

Ex Libris

[Hi.] 2. 11.

Bibliothecae Facultatis
Juridicae Edinburgi.

1947

1948

1949

1950

1951

1952

1953

1954

1955

1956

1957

1958

1959

THE MODERN PART
OF THE
UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

Compiled from

ORIGINAL WRITERS;

BY THE

AUTHORS of the *ANTIEN*T.

Which will perfect the WORK, and render it

A Complete Body of HISTORY,

FROM THE EARLIEST ACCOUNT of Time, to the PRESENT.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεσθαι μὴ κατανόει, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ εὐρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἅπερ ἔτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως.
Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

VOL. V.

LONDON:

Printed for T. OSBORNE, C. HITCH and L. HAWES, A. MILLAR, J. RIVINGTON, S. CROWDER, P. DAVEY and B. LAW,
T. LONGMAN, C. WARE, and S. BLADON.

MDCCLX.

MODERN HISTORY:

BEING A

CONTINUATION

OF THE

UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

BOOK XVIII.

CHAP. XII.

Terra Australis : Or, A history of the Southern Continent.

SECT. I.

- IT has been a long disputed point, whether Science stands more indebted to speculation, or to practice founded upon accident; whether the greatest discoveries have been made by men of deep thought, or by persons of long experience? It would, however, seem to be a controversy easily decided, by justly stating the proposition; since it is certain that the most useful discoveries have been the result of a just mixture of both. Hence it was that the first idea of the possibility of sailing round the world had its origin. The ingenious Genoese, Columbus, first laid down his system of the world from his conception; adding to it the proofs he had drawn from experience. Both he, Magellan, Le Maire, &c. were men of genius, erudition for those days, and experience; without the union of which we should, perhaps, never have owed the discovery of America to the first, of the streights called by his name to the second, nor the most commodious passage round Cape Horn to the third. In all attempts of this nature, those men only ought to be employed, who, to the competent abilities of seamen, have added a general capacity, a tincture of science, with a solid and enlarged judgment. The want of these has been the cause why mankind have so long been amused with idle fables, and monstrous absurdities substituted in the room of true and useful history. Voyages, in general, have been so insipid, tedious, false, and inconsistent, that a reader may toil through folios, and remain ignorant of the most essential articles; points of the greatest importance both to himself and his country. This has not only been an obstruction to true science, but also to the commerce, wealth, and power of nations; since, upon true relations of former attempts, depends the success of future enterprizes.
- c To a narrow system of politics we may likewise, in some measure, attribute the many absurd and ridiculous accounts published of different parts of the globe, and more particularly of the Southern Continent, as a more perfect knowledge might probably interfere with the interest of certain corporations, or individuals, who bear a considerable influence. To what but such selfish views can we ascribe the conduct of the Dutch, who would seem no less diligent in suppressing, than others would be in publishing, every account of this great tract of country, which could induce people to open a communication with, or settle colonies in it? Can we help believing, that the reason why the journals of Pelsart, and other unsuccessful
- Introduction to the history of the Terra Australis.*
- Reasons why so imperfect relations of this part of the globe have hitherto appeared.*
- Mod. Hist. Vol. V. B voyagers,

Lib. Bib. Acad. Edin.

The jealousy of the Dutch East India company, lest a commerce with the Terra Australis should be opened.

The manner in which the authors propose to describe the Terra Austra-
lis.

voyagers, were permitted to see the light, was any other than to deter men by the hardships a they underwent, the frightful descriptions of the country, and monstrous pictures they drew of the inhabitants of New Guiney and New Holland, from approaching so inhospitable a shore? Certain it is, that nothing could be more prejudicial to the interest of all the India companies in Europe, though perhaps nothing would more conduce to the increase of industry and commerce, than the success of that design set on foot by the Dutch West India company in 1721, of opening a traffick with different parts of the Southern Continent. That the East India company looked upon it in this light, is apparent from their having seized Roggewin, the person intrusted with the expedition, and condemned his ship and cargo at Batavia, where he put in for refreshments (A). Experience proves how advantageous to trade, manufactures, and the naval strength of a nation, all new discoveries are; how they heighten the spirit of b industry, and enlarge the sphere and marts of trade; yet has this probably valuable country been almost totally neglected, and no attempts have been made by any nation in Europe to settle a colony in it. If we may judge from the climate, as well as from the relations of such mariners as have touched upon the coasts of New Holland and New Guiney, no part of the world more abounds in the richest merchandize, or at least is more capable of producing them. Some travellers even describe them as abounding with rich vallies, pleasant and wholesome water-brooks, gold, silver, mace, nutmegs, ginger, and sugar-canes of an extraordinary size, with fowls, fish, and every thing conducive to the happiness and luxury of life (B). However, as no complete account of the Southern Continent has yet appeared, we shall lay before the reader a view of the particulars in each voyage which best deserve his attention, leaving c him thence to judge of the truth of the preceding reflections. This we apprehend to be the most satisfactory method of treating the history of a country but little known, and most conducive to the success of future attempts towards new discoveries.

ALL the southern part of the globe has been little frequented. It would have the appearance of nothing more than a prodigious tract of ocean, unless capes and coasts had been discovered, a certain sign of a continent. In all the voyages hither, when the course was held eastward betwixt Africa and America, for a run of 48 degrees, continual signs of a neighbouring shore were observed; and one proof of the Southern Continent's being divided from the other parts of the world, is, that the circumnavigation of the globe has been performed parallel to the equator, always leaving the Southern Continent on that side. Hence it is, d that no irrefragable proofs have yet appeared, whether America, towards California, be joined to Asiatic Russia. But that a more distinct view of this matter, and the most complete materials for farther improvements, may be laid before the reader, we shall give a faithful abridgment of the chief voyages to the south, and sum up the whole with such reflections as naturally rise from the facts, without wresting or torturing any thing into a proof of a favourite hypothesis (C).

(A) The judicious reflection of the famous John de Witte merits attention. His words are these: "When the East India company had attained to a certain extent of wealth and power, their interest became opposite to that of their country. For, whereas the advantage of the Dutch consists in the increase of their manufactures, commerce, and freight of ships, that of the company inclines them to promote the sale of foreign manufactures, with the least traffick and navigation in their power. Hence it is a settled point, that if the company gains more by importing Japan cloths, Indian quilts, &c. than raw silk; or if, by creating a scarcity of nutmegs, cloves, cinnamon, and other things, they can raise the price of them, so as to gain as much by 100 tons as they would by 1000, we are not to expect they will import those raw silks, or put themselves to the expence of transporting 1000 tons of spices, though the former would assist our manufactures, and the latter increase our navigation." This judicious reflection we see verified not only in the conduct of the Dutch, but nearer home; where, to the eternal infamy of those in whose hands it is, the spirit of trade is rather confined than pushed to its utmost extent, as is evident in two monopolies in the kingdom.

(B) So little is this country known, that some writers take it for a part of the continent of America; other for a large cluster of islands; and one or two others for a fifth division of the terraqueous globe. Dampier positively affirms, that in no part does it communicate with Asia, Africa, or America. Our reasons for calling it a continent will appear in the sequel.

(C) We give that part the name of the Southern Continent, which lies beyond the three southern points of the known world; that is, beyond the Cape of Good Hope, the Moluccas and Celebes, and the Streights of Magellan; a space containing about 8 or 10 millions of square leagues, which is more than a division of the globe. Nor is it possible to suppose such a vast tract of sea without a continent, and that an extensive one of solid earth, south of Asia, to preserve the necessary counterpoise and equilibrium of the globe in its rotation. Let any one consider the two hemispheres of the globe, cut by the equator and not by the meridian, he will be amazed to find so great an expanse of land in the one, and so little in the other. From such an examination of the whole it will appear, that there is a continent only of 120 degrees cut by the Atlantic ocean in the one part, while on the other a body of water remains of 240 degrees, separated only by some little islands. Hence we may conclude, that the weight of the Arctic hemisphere would be more than proportionable to the Antarctic, unless there was a tract of continent hitherto unknown in the latter. What the consequence of such an inequality would be, every one the least conversant with geographical problems is well acquainted with. Sufficient it is for our purpose, that physical reasons, as well as the proofs drawn from experience, assure us, that a large tract of hitherto-unknown country must necessarily lie south of the equator; and this we call the Southern Continent (1).

(1) Vide Buffon's Works, vol. ii. p. 125. Collect. de Maurijas, t. m. i. sub fin.

- a. BESIDES the voyages to the Streights of Magellan, the first persons who are said to have penetrated to New Guinea and New Holland, were Binot Paulmier de Gonneville, a Frenchman, and Alvaar de Saavedra, a Spaniard. All the best historians agree, that to the latter is owing the discovery of New Guinea, A. 1528; though the French labour hard to prove the merit of this discovery due to their own countryman; yet so fabulous is the account said to be drawn from the papers of Gonneville, so romantic the air of the narrative, as well as imperfect in dates, latitudes, and the longitude of the places he describes, that we cannot help looking upon the whole as a fiction^a. Admitting it to be true, it can prove of little use towards further discoveries, the true end of all such journals. Saavedra gave it the name of New Guinea, because he supposed it to be diametrically opposite to Guinea on the coast of Africa, as well as from the resemblance between the inhabitants of these two countries both in complexion, features, and the woolly hair. Others call it Terra de Papa, alleging, that Papa signifies black, in the language of the country^b. As in other respects the journal of Saavedra is greatly deficient, we shall pass it over, to recite those of subsequent navigators, who are more minute and exact in their narratives. Among the first is that of Don Pedro Fernandez de Quiros, a Portuguese by nation, who, in the year 1606, went to Lima in the squadron of Alvaro de Mandano, in which he served as pilot; from whence, it is probable, he had made a voyage into the Pacific Ocean before that time^c. Upon this occasion, he discovered the island called after his name, lying in 20° lat. and 240° longitude. Running after this 20° and 10' parallel, he discovered a number of other unknown islands. Schouten and Roggewin afterwards steered the same course with de Quiros; and his account is confirmed by the most experienced and faithful seamen, although it had been for a great number of years looked upon as fiction at the court of Madrid. Philip III. of Spain being extremely desirous to prosecute the discoveries already made in the Pacific Ocean by Gallego and Mindano, in both which expeditions Quiros had served, proposed to send him to conduct another voyage from Peru, where he was to be furnished with two proper ships, and every other necessary for the success of the design. Quiros, although he had suffered extreme hardships for the space of eleven years, in his former voyages, readily undertook this; the success of which will best appear from the contents of his memorial delivered in to the court of Spain after his return^d.
- d. IN this memorial he represents to his catholic majesty, that the continent he desired to settle was south of the equator, equal in bigness to Europe and the Lesser Asia together, a great part of it lying in the torrid zone; and therefore, in his opinion, likely to abound in the richest commodities. It ought, he says, to be esteemed the fourth part of the globe; an assertion we do not well comprehend, unless he reckons Europe, Asia, and Africa, the first part, the East Indies the second, America the third, and this new-found country the fourth division. As to its extent, his own experience led him no farther than the 15th degree southern latitude; yet, from what De Torres and Mindano observed, he conjectures it may be about 90° in breadth. The people about 15° S. L. he describes of various complexions, some white, some black, and others of a tawny colour. He is positive that the countries in this part are populous and well cultivated, the natives of a tame peaceable disposition, and extremely industrious, as far as their knowledge extends. He describes particularly in his journal (now lost), to which the petition refers, the plants, trees, beasts, birds, and fishes, with the whole natural history of it, affirming that it affords all the conveniencies of life in the utmost plenty, together with gold, silver, spices, and sugar-canes. He describes the bays of St. James and St. Philip, which are large and commodious, and their fine harbour, capable of containing 1000 ships, he calls La Vera Cruz, in the neighbourhood of seven islands; one of which he surrounded, finding it about 50 leagues in circumference. The haven lies in 15° 40' S. L. Quiros expatiates on the advantages that might arise from a settlement there, and insists particularly on its being the properest means for uniting the large dominions of Spain in the East and West Indies, as lying between both, and affording an easy opportunity of carrying on a safe and beneficial trade with either. This he offered to demonstrate to such commissioners as should be appointed by his majesty to examine into the affair, provided they were competent judges, and sufficiently skilled in geography. But whether these commissioners were ever appointed, and the proposals of Quiros examined, we have no proof.
- f. As a proof that commerce is carried on among the inhabitants of different countries of the Southern Continent, he describes them not only of different complexions, but says, that some wore long, black, and strait hair; others short, thick, and crisped wool upon their heads. They are very ignorant in mechanics, and live without fortifications or walls, without kings,

New Guinea discovered, A. 1527-8.

Voyage of Fernandez de Quiros into the Pacific Ocean. A. D. 1606.

An account of the memorial presented by Quiros to Philip III. of Spain.

A description from Quiros of the Terra Australis, or Southern Continent.

Quiros's opinion on that a commerce is carried on among the several

^a Hist. des Navigat. aux Terres Aust. tom. i. p. 102.

CHAS, tom. vi. p. 1442.

^b Hist. des Navigat. p. 104. tom. i.

^c PUR-

CHAS.

nations of the Southern Continent.

laws, or government, in a kind of primitive simplicity and innocence (D). Notwithstanding which, their promiscuous manner of living occasions frequent quarrels and ruptures, when the weapons they use are bows and arrows, clubs, pikes, darts, &c. all of wood. They wear a sort of covering from the waist down to the middle of the thigh, and are finically nice in neatness and cleanliness, nothing offending their natural good-humour and chearful temper so much as a slovenly disposition. Hence Quiros concludes how easy it would be to establish a colony among them. They build with wood, covering their houses with palm-tree leaves. Pitchers and vessels they make of a kind of loam, or earth dried in the sun : scissars, saws, and knives, they make of mother of pearl and oyster-shells ; which shews that they are not so ignorant of mechanics as Quiros calls them ; especially as he acknowledges that the art of weaving or knitting is not unknown to them. Their boats are excellently fitted either to row or sail with the utmost celerity ; an undeniable proof that either they border upon some civilized nations, or have themselves made some progress in the arts ^c.

A description
of the people, produce, and nature, of the Southern Con-
tinent.

THERE are three kinds of roots in great abundance, of which the natives make a very agreeable sort of bread, with very little trouble. The country abounds in the most delicious fruits, as almonds, cocoa-nuts, lemons, oranges, guavas, and mangoes. The palm-tree affords them a juice greatly resembling and little inferior to wine. From this they make a kind of whey and vinegar, as also an excellent honey by evaporation. A species of fruit they call the cocos is in great esteem among them, as it affords both meat and drink, besides an excellent burning oil, that exsudes from the shell exposed to the sun. From the whole description, however, of this fruit he dwells so long upon, it appears to be no other than the cocoa-nut ; which he mentions as a different fruit in another part of the memorial. Of the palm-leaves they make sails for their small boats, and a kind of ingenious mats or carpets, either for ciellings, floors, or hangings. Quiros affirms, that he has likewise seen melons, apples, pears, and other European fruits, among them, more excellent in proportion to the warmth of the climate, although this be a rule which does not hold universally. He has even tasted their beans, which, with the pork of that country, make an exquisite dish. The country affords plenty of hens, capons (for the art of castrating fowls is common among them), partridges, ducks, pigeons, turtles and stock-doves, besides cows, oxen, and goats ; none of which Quiros however saw. Their coasts abound with fish of various kinds, upon which Quiros's crew chiefly lived during their stay here. Nutmegs, mace, ginger, and pepper, they found here, some of which they carried with them to Mexico, it proving in every respect equal to what is brought from the Moluccas. He likewise takes notice of cinnamon, and says it is probable that the country likewise affords cloves, as it not only produces the other spices, but lies parallel with the island of Ternate, Banda, and the Moluccas ; a method of reasoning by no means unnatural. Many materials are produced for cordage and sail-cloth, and the whole abounds with wood of various sorts, of which the most valuable is ebony. He mentions a bituminous exsudation from the cocos, which might well supply the room of pitch, with a mixture of bees-wax and tallow, of which the climate affords abundance ; concluding, that nothing besides iron is wanting towards ship-building ; and this he thinks possible the country may likewise supply at a greater distance from the Tropics ^f.

As to the soil, it is rich and fertile, producing every thing almost spontaneously, or with very little culture. The fields are divided, interlaced, and watered, by pleasant brooks and rivers, that fall down from the mountains. Many of the rivers are so large as to afford the strongest arguments of the prodigious extent of this track of land. The air is pure and healthy, which he proves from the perfect health the whole crew enjoyed during their residence on the coast ; and one thing very remarkable is, that, unlike other warm climates, it is intirely free of every kind of noxious vermin ; no gnats, flies, and musquitos, in the air ; no crocodiles, serpents, or snakes, either by land or by water ; in short, nothing that can disturb or molest the most perfect enjoyment and tranquillity. Upon the whole, he scruples not to prefer this track of country to all the conquests of the Spaniards in both Indies.

THE account he gives of his taking possession of this fourth part of the globe, as he calls it, is somewhat remarkable. We shall therefore give it in his own words, especially as it will shew the reader the necessity we are under of giving only an extract of the whole. “ Such, Sire, are the greatness and goodness of the countries which I have discovered, of which I have already taken possession in the name of your majesty, and under your royal banner, as appeareth by the acts which I keep safely in my power, whereunto I proceeded in the following manner :
“ 1. Sire, we erected a cross, and built a church in honour of our Lady of Loretto. Then we

^c PURCHAS, tom. iv. p. 1423.

^f Ibid. tom. i. p. 1424. Hist. de Navigat. ibid.

(D) The reader is to observe that Quiros is here latitude, where he put into several bays on the continent. speaking of the people living about 15° 40' north

“ caused

- a “ caused twenty masses to be celebrated there, our troops all passing thither to receive certain indulgences upon Whitsunday. We also made a solemn procession, and observed the feast of the Blessed Sacrament, which was carried in procession, your majesty’s banner flying before it, through a great circuit of countries, honoured with the preference of the same. In three several places we set up our title, in each of which we erected a column with the arms of your majesty engraved upon them. Hence you have received a prodigious addition of territory, this country stretching beyond words into the continent. I have therefore presented to your majesty’s other titles, that of La Austrialia del Espiritu Santo, the which I wish may be blazoned and spread over the face of the whole world, for the glory of God, and the honour of your majesty^f.”
- b In another memorial, which Purchas has preserved in the original Spanish, he recites most of the particulars we have related, together with many other circumstances, which would seem to speak it his last effort to have colonies sent thither. Here, besides the country already described, he gives the names of about twenty islands; viz. Yaumico, Manicola, Chicayana, Guatopo, Mecarayla, Tucopio, Fonoforo, Pilan, Papon, and others, which it would be tedious to relate. Describing the bay of St. Philip and St. James, or Baya de Sant Felipe y Sant Jago, and harbour of Vera Cruz, he believes them to belong to the continent, as he judges from the high double mountains, and the largeness of the river Jordan. Quiros staid ten days in the island of Yaumico. Here the king, or lord, called Tamay, was of great service to him, with his people, in supplying the ships with fruits, roots, and fresh water. He was a man of sense, tall, and full-bodied; his colour of a sea-ware, or reddish; his eyes light, his nose aquiline, his hair and beard curled, with a grave aspect and majestic deportment. He described, by signs, about 60 islands, and a great country called Manicola, lying from S. S. E. to N. E. To represent the large islands, he drew large circles, or irregular figures, and smaller ones for the lesser islands. In representing the continent, he opened his arms, pointed to the sun, shut his eyes, and made other gesticulations, expressing that it would be ten weeks sailing to surround the islands. Quiros, the following day, saw many more of the natives, all of whom perfectly agreed in their accounts. When he departed, he carried off four of the inhabitants, three of which died before his arrival at Mexico; but the other, after having learned the Spanish, coincided with the relation given by his countrymen.
- c He carries off some of the natives with him to Mexico, whose account perfectly agreed with what Quiros related.
- d This man gave an account of an island distant about three days sailing from Yaumico, which, he said, was larger than Yaumico and Chicayana taken together. This he called Guatopo, inhabited by people chiefly of white complexions, and various-coloured hair. He launched out greatly into the fertility and wealth of Manicola, which induced Quiros, from the signs he made, to make trial how far he understood him, or how true his relation might be. On his arrival here, he found every thing corresponding with the account of the Indian, and rather exceeding than falling short of his description^g. Upon the whole, Quiros would seem to be of opinion, that those islands were in the neighbourhood of a continent stretching from 240° longitude to New Holland and New Guinea, the islands of Solomon lying surrounded by that part of the ocean from 12° lat. quite to the equinoctial line. How far his conjectures are verified by future navigators, we shall be able to judge from the voyages of Roggevin, and others (E).

^f Lib. ult. citat. p. 115. tom. i.^g PURCHAS, tom. i. p. 1425.

(E) We have not given the particulars of the voyage, as we found it in the French collection, for the following reasons. 1. Because we have some doubts concerning the authenticity of that journal, as Purchas speaks of it as lost; and, 2. Because all the particulars contained in it are found in the Memorial and Journals of Schouten and Roggevin.

S E C T. II.

Giving an account of the voyages and discoveries of William Cornelison Schouten, and Jaques Le Maire, in the South Seas.

Account of Le Maire and Schouten, with the intention of their voyage.

THE exclusive charter of the Dutch East India company was extremely displeasing to a number of the most considerable merchants in Holland, who were desirous of fitting out ships at their own expence, upon new discoveries. They thought it an intolerable grievance that they should be prohibited by the government, contrary to the law of nature, from using those passages, and reaping the fruits of those circumstances which Providence so wisely intended. Among these was Isaac Le Maire, a rich merchant of Amsterdam, well acquainted with business, of an enterprising spirit, directed by a sound judgment. Le Maire was desirous of employing part of the wealth he had acquired in trade to the advantage of posterity, and in building fame for himself as a discoverer. With this view he applied to Schouten, a man in easy circumstances, of great reputation as a seaman, and perfect knowledge in the East Indies, to which he had performed several voyages in the different stations of master, pilot, and supercargo. The question proposed by Le Maire to the intelligent Schouten was, Whether he did not believe it possible to find another passage, besides the Streights of Magellan, into the South Seas; and whether, if this discovery was made, the countries to the south of that passage might not afford as rich commodities as either the East or West Indies? Schouten gave it as his opinion that such a passage was highly probable, and was still more positive with respect to the wealth and fertility of the southern countries. After many conversations upon the subject, a resolution was formed of attempting the discovery, from a full persuasion that the States General could not intend, by their exclusive charter to the East India company, to preclude their other subjects from discovering countries on the south, by a new route, distinct from either the passage to India by the Streights of Magellan or the Cape of Good Hope. In consequence of this, an agreement was entered upon, whereby Le Maire and his friends furnished one moiety of the expence, and Schouten and his friends the other. Accordingly, the following spring, A. 1615, two ships were equipped with every thing necessary for the voyage, which was to be under the direction of Schouten in person, and Jaques Le Maire, son to Isaac Le Maire, who was to act in quality of a supercargo.

They determine to search for another passage than the Streights of Magellan into the South Sea.

On May the 25th, they weighed anchor from the Texel, and had sight of the *Madeira*s on the 11th of July, where Schouten resolved not to touch, that no time might be lost. On the 20th they fell in with the north side of Cape Verd, a north-east wind obliging them to anchor there. Here the Moorish Alcaid came on board, and furnished them with a supply of fresh water, for a certain reward. August 21st, they weighed from the Cape, and, by the 31st, saw the high land of Sierra Leona, and also the island of Madrabomba, lying on the south point of the high land of Sierra Leona, and north of the shallows of St. Ann's island. By the 26th of September they made $6^{\circ} 25'$ S. latitude, sailing the remainder of that month mostly southward, till they made $10^{\circ} 30'$. November the 1st, they had the sun north of them at noon. On the 3d, they had sight of Ascension island under 20° , where they observed the compass to vary to the N. E. 12° . The 21st they came under $38^{\circ} 25'$, and here the variation of the compass was 17° to the N. E. December 6th, they had a prospect of land not very high, but rather flat and white; soon after which they fell in with the north side of Port Desire, and that night anchored within a degree and a half of land in ten fathom water, with an ebb that ran strongly southward. The 7th, keeping their course due south, they came before the harbour of Port Desire, lying under $47^{\circ} 40'$; at the entry of which they had very high water, but saw none of the cliffs which former voyagers described northward in sailing into the harbour. Cliffs, however, to the south, were visible enough, which might perhaps be those meant by Van Noort. Upon this, they went on sailing so far south, that they missed the right chanel. They soon came into a crooked bay of four fathom water at high sea, and but 14 feet at the tide of ebb. Here they found abundance of eggs among the cliffs, muscles, and fine smelts, for which they gave it the name of Smelt Bay. After this, they went to Port Desire, where they staid till January 13th, an. 1616. On the 20th, they got into 53° , when they observed a great current that runs S. W.; and now they reckoned about 20 leagues southward of the Streights of Magellan. From hence they held their course S. by W. and the same day saw land bearing W. S. W. from them, and quickly after to the South. Then attempting to get beyond the land by an E. S. E. course, the hard north wind that blew then constrained them to take in their top-sails, and reef the main-sail. The 24th, in the forenoon, they saw land about a league's distance, stretching out east and south, with high hills covered with ice, with other land bearing east from it, high and rugged as the former. These they conjectured lay about eight leagues asunder, with a good passage between them, because of a

* Histoire des Navigat. tom. i. livre iii. p 352.

- a brisk current that ran southward by them. About noon they made $54^{\circ} 46'$, and then began steering towards the above passage, but were prevented by a calm. Here they saw such an incredible number of penguins and huge shoals of whales, as forced them to proceed with caution, for fear of running the ships upon them.

- By the 25th they got close up by the east land, which, upon the north side, reaches E. S. E. States Island, as far as the eye can follow it. This they called States Land, and to that lying west they gave the name of Maurice Land. In this place they observed good roads and sandy bays, with ^{Maurice} great store of fish, penguins, and porpoises, as well as some kinds of fowls; but the land ^{Land.} adjacent seemed quite naked and barren. Having a north wind upon their entrance into this passage, they steered S. S. W.; so that by noon they made $55^{\circ} 36'$, and then held a S. W. course. The land on the south side of the passage seemed to run W. S. W. at the west end of Maurice Land, and S. W. as far as they could see it, it being rough craggy ground. In the evening, having a S. W. wind, they steered southward, meeting with prodigious billows rolling before the wind, which, with the depth of the soundings, gave them a full assurance that the South Sea was now before them, into which they had almost made their way by a passage of their own discovery. The sea-gulls here were as large as swans, their wings, when extended, measuring about a fathom. They would sit upon the sides of the ship, and suffer themselves to be taken, without attempting to fly away. The 26th they made 57° , and were overtaken by a storm from the S. and S. W. All this day they continued to steer southward, but at night changed it for a N. W. course; in which quarter they discovered very high land. On the 27th they were under $56^{\circ} 51'$, the weather cold, with hail and rain, a west and westerly south wind blowing. Here they went a southern course, and crossed northward with their main-sails. After this, they steered with a W. and then a N. E. wind, holding their course S. and then W. W. by S. which brought them under $56^{\circ} 48'$. The 29th they had a N. W. wind, and held their course S. W. which gave them the prospect of two islands surrounded with high cliffs, lying W. S. W. from them. These they called Barnevelt Islands, lying in 57° S. From hence taking a N. W. course, they saw land again in the evening, lying S. from the Streights of Magellan, to which they gave the name of Cape Horn, from its pointed figure, the extremity of which is in $57^{\circ} 48'$ S. They held their course westward from hence, and were fully convinced, by the billows rolling upon them, as well as the strong current, that the passage was open into the South Sea. This day they made the latitude of $57^{\circ} 31'$. At last, on the 12th of February, ^{The Streights of le Maire discovered, and they arrive in the South Sea.} they plainly discerned the Streights of Magellan, lying to the E. of them; from whence being assured of their happy new discovery, they gave thanks to their good fortune in three rounds of wine. The passage received the name of the Streights of Le Maire, he being the original projector of the enterprize. It is observable, that, during their passage through the new-found streights, they had settled bad weather, thick fogs, and strong currents, which made the navigation tedious, and their discoveries less considerable, than otherwise they probably might have been. On the 27th they made 40° S. lat. with fair weather, holding their course northward. After this they steered for Juan Fernandez, at which they arrived on March 1st. As the crews became extremely sickly by so tedious a voyage, the refreshments of this place were received with the utmost joy ^b.

- We find in this journal one of the oldest accounts of the two islands of Juan Fernandez; but as they are now well known, we shall pass it over. On the 11th they passed the Tropic of Capricorn a second time, holding their course N. till the 15th. When they made 18° , then they steered due west. April 3d they made $15^{\circ} 12'$, and had then no variation of the compass. Towards noon they discovered a small low island. They sent the shallop on shore here, and caught a great number of fish; finding nothing, however, upon shore but a species of dogs in every respect resembling European dogs, for which reason they called this place the Island of Dogs. It was covered by a fine long grass of a bright green, that gave a beautiful ^{Dog Island.} look to the coast, which might be about three leagues in circumference. The island lies in $15^{\circ} 12'$, and about 925 leagues from the coast of Peru (F). For four days they sailed W. and W. by N. when they fell in with a large but low island, from which an Indian canoe advanced to meet them. The men were naked, of a reddish complexion, with long black hair, of a robust make, and strong limbs, their eyes extremely sharp and piercing ^c. They kept aloof from the ship, but invited the Dutch, by signs and shouts, to come on shore. Schouten ordered his men to speak to them in the Spanish, Dutch, the Moluccan, and Javan languages, none of which they understood. The ship approached within musket-shot of the ^b HARRIS, vol. i. b. i. c. 1. §. 9. Hist. des Navig. l. iii. p. 364.

 Aufl. t. i. p. 361.

^c Vid. Hist. des Navig. aux Terres

(F) This is probably the island which Magellan, This at least is the conjecture of the French compiler according to Jerom Bezon, calls the Unfortunate Island. (1), which we think by no means improbable.

(1) Hist. des Navig. t. i. p. 358.

shore, but found no soundings; upon which he steered round, in expectation of finding a bay to cast anchor in. After having sailed about 10 leagues in a S. S. W. course, they came close to the shore, on which several of those naked people flocked close to the water-side, and invited them to land. One of their canoes put out, but would not venture to come on board. They were greatly pleased with the toys thrown to them, and at last encouraged to come to the ship. After they had for a while surveyed her, they ventured on board, where they immediately fell to work in taking the nails and bolts out of the cabin doors and windows, seeming to have an extraordinary passion for this metal. Indeed they did not confine themselves to iron only; for, when that was out of their reach, they paid their respects with great address to whatever lay nearest them.

THE inhabitants of this island are of a very particular humour, much addicted to stealing, at which they are abundantly expert. They go quite naked, the pudenda only being covered with a small mat. Their bodies are painted all over with the pictures of snakes and dragons, drawn upon a blue ground, resembling the effects of powder upon the skin. They drank eagerly of the wine given them, but could not be prevailed on to return the cup. The next day Schouten sent the shallop with about sixteen men armed on shore, who were no sooner landed than they were attacked by a body of 30 or 40 natives, that rushed upon them from the woods. As they were armed only with clubs, the seamen found it no difficult matter to repulse them; but, finding all their endeavours to bring them to traffick were to no purpose, they returned to the ship, and proceeded in their voyage. This island they called by the name of Without Bottom, because they were able to find no soundings. It is a long narrow island, seemingly fertile, abounding with palm and cocoa trees, and lying in latitude 15° S. about 108 leagues from Dog Island ^a.

ON the 16th Schouten fell in with another island, about 15 leagues distant from the former. The land is almost intirely overflowed, yet trees flourish upon the borders. Upon a little eminence they discerned a spring of fresh water, with which they supplied the ship, and thence gave the place the name of Water Island.

THE 18th they came to another island, 20 leagues distant westward. The boat was sent to look out for water, and soon fell in with a gentle stream at 40 fathoms sounding. The incredible swarm of flies and insects with which this island abounded, made it impossible for them to fill their casks, being forced immediately to return to the ship, with their clothes and faces covered over with those vermin. This they called Fly Island, and left without farther observations, having found however that it was inhabited.

ON the 23d they got under the latitude $15^{\circ} 4'$, where they had great billows rolling from the south. They conjectured they might as yet be 250 leagues from the Southern Continent described by Quiros (G). May the third they sailed westward, and made at noon $15^{\circ} 3'$, in which latitude they met several great dorados (a kind of gold-fish), the first they had seen in the South Sea. On the 9th they were under the latitude $15^{\circ} 20'$, when they conjectured they might be about 1510 leagues from the coast of Peru. This day they discovered a bark coming towards them, upon which they proceeded to meet her, but she turning her course, the captain ordered a gun to be fired to bring her to. As this had not the desired effect, the shallop was sent with a number of men armed to seize her, which she did, making prisoners of about 23 men, with some women and children. They were a cleanly decent people, of a copperish complexion, curled hair, naked to the waist, and from the knee downwards. The bark was of a very peculiar structure, but well adapted to the purposes of sailing. All that was found on board consisted of a few fishing-hooks made of stone, mother of pearl, tortoise-shell, or a kind of black bone. After endeavouring to procure information from them, they were dismissed, having received the kindest treatment; with which the poor savages were so delighted, that they pulled off their caps, stuck with gaudy feathers formed in the fashion of a coronet, and put them on the heads of the sailors.

SCHOUTEN, steering W. S. W. discovered on the 10th high land on the larboard side, lying south-east-by-south, about eight leagues distant. The 11th he came up with a very high island, and about two leagues southward discovered another flatter, and seemingly more fertile. Near this island another bark approached them with incredible swiftness, her men steering with oars astern. Taking the soundings, they found fourteen fathom water, in which they cast anchor. The island stands in $16^{\circ} 10'$, being one intire mountain, all covered over with cocoa-trees. They were soon visited by three large barks, and about ten canoes with white flags in token of peace. Those canoes were of an extraordinary make, being flat before, and quite sharp behind, notwithstanding which they row with great velocity. When they came

^a Hist. des Navig. p. 556. tom. i. HARRIS, ubi sup.

(G) It may be proper to observe, that although yet it is probable that Le Maire never saw his journal, Quiros had performed his voyage some years before, as it was not printed till the year 1613.

within

- a within a small distance of the ship, they leaped into the sea, and swam towards her with cocoanuts in their hands, which they bartered for nails and beads, giving five nuts for a nail. This traffick drew such a number of the natives to the ship, that she soon was crowded with them, going up and down with the utmost familiarity. Schouten, to avoid being troubled with greater numbers, sent the long-boat to look out for an anchorage on the other island; but she was presently surrounded and covered by a number of canoes, filled with a fierce and savage people, armed with clubs, who attacked the Dutch with great fury. The seamen fired upon them, but were laughed at, as no one happened to be hurt by the first discharge; but the second doing execution, the savages were terrified, and began to abandon the long-boat. Some of the wounded who were taken, being kept prisoners, and kindly treated, it soon induced others to
- b come on board the ship, with seemingly more friendly intentions. They were a strong-built, well-proportioned people, naked, thorough-bred, and excellent swimmers. Their complexion was inclining to black, their hair long and black, though some cut it short, and were extremely whimsical in their manner of dressing it.

THEY now began to come on board with cocoa-nuts, bananas, ubas roots, and live hogs; which they exchanged for the most trifling and useless toys, priding themselves greatly on having outwitted the Europeans. They wondered much at the strength and size of the ship, knocked against her with stones, and then turned up their eyes in admiration. The king of the island sent a black hog as a present to the ship, ordering the messenger to accept of no reward; an order which he did not chuse strictly to obey. After this he put out from shore in his royal galley, attended by twenty canoes, but did not chuse to come on board, although he permitted his son, to gratify his curiosity. When near the ship, his men gave a loud shout, by way of welcoming the Europeans; which was returned by drums and trumpets, with the music of which his majesty was highly delighted. The king then sent a Matien from his vessel, as a present to Schouten, which he returned with an old hatchet, old nails, and some glass beads, with which his majesty was quite transported, or pretended to be so.

- He was distinguished from his subjects only by the respect they paid him, going like them naked, and without any badges of authority. For a day or two this friendly commerce continued, but the Europeans began afterwards to suspect that the professions of the savages were not very sincere, and their conjectures were soon verified; for all on a sudden they inclosed the ship on every side, and, with a loud shout, began to board and batter her with stones. His majesty's ship was the first and fiercest in the attack; but they were soon dispersed and defeated by a general discharge of grape-shot and musquetry. All traffick being thus at an end, Schouten left the island, after giving it the appellation of Traitors Island, from the conduct of the natives ^b.

- SCHOUTEN arrived on the 14th at an island he called Hope Island, because here he expected to meet with refreshments; but, being disappointed, he continued his course, after having defeated the natives in a brisk attack they made on the ship. This island was covered over with cocoanuts, and appeared to be fertile in the vallies. On the 18th, being under $16^{\circ} 5'$, Schouten called a council, in which he represented, that they were about 1600 leagues eastward of Peru and Chili; and as they had not yet discovered any thing like a continent, so there was no probability of their succeeding in that design, as they had failed so far westward. The same course, he said, would bring them to the coast of New Guiney, where, if they found no passage, they must inevitably perish, since there was no possibility of returning eastward, on account of the easterly winds, which were continually set in that continent. For these reasons he proposed, that they should alter their course northward, so as to fall in with the north side of New Guiney. The proposal was embraced by the rest of the crew, and accordingly they began immediately to steer a north-north-west course. The 21st, at two leagues from shore, they were visited by two canoes, who insulted them without any provocation, but retired with the loss of two men from a discharge of some muskets. The 22d other canoes approached the ship, but with a peaceable intention, bringing cocoa-nuts, ubas roots, and hogs, in exchange for beads, nails, and knives. The houses of the natives were ranged along the shore, being about 12 feet high, covered with leaves, and a porch before each. All the furniture consisted of a bed of dried herbs, an angling rod, and a great club; his majesty's palace differing in nothing but the size from the meanest subject's cottage. The people in general swim and dive with great dexterity, nor are they less expert in thieving than the inhabitants of some former islands we have mentioned. This crime, however, is punished by the king with great rigour, as the Europeans experienced in the case of one of them, who stole a cutlass, for which he was soundly beaten, and would have been put to death, had the fact come to the ear of the king. They were greatly terrified at the noise of the cannon, yet the king had a great desire to see one discharged. For this purpose he was seated under a canopy, with all his court round him; but, upon the explosion, he leaped out of his seat, and fled with the utmost celerity into the woods, ^a nor could all the assurances of the Europeans, that no danger was to be apprehended, bring him back, till he had recovered his fright. The Europeans went on shore to purchase hogs, in which they were disappointed, on account of their scarcity in the island; nor could they procure any supply of cocoa-nuts, although the natives seemed desirous of accommodating them. His majesty shewed them much friendship and respect; both he and his courtiers taking off their caps, adorned with plumes of beautiful feathers, and putting them on the heads of the Dutchmen^c. Notwithstanding this hospitality, he began to be apprehensive of their designs, and offered them a reward of ten hogs if they would quit the island.

^b Auct. citat. ibid.

As to the rest, the men are generally tall to an extreme, and strong built; they are of a yellowish complexion, with long black hair, which they wore after different fashions. Some ^b took great pains in curling or frizzing it, others bestowed equal labour in making it sleek and strait. Some tied it up in knots, and others wore it half an ell high over their heads, standing upright, with bits of wood and twigs to which they fastened it. The king and some of his courtiers wore two long locks, which hung down below their waist. As to the women, they are in general hard-favoured, of a disagreeable shape, with great loose breasts hanging down. Both sexes go quite naked, excepting a few leaves stitched together, which conceal the difference of sexes. They seem to be wholly devoid of religion, œconomy, industry, and knowledge. They live in the manner of brute animals, taking what the earth spontaneously puts forth, without care or labour. Here is neither sowing nor reaping, buying nor selling, every ^c thing being left to nature and chance. Nor is their regard to modesty greater than their industry and religion; for they use their women openly before the greatest assemblies, and even before the king, although they greatly reverence him, this being reputed no mark of disrespect or indecorum. Here is a good bay on the south side of the island, in a dock under 14° 16' ^d.

SCHOUTEN set sail from hence on June 11th, touching at no land till the 21st, when he fell in with a very low island, S.S.W. in latitude 40° 47'. Round it were four smaller islands, covered with trees. Soon after his casting anchor here he was visited by a canoe, of the same model as those of the above island. She carried four men, of a much darker complexion than any we have described, and armed with bows and arrows, the first they had seen in the South Seas. They told the ship's crew by signs, that there was more land and good accom- ^d modations to the westward, where the king dwelt; upon which Schouten weighed, and steered according to their directions. The 22d he sailed west-by-south-west, under 40° 45', and came within sight of a cluster of twelve or thirteen small islands, W. S. W. from them, which he left on the larboard. The 24th he saw three low islands on the larboard, all covered with trees of various sorts. These he called the Green Islands, on account of the pleasing verdure afforded by the trees. Soon after another island lying west-by-north presented itself. Upon this were seen eight or ten small hovels, plainly indicating that it was inhabited. This they called St. John Baptist's Island, because upon that day they discovered it. From hence they descried high land to the south-west, which they took to be the point of New Guiney. This they reached the same day, and, failing by it, sounded for anchorage, but without success. Two or three canoes filled ^e with men made an attack upon the ship with slings, but were soon dispersed. The inhabitants of this coast were exceeding black, wore no covering on any part of their bodies, and spoke a language quite different in sound from any of the former places they had touched at, but not less articulate and sonorous. All night they kept fires upon the shore, and seemed extremely apprehensive of the ship. In the morning they were no less shy, none of them being persuaded by the utmost civilities either to come on board, or to exchange any thing with the crew. Notwithstanding they were treated with all these marks of kindness, they soon assembled a body, and attacked the ship with slings, which they used with great dexterity, holding an obstinate engagement, till showers of grape-shot, fired among them, killed twelve or fourteen, upon which they dispersed. Their security seemed to be the sea, to which they fled, swimming and diving with the agility of natives of that element; however, the seamen in the long-boat found means to knock several of them on the head, as they emerged out of the water. Some they made prisoners, whom they afterwards ransomed for hogs and vegetables.

ON the 28th the ship set sail, and, holding a north-west-by-north course, they steered by ^{Three islands} land till the evening, in which they observed a number of bays and havens. This day they discovered three islands more to the northward, under 3° 20'. The 30th several canoes put out to them; and the Indians, boarding the ship with permission, broke staves in token of peace over their heads. Their canoes bore more of the marks of art than any of the former they had seen; themselves seemed to be more civilized and polished, notwithstanding they went naked from the waist upwards. They pretended poverty, and came only to beg, not to traffick; yet the ^g a island afforded great plenty of cocoa-nuts. On June the first Schouten anchored between an island two miles in length and the continent of New Guiney, where he was soon surrounded by twenty canoes of the same people, who the day before had broken their slaves. By the conduct of these it would appear, that the ceremony performed by the others was intended only to lull the Europeans into security, when they might more easily attack them. They began their design with fixing upon the anchor, and pulling the cable with their girdles, thinking to draw the ship nearer to them. The others came about her in the canoes, making a general discharge from their slings. Upon which a volley of grape-shot was fired among them, which, killing thirteen, put the rest to flight.

^c HARRIS, ibid.^d Histoire Moderne, t. vi. p. 229.

b THE ship continued her course, coasting peaceably along the shore, holding a W. N. W. route. On the 2d, under $3^{\circ} 12'$, they saw low land on the starboard. The 3d they saw high land, and were carried along by an easy current. On the 4th, as they were passing the islands we have mentioned, they discovered about twenty more lying all in a cluster, of various heights and sizes; most of these they left a-starboard, and only three on the larboard. Some were distant a mile, others divided only by a narrow stream from the rest, all of them lying under $2^{\circ} 30'$ nearly. On the 6th a very high hill was descried, which they took to be the mountain Goemenassi in Banda; but on a nearer approach discovering three more hills resembling it, six or seven leagues to the northward, they were more assured of the truth of their conjecture. The 7th they sailed towards those high hills, on some of which they discovered volcanoes, from which circumstance they gave it the name of Vulcan's Island. It seemed to be well inhabited, and stocked with cocoas, but they could find no anchorage. The people were naked, timid, and shy, speaking a language very different from any they had heard, and unintelligible to any of the blacks on board. There appeared more islands to the N. N. W. but the ship held her course to a very low one that lay N. W. by W. from them. Here they observed the water of various colours, green, white, and yellow, which they ascribed to the mixture of some rivers pouring into the sea; and the rather, because the water was much fresher than that of the ocean, filled with leaves and boughs, some of which had birds and crabs fastened upon them. The 8th they anchored at a high island in $3^{\circ} 40'$, which seemed to be an unhealthy place, yielding nothing considerable besides ginger. It was inhabited by Papooos, or blacks, whose ridiculous fancy in dress, superadded to their natural deformity, made them appear highly disagreeable. Every one had something absurd about him, quite peculiar to himself. Nay, it would appear that nature was no less sportive and wanton than their own humour and caprice; for the features, limbs, and size, had nothing of a resemblance, or any certain national criterion. Round their necks they wore strings of hogs teeth; their noses and ears were perforated for rings, to which were suspended those inestimable jewels the hogs teeth. Their hair was short and frizzled, their features insipid and dead, and the whole turn of face and symmetry of parts such as could not fail to disgust. Nor were the women a whit more agreeable than the men, they preserving the same manners, and being stamped with the same unhappy and forbidding figure. They built their huts upon stakes, eight or nine feet from the ground, which seemed to indicate an unhealthy dampness or moisture.

c On the 9th they anchored in a more convenient bay at twenty-six fathom, with a sandy bottom mixed with clay. There were two villages of the natives near the shore, from whence they brought hogs and cocoa-nuts to the ship, but kept them at so high a price, that there was no bartering with them. But now, after sailing for several days along this coast, they were unable to determine whether or no it was New Guiney. At first, from the four high hills, they were assured they had got to Banda, in which however they were mistaken, as appeared by the continent that ran along to the southward. Neither did their charts agree, nor their opinions of the lands they had in prospect, which for the most part stretched N. W. by W. Notwithstanding this scruple, they still continued a W. N. W. course along the shore, by which, and the assistance of a gentle current, they made $2^{\circ} 58'$ by the 12th at noon.

f THE 13th and 14th they pursued the same direction, having sometimes very high and sometimes exceeding low land in view. On the 15th they reached two low islands about half a league from the land, and under $2^{\circ} 54'$ S. lat. Now they had good anchoring at forty-six fathom; and, seeing the country was well stocked with cocoa-nuts, the boat and shallop well armed were sent on shore. They were observed by the Indians, who gave them a warm reception with their slings and arrows, wounding sixteen of the men, and obliging them to fly with precipitation to the ship, without having leisure to try the effects of their fire-arms. The 16th Schouten sailed in between both islands, and dropped anchor in nine fathom water. The same day the boat well armed landed upon the lesser island, set fire to some villages, and carried off a booty of cocoa-nuts. Henceforward the natives became more peaceable and gentle, for, on the following day, they came with cocoa-nuts, bananas, ginger, and a yellow root which they

Vulcan's
Island.

Coast of New Guiney, and the island surrounding it.

use for saffron. After the quarrel was made up, they ventured on board, exchanging the product of the island for old nails and beads. On the 18th they brought on board prodigious quantities of cocoa-nuts, bananas, cassava, and papada. The two last were inferior to what is found in the West Indies, but the use to which it is applied is the same, both baking it into large round cakes, which they use for bread.

Mofa Island.

Jufan Island.

Armeria Island, and by the French commonly called Armoia, or Arimoa.

THE lesser island, which lies the most eastward, the natives call Mofa, and to the other they gave the name of Jufan. The third island is by much the largest, standing about five leagues from the coast of New Guinea. This they call by the name of Armeria. Schouten naturally concluded, that these islands had been visited before by Europeans, for the natives were not terrified at the discharge of fire-arms, and a number of Spanish pots and jars were seen among them. This suspicion was the more confirmed, because those savages did not express the same wonder at the sight of the ship, or shew an equal curiosity to pry into every particular, as others to whom it was a novelty; which however did not seem to proceed from stupidity, or want of sensibility.

THE 21st Schouten sailed along by the north-west land, and at noon made $1^{\circ} 13'$. The current drove him then to a cluster of islands, where he anchored at thirteen fathom, with storms of rain and thunder at night. Getting under sail on the 23d, he was overtaken by six great canoes from the land, bringing with them dried fish, cocoas, bananas, and tobacco, with a small fruit resembling prunis. The natives of another island brought china, porcelain, and raw furs, to barter. These people, like most of the barbarians, were fond of iron nails and beads, which they received at a high price. They were remarkably distinguished from any Indians the Dutch had yet seen, by their orange complexion, and prodigious stature and strength. Some wore long hair, others short, but the language of the whole was distinct from that of the other islands. Their arms were bows and arrows, and the chief ornaments of their persons consisted of glass ear-rings of different colours, a sure proof that this island was known before to Europeans.

Schouten
Island.

Horn Island.

BEING under thirty minutes, on the 24th they steered N. W. and W. S. W. coasting along a pleasant island, on which they bestowed the name of Schouten, calling the west point of it the Cape of Good Hope (H). This seems to be the same island which is distinguished in most maps by the name of Horn Island. On the 27th a great extent of uneven land appeared on the larboard, lying S. S. W. by W. The 26th three more islands were discovered, stretching N. W. by W. On the 29th Schouten was under 29 minutes, having sight of large tracts of land to the southward, some high, some low, by which he passed north-west. The 29th an earthquake was felt, which shook the ship with such violence, that the men ran frightened upon deck, imagining she had struck, and bulged on a rock. Upon trial it appeared, however, that the sea in that part was unfathomable, from whence they concluded it to be the shock of an earthquake. On the 30th Schouten put into a large bay, but, finding no passage, he returned to a northern course. Here the ship was again violently agitated, the shock being immediately succeeded by loud and terrible claps of thunder, with balls of lightning, which they apprehended would have set the sails on fire, had not a deluge of rain poured down upon them. The 31st they passed the equator, steering due north; and, being almost surrounded with land, they anchored at twelve fathom, near a desolate island that stood close to the continent. August 1st they made 15° N. lat. going with a strong current close to the land, where they dropped anchor, because of a calm. On the 3d they made 35° N. latitude, where they saw several whales and tortoises, by which time they concluded they were at the end of the continent, and past the coast of New Guinea, after having sailed along it for 280 leagues^f.

Reflections upon this voyage.

To pursue the voyage farther would be trespassing upon our design, which is no other than to throw as much light as possible upon the navigation to the South Sea, and the attempts to find a continent towards the south. With this view it was necessary to be minute in relating the bearings, soundings, course of the lands and islands, as well as the nature of the winds. However tedious this journal may appear to a superficial reader, the deep thinker will form another judgment of it, as it gives room for useful and curious reflections and inferences. In order to render the journal as useful as possible, and to assist the reader, we shall beg leave to subjoin the following remarks. The first is, that Schouten's voyage seems to point out a kind of navigation capable of great improvement, and to which perhaps no nation has a better title than Great Britain, as the South Sea company would seem to be originally established chiefly with the view to make

^f Vid. Histoire des Navigation aux Terres Australes, tom. i. l. iii. HARRIS's Coll. Voyag. vol. i. p. 56.

(H) The French compiler observes from the journal of the chief mate, that here they found a fruit of an orange colour, and shape of a melon, extremely seedy, but of a pleasant taste. It was an aquatic, and greatly resembling a species of water melon which is produced in the Venetian territories (1).

(1) Histoire des Navigat. tom. i. lib. iii. p. 404.

a new discoveries in the Pacific Ocean, which might well supply the loss of the Assiento trade. 2dly, The observations of Schouten, with regard to the variations of the compass, the tides, winds, and mountains, plainly point out a continent larger and more extensive than has hitherto been discovered of New Guiney or New Holland; the latter lying so much out of his course, as not to affect him with any of the above circumstances². 3dly, The climate, the face of the country, the commodities brought on board, and the resemblance between the natives of the different islands and those of the well known parts of the East Indies, are sure proofs that they merit attention. Admitting that at present they do not produce spices, and the most valuable commodities, yet is it highly reasonable, if we may argue from analogy, that they are equally capable of producing them as the Moluccas. 4thly, If the vicinity and jealousy of the Dutch and Spaniards should be objected against the possibility of establishing settlements in them, we may answer, that the superiority of our fleets, and the vigour which for some time has reigned in our administration, will be sufficient to protect them against insults; nay more, that it will be the interest of most nations in Europe and the East to countenance a commerce which must necessarily lessen the price of some of the most valuable commodities. 5th, The great argument against establishing a settlement in the South Sea is the difficulty of a passage either through the Streights of Magellan, the Streights of Le Maire, or by doubling Cape Horn; and yet experience shews, that the inconveniences sustained by those who made that voyage arose more from a wrong conduct than from the natural difficulties of it. If people go at a wrong season of the year, embarrassed with superfluities, and destitute of necessaries, with an old, feeble, and decrepid crew, why should we draw any conclusions from thence prejudicial to the design; or indeed any other, than that such projects were directed either by weak heads, or corrupt hearts? If Commodore Anson failed, it was owing not to his own imprudence, but to that of his superiors. If Le Maire had better fortune, it can only be attributed to the wiser measures pursued by his constituents. Lastly, As complaints are every day uttered of the decay of commerce, of the restrictions upon trade by exclusive charters, of its being overstocked, and such-like, can there be a more probable prospect of opening new marts, and giving full scope to the labour and industry of the nation, than by making settlements in some of the islands of the South Sea, and, by their means, disclosing a new and extensive source of wealth and maritime power? Perhaps we have lost the fairest occasion for this, when the fine island of Juan Fernandez might have been seized from the sluggish Spaniards, who could possibly have no other motive for keeping it out of the hands of the British merchants, than that by means of it they would be able to render the Philippines less valuable to the crown of Spain. This occasion, it is true, is past; but it may again return, and this hint may not be useless, if it should be the fate of Britain to be again involved in a quarrel with Spain. To conclude our remarks, we shall only observe, in answer to an objection which may be started, viz. that the discoveries hitherto made in the South Seas consist only of small islands, or of a continent not sufficiently examined. This, in our opinion, is saying nothing, if it be admitted that such of these islands as have been thoroughly examined, are inhabited; and that the continent, not sufficiently known, is so situated as to justify our conjectures. It is, in short, no more than saying, that it is imprudent to attempt the discovery of countries from whence there is not a sure prospect of immense profits; which, in part, is affirming, that we are not to attempt discoveries at all. Had mankind always reasoned thus, we should have still remained more ignorant of the East and West Indies than we are of the Southern Continent; and what the consequences would have been, may appear from the consideration of the different circumstances of things since those discoveries were made (1).

To

² Vide preceding voyage, p. 276.

(1) It may not be disagreeable to our readers to see a short vocabulary of the language of New Guiney, as the many onomatopoiæ, or resemblances of sounds to the things they represent throughout all nations, seem to point out the possibility of forming an universal language. At least it shews that nature dictates the same expressions for the same feelings, however different in the progress of time they may prove by corruptions and refinements upon language. It cannot be denied, but men of all countries give appellations to animals in imitation of the sounds they utter, and that distinguish their voice from other animals. The examples of this are without number in every language, and here only have we a true primitive speech, and its roots. It would be easy to carry this notion to a high degree of satisfaction, but it would be a digression foreign to our purpose.

V O C A B U L A R Y.
A hen	—	—	Coocq.
A hook	—	—	Taouli.
A king	—	—	Laliere.
A cocoa-nut	—	—	Lamas.
Water	—	—	Dan, Daan.
A fish	—	—	Hiffon.
A leaf of a tree or plant	—	—	Nomboug Po.
A boat or wherry	—	—	Bou.
Iron	—	—	Herees.
The head	—	—	Ea.
The nose	—	—	Niffon.
The eye	—	—	Tulingan.
The teeth	—	—	Tsang.
The neck	—	—	Poffon, Arang.
The hair	—	—	Nihong.
The hand	—	—	Limang.

To confirm those conjectures, it may be necessary to give a short abstract of some other a voyages to the South Seas, with intention to make new discoveries, and examine the truth of former journals. Of these one of the most curious is that performed by Francis Pelsart, who suffered shipwreck on the coast of New Holland.

Captain Pelsart's shipwreck, and coasting along New Holland.

In the year 1620 the Dutch East India company, animated by the prodigious returns of wealth made by the fleet under General Carpentier, were induced to equip a still larger fleet for the same voyage. Among these was the Batavia, Captain Pelsart, who was separated from the rest of the squadron on the 4th of June, after having doubled the Cape of Good Hope. The storm continuing with great fury for several days, the Batavia was driven quite out of her course, and at length struck upon shoals in the latitude 28° south, the same which the Dutch charts call the Abrolhoes of Houtman. Pelsart was sick in bed when this accident happened, b but, perceiving the ship had struck, ran upon deck. It was then night, the weather tolerably serene, the moon bright, the course they steered north-east-by-north, under full sail. The sea, as far as they could discover it, was covered with a white froth, which occasioned various opinions on board, previous to the accident ; some imagining that its whiteness was occasioned by the reflexion of the moon ; others, that it was a froth raised by the late commotion of the waters ; while others attributed it to the great number of shoals and rocks which broke the waves. Pelsart charged the master with the loss of the ship, who excused himself by protestations of his having done his duty with care and diligence. The question then was, What next was to be done ? After sounding, it was resolved to throw their cannon overboard, and ease the ship as much as possible, hoping by this to get her afloat again. While they were thus c engaged, another terrible storm of wind and rain arose, which made them despair of safety amidst surrounding rocks. After cutting away the main-mast, and taking every other precaution to save the ship, it was at length determined to abandon her, and endeavour with the long-boat to reach a desolate and rocky island, at the distance of three leagues from shore. The master, with the long-boat, being sent to examine the soundings, returned with intelligence, that landing would be difficult ; however, advising it as expedient, and the last resource. The women and children, with some provisions, were first put on shore ; and thus, in two or three trips, the greater part of the crew, about twenty barrels of beef, bread, and a few casks of water, this article being forgot in the general confusion, were got on shore. About 20 persons, male and female, were landed on the smaller island, and 180 upon the d greater, 70 still remaining on board the ship, in a most deplorable condition, the sloop being unable to weather the storm, after several attempts. These, however, found means to reach the islands in the skiff or the sloop, which, by means of rafts, they had made out of planks. The whole company on both islands amounted now to 270 persons, among whom there were no more than forty gallons of water. The first inquiry, therefore, was after some brook or spring ; in which, after the most diligent search, they were disappointed. On the small island the men began to murmur that the captain did not put to sea in search of some island that might supply their wants ; and this was soon resolved on, though Pelsart parted from the crew with the utmost grief. Hitherto they had imagined the island barren and desolate ; but a few savages, that appeared at some distance, convinced them that the greater island was inhabited. e These barbarians had long, strait, black hair, and went quite naked.

He goes in the pinnace to Batavia.

PELSART, according to the late resolution formed, put to sea in the sloop, well manned, and provided as well as the slender stores would permit. First he took an observation, by which he found they were in the latitude of 28° 13'. Then he carefully examined all the little neighbouring islands, but, finding no water, he continued his course, and soon got sight of the continent, which appeared to lie sixteen miles N. W. of the place where the ship struck. On the 9th of July he found himself about three miles from land, on which he plied all day, sometimes north, and sometimes in a westerly direction, the country appearing low, naked, and rocky. By the 14th he found by an observation, that he was in latitude 24°, having coasted for several days without being able to put to shore. The men, impatient of longer delay, f trusting to their dexterity in swimming, got to shore with much difficulty, the sloop keeping her station in the mean while as near as possible. After a vain search, they returned to the vessel, without having seen any thing besides a few savages, resembling those that had presented themselves on the island. On the 16th, after coasting a considerable way farther, they put again to shore, and had the good fortune to meet with some rain water in the clefts of rocks, than which nothing could be more seasonable, their stock of water being exhausted, and the crew ready to expire with thirst. Under 22° 17' they landed again, but found no water, nor success in their endeavours to come to a correspondence with eight of the natives, that approached within musket-shot of them. After having all this while beat about to no purpose,

The foot
The breasts
The belly

— — —
— — —
— — —

Makeigu. In the French voyages we have a long list of words, Sen-fu. which it would be tedious to mention.
Balang.

a the resolution of going to Batavia was at last taken. This Pelsart looked upon as the only possible means of saving the hands with him, as well as the remainder of the crew left upon the islands. After various difficulties he at length arrived on the coast of Java, where he fell in with a Dutch ship, in which he went to Batavia^b, to obtain relief from the governor for his unhappy companions.

DURING the absence of Pelsart, Jerom Cornelius, a supercargo, after some villainous actions; obtained so much power among the crew left on the islands, that, after forming them into a small but ill-constituted community, he procured for himself the name and authority of captain-general. All the hardships they had sustained, although they exceed description, did not depress the wild ambition and turbulent spirit of this man. A great number, however, refusing to acknowledge the usurper, made their escape to a third island, after having about thirty of their number butchered by order of Cornelius. The rest kept their ground, and defended the island against all the attempts of Cornelius, till Pelsart arrived in the Sardam frigate from Batavia. He was greatly surprised to find these miserable remains accumulating their misfortunes by the most shocking crimes, dissensions, and hostilities. However, these he soon composed by a spirited exertion of his authority, by putting the ringleaders to immediate death, and taking every other measure requisite for the safety of the whole; after which he returned, and arrived safe in *Batavia*ⁱ.

An account of the rest of the crew left on the island during his absence.

Pelsart returns.

WE shall only remark upon this voyage, that, from the situation of the coast, it is certain it could be no other but that of New Holland, which hitherto had been very imperfectly examined. There had, indeed, been some rumours concerning the inhabitants of this continent, which the relation of Pelsart proves to be false. It was said, that when some Dutch East Indiamen attempted to land here, they were opposed by a gigantic race of men; whereas Pelsart met with no opposition but from the rocks, and saw no inhabitants besides a few naked, timid, and miserable natives, not exceeding the ordinary size. By this story, our former conjecture receives further confirmation, since so romantic a tale could be calculated for no other view than to deter other nations from venturing into those seas, or making discoveries on the continent. Besides, farther proofs appear, as well from the general conduct of the Dutch, as from the mysterious air they gave to the success of that ship which touched upon Carpenter's Land, in south latitude 10° 36', and returned with a considerable quantity of gold, spices, and other valuable goods. To prevent this accident from engaging other nations in the enterprize, the Dutch gave out that this cargo was not the produce of New Holland, but taken up out of the wrecks of an India ship cast away on that coast; although this was directly opposite to the account given by the officers and sailors, till they were silenced by authority. This plausible tale, however, received more credit from the repulse which some other ships affirmed they met with on that coast, a few years after. But as the public never were favoured with particular and attested journals, no great credit can be given to surmises inconsistent with themselves, and with this account of Pelsart; but tallying exactly with the interest and views of the Dutch East India company. The great object of this company has ever been to engross to themselves the richest commerce of the Indies, and to exclude not only other nations from it, but even to prevent their own from making such discoveries as might be prejudicial to the lucrative trade they carry on. Another maxim with them is, to make the Moluccas, and islands depending on them, a frontier, to prevent either Dutch or foreigners, not belonging to the company, from navigating these seas with security, or becoming acquainted with the roads, natives, and fertility of soil, with which the continent may abound. This will be more obvious, after the reader has perused the voyages of Tasman, Roggewin, and Dampier. Hence it is apparent, that the company are satisfied they have already as much territory and trade as they can well conduct and defend; and that extending either would be only lessening their value. Nothing, therefore, but either the decline of their East India trade, or their apprehensions that some other nations will take the advantage of their indolence, will oblige them to exert themselves in making settlements in the Southern Continent, or further discoveries in New Holland and New Guiney, or any of the adjacent islands.

Reflections on the voyage.

^b Hist. des Navigat. aux Terres Australes, tom. i. p. 451—456. HARRIS, tom. i. p. 322. ⁱ Ibidem ibid:

S E C T. III.

Containing the voyages of Captains Tasman and Dampier to New Guiney and New Holland. Their relations of the natives, soil, climate, and other particulars; with general reflections upon the different occurrences of the voyages (A).

IN the month of August 1642, Captain Abel Jansen Tasman sailed from Batavia with the ships Heemskirk and Zeebaan. On September 8th, he arrived at Maurice Island, in the lat. of 20° , and long. of $83^{\circ} 48'$, finding the island 50 German miles more east than it had been laid down in charts. He left Maurice Island on the 8th of October, steering south to the lat. $40^{\circ} 41'$, when he descried a variation of the compass, equal to $23, 24, 25^{\circ}$, till the 22d of October, that he came under lat. $45^{\circ} 47'$ S. long. $89^{\circ} 44'$, where the needle changed to $26^{\circ} 45'$ towards the west. From the first variation he continued an easterly course, inclining a little to the S. (B).

By the 6th of November he was in $49^{\circ} 4'$ S. lat. and in the long. of $114^{\circ} 56'$. At this time the variation was 26° to the westward. November the 15th, he arrived in lat. $44^{\circ} 33'$ S. long. $140^{\circ} 32'$, when the variation was found $18^{\circ} 3'$ W. and decreasing every day, till on the 21st, in long. 158° , it was no more than four degrees. On the 22d, the needle was in continual agitation, without resting in any of the eight points; whence he concluded that some mine of iron ore, or loadstone, was not far distant (C). The 24th, in the lat. of $42^{\circ} 25'$ S. and long. $163^{\circ} 50'$, he discovered land at the distance of ten miles, which he knew must New Holland. This coast he called Van Diemen's Land. The compass pointed right towards land, while he steered S. E. along the coast, to 44° S. where the land runs away E. and afterwards N. E. and by N. In the latitude of $43^{\circ} 10'$ S. long. $167^{\circ} 55'$, he anchored on the 1st of December in a bay which he called Frederick Henry Bay. There he heard, or fancied he heard, the sound of human voices on the shore, but could see nobody. Nothing occurred here that land.

New Hol-
Van Diemen's Land.

Henry Bay.

(A) We will beg leave to observe, that the great discoveries made by the Dutch in the southern countries were subsequent to the voyage and discovery of Jacques le Maire. In 1618, that part of Terra Australis, which the Dutch call Concordia, was discovered. An. 1619, the land of Edels received its name from the first discoverer. In 1622, that part of New Holland, which goes by the name of Lerwin's Land, was first found out; and, in the year 1627, a country between New Holland and New Guiney was discovered by Peter Nuyts, which bears his name. There were also several other voyages, of which we have accounts; but that the Dutch were constantly defeated by the natives in all their attempts to penetrate the Southern Continent. Indeed they appear to have unanimously suppressed many journals, which might reflect great light upon this subject. This loss we will endeavour to supply by the journals of Dampier, Roggevin, and particularly of Tasman, who made an exact survey of the coast. We are told by the French compiler, that this journal was originally written in Dutch, and in but few hands, till a French translation of it appeared by some accident. This has since been proved faithful, by comparing it with the original Hist. des Navigat. aux Terres Australes, V. i. p. 456.

(B) As Captain Tasman was curious in remarking the variations of the needle, it may not be disagreeable to the reader, that we take this opportunity of explaining the nature of this truly elegant invention, that the importance of the captain's remarks may appear with their full clearness and force.

It is well known that the needle points directly north only in a few places, and perhaps not constantly in them. In general, it inclines a little rather east or west, whence arise the terms easterly and western declination. This variation was first attributed to excavations or hollows in the earth, or to veins of lead, iron ore, stone, and other such causes. When it was afterwards discovered by repeated experiments, that this variation varied, it was concluded that none of the assigned causes were adequate to the effect; since, according to them, the variation would always be the same in the same place; which is contrary to experience. Here, for instance, at London, an. 1580, the variation was observed to be $11^{\circ} 17'$ east. In 1666, it was $34'$ to the west; and, in 1734, somewhat more than 1° west. To find the variation with all possible exactness, mariners take the following method. They mark by the compass the point the sun is in after its rising, then taking its altitude. In the afternoon they observe when the sun comes to the same altitude, and the point it is in by the compass. The difference then between that and the north or south upon the card, which is pointed out by the needle, is the variation of the compass, and shews how much the north and south given by the compass deviates from the true north and south points of the horizon. Hence it is necessary, in order to ascertain the variation, and the variation of that variation of the compass, to have, from time to time, distinct accounts of the variation as it is observed in different places. It is true, the ingenious Dr. Halley gives a curious hypothetical solution of this matter; but as it is founded upon its agreement with observation, we may conclude that this sort of experience is necessary.

(C) This observation may seem to contradict what we have before advanced concerning the variation, and its causes. However, when the remark is attentively considered, every difficulty will vanish. When we assert that veins of loadstone act not upon the needle, and are not the causes of variation, it is to be understood of the constant variation of a few degrees to the east or to the west. But where the variation is altogether irregular, and the needle playing round the compass, Captain Tasman's conjecture may consistently enough be admitted. Yet we must own that we think it a point far from being proved, that such things affect the loadstone at a distance. This might indeed be easily determined, as there are mines of loadstone not only in the island of Eila on the coast of Tasman, but likewise in other parts of Europe.

- a merited notice, besides a number of fine trees, measuring two or two fathoms and a half in circumference, and from 60 to 65 feet in height from the root to the branches. They found steps cut out in the trunks, in order to climb up to the birds nests; whence they concluded that either the inhabitants must be of an extraordinary stature, or that they had a method of climbing peculiar to themselves. In one of the trees the steps appeared so recent, that they could not have been cut above three or four days. The marks of wild beasts were observed in the sand, but no human vestiges; they believed them to be the prints of a tyger's feet. After gathering some gum and bark off the trees, making remarks upon the tides, which ebb and flow about three feet, after discovering a smoke at some distance, erecting a wooden pillar, on which every man carved his name, and hoisting a flag at the top, he weighed anchor on the 5th of December; only observing that here, in $41^{\circ} 34'$ S. lat. long. 169° , the compass varied to three degrees eastward. Quitting Van Diemen's Land, he resolved to steer east to the longitude of 195° , in hopes of discovering the islands of Solomon^a.

Remarks upon
the country.

- DECEMBER 9th, he was in the lat. of $42^{\circ} 37'$ S. and in the longitude of $176^{\circ} 25'$, the variation being five degrees eastward. The 13th, in the lat. of $42^{\circ} 10'$ S. long. $18^{\circ} 28'$, he found the variation $7^{\circ} 30'$ eastward, when he discovered a high mountainous country, marked in the charts under the name of New Zealand. After coasting along the shore till the 18th, and then being in the lat. of $40^{\circ} 50'$ S. long. $191^{\circ} 41'$, he anchored in a fine bay, where he observed the variation to be nine degrees to the east. Here he met with a great number of the natives, a well-built robust people, with hoarse voices, but nothing supernatural in their size. They would not approach within musket-shot of the ships, but continued at a distance, playing upon a kind of instrument resembling a trumpet, which the Hollanders returned by the best music their ships afforded. The complexion of this people was a mixture of brown and yellow, their hair long, and almost as thick as that of the Japanese, which they combed up, and fixed in a knot on the crown of the head, with a nail or bit of ivory. They covered the middle of their bodies some with a mat, others with a woollen cloth, leaving the upper part of it, as well as from the middle of the thigh downwards, quite naked. In a few days they became bolder and more familiar; at last venturing on board the commodore's ship, in order to trade with the seamen. Tasman was then on board another ship, and, observing it, sent the shallop to advertise the crew of a surprise, and to put them on their guard. The shallop was instantly attacked with great fury by the savages, who killed three out of the seven on board, and obliged the others to save their lives by swimming. The crews would certainly have taken their revenge, had not a succeeding storm prevented it, and obliged the commodore to bear away from this incommodious station, after giving it the appellation of the Murderers Bay. The country appeared rich, fertile, and well situated; but the foulness of the weather hindered Tasman from making further observations, and indeed of getting clear of the coast.

New Zealand.

Description of the inhabitants of New Zealand.

Murderers Bay.

- On the 24th, the wind not permitting him to continue a northern course, doubts arising whether he should be able to find a passage on that side, and a flood coming in from the south-east, he concluded it would be best to return to the bay; but the wind coming round favourable on the 26th, made him pursue his former course, steering north, with a small inclination to the west. On the 4th of January 1623, in lat. $34^{\circ} 35'$ S. long. $191^{\circ} 9'$, he sailed quite to the cape which lies N. W. where he found the sea rolling to the N. E. whence he joyfully inferred that he had at last found a passage. There was in the strait an island, to which he gave the name of Three Kings. This he doubled, with intention to refresh the crews; but, as he approached the cape, the seamen perceived 35 persons, apparently of large stature, though the distance prevented their making any particular observations. They likewise imagined they discovered large clubs in their hands, that they were quite naked, and hallooing to them in a kind of articulate but unintelligible jargon. Some farther remarks were made with regard to the swiftness of their motions, and the length of their strides. Probable indeed it is, that the seamen's imaginations were a good deal warmed with the reports they had formerly heard concerning the gigantic stature and strength of these savages; for it is remarkable, that Tasman always mentions such circumstances as arising from the observation of the common men. After making the tour of the island, remarking that it was but thinly inhabited, and badly cultivated, with a fine river of fresh water, he determined to sail east as far as long. 220° , and thence north as far as lat. 17° south, and thence west, till he fell in with the island of Cocos, or Horn, discovered by Schouten, where he proposed refreshing the men, who had not been on shore from the time they left Van Diemen's Land in New Holland (D). Circumstances, however, occurred

Island of Co-
cos.

to

^a HARRIS, §. 22. l. i. c. 1. b. i. t. i. Hist. des Navigat. loco citato.

(D) That the reader may have a distinct idea of this passage, we will observe, that the island of Cocos lies in $15^{\circ} 10'$ S., and, according to the account we have given from Schouten, well inhabited, cultivated, and abounded with all kinds of refreshment.

Schouten, however, describes the people as treacherous and base to a degree of admiration. The island Herne lies nearly in the same parallel, is well cultivated and inhabited by a people of a tame, to prevent the execution of his design. Being, on the 28th of January, in lat. $30^{\circ} 25'$ S. and a long. $192^{\circ} 20'$, the needle was observed to vary nine degrees towards the east. This, with a high and rolling sea from the south-west, made the commodore conjecture there could not be any land expected towards that quarter. On the 12th he found himself in $30^{\circ} 5'$ S. lat. and $195^{\circ} 27'$ long. with a variation of $9^{\circ} 30'$ to the east, a rolling sea from the south-east and south-west. From these observations of Tasman we may infer then, that the position laid down by Dr. Halley, of the needle's not being governed by the poles of the world, but by other poles moving round them, is highly probable; otherwise it would be difficult to conceive how the needle, as Tasman affirms, came to have a variation of near 27° to the west, in the lat. of $45^{\circ} 47'$, and then gradually decreasing till it had no variation at all; after which it turned east in the lat. of $42^{\circ} 17'$, and so continued increasing its variation eastward to this b time.

The islands of Amsterdam
and Rotterdam.

On the 16th, Tasman was in the lat. of $26^{\circ} 29'$ S. long. $199^{\circ} 32'$, the variation of the needle being 8° . It may be observed from hence, that the eastern variation decreases; a circumstance intirely coincident with Dr. Halley's hypothesis, as the reader will see from the short account given of it in the note (E). On the 19th of January, in lat. $22^{\circ} 35'$ S. long. $204^{\circ} 15'$, he observed a variation of $7^{\circ} 30'$ east. In this situation he discovered an island about two or three miles in circumference, very high, steep, and barren. This island they called Pylstaurt, on account of the prodigious number of those birds that were observed to inhabit it. Next day two other islands appeared, but with no circumstances that are remarkable. On the 21st, in the lat. $21^{\circ} 20'$ S. long. $205^{\circ} 29'$, the variation was 7° to the north-east. Tasman then c drew near to the island furthest to the north, which was the largest; this he called Amsterdam, giving the other the appellation of Rotterdam. Upon the former were found abundance of fowls, hogs, fruits, and all kinds of refreshment. The natives did not appear to know the use of arms, at least Tasman discovered nothing like a weapon among them. They received the Dutch with hospitality, and treated with them, in a commercial way, with great probity, excepting when an occasion offered of filching something which perhaps related not to the bargain. It ebbs north-east and flows south-west here; but the current is not considerable. A south-west moon causes a spring-tide, which rises seven or eight feet. The wind blows constantly S. E. or S. S. E.

TASMAN failing from hence was, on the 25th, in the lat. of $20^{\circ} 15'$ S. and in the long. d of $206^{\circ} 19'$, where the variation was $6^{\circ} 20'$ to the east. After getting sight of several other islands, he made that of Rotterdam. Here the natives resembled those of Amsterdam, being good-natured, hospitable, a little addicted to pilfering, and unacquainted with the use of arms. After taking in water, Tasman made the circuit of the whole island, which he found well-stocked with cocoa-trees regularly planted, saw abundance of garden-ground neatly disposed and laid out, plentifully stocked with fruit-trees planted in a beautiful order and taste, and the whole bearing the marks of a civilized and polished people. Quitting the island of Rotterdam, he determined to sail north to the height of 17° south latitude, and from thence to shape a westerly course, without falling in either with Traitors or Horn Island (F). On February the 6th, being in a tame, gentle, and hospitable disposition, who furnished the Dutch with every convenience in their power. These were the reasons which weighed with captain Tasman to alter the plan he had laid down. The length of the voyage had greatly fatigued and dispirited his men; many of them being down with sickness and infirmities, owing to their long confinement, salt provisions, &c. How reasonable soever this alteration of measures was, he found reasons for not following it.

(E) The Doctor supposes that a large solid body contained within, and distinct from, the earth, having its own proper motion, and being included like a kernel in its shell, revolves circularly from east to west, as the exterior earth revolves from west to east in its diurnal motion. Hence he explains the position of the four magnetical poles attributed to the earth, by allowing two poles to the nucleus, and two to the earth, or cortex. As the two former perpetually shift their situation by their circular motion, their virtue, compared with the exterior, must be different at different times; consequently the variation of the needle will perpetually change. To the nucleus the Doctor likewise attributes an American south pole and an European north one, on account of the variations of variations observed in those places, which are much greater than those found near the two other poles. He conjectures that these poles will finish their revolution in about 700 years; after which time, the same situation of the poles as the present will return, and the variations be the same again over the whole face of the globe. But this is a theory which only can be proved some centuries hence, and to which, tho' the best explication, there are many unsurmountable objections.

(F) If Captain Tasman was not limited by his instructions, it is difficult to conceive why he did not remain longer on Rotterdam island, than which nothing can be more commodiously situated for making discoveries. He owns that he traversed the whole island; that he found it a perfect paradise; and that the people gave him not the least apprehensions of doubting their faith, or his own security. In this case a party of the men might have remained on the island, by throwing up a slight fortification, while the ships went in search of the islands of Solomon on the one side, or the continent of Quiras on the other; from neither of which they were at a great distance. From so skilful a mariner neglecting this happy occasion for new discoveries, it is probable that he was circumscribed both as to his course and in point of time, by the instructions he received from the company. We cannot help therefore lamenting

- a in the lat. of $17^{\circ} 19'$ S. and the long. of $201^{\circ} 35'$, Tasman's ship was surrounded by about twenty small islands, each of which was surrounded by shoals, sand, and rocks. These are marked in the charts by the name of Prince William's Islands, or Heemskirk's Shallows. On William's the 8th he was in lat. $15^{\circ} 29'$, long. $199^{\circ} 31'$, with heavy rain, a strong north-east wind, and dark cold weather. Fearing, therefore, that he should run further west than by this reckoning he thought himself, or that he should be driven to the south of New Guinea, or be blown upon some unknown coast, he resolved to stand away to the north-north-west, till he arrived in the latitude of $4, 5$, or 6° south, and then to bear away west for the coast of Guinea, as the least dangerous course. Hence it appears that he laid aside all thoughts of farther discoveries, and for what reasons it will not be difficult to judge. When he was in this latitude, he could not
- b fail of knowing that he might, without difficulty, sail round by the coast of New Guinea back to the east. It is therefore highly probable, as the judicious compiler of Harris's voyages observes, that he was directed by his instructions to coast round that great southern continent, already discovered, thereby to know of a certainty whether it was joined to any other part of the world. Some men looked upon it, notwithstanding its vast extent, viz. from the equator to 43° of south lat. long. from 123° to near 190° , to be an island, divided every-where by the sea from any of the four known parts of the world^a. The reasons for such instructions, as the same sensible compiler observes, might have been, "that an exact chart being drawn from his discoveries, the East India company might have perfect intelligence of the extent and situation of this new-found country, before they executed the plan they were then contriving for preventing its being visited or farther discovered by their own or any other
- c "nation. This likewise accounts for the care taken in laying down the map of this country on the pavement of the stadthouse at Amsterdam; for as this country was to remain henceforward as a kind of deposit, or land of reserve, in the hands of the East India company, they took this method of intimating as much to their countrymen; so that while strangers are gaping at this map as a curiosity, every intelligent Dutchman may say to himself, "Behold the wisdom of the East India company! By their present empire they support the authority of this republic abroad, and by their extensive commerce enrich their subjects at home; and at the same time shew us here what a reserve they have made for the benefit of posterity, whenever, through the vicissitudes to which all sublunary things are liable, their present sources
- d "of power and grandeur should fail (G)."

To proceed on our voyage: Captain Tasman was, on the 14th of February, in the latitude of $16^{\circ} 30'$ S. and in the longitude of $193^{\circ} 35'$. Hitherto they had deluges of rain, and much foul weather; but the day clearing up, he hailed the Zeebaan his consort, and had the satisfaction to find that their reckonings agreed. On the 20th, in the latitude of $13^{\circ} 45'$, and in long. of $193^{\circ} 35'$, the dark cloudy weather, with thick fogs, a rolling sea, and the wind variable, returned. The 26th, in latitude $9^{\circ} 48'$ S. long. $193^{\circ} 43'$, he had a north-west wind, with continual rain, more or less, for the space of 21 days. March the 2d, in the latitude of $9^{\circ} 11'$ S. and in the longitude of $192^{\circ} 46'$, the variation was 10° to the east, the wind and weather still inconstant. The 14th, in the latitude $10^{\circ} 12'$ S. and in longitude $186^{\circ} 14'$, he found the variation $8^{\circ} 45'$ east; after which he passed several days without being able to take any observation, the weather being all the time dark and rainy. The 20th, lat. $5^{\circ} 15'$ S. long. $181^{\circ} 16'$, the weather being then fine, he found the variation 9° east. Two days after he had fine weather, and the benefit of the trade-wind from the east, in lat. $5^{\circ} 2'$ S. long. $178^{\circ} 32'$. The same day he had sight of land four miles to the west, which proved to be these islands laid down in charts by the name of Anthong Java. They are about ninety miles from the coast of New Guinea, or rather New Britain, which Captain Tasman frequently calls New Guinea. Aclamenting this loss, as there never could have been found a person better qualified for the undertaking than Tasman (1).

^a HARRIS, tom. i. p. 328. Hist. des Navigat. aux Terres Austr. tom. i. p. 458.

(G) We cannot help quoting his words farther, they speak our own sentiments so exactly. "I cannot," says the compiler, "avoid supporting my opinion in this respect, by putting the reader in mind of a very curious piece of antient history, which furnishes us with the like instance in the conduct of another republic. Diodorus Siculus, in the 5th book of his Historical Library, informs us, that in the African ocean, some days sail west from Libya, there had been discovered an island, the soil of which was exceedingly fertile, and the country no less pleasant, all the land being finely diversified by mountains and plains, the former thick-clothed with trees, the latter abounding with fruits and flowers; the whole watered by innumerable rivulets, and affording so pleasant an habitation, that a finer or more delightful country fancy itself could not feign. Yet he assures us, the Carthaginians, those great masters of maritime power and commerce, tho' they had discovered this admirable island, would never suffer it to be planted, but reserved it as a sanctuary to which they might fly whenever the ruin of their own republic left them no other resource. Should the Dutch be driven out of Java, Ceylon, &c. they might probably retire to the Moluccas, and avail themselves of the Southern Continent (2)."

(1) Harris, p. 328.

(2) Harris, ibid.

Mark
Islands.

according to Dampier, as we shall see, it is really a large island, distinct and separate from that great tract of continent which goes by the name of New Guinea. The 25th, in lat. $4^{\circ} 35'$ S. and in the longitude of $175^{\circ} 10'$, he found the variation $9^{\circ} 30'$ east. He was then in what he calls the height of the islands of Mark, discovered by Schouten. They are in number fourteen or fifteen, inhabited by savages with black hair, in their manners and dress similar to those he saw in Murtherers Bay, in New Zealand. On the 29th he passed the Green Islands, and, on the 30th, that of St. John, both discovered by Schouten. This last island he found to be of considerable extent, and lying about 1840 leagues from the coast of Peru. It was apparently well-inhabited, cultivated, and abounding with the necessities of life. The inhabitants were armed with slings, darts, and wooden swords, wore bracelets of pearl, necklaces, and the same jewels in their ears. They had canoes of all sizes, and seemed to have made some progress in the arts; however, they were very intractable, notwithstanding all the pains used to bring them to a friendly correspondence, which at length obliged Schouten to fire upon them. This might be the reason why Tasman did not touch upon land, or attempt to make any further discovery into the nature of the islanders.

On April the first he got sight of New Guinea, being then under the latitude of $4^{\circ} 30'$ south, and the longitude of $171^{\circ} 2'$, the variation being $8^{\circ} 45'$ to the eastward. Endeavouring to double the cape Santa Maria, he continued to sail along the coast lying north-west; after which he passed the islands of Anthony Caens, Gardeners Islands, and Fishers Island, advancing towards the promontory called Strais Hoek, where the coast runs S. S. E.; determining to pursue the same route till he should either discover land or a passage on that side. All this while, we cannot help thinking that he continued not on the coast of New Guinea, but on that of New Britain; for the cape Santa Maria is the same which Dampier calls Cape St. George, with the same islands on the coast as Tasman describes, under the same latitude and longitude. As for the continent of New Guinea, it lies behind the island of New Britain, and was laid down in all the charts before Dampier's discovery at least four degrees too much to the eastward. Besides, what Tasman relates of the inhabitants, coincides with the account of Schouten and Dampier; the former having found them a base and treacherous people, dexterous in the use of slings, black, and naked all but the waist.

APRIL 12th, in the latitude of $3^{\circ} 45'$ S. longitude 167° , the variation of the compass was 10° eastward. This night they were waked out of their sleep by a rough shock of an earthquake, which made them run upon deck, imagining the ship had struck; but, upon heaving the lead, there was no bottom to be found. It was succeeded by several other shocks, less violent than the first (H). On the 14th, in the latitude of $5^{\circ} 27'$ S. long. $160^{\circ} 57'$, the variation of the compass was observed to be $9^{\circ} 15'$ to the west. The land then lay N. E., E. N. E. and again S. S. W. from which they imagined there had been a passage between these two points. However, they soon found that it was all one solid coast. Thus they were obliged to double the west cape, creeping along shore, and often becalmed. Circumstances which tally remarkably with those described by Schouten, which proves that Tasman was now arrived on the coast of New Guinea.

Burning
Island.

On the 20th, in the latitude of $5^{\circ} 4'$ south, and in the longitude of $164^{\circ} 27'$, the variation was $8^{\circ} 30'$ east. This night they approached the Brandonde Yland, burning island, or Vulcan's Island, as Schouten terms it, where they perceived great flames and a smok issuing from the top of a mountain. Between that island and the continent they observed a number of fires lighted upon the shore, and half way up the mountain. Trees, bamboes, and shrubs, were likewise seen floating on the sea, whence Tasman concluded that the country was watered with rivers, and fruitful. The same observation was made by Schouten, who likewise took notice, that the copious discharge of fresh water altered the colour of the ocean, as well as the taste of the sea-water. Schouten also says, that the burning mountain is well peopled and cultivated; and that he afterwards anchored on the coast of the continent, where he endeavoured to trade with the natives, who made him pay dear for hogs, cocoa-nuts, and some ginger.

Jama Island,
their manners
and language.

On the 27th, being in the latitude of $2^{\circ} 10'$ south, longitude of $146^{\circ} 57'$, Captain Tasman thought he could discover the island of Mofa, or Moa, but that it proved to be that of Jama, to the east of the former. Here the seamen met with plenty of cocoa-nuts, and other refreshments. The inhabitants were exceeding black, and could easily repeat the words of any language they heard spoken; a presumptive proof that their vernacular tongue is copious. It is, however, difficult to pronounce, on account of the frequent use of the letter R, which often occurs twice or thrice in the same word. On the following day the ships came to an anchor on the island

(H) It is probable from this accident, which likewise confirms what Schouten observed, and from the volcano's and burning mountains described by both, that this country is subject to earthquakes; a presumption that it abounds with metals and minerals. All the writers likewise take notice that the people wore rings, altho'

they do not inform us of what metal they were made. This Le Maire, in particular, might easily have done, as he carried off a man from this coast, who, as he learned the language, could have told him of this, as well as of many other circumstances; such as that the language of every nation was different, &c.

- a of Moa, which they likewise found well supplied with all kinds of necessaries. Here they were detained by stress of weather till the 6th of May. They purchased by barter 6000 cocoa-nuts, and 100 bags of pysanghs, or Indian figs. One of Tasman's seamen was either accidentally or designedly wounded by an arrow shot by one of the natives; but such was the justice or fear of his countrymen, that the criminal was delivered up for punishment, without being demanded. They perhaps had not forgot the revenge taken upon them for bad usage, by Schouten, 1616. But here our author's observation is false; for Schouten's men, or rather the petty officer who commanded the shallop, grossly insulted the natives before they offered violence to his people; and then, though they made several discharges of small arms, the people forced them to retreat, which obliged Schouten to bring the cannon to bear on the island before he could reduce it. He tells us, they had earthen pots, glass beads, and ear-rings, with other European commodities, before his arrival: that they were a civilized people, their country well cultivated and fruitful: that they had a number of boats and small vessels, which they navigated with great dexterity: that they gave him a distinct account of the neighbouring islands, and were earnest in their request that he would fire on the Ariawans, with which nation they were then at war. From hence it appears, that the natives of Moa are a nation which it would be easy to draw into a commerce with the Europeans, by which they might be greatly facilitated in farther discoveries, as the instance given by Tasman is a strong proof either of their natural love of equity, or their dread of the European power^b.

- TASMAN, on the 4th of May, being in latitude 54 minutes south, and longitude 153° 17', found the variation of the needle 6° 30' east. He continued coasting the north side of Schouten's Island, which is about 19 miles in length, populous and fruitful, the natives exceedingly lively and active. They were so far from discovering a savage disposition, that they gave manifest testimonies of their having had an extensive commerce before Schouten's time. They shewed not only various Spanish commodities, but china ware likewise, of which they appeared to be great admirers. Schouten describes them as different from any of the natives he had seen, being of an olive complexion, some having long, others short, hair, dressed in various fashions. They were taller, more robust, and stronger made, than the natives of the neighbouring islands. Their vessels were the largest, and best adapted to use, of any he had seen; they readily parted with their bows and arrows in exchange for European commodities, and were particularly fond of glass and iron. In the vicinity of this island Schouten met with an earthquake, which so alarmed the ship's company, that they imagined they had struck upon a rock or shoal. There are some other islands at a small distance from this, well peopled and fruitful: as they lie on the confines of the Southern Continent and the East Indies, they enjoy all the advantages resulting from their happy climate, and from their commerce with their neighbours, especially the islands of Ternate and Amboyna. The inhabitants of these come thither yearly to purchase their commodities in exchange for their own, and their visits are returned in proper seasons by the inhabitants of the southern islands.

- THE 18th of May, in the latitude of 26° south, and in the longitude of 147° 55', Tasman observed the variation of the needle to be 5° 30' east. He was then arrived at the eastern extremity of New Guiney, which appears to be a detached promontory, though it is not marked so in the latest maps or charts. On the 15th of June he arrived at Batavia, after having performed the voyage in ten months, and partly surrounded the Southern Continent. Such was the end of this expedition, which has justly been considered as the clearest and most exact that was ever made for the discovery of the Terra Australis Incognita. It is a voyage no less to the author's honour, than to the advantage of trade and science, if the natural consequences of it had been prosecuted, and if the Dutch had not been biassed from the true interest of the nation by the influence of their India company. But, without staying to make our reflections on the whole of this sensible journal, we shall proceed to the second voyage into the South Seas, made by Captain William Dampier, as the reader will there find confirmed many of the observations made by Tasman, and the most complete history of New Holland, New Guiney, and the southern islands, that is yet published. This, with Roggewin's voyage, will, we apprehend, give the reader as clear an idea of the situation, climate, inhabitants, produce, and consequence, of the Terra Australis, as the discoveries hitherto made will admit of.

^b Ausl. citat. ubi supra. Etiam Histoire Moderne, tom. vi. p. 236.

S E C T. IV.

Dampier's voyage to the Southern Continent. He arrives on the coast of New Holland; describes the coasts, produce, natives, &c. and proceeds to New Guiney and New Britain.

Dampier's voyage, in quest of discoveries in the South Sea.

Arrives on the coast of New-Holland.

Trees and plants.

The animals.

Rosemary
Island.

Captain Dampier, whose voyage round the globe had now acquired him great reputation, ^a began this expedition, made expressly in search of discoveries in the South Sea. on the 14th of January 1699, at which time he lost sight of the Downs. After doubling the Cape of Good Hope, steering for the course of New Holland, and running a prodigious course, he fell in with land in $26^{\circ} 14'$ S. latitude, and $85^{\circ} 52'$ longitude east from the Cape, when he looked for an opening to drop anchor in, and refresh the men after the fatigue of so long a voyage. In the 26° S. lat. he discovered a large bay, but, on heaving the lead, found it 55 fathom water, foul and rocky. Continuing his course, he descried land again, with the opening he sought for, where he anchored on the 6th. This he called Shark's Bay, lying in $25'$ south latitude, and, according to his reckoning, in 87° longitude east from the Cape of Good Hope, which is less by 195 leagues than is laid down in the common charts. Here the land is high ^b and steep to the sea. The sand on the shore is small and mouldy, producing a great quantity of samphire with a white flower. Farther in, the sand is of a reddish cast, and bears some grass, plants, and shrubs. The country bears a good many trees, but small, hardly any exceeding ten feet in height, and three feet in circumference. Some of the trees were sweet-scented, and reddish within the bark, resembling sassafras, but somewhat darker; the leaves were on the lower side whitish, on the upper of a fine green colour. Most of the trees were in blossom of various colours, but in general a beautiful blue, which had a peculiarly agreeable fragrance. There were but few land fowls, our author having seen only a few eagles, and five or six different kinds of small birds. Of the latter, some were of the size of a cock, ^c others of a wren, but all musical, and singing with a great compass of voice, and much sweetness. The water fowls were ducks, cuckows, crab-catchers, cormorants, gulls, pelicans, and others peculiar to the country. As to the land animals, such as Dampier saw consisted of the maccroons, different from those of the West Indies; and a sort of Guanas, unlike any he had before seen, having a large ugly head, no tail, but a great hunch on the rump, resembling a head. They were speckled black and white on the back, and scaly like crocodiles. The fish were sharks, skates, thornbacks, guard-fish, bonettoes, and some others. Muscles, oysters, and limpets, were found on the shore in great abundance, and the whole coast most beautifully ornamented with a great variety of different figured and coloured shells, some of which our author carried away with him. The ship's crew took two turtles, each weighing about 200 lb. They also caught a shark eleven feet in length, with the head and bones of a hippo- ^d potamus in the belly. All Dampier's endeavours to find water there were in vain, nor could he by any means discover whether or not the coast was inhabited ^e.

SAILING out of this bay on the 10th of August, he coasted along the shore till the 20th, when he came under latitude $19^{\circ} 37'$ south. Here he saw a number of snakes curiously shaped, coloured, and of different magnitudes. At noon, bearing in south-east-by-east, the land appeared like a cape, but, anchoring about five leagues from Bluff Point, it proved the east end of an island, six leagues in length, and one in breadth, surrounded with small rocks, which seemed to deny all entrance to larger vessels. The tides he met with soon after gave the captain a suspicion there might be a kind of Archipelago of islands, and a passage to the south of New Holland and New Guiney, into the great South Sea eastward. This he was deterred ^e from attempting by a scarcity of water on board. The place where he imagines this passage to be lies in $20^{\circ} 21'$, whereas the common draughts, and even Tasman's, have it in $19^{\circ} 50'$, representing the land as joining by a small neck to the continent. He went on shore in the island near Bluff Point, which he called Rosemary Isle, from two or three shrubs he found on it resembling rosemary. He likewise found two sorts of grain like beans, one growing on bushes, the other on a sort of creeping vine. Here he saw cormorants, gulls, oysters, and limpets, with others of the same kinds of fowls and fish as he had seen in Shark's Bay.

On the 23d he bore out to sea, and did not discover land again till the 30th, in $18^{\circ} 21'$ S. latitude. Here he saw a great number of large smokes near the shore, at which he anchored at eight fathom. This evening he saw an eclipse of the moon, but the haziness of the weather ^f prevented his making the proper observations. The day following, the captain, with eleven men,

^a Vide tom. iii. DAMPIER'S Voyages, passim.

- a men armed, went on shore to search for water, when they discovered three of the natives, tall, black, and quite naked, standing close to the sea. On the approach of the captain they ran towards a neighbouring hill, being joined by eight or nine more of their countrymen. The captain proceeded to the top of the hill, from whence he had a good view of the country, which, as far as he could see, consisted of a fine savannah. After gratifying his curiosity, he returned to the shore, and his men began digging for water, during which about a dozen of the natives assembled upon the hill, from whence they made a disagreeable menacing noise. At last one of them advanced, followed at a little distance by the rest, as if he wanted to come to a parley; but, on the captain's coming within fifty yards of him, ran away, nor could any of them be induced by all his endeavours to enter into a correspondence or commerce.
- b In the afternoon the captain, taking two men only with him, went along the country, to try if he could seize upon one of the natives, in order to procure information where he might be supplied with water. This led him on to skirmish with ten of them, who thought to make a prey of him and his men, in which one of the blacks was badly wounded with a musket-shot, and another of the captain's men hurt in the face by a wooden dart flung at him. One of the natives the captain inferred to be the superior of the rest, from some ornaments he wore, such as a white circle of chalk or lime round his eyes, a white streak down his nose, with the same kind of decoration on his breast and elbows. This gave him a ferocious look, adding greatly to his natural deformity; for all the natives of this coast, says Dampier, have most unpleasant aspects, and the worst features he had ever seen on
- c savages (A).

DAMPIER saw a great many places where they had made fires, and where there were commonly three or four boughs stuck up to the windward for shelter. In the evening the captain went on board, without having the good fortune to meet with water. He observed a strong tide, and a regular ebbing and flowing of the sea, the flood running south-east-by-south till the last quarter; then it sets in directly to the shore, which lies here south-south-west and north-north-east, the ebb setting north-west-by-north. The captain acquaints us, that, but for that sort of pleasure which accompanies the discovery of even the barrenest spot upon the globe, he could find no other reason to be satisfied with this country of New Holland. The lands upon this coast, as well as on all the others he had seen, are fenced by a chain of sand hills towards the sea, in such a manner, that there is no seeing what lies behind them.

d At high water the tides rise so amazingly high, that the land appears greatly beneath a spectator from a ship. At low water the coast is so filled with rocks, that hardly a small boat can put to shore, though in the flood tide she may safely go over all of them. For five or six hundred yards from the sea the land is such as we have described in Sharks Bay, and bearing shrubs of the same kind. Farther in, the country appeared low and level, chiefly savannah, and partly wood-lands; the former bearing a coarse grass, and the latter groves of small trees about fourteen feet in height. He saw but a few land animals, among which were lizards, a creature resembling a wolf; crows, hawks, kites, and turtle-doves. As to the fish, it is much the same he described ^b.

e Thus Dampier spent about five weeks on the coast of New Holland, making all the discoveries he could, and looking out for places of refreshment, that his men might be enabled to pursue his design with the more vigour, for the scurvy had begun to shew itself among them. He doubted not in so fine a climate to meet with some part of the continent, or some island, that could supply his wants. Being disappointed in this expectation, he reflected upon the next necessary measure to be taken, and resolved to continue coasting along the shore to the north-east, in order to make farther discoveries, and from a full persuasion that at least in the latitude $16^{\circ} 15'$ he should meet with sweet water and vegetables. This notion must be allowed reasonable, yet did the event prove it but ill founded. Every little accident becomes of consequence among a crew ready to lay hold of every opportunity to call their commander's

^b DAMPIER'S Voyage, vol. iii.

(A) This was probably the coast he touched at in 1699 in his voyage round the world, there he describes them in the following manner: "The inhabitants are the most miserable wretches in the universe, having no houses or covering but the heavens; or garment, except a piece of the bark of a tree tied round the waist; no sheep, poultry, or fruits; but feed upon a few fish, cockles, muscles, and the like, without religion or government; they cohabit promiscuously. For the rest, their bodies are tall, thin, and strait, with great heads and eye-brows, and round foreheads.

"Their eye-lids are constantly half-closed, to keep the flies out, which are exceedingly troublesome here. They have large bottle noses, thick lips, and wide mouths. Both men and women, old and young, want the two fore-teeth of the upper jaw; but whether they draw them, I am not able to tell. They have no beards, but black, short, curled hair, like the negroes of Africa. Their weapons are a strait pike sharpened at one end. Of their language I can say nothing, but that they speak through the throat (1)."

(1) Vide Voy. vol. i. p. 163.

knowledge in question, to magnify the difficulties of the voyage, and to countenance a whatever appeared to agree with their own favourite scheme of returning home, though impracticable.

The islands of Timor and Anamaboa.

With these sentiments Captain Dampier put to sea on the 5th of September, with a gentle gale, but he was soon compelled to abandon his design, the shoals along the coast rendering it difficult, hazardous, and almost impossible to keep to the land, or to put in if necessary; he therefore turned out farther to sea, in water from seven to thirty-six fathom. The next day he could but just discern the land, though he had then no more than thirty fathom sounding; nay, often out of sight from shore, the soundings were from seven to eight fathoms only. In this course he kept till September the 8th, when, finding he had passed the latitude where he expected to be supplied with water, without the possibility of landing, and being apprehensive that the same difficulties might continue for several degrees further, he resolved to steer for the island of Timor. On the 21st, he arrived on the island, where he met with a Dutch sloop, the master of which shewed great surprise at seeing the ship of any other nation in these seas. His whole conduct was intended to dissuade Dampier from landing, assuring him that the side of the island on which he was afforded no water, excepting a well hard-by the Dutch fort, near which he would find it impossible to come, as the natives would certainly oppose and use him ill. Nay, because Dampier had accidentally discovered the straits which divide the islands of Timor and Anamaboa (for these two are, in all charts, laid down as one island), they presumed that he must have robbed some Dutch vessel of her charts, since the straits are only known by them. With these suspicions and jealousies the sloop returned to the fort; but Dampier was neither to be intimidated or circumvented by the Dutchmen. He sent his boat on shore to the governor, to satisfy him that the ship was no pirate, imagining he could have no jealousy or resentment upon any other account. But he was soon undeceived. The governor complained of an infringement of the privileges of the company, saying that no other ship had a right to come into those seas; that it could be done with no good design; that it must be either to inspect into their trade, or to rob their settlements. In short, he seemed to claim to his own nation the sole right of approaching the islands of the South Sea. Dampier, unwilling to enter into arguments with him upon a point of which he was no competent judge, agreed to ride at anchor two miles from shore, provided the governor would supply him with water at any price. This was accordingly done; after which he set fail.

The Dutch
fort Concordia in the island of Timor.

THE country appears pleasant to the eye, the mountains being covered with wood, and the adjacent meadows with grass. The island Anamaboa, or Anabao, is about ten leagues long and four broad; yet is this small tract of land divided into two kingdoms. The natives of both resemble the other Indians, and are of a swarthy copper colour, with straight black hair. The subjects of the king of Anamaboa are in league with the Dutch fort Concordia in the island of Timor; but inveterate enemies to the people of the other kingdom Anabao. The latter, besides managing their plantations of a few cocoa-trees, fish and strike turtles, and hunt buffaloes, killing them with swords, darts, or lances. They carry on a small trade, for the sake of conveniency, with the Dutch, whom they hate, and the Portuguese, with whom they live upon not the most friendly footing. They go constantly armed, and spend four or five days in hunting or fishing, without visiting their habitations. The fish or flesh they take, that is not wanted for immediate use, is dried on a barbacue, or wooden grate, standing high over the fire; after which they carry it home.

A description
of the fort.

HAVING procured some water, and made his observations, Dampier weighed anchor on the 22d, coasting along the shore till the 27th, when he put into Copang bay, where he discovered a good watering-place. He describes the island Timor to be about 70 leagues in length, the centre of it in 9° S. lat. and sixteen broad. It has no navigable river, nor any harbours, though there are bays where ships may ride with great safety at most seasons of the year. The shore is bold, free from shoals, rocks, or islands, excepting a few which are perfectly visible, and easily avoided. From the foot of the mountains to the shore is full of red Mangrove trees, excepting within 200 paces of the sea, which is covered with a particular species of pines. Concordia, the Dutch fort, is pleasantly situated; it has a river on one side (although the sloop informed Dampier otherwise), about forty yards from the walls, with a garden on the other. Here are all kinds of fallads, roots, and other vegetables for the kitchen, with a pretty parterre. In some parts of it are fruit-trees, as jacas, pumplenoses, oranges, sweet lemons, &c. and by the walls are cocoa-nut and toddy trees in great perfection and plenty. Besides these, they have musk and water-melons, pine-apples, pome-citrons, pomegranates, and other delicious fruits. Between this garden and the river is a kind of paddock for black cattle. Beyond the company's grounds the natives have their village or town, consisting of about fifty or sixty houses. The fort is defended by about fifty soldiers, and several pieces of cannon, as well as stone walls with bastions. Within the walls is a new chapel built of stone, and prettily decorated.

a As to the natives, they are of a middling stature, slender-limbed, strait-bodied, long-visaged, their hair black and lank, and their complexion swarthy. They are nimble, active, and dextrous, but at the same time lazy to an extreme: they are said to be dull in every thing but treachery and barbarity. Their houses are mean, their dress a bit of cloth tied round the waist. Some for ornament wear frontlets of mother of pearl, or thin pieces of gold or silver, of an oval form, the size of an half crown, curiously milled round the edges. Five of these they dispose in a certain manner above the eye-brows, both for elegance of dress, and a security to the forehead. Others again wear palmeto leaves, shaped into different fashions.

b THEY take as many wives as they are able to maintain, without limitation or restriction; they even often sell their children for a wife. Religion they would appear to have none, as they use no kind of ceremonies. Their common food is Indian corn, which every man plants for himself, and just as much as he imagines will maintain his family; if there should prove an overplus, he gives it to his neighbour, who perhaps may be deficient; and he again transfers it to a third, if himself does not stand in need of it. Their method of clearing the ground is by setting fire to the withered grass and shrubs, the ashes of which they find fertilize and enrich the soil.

c THEIR plantations are extremely mean; for, as their chief delight is in hunting, every part of agriculture is neglected for that, excepting the easy process of burning the grass, and sowing with lances, or a short thick truncheon, and a target on the left arm; the same weapons they use in war. The whole island is divided into five different kingdoms, viz. Copang, Omabie, Fontribie, Popumbie, and Mamquimal. Almost all the kings are sworn foes to each other; and their divisions are fomented and kept up by the Dutch, who find these perpetual animosities of use to their authority, which otherwise they would hardly be able to maintain. It indeed seems to be the prevailing maxim of their policy, throughout the whole empire of the India company ^b.

d THE Portuguese fort is on the opposite end of the island, which is reported to be greatly superior in strength and power to the Dutch. This at least is their own opinion, and with this idea they content themselves while the Dutch run away with the whole trade of the islands. They depend greatly on their alliance with the natives, with whom they are consolidated into the same nation by intermarriages; however, their influence or manners does not extend far into the country. They acknowledge the sovereignty of the king of Portugal, but will receive no officers appointed by him. The Malayan, the Timoran, and the Portuguese, are all spoken by the inhabitants in the vicinage of the Portuguese settlement, or rather a mixture of all three. Dampier says, that he did not see above three or four white men in the whole Portuguese factory, the rest being a kind of mixed descent, of whom there are several thousands. The chief of the factory has his residence at a place called Porto Novo, but he is commonly at the head of an army in the mountains, to guard the passes against the Copangoyans effectually in the dry season.

e THERE are also some Chinese merchants from Macao, who import hither gold, tea, iron work, china, and silk, both wrought and raw. For their mixed stamped gold, they get in exchange pure gold, bees-wax, sandal-wood, and coire. In short, the country, taken together, is rich and plentiful; fruits of all kinds abound in the island; rice, Indian corn, fowls, honey, wax, gold, copper, and many other necessaries of life, and rich merchandize, are found here; and to conclude, the island is no less wealthy than pleasant.

f ON the 12th of December Captain Dampier sailed from Timor, and saw during the remainder of the month several other islands. On New Year's Day he first discovered the coast of New Guinea, and soon after several islands. On January the 4th, 1700, he descried smoke in different places on the islands lying to the west of his course, to which he bore away with the advantage of a brisk gale a-stern. There two canoes came off within call, making signs to come on shore, and speaking in a language that none of the crew understood. They were returned in the Malayan, but made no answer. As they would not be prevailed on to come on board, the captain went after them with the pinnace, carrying with him knives, beads, and toys, such as he imagined the most likely to engage them in a commerce. At first they were shy, and hid themselves behind the rushes on the shore; but, on the captain's throwing them some trifles, they approached in a friendly manner, pouring water on their heads, and using other ceremonies of a perfect cordiality. The next day several canoes came on board, bringing with them fruits, roots, and other vegetables, which were all bought up.

g THIS island is called Pulo Sabuda by the natives, but has no appellation in the charts of the New Guinea coast. It is about three leagues in length, and two miles in breadth, of a good height, and to be discovered at sea at the distance of 11 or 12 miles. In general it is rocky, but over the rocks in many places there is good red and yellow mould, not deep, but producing a tall trees bearing delicious fruit. These the natives plant, for in this mould nothing shoots up spontaneously. There is great variety of fruit on the island; what Dampier saw were only lemons, oranges, plantanes, cocoa-nuts, pine-apples, and a few others. He mentions indeed another kind, which he calls a wild jacas, about the size of a small pumpkin, full of stones or kernels, but exceeding delicious. The libby tree grows in the vallies of this island, from which the natives make fago-cakes. What they use for this purpose is the pith. Dampier bought a few nutmegs in the shell on this island, but he does not say whether they were the produce of the country. He saw a great number of sea fowls upon the shore, of these boobies and men of war birds were the chief. A sort of wild pigeon he mentions as peculiar to Pulo Sabuda, it externally appearing jet-black, till, on turning the feathers, the inside is of a snow-white; in other respects it differs nothing from an English pigeon. Here is also a kind of sky-coloured bird, which Dampier had never seen but on the coast of New Guinea. Bats as large as conies are found on the island, their necks, heads, ears, and noses, like foxes; their hair rough; that about their necks of a whitish yellow, that on their heads and shoulders black. Their wings extended are four feet wide, measuring from the extremity of each. Their smell is rank and disagreeable, like that of a fox. The fish of the island is of various kinds, mullets, bass, rock-fish, old wives, whiprays, and some other sorts, but of no kind is there any plenty. The island lies in $2^{\circ} 43'$ S. latitude, distant from Port Babao on the island of Timor 486 miles. The inhabitants of this and of several adjacent islands are a sort of tawny Indians, with long black hair, differing but little in their manner from the Mindanayans. There is a kind of subordination among them; for, besides the different degrees of rank among the natives, there is an inferior order of curl-pated New Guinea slaves, at least of the same complexion and features with these, which the captain believed might have been imported. They are in general poor, and naked, except a bit of cloth round the waist, made from the rind of the palmetto-tree; but the women wear a kind of callico loose dress. For ornament they wear blue and yellow bracelets made of glass beads. They are armed with bows, arrows, and broad swords, like the Mindanese; they have lances also pointed with iron.

THEIR method of striking fish by the fish-gig is ingenious, and something curious in the manner. They make the fish rise by means of a piece of wood cut out and painted like a dolphin; this they let down into the water by a line and weight to sink it; when they believe it low enough, they hale the line with the utmost celerity into their boats, and the fish, rising after the figure, are struck as soon as they appear near the surface. But the chief sustenance of the natives is drawn from their plantations, although they have large boats with which they trade to New Guinea, from whence, among other things, they import slaves and parrots, which they again export to Ceram, and exchange for calicoes. While the captain staid on the island, one of those trading boats arrived from New Guinea; but they would dispose of neither slaves nor parrots for any other merchandize than calicoes. Their houses are poor and mean on one side of the island, but much larger, and more convenient and splendid, on the other. He could not guess at their religion for certain, although he believed them to be Mohammedans, and for a very extraordinary reason; viz. that they drank brandy out of the same cup with the seamen, without scruple. An atheist would have done the same.

New Guinea, and the islands on its coast in the captain's return.
Cockle
Island.

ON the 20th, after laying in a stock of roots, fruits, and water, the captain weighed anchor, and left the island, and steered to the north-west cape of New Guinea, called by the Dutch Cape Malo. Off this cape lies a small woody island; to examine which Dampier sent his boat, which soon returned with a cockle of an incredible size, whence he gave it the appellation of Cockle Island. On landing he observed a greater number of pigeons than he had ever before seen together, although all the islands within the Tropic of Capricorn abound with this fowl. He reports, that on this shore his men found a cockle-shell, which, empty, weighed, what the reader will perhaps think incredible, 258 lb. The next evening he anchored near a pleasant island, about two leagues and a half in length; the country high, and finely clothed with wood of different kinds. Most of the spices were unknown to Dampier, but they were all in leaf, and yielded a delightful odour and fragrance. They bore flowers of different colours, some white, some green, yellow, blue, purple, &c. They were tall, strait, and of a smooth exterior; one in particular measured 70 feet in height to the branches, without a curve, knot, spot, or blemish, on the bark. The soil is shallow, black, but fertile. To this island he gave the name of King William.

King William's Island.

ON the 14th he was within six leagues of the continent of New Guinea, which appeared very high from the sea. He discovered two capes, distant from each other about twenty leagues; the variation of the compass here was four degrees to the east. Next day he fell in with an uninhabited island, to which he gave the name of Providence; it lies near the island discovered by Schouten, and is called by his name in all the Dutch charts. On the 16th he crossed the line, fell in with an island which he at first took to be Wishart's Island, but, perceiving

Providence
Island.

- a ceiving his mistake, he called it Matthias Island. Eight leagues to the eastward he saw another island, and after that several more, to the largest of which he gave the appellation of Squally, on account of the squalls and blowy weather he met with on the coast. After this, in order to indemnify himself for the sufferings he had sustained, and with so little profit, he determined to steer away clear of the islands, towards the continent, in hopes there to meet with something to compensate all the toil and labour the crew had gone through. He came within sight of it on the 18th, and describes it nearly in the following manner: The continent, says he, appeared high and mountainous, the face of the hills being all over covered with woods, and adorned with flourishing trees. The sides of the hills had many plantations, and tracts of cleared lands, which, with the smokes he observed, was a plain indication of the country's being inhabited.
- b When he was within a short distance of the shore he saw a proa, followed by three or four more coming out from the adjacent bays, as if they intended to approach the ship. In a little time a fleet of forty-six of these skiffs were got together, and came so near, that the ship's crew could see them beckoning to go on shore, and hear their language, which however they could not comprehend. Dampier endeavoured to put into the bay, but, being driven to the leeward, the proes gathered round him. He endeavoured, by shewing them several toys, to draw them into a commerce, of which they seemed to be shy. Upon this he put some knives, scissars, and beads, into a bottle, which they took up with great satisfaction; striking their left breast, and holding a black truncheon over their heads, in token of friendship. When the ship stood to the shore, they looked pleased, and frowned as often as she stood to a greater distance. There were 200 men in the proes round the ship, and the whole shore lined with inhabitants, which, with the shoals in the bay, deterred the captain from attempting to enter for that night. He had ordered his men to stand to their arms, and took every precaution against a surprise, as he was ignorant of their designs. At last he determined to land in the pinnace; which being observed by the natives, they began to sling stones with great dexterity from certain engines they were provided with; this bay he therefore named Slingers Bay. Upon the firing of a gun, they were greatly astonished, left off their slinging, and huddled together, as if they were consulting their future measures. The shot fired upon them did some execution; but Dampier was unwilling to repeat it, as he must thence cut off all hopes of any farther commerce with them.
- d NEXT day he sailed by an island, from whence two or three canoes put out, and laboured hard to overtake the ship, in which they failed, though she went with an easy sail. About three leagues to the north he opened a large deep bay, to the north-east of which lay two islands. One was small and overgrown with wood; the other a league in length, well inhabited, and full of cocoa-nut plantations. He attempted to get into a bay on the north side, but, finding it shoaly, he tried to get anchorage on the east end. Disappointed in this, he was steering on south-east, when a canoe came up close with the ship. She had on board three men, who came without fear or dread into the ship, and sold some cocoa-nuts to the seamen. Before these departed, two more canoes were seen coming; but Dampier, not chusing to admit a number of savages on board at night, steered off from land.
- e ON March the 3d he was got to Garrat Dennis, about 15 leagues in circumference, high, woody, and mountainous. Some trees were very large, and the bay abounded with cocoa-nut trees. The sides of the mountains were covered with plantations well laid out and cultivated. The mould in the new-cleared land was of a brown reddish colour, not deep, but exceeding fertile. The middle of the island lies in $3^{\circ} 10'$ south latitude, by which Dampier's course may be perfectly understood; for, from the island of Ceram north of the line, he surrounded the north point and islands of New Guiney, coasting along the continent till he came to the north-east side of New Britain. The natives of Garrat Dennis are a black, strong, well-limbed people, their heads quite round, their hair short and curled, but dressed into different forms, and dyed with all manner of colours, red, yellow, and blue. They have round faces, bottle-noses, yet not disagreeable, except they are disfigured by the strange ridiculous modes of the country, such as running rings as thick as the finger through the nose, both nostrils, and hanging down upon the cheeks. Their ears are also pierced, and, like the Indians of the East, distended into an almost incredible length down the neck and shoulders, with pendants of some heavy metal; for the lower the ear falls, and the larger the hole pierced in it, the more beautiful the owner is thought (A). They are active and dexterous in their proes, which are built upon a very ingenious model, ornamented with the carved figures of men, birds, and fishes, not badly executed. Their weapons are slings, lances, swords, with bows and arrows.

(A) We cannot help remarking how unjust the opinion is, that all distortions of nature first appear in the most civilized countries. If we want to see true simplicity of manners, we are desired to look for it among savages, and the wild untutored Indians; yet can any thing be more contrary to nature than the customs which travellers relate of those rude and uncultivated nations? The people we are now describing afford a striking instance of this.

They have also wooden fish-gigs for striking fish, at which they are no less expert than the people of Slingers Bay. Their speech is clear, soft, and articulate ; the words they used the most were Vacousee, Olamais ; the others equally abounding in vowels and soft consonants.

Cave's
Island.

THE following day, Dampier visited another island in S. latitude $3^{\circ} 25'$, distant about 316 miles from the meridian of Cape Mabo. It is high and woody like the former ; but shews many proofs of industry by finely cultivated plantations on the brows of the mountains. On the south-east parts of this island are two or three more small islands, all of them covered with wood, chiefly of cocoa-nut trees. On the north is another island, larger and more flat than any of the former. Passing between this and the high island described, which, in the Dutch charts, goes by the name of Cave's Island, some canoes came out from shore, making signals for the crew to land, and doubted not but the ship might be run upon the shore with the same ease and safety as their canoes. On their coming on board, which with some difficulty they were prevailed on to do, the captain presented them with bits of mirrors, knives, and glass beads ; presents they were highly delighted with. He shewed them cocoa-nuts, pumpions, nutmegs, and gold-dust ; all which they said they had upon their island, calling the latter Maneel. They were of a jet-black complexion, their hair frizzled, tall, stout, and well-shaped men, speaking the same language as the inhabitants of the neighbouring islands. The captain says, that of all the natives of New Holland, or New Guinea, he had ever seen, these were the most civilized and polished in their manners. After this, he fell in with St. John's Island, the people of which spoke the same language with those of Cave's Island, and differed but little from them in their customs. From hence he descried a headland, beyond which he could discover no land ; whence he infers, that the continent runs away more to the west than it is laid down in the maps. This headland lies in the latitude of $5^{\circ} 2'$ south, at the meridian distance of 1290 miles from Cape Mabo. Between this and Cape St. Mary's the land is mountainous, rough, and woody, with a number of points jutting out so far into the sea as to form some fine bays. Here he observed a burning mountain at a considerable distance up the country, but neither the appearance of houses or plantations on this coast. The bay Dampier called St. George's Bay, giving likewise the same name to the opposite mountain. Next day he came within sight of a cape, which he called Cape Orford. It lies in $5^{\circ} 24'$ south latitude. On each side the cape the land is more savannah than woodland, and appears to be of little value. Steering along south-west as the land lies, he observed the coast to be high, but more pleasant, and apparently more fruitful, than the former. He now began to see smoke again in different places, whence he judged this part of the country to be better inhabited than the former. On March the 14th, he had sight of a deep bay, with some islands about it. The same day he saw a point projecting into the sea, and a bay within, where he expected to meet with fresh water. Here he saw all the marks of a well-cultivated country, as cocoa-trees, fruitful plantations, and a great number of houses. When he was within five miles of the land, several canoes came out to survey the ship. He spoke to them, made signs, and did all in his power to invite them on board, but could not succeed. Soon after, a large well-built boat, with about forty men, came within call of the ship. She was followed by another still larger, finely carved and decorated, with upwards of fifty men on board. As he suspected they came out with intention to fight him, he ordered the gunner to point a cannon charged with grape-shot between the two boats. This he executed with so much address, that all the shot fell just where he intended, without touching either boat, and had the desired effect ; for they pulled with all their might to shore ; after which the ship followed them into the bay. As she passed by the point, a great number of people were seen peeping out of the crevices of the rock ; on which the captain ordered a cannon charged with ball to be fired, to terrify them. It lighted so near them, that they took to their heels with great precipitation, looking behind them to see if any more balls were coming. They soon assembled again in a grove of cocoa-trees ; when the captain thinking it necessary, on account of their numbers, to inspire them with high notions of his power, ordered a third gun to be fired ; after which he sent his boat on shore, to wood and water. Some of the natives came running to her with presents of cocoa-nuts, and the seamen cut the necessary wood, and filled their casks, without opposition. However, it was difficult to bring them to trade ; for they refused him yams, hogs, and fruit, in exchange for money or toys. At last they were prevailed on to spare some cocoa-nuts ; yet still they seemed afraid, running away as soon as they had delivered them. For several days the captain staid in this bay, in expectation of establishing a friendly commerce with the natives. He describes the men as dressed with feathers about their heads, and lances in their hands, and the women without any ornaments, or even covering, except a bunch of green boughs stuck behind and before in a string tied round the waist. They were industrious, and perpetually passing with large baskets of yams on their heads. It is the captain's remark, that, among all the uncivilized nations he had ever seen, the women carry the burdens, a thens, and perform the most laborious and servile employments, while the men parade before them with no other load than their arms.

ALL of a sudden, without any apparent cause, the natives became more shy than before, retiring a good way from the shore, pulling all their cocoa-nuts the preceding night, and driving away the hogs, with every thing that was moveable. The sailors followed them, and made signs to know what they had done with the hogs and goats; upon which they pointed to little huts at some distance, expressing the voices of the different animals by grunting and bleating, and their sizes by holding their hands at different distances from the ground. On the following day, the captain, accompanied with some of his men, carrying with him such trifles as he imagined would be most acceptable to them, went, with an intention, if possible, to bring them
b to friendly and familiar terms. He saw two men and a boy, one of whom was prevailed on by signs to come to the boat-side. He gave him a knife, a string of beads, and a glass-bottle; upon which he signified that he would go to a neighbouring village for cocoas. At the earnest request of his men, the captain permitted them to go to the bay where the natives had driven their hogs. Upon their landing, they assembled, and shook their lances, as if they intended to oppose them. The seamen held up such trifles as they had taken with them, but could not get them to approach or accept of any. Finding that their friendly endeavours had no effect, and determined to carry away some hogs, of which the ship was in great want, the seamen discharged some shot among them; upon which they all, except two or three, ran away. These kept their ground, and stood in a menacing posture; but soon ran off, upon one c of them being wounded in the arm by a musket-shot. After this, the men shot nine hogs, with which they returned to the ship, but soon came back, and landed without opposition; nor did the natives even attempt to resist their carrying off as many cattle as they thought proper. One man ventured to bring some cocoa-nuts, left them on the shore, and after making signs to the seamen where they were, ran off. This was all the communication the captain had with this timid people.

DURING a stay of several days here, the weather was almost constantly clear, fair, and pleasant, only sometimes interrupted by claps of thunder and showers of rain. The sea and land breezes were regular and refreshing; the former S. S. E. and the latter from N. E. to N. W. In honour of his patron he called this bay Port Montague. It lies in $6^{\circ} 10'$ S.
d latitude; the country round it being mountainous and woody, but interspersed with beautiful and rich vallies, and pleasant fresh-water brooks. The soil in the vallies is deep and yellowish; that on the mountains more shallow, and of a brown colour; but all extremely fertile and prolific. In general, the trees are neither remarkably tall, strait, nor thick, but, putting forth a fine verdure, they greatly delight and refresh the eye. Some were covered with flowers, some with berries, others loaded with large fruit, but all of them uncommon to any of the crew. Cocoa-nuts flourish greatly here, as well by the sea-side as in the more remote vallies. They are of the common size, and the stalk and kernel rather more delicious than any the captain had tasted before. Here is ginger, yams, and several culinary roots and herbs. Hogs, dogs, and some other land animals, he saw; such as pigeons, cuckadores, crows, and parrots;
e also another bird resembling a black-bird, but larger, and many more of a small size, peculiar to the country. The sea and rivers are well-stocked with fish, such as yellow-tails, whipsays, cavellies, &c.

ON the 22d of March early in the morning, the captain was called up to behold what the crew called a miracle. It was a large pillar of fire, shooting gradually for three or four minutes, then sinking in the same space of time, till it became scarce visible. He knew it immediately to be a volcano, or burning mountain, and steered for it accordingly. On the 25th he found himself within three leagues of the island in which this volcano was, about six miles from the continent. The island for the whole time vomited out flames, smoak, and ashes, with dreadful explosions as loud as thunder. The interval between each explosion was near f half a minute; neither were the eruptions equal in degree. Some were but faint convulsions in comparison of others; yet the weakest were terrifying. The stronger threw up a flame thirty or forty yards into the sky, and a stream of fire running down to the foot of the mountain, and even to the shore. From the chanel dug up by this liquid fire, they could in the ship perceive a smoke, which Dampier attributed to the half-consumed sulphur poured out from the funnel at the top of the mountain. This volcano is situated in $5^{\circ} 33'$ S. lat. The east part of New Guinea lies 40 miles west of this tract of land, and in most charts they are laid down as contiguous; but captain Dampier found a wide passage between them, calling the north-east promontory of New Guinea King William's Cape, and the island New Britain. It g land, interspersed with fine vallies, and abounding with tall and noble trees. It is well inhabited by a race of strong well-made negroes, but so suspicious that the captain could hold no commerce with them. Farther east on the continent he discovered another island, which he called

Rooke's Island.

Crown
Island.

Reflections on the voyage.

Sir George Rooke's Island, about 12 leagues in length, well-cultivated, rich, and populous; another near, but more to the east, which, from its figure, he called Crown Island; after which he got to Batavia without any other material discovery.

FROM what has been said, the reader will perceive how strongly Dampier's account^f confirms what has been related from captain Tasman's journal, and the certainty that there lies a large, rich, and inhabited continent in the South Seas, from forty-two or forty-three degrees south latitude, quite to the equator, with a variety of fruitful, pleasant, and healthy islands. He will likewise observe, that however short of expectation this voyage turned out, yet that still it was of the utmost consequence. It has shewn a new Indies, or at least described one more minutely than former accounts had done, in which we may be able to undertake settlements as advantageous as any this or any other nation has hitherto made, whenever that spirit of industry shall revive which first gave birth, then extended, and at last established, the British commerce. This journal tallies so exactly with the relations of Quiros and Schouten, that we can hardly entertain a doubt of the possibility of finding in the South Sea countries which would fully compensate all the toil and expence of opening a trade with them. And, indeed, if there were no other merit in Dampier's expedition, this alone ought to recommend it, that it has for ever removed those suspicions concerning the authenticity of former journals, and fully assures us that there is a Southern Continent; a blessing reserved for the British nation, if she has prudence and resolution enough to embrace it. But this matter will be set in a still clearer light by the following extract of commodore Roggewin's journal.

^f DAMPIER, vid. vols. iii. & iv.

S E C T. V.

Containing an account of the parentage of Commodore Roggewin: his memorials to the Dutch West India company; their intention of equipping a fleet for this voyage; and, finally, the discoveries of the Commodore on the Southern Continent, with the seizure of his squadron by the East India company at Batavia.

Roggewin's voyage to the South Seas.

AT the expence, and by the appointment, of the Dutch West India company, commodore Roggewin sailed from the port of Amsterdam on the 16th of July, an. 1721, in search of discoveries in the South Seas (A). He had under his command three ships well provided for so long and hazardous a voyage. After various accidents he arrived at the island of Juan Fernandez, which he soon quitted, with intention to visit that part of the Southern Continent reported by Mr. Wafer to be discovered by captain Davis (B), an. 1680. Roggewin having the

(A) Mr. Roggewin, father to the commodore, a gentleman of great parts, penetration, and opulent fortune, which he had acquired in India, was the projector of this voyage for the discovery of that vast continent, and the infinite number of islands, which are demonstrated to lie in that part of the globe. His project, with explications of his plan, and arguments in support of it, he presented to the East India company anno 1696. It was well received, and Mr. Roggewin was assured by the company, that as soon as the state of their affairs would permit, he should receive all the assistance and countenance in their power. But the disturbances which soon after followed put a stop to their good intentions, and before any farther steps were taken, Mr. Roggewin breathed his last. He was a gentleman of the province of Zealand, who from his youth had applied himself to mathematical studies, at least such of them as relate to geography, navigation, and a perfect knowledge of the globe. He had a hearty zeal for the service of his country, of which he gave many proofs, but none so great in his own opinion as this project, the execution of which he earnestly recommended on his death-bed to his son.

After his father's decease, the young gentleman pursued his studies with the utmost vigour, and made so hasty a progress as to qualify himself for the post of counsellor to the judiciary at Batavia, whilst young. After his return from thence with a large fortune, he resolved to perform the promise he had made to his father; and, in the year 1721, presented a memorial to the West India company, which was received with the same readiness the East India company had shewn to his father's, but executed with more alacrity; for he soon had a little squadron of three ships appointed him; viz. the Eagle of 36 guns and 111 men, commanded by Captain Job Coster; the Thienhoven of 28 guns, and 100 men, Captain Borwman; and the African Galley, 14 guns, and 60 men, under the command of Captain Rosinbald (1).

(B) As Roggewin's journal, or rather that published in French by a native of Mecklenburg, who performed the voyage with him, is greatly deficient in this circumstance, we will relate it from Mr. Wafer's account of the discovery. "We steered," says he, "from the Gallipagos South-and-by-East, until we came into lat. 27° 20' South, where we fell in with a low sandy island, and heard a roaring noise like that of the sea beating upon the shore, right ahead of the ship, it being then night. Upon this, fearing to fall foul of the shore before day, the ship was put about, and lay to till day. It proved to be a small island, without the guard of any rocks.—To the westward about twelve leagues, we saw a range of high land, which we took to be an island; for there were several partitions in the prospect. This land seemed to reach about 16 leagues in a range, and there came flocks of fowls. I, a the benefit of the south-east monsoon, soon arrived in the latitude of 28° ; and in the longitude of 251° , he expected to meet with Davis's Land; and was the more assured of this prospect, when he saw fowls flying over the ship, and observed the wind often shifting and veering; both which are looked upon as certain signs of land. So strong were their hopes, that some of the company imagined they saw it, though, to their great mortification, after a fruitless search, they could not fall upon it. Hence he concluded, that he had either passed it, or that there existed no such land; but we are not to be surprised at his disappointment, as it appears from Wafer's account, that he sought it ten degrees too far to the west^a.

(1) Vid. Hist. des Navig. tom. ii. p. 226. Harris's Collect. p. 258. tom. i.

Pursuing his course for 12 degrees west, he still saw great flocks of birds, which attended him till he fell in with a small island, about 16 leagues in extent, to which he gave the name of Pascha, or Easter Land, it being discovered on Easter-day. The smallest of the vessels was sent to sound and examine this coast; and she returned with advice that it seemed fertile and populous, as they discovered a great number of smokes in different parts of the island. When the squadron was about two miles from shore, an Indian canoe came off to them. They made signs for it to come on board, which the man to whom she belonged readily agreed to; and was accordingly well received. As he was naked, the first present made him was a piece of cloth to cover him; then they gave him toys, such as glass beads, knives, and other things; with all which he was overjoyed. His body was all over painted with figures of different animals. His natural complexion, as far as could be discovered through the cover of paint, was a dark brown, and his ears excessively large and long. He was tall, well-made, robust, and of a happy countenance. His spirits were good, his limbs active, and his temper disposed to cheerfulness, as appeared by his gestures, and the agility with which he traversed the ship. They gave him a glass of wine to drink, which he threw away, probably for fear of being poisoned, or perhaps, being accustomed to drink water, the smell might be offensive to him. They next clothed him from head to foot, putting a hat on his head; with which he appeared to be greatly incumbered and uneasy. They gave him victuals, of which he ate heartily; but could not be prevailed on to use either knife or fork. They then ordered their music to play, which highly delighted, and set him a skipping and dancing. As they could not get to an anchor that night, they thought it proper to set the Indian in his canoe again, letting all the presents they had given him remain with him, in order to induce others to come on board. But so far from expressing a desire to return, he was uneasy, and seemingly affronted, that it should be required of him. He held up both his hands, looking wishfully, then, pointing to the island, he cried out, Oderoga! Oderoga! Oderoga! in a distinct and articulate voice. This they imagined to be his god, because they found a number of idols erected on the shore. On Roggewin's entering the gulph on the east side of the island, the ship being close to land, several thousands of the natives came on the beach with loads of fruits, roots, and fresh provisions, particularly trouts. Many came on board, and were civilly treated. As the ship drew nearer, the natives crowded down to the sea-side, sacrificing to their idols, probably to protect them against the strangers, whose formidable and unusual appearance greatly terrified them; for those who were bold enough to come on board betrayed marks of fear, that made it obvious they were desirous of conciliating the favour of the Europeans, rather from motives of terror than of love, or any particular hospitality to strangers.

The next morning early they were seen prostrated before their idols, making burnt-offerings.

In the mean time, Roggewin, with about 150 seamen, was preparing to land; just as they were entering their boats, a large fleet of canoes, with every commodity the island afforded, came to the side of the ship. Among these was the friendly Indian they had so kindly treated on board, who returned with symptoms of the strongest joy, which he expressed by some ridiculous capers and skips along the deck. There was likewise one man perfectly white, with large pendants in his ears, of a grave and solemn deportment, and an air either of deep melancholy or gloomy religion; from which the Dutch conjectured he was a priest. During this state of friendly offices, one of the natives was shot dead in his canoe (by accident, says the journalist), which spread such terror among the rest, that they leapt into the sea, and

^a HARRIS'S Collect. p. 269. tom. i.

"and many more of our men, would have made this land; but Captain Davis would not permit it. The small island bears from Copayopo 500 leagues almost due east, and from the Gallipagos under the line 600 leagues (2)." From hence it is apparent, that Roggewin's project, when he set out from Juan Fernandez, of steering this course, was not only natural, but founded on experience, and the lights afforded by actual journals. He had good reasons to believe there was a Southern Continent; and this account of Davis's Land seemed to prove to him, that this range described by Wafer was a part of it.

(2) Harris's Collect. p. 265.

swam ashore with the utmost precipitation. They were followed by the Dutch, who, finding the shore crouded with these miserable creatures, thought themselves under the necessity of brutally making their way through them by force. This they did by a discharge of small arms, which instantly cleared the coast. Nothing could be more imprudent, barbarous, or insolent, than this unprovoked act. By their own acknowledgement, the Dutch were received with all possible demonstrations of friendship; why then unnecessarily commence hostilities, and shed the blood of those very men who were paying them all possible marks of regard and devotion! The natives, forsooth, had presumed to stand in their way, and even, out of curiosity, to touch their arms; which atrocious crime must cancel all the obligations received from their hospitality. No arguments, indeed, can palliate the conduct of the Dutch on this occasion; for it appeared equally devoid of religion, humanity, and policy, too much akin to that brutal pride and over-weening insolence they had shewn in all their settlements in the Indies, both to natives and Europeans.

Pascha or Easter Island, mentioned by Tasman, and here minutely described.

By this discharge a great number were killed and wounded; among the former of which was the poor Indian, who had been twice on board to welcome them with so much cordiality. Upon this, the natives kept at the distance of ten yards, supposing that space sufficient to secure them against the effects of the musquetry; nor did the Dutch chuse to repeat their wanton cruelty. Although the consternation into which they had been thrown was very great, as was apparent from the dismal shrieks and howlings they uttered, yet finding that no further attempts were made against them, they soon laid aside their resentment, to resume those acts of benevolence more agreeable to their disposition. Men, women, and children, presented themselves before the proud usurpers, with branches of palm, in token of peace, and with offerings of fowls, fruits, and the best produce of their country. Even their women were given to the Dutch, and nothing refused that could either demonstrate the affection, the fear, or the submission of the inhabitants. Softened with such tokens of deep humility, the stubborn hearts of the Dutchmen deigned to treat them with kindness, and even to return their presents by a number of toys and baubles, by way of atoning for the innocent blood they had spilt.

THE natives perceiving that no further injury was intended, brought them 500 live fowls, large quantities of red roots and potatoes, which they use instead of bread, several hundreds of sugar-canes, and loads of pisans, or Indian figs, of the size of a gourd, and covered with a green rind. The pulp of this fruit is sweet as honey; the figs grow in branches, sometimes an hundred on a bough, and shaded with leaves six or eight feet long, and three broad. No animals besides birds appeared on the island; of these there were great numbers and an infinite variety, some of the most beautiful the Dutch had ever beheld. But they thought it probable that some parts of the country were not without cattle and other beasts, because the natives expressed as much by signs.

Description of
the natives, their customs and manners.

THEY dressed their food in earthen pots, of the manufacture of the island; and their most common food is drawn from vegetables raised by cultivation. The Dutch imagined that every separate family or tribe among them had its peculiar village. The huts or cabins, which compose them, were from 40 to 60 feet in length, and six or eight feet in width, formed of poles stuck perpendicular in the earth; the spaces between which are filled with a kind of loam or fat earth, and the roof made of palm and pisan leaves. All their plantations were staked out, neatly divided, and finely cultivated. When the Dutch were there, almost all their fruits, plants, herbs, and roots, were in full maturity; so that nothing could present a more rich and beautiful prospect to the eye than the whole face of this island, blooming with the elegant verdure of the spring, and the plentiful mellowness of autumn. The houses were but indifferently furnished, yet sufficient to prove that the arts were not wholly unknown to the natives. The chief ornaments were red and white coverlets, of a pretty fancy, and neat execution, which at night they used as bed-cloaths, and in the day as a defence against the piercing rays of the sun. The stuff was smooth and soft as silk, appearing by many tokens to be absolutely of their own manufacture.

As to the persons of the natives, they were in general an active, slender, strait, and well-made people, extremely swift of foot and agile. In point of temper, they were of a sweet, mild, modest, and agreeable disposition, timid, fearful, and faint-hearted, to a degree of weakness and effeminacy. Whenever they brought the Dutch any provisions, they instantly fell down on their knees, and then hastily retired; nor indeed can we be surprised at this rear, after the proofs of gratitude the Hollanders had already given. In general, they were of a brown complexion, or rather of the olive copperish colour of a Portuguese Indian, though many of them were absolutely black, and others almost fair, if not completely white. Another cast or tribe of them had a complexion intirely red, as if their skins had been scorched by the sun. Their ears hung down to their shoulders, and some wore white pendants or ear-rings a of an enormous size, which they considered as very ornamental. Their bodies were painted with the figures of birds, serpents, goats, hogs, and other animals; a strong presumption that such were not unknown to them. Of these, several of the figures displayed a happy talent at the imitative art, being lively representations of the life.

^a Hist. des Navigat. aux Terres Aust. T. ii. p. 231.

As to their women, they had an artificial bloom on their cheeks, of a crimson far surpassing any thing known to us in Europe; nor could the Dutch by any means discover the composition. On their heads they wore little hats, neatly made of reeds or straw, with no other covering than the coverlets we have mentioned. They did not excel in either modest coyness or chastity; for they often beckoned the Dutch into their houses, throwing off their mantlets when they sat by them. What is very singular among these islanders is, that not the smallest vestige or appearance of arms was to be seen among them. When they were attacked, they immediately fled to their idols for protection, and implored their assistance with a pathetic and warm devotion. What pity that minds so excellently disposed, were not directed to the knowledge of the true God! The statues of their deities were of stone, representing a human figure, with a crown on the head, large ears, but the rest nicely proportioned, and so highly finished, that the Dutch were struck with amazement at the progress they had made in sculpture. Round those idols were erected palisades of stone, well cut, at the distance of 20 or 30 yards. Some of the natives appeared more zealous and frequent worshippers than the rest; and these the Dutch imagined to be their priests, both for this reason and because they wore many marks of distinction, such as, their heads closely shaved, and large white balls suspended to the ears, with a bonnet of white and black feathers, resembling those of a stork; from whence the Dutch concluded, that when these birds leave their usual place of residence, part of them at least take up their abode here. But this conjecture the journalst seems to contradict in some other observations upon the nature of this curious fowl.

No appearance of civil government or subordination could be discovered in this island, much less any chief, prince, or king, who had dominion over the rest. On the contrary, they all acted and spoke with equal freedom; and yet no inconveniency was observed to result from this natural order; for they lived in the greatest tranquility and harmony imaginable. The father, indeed, in each family, had an apparent supremacy, and his authority was readily obeyed. Some marks of honour and ceremonies of respect were likewise paid to the aged; pure nature and good-sense seeming to dictate those distinctions. The old men wore on their heads bonnets or caps, fringed round with feathers like the down of ostriches, and truncheons, or short thick sticks, in their hands, which the Dutch naturally supposed to be some marks of degree and authority. This island the journalst thinks might be settled to great advantage, as the climate is fine, in $28^{\circ} 30' S.$ lat. the air clear and wholesome, the soil rich and fruitful, proper for corn in the low lands, and in the higher grounds capable of being improved into vineyards. In short, the Dutch must undoubtedly have made great discoveries here, as well as on the continent, which they had reason to believe could not be a great way distant, had they not been driven from their moorings just as they were preparing to penetrate into the heart of the island, and to make a kind of settlement to which they might return for refreshments from their inquiries on the continent ^b.

LEAVING the island of Pascha, it was not long before Roggewin found himself in the height of the island called Badwater by Schouten. Here he was in expectation of meeting with some part of the Southern Continent; but, by changing his course, he ran 300 leagues out of the way, and at least 150 leagues further than Schouten. That famous seaman one day gave chase to a small vessel, that bore away directly south from him; whence he naturally inferred, that there must certainly be land on that side. Indeed, from all the lights of reason and experience, there could be any doubt of there being a continent here of at least 2000 leagues in extent; to which a direct course from Europe is certainly S. S. W. and from America N. E. or N. E. and ^f the commodore ranged through this ocean for the space of 800 leagues, sometimes one course, sometimes another, in hopes of falling upon the promised land; but none could be found till he came under lat. $15^{\circ} 45' S.$ and long. 28° , when he met with an island, which he conceived to be intirely a new discovery; and therefore took the liberty of giving it a name; viz. the Island of Charles Court or Carlshoff. He describes it about three leagues in extent, with a stake or mark fixed in the middle. Charles Court Island.

AFTER parting with this island, the wind began to come round to the S. W.; from which he inferred that the current of the air was altered by some neighbouring coast. By this sudden shifting of the wind he was driven in the night among a number of little islands and rocks, upon one of which the African galley foundered. The inhabitants, roused by the noise which this accident made, kindled fires on the hills, and flocked down to the shores. This alarm obliged the commodore to guard against a surprise, which the darkness of the night made an easy matter. To this end he fired grape-shot on the coasts, without ceremony, till daylight appeared, when he discovered the great danger to which he was exposed, being environed by four considerable islands, surrounded with shoals and rocks, from which he found it a difficult matter to extricate himself.

^b Hist. des Navig. aux Terres Austr. T. ii. p. 234.

Mischievous Island, and others adjacent

THE crew of the African galley had saved themselves on one of the islands, to which the commodore sent his boats to fetch them on board. They all returned, except a few, who, in the hurry, had mutinied against their officers, and preferred living among the savages rather than run the hazard of a court martial. These, not all the eloquence and assurances of the commodore could prevail upon to return; and they put it out of his power to compel them, by flying into the heart of the country. These islands are situated in S. lat. 15 and 16 degrees, at the distance of twelve leagues west of Carlsbeff. To that on which the African galley was lost, they gave the name of the Mischievous Island; the two next they called The Brothers, and the fourth The Sister. All four were covered with a verdure altogether charming, abounding with tall trees, most of them cocoa-nuts. The herbs growing here were so refreshing and medicinal, that the ship's crew, many of whom were ill of the scurvy, soon recovered by the use of them. An incredible quantity of cockles, muscles, mother of pearl oysters, &c. were found, which gave reason to hope that a very advantageous pearl-fishery might here be established. These islands are so flat and low, that they must frequently be overflowed. against which calamity the natives have secured themselves by a great number of canoes, boats, and stout barks, with cables, ropes, and sails. Pieces of those were found on the shore, which seemed to be made of hemp. The natives of Mischievous Island were of a gigantic stature; and the seamen affirmed that they measured several prints of feet not less than 20 inches in length each. Their bodies were painted with various colours; their hair was jet-black and long; their features were large, hard, and fierce, bespeaking a mind no less fierce and uncultivated. They were armed with pikes or lances 18 feet in length, marching in parties of 80 or 100, and inviting the Dutch by signs on shore, probably to draw them into an ambuscade. While the seamen of the African galley were on shore, they kept them at a distance by continual discharges of their musquetry; which, however, rather astonished than terrified them. The commander perceiving that no refreshments were to be procured on this island but by force, weighed from it, and next day arrived on the coast of another island, eight leagues to the westward, which he called Aurora, from his having discovered it about sunrise (C). It was about four leagues in extent, covered with a charming verdure, and adorned with trees and shrubs of all kinds. But as the commodore found the coast foul and rocky, he did not attempt to anchor, only taking as near a view as safety would permit. The same day, towards evening, he came up with another island, which from hence he called Vesper. In circuit it was about twelve leagues, the land flat, but cloathed, as the former, with a beautiful green, and stored with various sorts of trees.

Aurora Island

Vesper Island.

STILL he pursued his course, steering west, to about the fifteenth degree south, when he discovered land, and a great number of fires, which indicated its being well peopled. Thither he made all possible sail, in hopes of meeting with water and fresh provisions, of which he was in want. As he approached nearer, the inhabitants were seen diverting themselves in their canoes on the coast. He likewise perceived, that what he had taken for one continued coast was really a chain of islands, separated by small arms of the sea. He was soon so entangled in those guts, that he found it a hard matter to get clear; but at last a passage through the islands was discovered, by which he again got fairly into the open sea. Six of these islands were exceedingly beautiful and pleasant to the eye, and all of them together he reckoned might measure thirty leagues in circumference. They were situated twenty-five leagues west of Mischievous Island; the Dutch called them The Labyrinth, from their having been obliged to make frequent tacks to get clear of them. As it was dangerous to anchor on the coast, and none of the natives coming to meet them, the commodore did not think fit to stay here. He therefore continued his course westward, and in a few days discovered another island, which

^c Hist. des Navigat. T. ii. p. 235. Etiam Suite à l'Histoire Ancienne de M. Rollin, T. vi. p. 98.

(C) Here it was that the ship Tienhoven narrowly escaped the fate of the African galley; an accident which produced a mutiny on board. The seamen insisted either that the commodore should immediately return, or at least give them security for their wages, whether the ship should be lost or not. Roggeveen listened to their complaints with an humanity worthy of a man of honour, and then bound himself by a solemn oath, that they should receive the last farthing, whatever might be the fate of the ships; or the event of the expedition; an oath which he afterwards religiously performed, when the fleet was seized at Batavia (3).

To say the truth, the demand of the seamen was reasonable. They were even every day exposed to the most excessive fatigues, and every squall of wind, or sudden shock, made them run the hazard of losing in a moment the fruits of all their labour and toil.

(3) Harris T. i. b. i. c. 1. §. 7. 20.

a at a distance appeared extremely high and pleasant. On his nearer approach he found the ground foul and the coast rocky, by which he was deterred from going close to shore. But as he stood in need of provisions, the scurvy prevailing again on board, he ordered each pinnace to be well manned for a descent. No sooner did the natives perceive his design, than they hurried down in crowds to oppose their landing. They were armed with long pikes, and soon gave proofs of their dexterity and valour. However, the fire-arms from the pinnace disconcerted them, and they stood in astonishment at this unusual thunder. After this skirmish the Dutch landed, shewed their presents of looking-glasses, beads, and other baubles, and in a short time established a truce with the inhabitants, who received the trinkets with joy, suffering the Dutch to gather what herbs and vegetables they thought proper; nay, they even b assisted, and shewed them the best herbs, as soon as it was known that no injury was intended them.

Next day the commodore sent a stronger body on shore, not only to gather vegetables, but likewise to make all the discovery possible into the nature of the country. They set out with presenting the king or chief with a considerable number of chosen trinkets; which he accepted indeed, but with such an air of indifference and contempt as prognosticated no good to their future commerce. His majesty was, however, polite enough to return the compliment by a present of cocoa-nuts. The prince was distinguished from his subjects by a variety of pearl ornaments, in value about 600 Dutch florins, which he wore. The women expressed great fondness for the white men, almost stifling them with caresses; but it was all affected, c false, and designed to lull them into security, the more effectually to destroy them. Indeed, had the event succeeded equal to the subtlety of the contrivance, the Dutch to a man must have been cut off. Suffering them to advance into the country, and shewing them the best vegetables, while the women were continuing their dalliances, the men were forming an ambuscade in the woods, caves, and neighbouring vallies. As soon as they thought the Dutch were sufficiently cut off from the sea, and surrounded beyond all hopes of escape, on a signal given, they poured out of their lurking-places, and in an instant made a general discharge of stones. The Dutch, upon this, formed themselves, and fired briskly upon the enemy, which they sustained without shrinking, and answered by repeated volleys of stones. At the second or third fire their king was killed; but this, instead of discouraging, rather animated and inflamed d them to a degree of fury. After the engagement had continued obstinate for half an hour, the Dutch all the while retreating towards the shore, at last they got on board their boats, all of them wounded, and many mortally, but with still greater loss on the side of the enemy. Neither side had much to boast of; the Dutch were contented that they had got clear at any rate, and the natives were no less pleased in having rid themselves of invaders, who they imagined covered deep designs under the specious pretext of gathering simples.

To this island, situated in 16° south latitude, longitude 285° , they had given the name of Recreation Island the day before, on account of the fine sallads and pot-herbs found on it. In extent it is about 12 leagues, the soil fertile, and producing a great number of trees, but chiefly cocoas, palms, and iron-wood. The Dutch had some reasons for thinking the heart of e the country abounded in mines; but our journalist does not venture to affirm that, nor to specify the arguments in support of the conjecture. As to the inhabitants, they were men of an ordinary size, robust, active, and well skilled in their military discipline. Their hair was long, thinning, and black, which they anointed with the oil of cocoa-nuts, a custom practised by most Indian nations. Their bodies were painted in the manner of the natives of Easter Island. The men covered the middle of their bodies with a net-work fastened to a girdle before, and tucked up behind. The women, more decent than those of the other islands, were entirely covered with mantles of their own manufacture, to the touch and sight resembling silk. About their necks and wrists they wore necklaces and bracelets of pearls. Their persons were f stait, slender, and genteel, with features by no means disagreeable, although they had that flatness of countenance peculiar almost to blacks and mulattoes, with the thick lips, the round forehead, but set off with extremely lively, piercing, and expressive black eyes^d.

AGREEABLE to the resolution of a council of war, which was held on the commodore's departure from this island, it was determined, after much opposition, to steer their course towards New Guiney and New Britain, and from thence to the Moluccas and Dutch settlements. The third day of their voyage, on a north-west course, several islands were discovered in the latitude of 12° south, longitude 290° . Upon drawing nearer, it was perceivable they were planted with fruit-trees of all sorts; that the country produced herbs, corn, and roots, in great plenty; and that the coasts were well cultivated, and laid out into neat and pretty plantations regularly disposed. The natives no sooner discovered the ships, than they came in their boats g with cocoa-nuts, Indian figs, fish, and other fresh provisions, in exchange for which they had

^d HARRIS, § 22. l. i. c. i. § 20. T. i. etiam ubi supra citat. ibid.

Bowman's
Islands.

variety of trinkets most acceptable to the Indians. It soon appeared that the islands were a exceeding populous, since thousands of men and women, the former accoutred with bows and arrows, came down to the shore to look at the ships. Among the rest was a very majestic personage, who it was presumed was king or sovereign of the nation, from the honours paid him, and the dress he wore. This great person stepped into his canoe, attended by a beautiful young woman, and was presently surrounded by an infinite number of boats, which seemed to form a guard. All the inhabitants of these islands were white, differing nothing in their complexion from Europeans, but that they were more sun-burnt. They were inoffensively lively and gay, of an agreeable good-natured disposition, extremely obliging, and treating each other with visible marks of civility and kindness. Though they were active and diligent, yet they shewed nothing wild or savage, all their endeavours appearing to be calculated to make life as happy and easy as it was possible. Unlike the other Indians, they were handsomely clothed from the waist downwards, the body being however left naked, but without the decorations of painting and monstrous figures. This tunic or petticoat was made of a species of silk fringes, very neatly folded and plaited. On their heads they wore hats of a prodigious size, to shade them against the sun, and about their necks collars of the most gaudy and beautiful flowers. The country itself appeared exquisitely charming, being agreeably diversified with hills, dales, brooks and groves, as lovely as imagination can paint. Some of the islands were ten, some fifteen, and some again twenty, miles in compass. It appeared that each cast, family, or tribe, had its particular district or village, and that the natives were divided into separate governments. They were in every respect the most civilized and refined people Roggewin had hitherto met with. Instead of discovering any signs of fear or apprehension on the arrival of the Dutch among them, they treated them with the utmost kindness, expressed great satisfaction at their stay, and manifested a deep concern and sorrow on observing that all their assiduity and diligence to render every thing agreeable could not prevail on the strangers to continue among them. The Dutch themselves felt many of them a like concern and reluctance in leaving so civil a people and plentiful an island, where the wholesomeness of the air, and the abundance of fine vegetables, would have perfectly recovered the sick. To all the other advantages of these islands, they had one peculiar almost to themselves, and that was good anchorage in fine sandy bays of twenty fathom water, and sheltered from all the winds, at least from three points of the compass. Such were the people, and such the enjoyments, the Dutch were forced to abandon, to pursue a voyage big with hazards and difficulties, and attended with not one happy circumstance to compensate all their fatigue and labour *.

Groninguen
and Tichoven Islands, probably a part of the Terra Australis.

WEIGHING from Bowman's Islands, and keeping a north west course, they gained the next morning sight of two islands, which they took to be Traitors Island and Cocoa Island, discovered by Schouten. The latter at a distance appeared to be high land, about eight miles in circuit, the other more flat, the soil red, and without trees or shrubs of any kind, both lying nearly in the latitude of 11° south. Soon after they fell in with two more islands of large extent, to which they gave the names Groninguen and Tichoven. Many of the officers on board were fully assured that the former was no island, but a part of the great Southern Continent they were lent to discover. As for the latter, it appeared to be rich, beautiful, and fertile, the country moderately high, the meadows of a fine verdure, and the inlands clothed with trees of all denominations. They observed, as they coasted along, that it formed a kind of crescent, one of its points turning towards Groninguen; whence it is probable, that what have been mistaken for two islands, are really a part of the Terra Australis Incognita. The author of Roggewin's journal acknowledges, indeed, that he traversed the coasts of islands in that neighbourhood 150 leagues in circumference; which coincides with Dampier's account of his having discovered a streight between New Guiney and New Britain.

PURSuing his course, Roggewin doubted not but he should soon fall in with the coast either of New Guiney or New Britain; but, after sailing many days, no land was discovered, and he began to be satisfied of the vanity of his calculations. To this disappointment was super-added the disagreeable circumstance of a sickly crew labouring under inexpressible anguish. The scurvy swept off numbers every day, cries and groans were perpetually ringing in the ears of those who were still able to stand to the duties of the ship. The stench of the dead and sick was so intolerable, that even the healthy swooned away on approaching them; so that they were avoided as a pestilence, and left destitute when they most wanted assistance. Many on the deck who were sufficient to excite terror and compassion; worn away to the bone, lay dead by inches in the open air, rather than confine themselves to beds, deserted by all their friends. At length it pleased God to put a period to the miseries of this unhappy crew, by giving them a sight of the coast of New Britain; which was received with so much transport and emotion as is altogether inexpressible, and not to be conceived but by those who have felt it.

* Hist. des Navig. p. 236. HARRIS, loco citato.

- a THE country of New Britain, as well as many of the neighbouring islands, is composed of high land, many of the mountains hiding their tops in the clouds. The sea coasts are equally fertile and pleasant, the meadows wearing a perpetual verdure, and the hills being covered with various sorts of fruit-trees. From the face of the country, as well as its situation, between four and seven degrees, the Dutch had all the reason in the world to look upon New Britain as a terrestrial paradise, in their present condition; it was therefore determined at all events to make a descent, notwithstanding the party's being cut off must have been fatal to the whole crews. Both ships could hardly spare hands enough to man the shallop, and, in its absence, to navigate one of the ships; but the passions of the seamen were so strong, and
- b their necessities so pressing, that a landing was determined upon. Accordingly the shallop was manned, and instructions given to the officer to effect a landing at any rate, but rather by fair means, if he could compass it. Force was to be used, if gentle remonstrances did not succeed, as it was almost equally eligible to die by the hands of barbarians, and to be cut off piecemeal by want and diseases. The nearer the seamen approached the coast, the more were they charmed with it, every necessary they could wish for presenting itself in full view to their ravished eyes. The natives crowded upon the coast, but not in a manner pleasing to the poor seamen; who dreaded meeting with any obstruction to the enjoyment of the felicity they saw before them. The inhabitants were well armed with bows, arrows, slings, and javelins, demonstrating by their gestures their resolution to oppose the landing of those strangers. As
- c the shallop drew near the shore, they threw themselves into a frantic despair, made frightful faces, howled, and tore their hair; and then immediately, as if they had borrowed courage from the great sense of their misfortunes, they hurried off in their canoes to meet that danger they saw was unavoidable. On coming up with the shallop, they discharged a shower of arrows, which was followed by the javelins they had in their hands, and these succeeded by a storm of stones that came pouring in like hail among the Dutch. This salute was returned by a continual fire from the musquetry, which soon broke and disconcerted the enemy. Their confusion was extreme; they even forgot the proper channels to the shore, and in the hurry run their canoes on rocks and shoals, which added to the despair of the Dutchmen, who now saw new obstructions to their landing. To complete their misery, a violent storm of that kind which
- d they call a prassat, rising in the midst of a calm, came on, and forced the ships to sea, leaving the shallop to shift for itself, among such a variety of dangers from enemies, foul coasts, and storms. They were without relief, and almost without hope, when on a sudden the shallop was driven on a shoal, and exposed to all the violence of the winds and waves. But as despair often gives men strength and spirits altogether supernatural, they dragged the boat on dry land, where, by the favour of Providence, they all got without the loss of a single man. Night coming on, before they had time to look out for a safe retreat, they contented themselves with collecting pieces of wood, and broken branches of trees, of which they made a fire to dry and warm themselves, keeping out a strict watch to prevent a surprise from the enemy, whose howlings in the woods gave them reason to apprehend that the night would not be passed
- e in quiet. By the light of the fire they discovered a number of little huts or cabins round them, deserted by the inhabitants. In these nothing was found but a few nets, curiously wrought, upon which the Dutch seized. They likewise saw a number of cocoa-trees, but were disagreeably tantalized by the near view of such delicious fruit, without the possibility of tasting it, as they had brought no hatchets with them.

New Britain described, and a sharp skirmish with the natives.

- f FROM the journalist's relation, as well as that of Dampier, this country appears to be exceeding fertile, especially in all kinds of fruits. The mountains promise a variety of mines; and indeed there are hardly any countries under this climate, the mountains of which do not produce rich metals. As for the inhabitants, they were tall, well-made people, of a mulatto complexion, with long black hair in curls and ringlets down to the waist. They are extremely nimble and agile; and so expert in the exercise of their arms, that no doubt can be made of their being accustomed to war, either among themselves, or with neighbouring nations. The sensible compiler of the voyages called Harris's Voyages observes, that it has been long questioned, among the most experienced navigators, whether this land ought to be accounted a continent or an island? A question which we think sufficiently answered by the discoveries of Dampier, if we allow any weight to his authority. This able seaman has so minutely described the streights through which he passed, separating New Guiney from New Britain, that no doubt can remain of the latter's being an island, if we admit that Dampier at all failed the course he pretends to have followed. We may likewise observe, that the journalist agrees so exactly with Dampier's description of the natives of this coast, as well as of the bay, that we
- g are led to believe Roggewin's shallop must have landed in the bay called by Dampier, Slingers Bay, from the dexterity of the inhabitants in the use of those weapons. To these reflections it may not be improper to add, that Dampier's and Roggewin's want of success ought by no means to deter men from prosecuting so important a discovery; since it is certainly possible for ships to reach those countries without sustaining the losses and hardships of Roggewin's crew.

The coast of New Britain is, from their accounts, well known, and so accurately laid down in our charts, that there is no danger of an expert seaman's missing it. If therefore a small squadron sailed from hence directly to that coast, there is all human probability that we should, in a short time, be masters of a country equivalent to the Spice Islands, and our loss at Ambony ^a.

THE misfortunes the Dutch met with here made such an impression, that they called this part of the country Storm Land. Without making any farther attempts, they quitted the coast, with intention to seek relief on either the island Moa or Arimoa. They had reason to commend the care and exactness with which Schouten laid down the situation of these islands, since from his relation they quickly discovered them. No sooner did they come within sight of the shore, than a descent on Arimoa was resolved on; but the hospitality of the natives rendered violence unnecessary, for the ships no sooner appeared, than canoes crowded to them with cocoa-nuts and other vegetables. Next day they returned again with fresh cargoes of cocoa-nuts, Indian figs, roots, and fallads, for which the Dutch offered them toys; but they would enter upon no bargains, giving their commodities gratis, and accepting of small presents in return, with a civility and obliging manners becoming a more polished people. The Dutch were extremely earnest to procure some hogs, and, to gratify them, the natives brought three or four large dogs, having mistaken the signs made by the seamen. The islanders did all in their power to induce the ships crews to land; but Roggewin, dreading some treachery might be intended, which could not fail of being fatal in the present distressed condition of the seamen, he declined the invitation. ^b

It was observed, that as often as the Arimoans went on board their vessels, they took in their hands a stick, with a flag tied to it, which they guessed to be a flag of truce; thence concluding, that they were at war with some neighbouring power; and probably with the Moans. Their conjecture was corroborated, by observing that their canoes never touched on that island; on the contrary, that they hurried by it with a visible precipitation. This remark suggested to their imagination a project for procuring speedily a fresh stock of provisions. They were satisfied that the island of Moa, or Mosa, was but thinly peopled, although no less pleasant and fertile than the other; and this engaged them to attempt, by a sudden descent, to carry off at once what might enable them to prosecute the voyage, without danger of again falling into the distresses they had so lately sustained. The scheme was bold, and required courage, prudence, and presence of mind, to conduct it with address. It was proposed that a landing should be effected in different places; that one body only should march into the country, while the rest made all possible efforts to unite, and, if occasion required, to support, the advanced party. The project succeeded to their wish; the execution being as intrepid as the plan was wisely formed. As soon as the Dutch began to cut down the cocoa-trees, the natives, who lay in ambush amidst some coppices and brushwood, sallied out, pouring a shower of stones upon them; from which, however, they escaped unhurt, and so vigorously returned it by a brisk discharge of their fire-arms, that several of the enemy being killed, the rest sought security in flight, leaving the Dutch to the quiet possession of the cocoa-nuts, as the reward of their valour. After this defeat, the enemy, by their cries and howlings, endeavoured to alarm the rest of their countrymen; but in vain: for so judicious was the disposition of the Dutch, as to be able to attack them in flank and rear, had they descended from the mountains. The booty the Dutch carried off consisted of 800 cocoa-nuts, a great number of pomgranates and Indian figs, or pisans, with which they joined the ships, extremely well satisfied with their expedition ^c.

WHILE they were preparing to leave the coast, the islanders, perceiving that they had no other design than to gather some fruit, came off from shore in two hundred canoes, with large quantities of fresh provisions, which they exchanged for the usual baubles. This visit the Dutch understood as intended to prevent a second descent; for which reason they refused admitting but a few at a time on board; and when they attempted to rush on board in numbers, they fired upon them. This made the Indians plunge into the sea, and, as soon as they had raised their heads above water, set them in a violent fit of laughter. As soon as this strange intercourse of hostilities and kindnesses was over, the admiral weighed anchor, continuing his course through a sea so replete with little islands, as made it impossible to number them; he therefore gave them the name of The Thousand Islands. ^d

Thousand Islands.

THE inhabitants of these countries were negroes, of a short squat make, their heads, like the negroes of the coast of Africa, covered with a thick curled wool. The journalist describes them as a bold, mischievous, and untractable race of savages. Their women and children all went naked, with no other ornament or covering than a kind of belt, or sash, composed of teeth and bracelets of the same kind. Some, indeed wore straw hats, mingled with the feathers of the bird of paradise, which, it is reported, are found no-where but here. Those on the coast of Africa differ widely from these in their size and plumage. Such of the islands as are situ- ^e

^a Vide lib. in locis citatis.

^b Suite à l'Histoire Ancienne, Tom. sixieme.

^a ated near the west point of the continent of New Guinea, are still called the islands of Papoes, or Papoes, as the continent itself has been called the land of Papoes, till the name is now being was imposed on it from its lying in the same latitude with Old Guinea, as we have already observed ^b (D). Besides their girdles, the inhabitants of the Iberford Islands have another ornament, viz. a bit of wood of the size of a tobacco-pipe, about three inches long, which they thrust cross the nostrils, to give them an air of ferocity. They were, as our author assures us, the very worst sort of people he met with during his voyage, being vicious, brutal, and savage, equally unpolished in their external appearance, and untutored in their minds, void of delicacy, decency, and all kind of sentiment, feeling, and humanity ^c.

As to the neighbouring continent of New Guinea, it appeared to him a very high country, full of plants, trees, and all sorts of excellent vegetables, inasmuch that, in a course of 400 leagues he could not discover one barren spot. This differs considerably with what Dampier alleges; but we are to consider the seasons of the year when each performed the circuit. He thinks it extremely probable, that this country abounds in many rich commodities, as metals, spices, &c.; the rather, because none of the countries discovered in that parallel were found different in those particulars. He adds, that persons of credit assured him, that some of the free burghers in the Moluccas make an annual voyage to New Guinea, and exchange small pieces of iron for nutmegs. Schouten, as we have seen, and other navigators, conceived high notions of the wealth and fertility of this country, which they constantly represent as one of the finest in the world; but they were not able to penetrate far into it, nor can this be effected with a small force, against a numerous, martial, brave, and well-disciplined people.

^c THE remainder of Roggewin's voyage being taken up in his passage on the north of the equator, through places already discovered, we shall finish our abridgement of journals, taking it for granted, that the reader is sufficiently convinced of the truth of the assertion, that there lies a continent in the South Seas, of prodigious extent. It is greatly to be lamented, that Roggewin's proposals to the West-India company were never published. It cannot be doubted but they contain a variety of curious particulars, which might reflect great light upon this subject. However, as this is a particular rather to be wished than hoped for, we must content ourselves with endeavouring to supply this deficiency, by a close attention to his and other voyages we have abridged.

^b Suite à l'Histoire Ancienne de M. ROLLIN, T. vi. p. 172. ^c Hist. des Navig. aux. Terres Austr. p. 242.

(D) Whenever the inhabitants of these islands go to any of the Moluccas, to expose the produce of their country to sale, such as salt pork, ambergris, gold dust, &c. they likewise carry with them some birds of paradise. What appears extraordinary is, that these birds are constantly found dead, the natives being entirely ignorant whence they come, or where they breed. Certain it is, however, that they are seen sometimes very high in the air. This bird is exceeding light, as it chiefly consists of feathers, which are so very beautiful as to render it one of the greatest curiosities of nature. The plumage of the head is bright as burnished gold; its beak of a shining, soft, and elegant green, with a tail and wings resembling a peacock. Such, at least, is the description given by the Journalist, which differs considerably from the accounts of some naturalists, and indeed from what we have seen called the bird of paradise in the collections of some virtuosi. As to the rest, in its beak and form, it comes nearest a swallow, but larger. Those Papoes, who deal in them, would persuade strangers, that, having no feet, when asleep, they suspend themselves by the feathers to the branches of a tree; but the truth is, they cut off their feet, in order to render the curiosity more wonderful. They likewise allege, that the male has a cavity in its back, where he lodges the young till they are able to fly; another story raised by the tricks of those honest dealers. They also assert that the bird of paradise is continually on the wing; a natural consequence of its being without feet; and that it lives upon insects, which it snatches in its course through the air. The feathers of the male are more beautiful and gaudy than those of the female; and it is very extraordinary, that, of all the animals of which we have any knowledge, this inversion of nature and peculiarity appears only in birds, the female of all other animals being the most beautiful. In the eastern language, this bird is called Mantidrata, that is, the Bird of God. The Moors, the Arabians, and the Persians, esteem them greatly, using their feathers to adorn their saddles and horse furniture; and, to heighten their lustre, they intermingle them with pearls and diamonds. They wear them likewise in their turbans, especially when they go to war, from a superstitious notion that they are a kind of charm to secure them from wounds. The shah and mogul used to present them as tokens of the highest favour and esteem (5).

(5) Roggewin's Journal, p. 276.

S E C T. VI.

Containing the reasons why the Spaniards neglect cultivating and pursuing the discoveries of Quiros; a general view of the Terra Australis; arguments why the English ought to endeavour to establish colonies there; maxims relating to the prosecution of discoveries; proposals for planting settlements in New Britain; and philosophical conjectures concerning the inhabitants of the Southern Continent.

The reasons why the Spaniards do not prosecute the discoveries of Quiros.

WE observed, at the conclusion of our abstract of Don Fernandez de Quiros's memorial ^a to Philip III. that the whole project of this enterprising man came to nothing, though the court had then so good an opinion of it, that they ordered commissioners to take it into consideration, and the memorial to be printed at Seville, A. 1610. It had been indeed a settled maxim for many years afterwards, in the Spanish cabinet, not only to abandon the pursuit of these discoveries, but even to treat as fiction the relations of them published from the best authority. They were reduced so low as to be no longer in a condition to execute enterprises of this nature, or even to attempt them with any probability of success. They foresaw, that if they should establish themselves in two or three islands only, it would encourage their more potent maritime neighbours to dispossess them, and by that means gain not only the settlements from whence they were driven, but a step towards fixing colonies between their American dominions and the Philippine Islands. As this would be a most pernicious stroke to the Spanish trade, the ministry have always declined the immediate advantage that might result from a commerce with the Southern Continent, rather than hazard the future inconvenience. However prudent this conduct may be in the Spaniards, it is wonderful, that other nations have not endeavoured to reap the fruits which naturally flow from the peculiar circumstances of that court. Before we proceed to those political observations, it may be proper we should first lay down succinctly and clearly the several discoveries made by the principal navigators into the South Seas. It is evident from what has been related, that New Guinea, Carpentaria, New Holland, Anthony Van Diemen's Land, and the countries discovered by Quiros, make all one continent, from which New Zealand on the one side, and New Britain ^b on the other, are disjoined by streights. The former may perhaps be part of a continent corresponding to Africa, as the Terra Australis does to America. This Southern Continent stretches from 44 degrees south latitude quite to the equinoctial, extending from 122 to 188 degrees of longitude; a tract of country altogether prodigious, to have so long lain undiscovered, but far short of the limits ascribed to it by de Quiros. To comprehend the nature of this discovery, and the situation of the Southern Continent, a short view of the southern hemisphere may be necessary.

A general view of the southern pole, and the adjacent countries.

If then we suppose the south pole to be the centre of a chart, of which the equinoctial is the circumference, a division of four quarters will be made, which if thoroughly known, this part of the world would be perfectly discovered. What we mean is, that if the course ^c from 44 degrees south quite to the line had been strictly followed, and then the tour round New Britain and the north end of the continent made, the general chart of this tract would be sufficiently clear. Within the first of these divisions, viz. from one to nine degrees of latitude, lies the great continent of Africa, the most southern point of which is the Cape of Good Hope, lying in the latitude of 34 degrees 15 minutes south. Between this cape and the pole several small and very inconsiderable islands have been discovered, affording us only this certainty, that to the latitude of 50 degrees there is no land of any consequence. Mr. Bouvet, in the year 1738, performed a voyage purposely to discover whether there were any lands to the south in that quarter. On the 18th of July he sailed from Port l'Orient, and on the first of January fell in with a country in 54 degrees south, the coasts of which were covered with ice ^d. This country was in the longitude of 28 degrees 36 minutes; the variation of the compass being there 6 degrees 45 minutes to the west ^e. In the next quarter, viz. from ninety degrees of longitude to 180°, lie the countries of which we have been speaking, or that large southern continent or island extending from the line to 44 degrees south latitude, which is the extremity of Van Diemen's Land in New Holland. In the third quarter there is very little discovered with any degree of certainty, that is, from 150 to 170 degrees of longitude. Captain Tasman indeed visited the coast of New Zealand, in the latitude of 42 degrees 10 minutes south, and in the longitude of 188 degrees 28 minutes. But excepting this, and the islands of Rotterdam and Amsterdam, we know very little. If there be any doubts then about the

^a Hist. des Navigat. aux Terres Austr. T. ii. suppl.

^b HARRIS, b. i. c. 11. f. 20.

- a reality of a Southern Continent, it must be with respect to that part of it lying within this third division, through which Schouten and Le Maire sailed, without discovering any thing but a few islands. The fourth and last division of the southern pole is from 270 degrees of longitude to the first meridian, within which is included the continent of South America, and the island of Terra del Fuego, the most southern promontory of which is supposed to be Cape Horn. This cape, according to the best charts, is situated in the latitude of 56 degrees, beyond which there has been nothing discovered with any degree of certainty, on the south-east or the west sides. On the whole, however, it appears, that three continents are already tolerably discovered, which point towards the south pole. Hence it is highly probable there is a fourth, lying between the country of New Zealand, discovered by Captain Tasman, and those lands seen by Captain Sharpey and Mr. Waser, in the South Seas. Leaving this matter to the industry of future ages, we will return to that great southern island or continent, by whichever of these names the reader may chuse to call it, which was actually surrounded by Tasman, Dampier, and in a great measure by Schouten, the bounds of which are pretty exactly ascertained.

*The certainty
we have of the Southern Continent.*

- THAT the reader may have a further idea of the importance of the country, it will be requisite to say something of the climates in which it is situated. As it lies upon the equinoctial line, and near the forty-fourth degree of south latitude, the longest day in the most northern parts must be 12 hours, and in the southern about 15 hours some odd minutes. Thus it extends from the first to the seventh climate, which shews its situation to be the happiest in the world; the country called Van Diemen's Land in every thing resembling the south of France.
- c In all countries some parts are observed to be more wholesome and pleasant than others. If we may reason from analogy, we may infer, that the countries situated within two or three degrees of the Tropic of Capricorn, which passes through the middle of New Holland, are the most unhealthy and disagreeable parts of the whole. Here, as the days and nights are always of an equal length, the climate must be hotter than under the line. Two degrees further from the tropic, that is, under the latitude of 27 degrees south, the days are thirteen hours and an half, and the sun twice in their zenith, which must cause a scorching heat for two months, or more; although near the line, or beyond 27 south, that is, in both extremities of the continent, the climate must be equally wholesome and pleasant.

*The climate of
New Holland and New Guiney.*

- As to the wealth and fertility of this continent, both reason and experience seem to unite in making it one of the happiest countries in the world. Both de Quiros and Dampier have described it in glowing colours, such as might be thought to flow from the pencil of fancy, if farther experience, and the very nature of the thing, did not support their assertions. The country, called by the former La Australia del Espiritu Santo, in the latitude of 15° 40' south, he affirms to abound with gold, silver, pearl, mace, nutmegs, and ginger. It is opposite to the country called Carpentaria, and, from its situation, gives the strongest credibility to the warm description of the discoverer. Captain Dampier speaks of the land about Cape St. George and Port Montague in much the same language, but enumerates fewer of the rich commodities, which might probably arise from the superficial view he took of the country; whereas Quiros actually resided for some time in the parts he describes, and consequently had better opportunities of being acquainted with the produce. Schouten and Tasman likewise take notice of nutmegs and ginger, as well as cocoa-nuts, pisans, &c. which they sow on the coast. It cannot either be supposed, that all those writers were mistaken, or that they concurred in a settled plan of deceiving the public, and imposing on their readers. The perfect harmony between their reports, and the situation of this continent, the trees on the land, and the fish on the coast, corresponding exactly with the trees of those countries, and the fish on those coasts, where these commodities are known to abound within land, strongly intimate a conformity throughout, and take away the least suspicion of their authority and veracity.

Of the wealth and fertility of those countries.

- If the islands of Sumatra, Java, and Borneo, abound in precious stones, and other valuable commodities, and the Moluccas in spices, New Guiney and the regions behind must, by a parity of reason, be as plentifully endowed by nature. If the island of Madagascar is so fine, and such a country as all authors speak it; if gold, ivory, and other commodities of great value, are common in the southern part of Africa, from Melinda down to the Cape of Good Hope, and up again to Cape Gonzalez; here are the same parallels in New Zealand, New Holland, and Carpentaria. If Peru overflows with silver, if all the mountains of Chili are filled with gold, the Brazils with every sort of wealth, this continent enjoys the benefit of the same position; and therefore whoever thoroughly discovers and settles it, will infallibly be possessed of territories as rich, as fruitful, and as capable of improvement, as the Moluccas, the Cape of Good Hope, Peru, Chili, or the Brazils, and indeed as any that have hitherto been discovered in any part of the terraqueous globe.

* Hist. des Navig. T. ii. p. 393.

Reasons for not apprehend-the power of the Dutch in India.

As to the possibility of planting colonies, and establishing settlements here, we must confess, that at first sight considerable difficulties would seem to arise with respect to any European nation, besides the Dutch and Spaniards. The former, in particular, might either from Batavia, the Moluccas, or even from the Cape of Good Hope, settle with ease where they thought proper. However, as they have neglected this for near a century, no reason can be given why their conduct should be a rule to other nations. It would likewise be absurd to dread the resentment of the Hollanders, for endeavouring to turn to advantage countries which they have so long permitted to lie waste and deserts, at least with respect to Europe. The power of the Dutch is doubtless very great in the East Indies; but the superiority of the British marine, with a due exertion of British spirit, would not fail of keeping them in awe, and affording all necessary protection to the new colonies. That the Dutch East India company would be jealous of such an establishment, and do all in their power to impede its progress, is too obvious from their conduct to the Dutch West India company, A. 1722-3. But are we therefore to sit still, and be awed and intimidated by a company! We have reason to thank God that we are now governed by a king who has ever shewn an equal regard to the welfare of his people, and the dignity of his crown; who is biassed by no connections with Holland, or with any other maritime power, that can in the least interfere with the commercial interest of Great Britain. If the weak and timid measures of the administration made us relinquish the trade of the Moluccas, the popularity, vigour, and integrity of the present ministers, afford the happiest opportunity for retrieving that loss, and giving a more severe blow to Holland than all the power of our navy could, under the protectorate of Oliver, or the indolent reign of Charles the Second. Perhaps the consequences of the tragical affair of Amboyna and Pooloway have not ceased, through a series of years, to this moment. The Dutch have ever since maintained these islands, and engrossed the whole spice trade. Long possession has now given them a kind of right, which it would be hazardous and expensive to dispute with them, as their garrisons are strong and numerous in their different settlements in the East Indies. But they can neither pretend an exclusive right, nor, if they did, could they maintain it in any countries south of the equinoctial. Their dispute with the Dutch West India company proves what the general sense of that nation was to the rights of the East India company. The decision of the commissioners, who were all civilians, and persons knowing in trade as well as learned in the law, was clear against them, although the influence and power of the East India company deterred the West India company from attempting to reap the fruits of the verdict given in their favour. We have nothing to fear on that head, our fleets and armies, as well as the justness of the undertaking, would be our defence.

Reasons for establishing a commerce and settlements in the Southern Continent.

WE cannot do better than present the reader with an abstract of what the new compiler of Harris's Voyages says upon this subject. We know the reader will excuse it, on account of the good sense, the public spirit, and true commercial knowledge, so conspicuous in every page of this judicious historian. The first point with respect to a discovery would be, as he observes, to send a squadron on the coast of Van Diemen's Land, and thence round by the coast of New Guinea, following the course of Captain Tasman. By this the nation who attempted the discovery might possibly acquire a certainty of the commodities, harbours, and manner of commencing a trade, with the Southern Continent. Such a voyage might be finished at a small charge by the India company in the space of eight months; nor is there any thing improbable, that the legislature, when disengaged from war, and intent upon the affairs of commerce, may be directed to make such an expedition at the expence of the public. Hence all the back coast of New Holland and New Guinea, quite to the equinoctial, might be thoroughly examined, the country penetrated by a sufficient force, and certain information be obtained, how far a colony settled there might answer the expectations of the best judges. To persons acquainted with the navigation to the East Indies, the expedition could neither be thought dangerous or difficult. It is already known, that there are islands every-where on the coast, where ships, upon such a discovery, might be able to obtain refreshments.

If we reflect upon all the circumstances mentioned in the journals we have quoted, the credit of the several authors, their apparent connection, and the impossibility of making forgeries coincide so exactly with reason, with experience, and with each other, we must conclude, that there is ample evidence of there being a continent and many islands to the south, all rich, fertile, and populous. If a trade to these was opened, the same reason shews that it must be very commodious, and produce as great, or greater advantages, than those which have resulted from the discovery of America. Is it not therefore astonishing, that this powerful and busy nation should never have undertaken to gratify their curiosity, by the fullest conviction of the state of this continent! Many expeditions have been made to the South Seas, but not one for the purpose we have mentioned, unless we except Dampier's; much less for effecting a settlement. Indeed no European power ever fitted out a squadron adequate to the design, or able to penetrate by force into the bowels of the country. The English and Dutch have

- a have contented themselves with running along the coasts, without venturing to make a descent, either for fear of being overpowered by the inhabitants, or of wanting provisions in their return. Roggewin, indeed, made some attempts; but without endeavouring to penetrate farther than the groves of cocoa-trees, and the skirts of the country. The author of Roggewin's journal specifies these as reasons for the miscarriage of that expedition, and lays down the following maxims, which, he thinks, if steadily pursued, would greatly assist, if not absolutely effect, this important discovery. “ In the first place,” says he, “ such a design is not to be undertaken by one or two ships, but by a squadron; and these too of several kinds, some of force, some tenders, all well provided, manned, and victualled, for a long voyage. 2dly, The ship’s company ought to be composed chiefly of good seamen, whereas hitherto the crews of such vessels have at least had a majority of soldiers on board. In such a voyage it is natural that both should decrease; but the consequence is by no means equal; for if there be seamen enough left, they can make shift to fight; but the land-men, in what numbers soever, will not be able to navigate the ships. 3dly, Some months after the departure of the first squadron, there should be another sent after it, which would prevent the bad effects of the scurvy, and of bad provisions, since it would give an opportunity of shifting crews, and prevent either squadron from remaining too long at sea without a convenient supply. 4thly, As it is impossible to foresee the accidents that may occur in a voyage, a certain place of rendezvous should be fixed upon before the squadron sails, and the captain of each ship be strictly enjoined to repair thither, and continue there for a certain time, to wait for the comforts and junction of the whole fleet. Lastly, Whoever is intrusted with the chief command of such an expedition, should not be limited or restrained by his commission. Much should be left to his discretion, that he may be able to pursue circumstances, and accommodate himself to contingencies, which it would be impossible to foresee. Upon this, and his own prudence, depends the success of the whole expedition.” Our journalist had reason to mention this last maxim; for he saw the confusion which attended the limited and strict orders of Roggewin, who was forced by his instructions to return to Batavia, at the very time when he might have entered upon his discoveries with advantage and success^d.

Maxims relating to the prosecution of discoveries in the Terra Australis.

- PROBABLY the reason why no European state has attempted settling colonies in the Terra Australis may be, that they all wait till some one begin, which, having opened a way, the rest may follow with less hazard and expence; yet what reason is there to suppose that the first discoverer would, in this instance, be less tenacious of his right than the Spaniards are of theirs in Peru, the Portuguese in the Brazils, the French in Canada, the English in Virginia, and the Dutch in the Moluccas. The law of nations gives an exclusive right to the first discoverers and colonies, who are the lawful sovereigns of this trade; and in this case, would soon become the most considerable maritime power in the world.

- WITH regard to ourselves, perhaps, the greatest difficulty attending the sending a squadron to Diemen's Land, to make the necessary inquiries previous to the establishment of settlements, would consist in having a fair and impartial account of the expedition when made; for private interest is so apt to interfere and clash with the good of the public, that it is no easy matter to procure the surest intelligence where so many persons are concerned to prevent it. The instances of the New Russia trade, and Captain Middleton's voyage for the discovery of a north-west passage, are sufficient proofs of this. The latter of these terminated in a warm dispute whether that passage be discovered or not; the person supposed to have made the discovery maintaining the negative. This obstruction might, however, be surmounted by prudent cautions in sending none but men of ability and integrity upon such expeditions, who, on their return, should be obliged to deliver their journals upon oath. The principal officers under him should also be obliged to keep their journals distinct and separate, not to be inspected by their superior; and all of them to be published by authority, that every man might have the liberty of examining them, of proposing his objections, or confirming certain circumstances from reason, from experience, or from history. In short, of giving a full and scrupulous critique upon each journal, that the public might have the clearest information that was possible. From hence would appear the expediency of prosecuting or abandoning the design; experience would be assisted by philosophy, and it, on the other hand, be confirmed by experience. Science and practice would go hand in hand, and the public would be freed from the danger of embarking upon expensive ideal projects, which too frequently are the tools of knaves, and the schemes of the artful and designing.

The difficulty of procuring an impartial relation of discoveries.

Proposal that the journals be delivered upon oath, and published by authority.

- If extending this commerce, and settling new colonies, might be thought burthensome to the India company, whose trade is already sufficiently great for one corporation; if it should be thought grievous to a company that has purchased her privileges, at the expence of a large loan upon low interest, to undertake such an expedition, merely to serve the public, promote

Project that the African company should be invested with the ex-

^d Hist. des Navig. p. 257. HARRIS, T. i. sect. 20.

exclusive right
of making discoveries and settlement in the Southern
Continent.

the exportation of our manufactures, and increase the number of industrious persons maintained by foreign trade; in that case there can be no objection to putting the project in the hands of the African company. As they are in a less flourishing condition, they may probably pursue it with more industry. They have opportunities nearly equal with the others, as the voyage may easily be performed from their settlements in ten months. If the trade was found to answer, it might encourage them to settle a colony in Madagascar, from which island the trade to New Guinea might very commodiously be conducted. Should it be objected, that the French settlements on Madagascar met with no success, and soon fell into ruin, we might answer, that the case is widely different. There they began upon a stock raised at an exorbitant interest; here they are supposed to set out free at least. There the trade was confined to a narrow compass, and markets forestalled by the Dutch, English, Portuguese, and Danes; here it would be carried on with a new-discovered country, probably rich in many articles hitherto unknown, as well as in those of the greatest value, now engrossed by the Dutch; a country the property of the company, from which foreigners, and Britons not of the company, are excluded. We cannot, indeed, presume to say how far such a trade might be consistent with their present charter; but we will affirm it might be conducted without interfering at all with the rights of the East India company. If then it should be found advantageous to the public, and beneficial to the company, there can be no reason assigned why it should not be secured to them in the most effectual manner.

A VERY small progress in this new commerce would soon restore the reputation of the company, and perhaps ease the nation of the annual expence of maintaining forts and garrisons on the coast of Africa, as well as bring a large additional revenue to the crown. Something of this sort is absolutely necessary to justify the charge the public is at. If the trade, for conducting which a company is established, proves, by a change of circumstances, inadequate to the support of that company, and a load upon the government, this ought to be the strongest motive with that company to endeavour the extension of their commerce, the striking out some new branch of trade, which might restore it to its pristine splendor, and put it upon an equality with other corporations. As this hath an apparent right, and fair prospects, there is not the least room to doubt of its meeting with all the countenance and protection of a king and parliament, devoted, as the present are, to the good of the public, and every scheme that promises the promoting industry and trade, and increasing the maritime power of Great Britain.

Proposal that a colony be planted in New Britain.

SHOULD this project ever take place, perhaps the island of New Britain might afford a commodious spot to fix a colony in. The situation, extent, and condition, of that island, we have mentioned from Dampier. The climate, we have seen, is fine, the vallies fruitful, and the mountains covered with useful wood. It is well-inhabited by a robust, strong, well-limbed race of negroes, daring and bold in many parts of the coast, as Dampier experienced; but easily brought into commerce, and even a perfect submission, with gentle and good usage. The misfortunes that befel this officer ought to have no weight in the present case; since, though he was an excellent pilot, he appears to have been but an indifferent commander. Besides, the Roebuck, in which he sailed, was a worn-out frigate, hardly fit to put to sea: we need not wonder then at the impatience of the crew to return from an expedition, the pursuit of which they saw must be attended with so imminent danger. Yet, after all, he performed the business he was sent upon. By the discovery of New Britain, he secured to us an indisputable right to a country that is, or might be made, very valuable. A country so situated, that a trade from thence with the Terra Australis might be carried on in its utmost extent, and with the most valuable islands of the East Indies, to great emolument and profit. In short, all the advantages proposed by a junction of the Dutch East and West India companies would, by this means, be procured to Great Britain. Passing a law only, in favour of the African company, would more than give them sufficient credit to equip a squadron at once capable of securing the possession of that island, and of giving the public such conviction of its importance, as might be requisite to obtain farther powers and assistance from the government, if that should be found necessary. It would be easy to point out some peculiar advantages that would naturally result from such a project to the African company; but it will be time enough to make them universally known, when the company shall discover an inclination to prosecute the design.

If neither the India or African company should think it expedient or consistent with their interest to pursue discoveries, and establish settlements, in the Southern Continent, there is yet a third company, within the spirit of whose charter the prosecution of such a design immediately lies. We mean the South Sea company, who never, we believe, sent a single ship in search of inquiries to the Terra Australis, altho', from the extent of their charter, one would naturally imagine this to be the great point proposed in their establishment. To prove this, we need only lay before the

- a reader the limits assigned this company by their charter, which we shall do in the words of the sensible author of the Present State of Europe, who, in his revival of Harris's Collection of Voyages, has fully and clearly stated this matter in a new and uncommon manner. The extract from the charter is as follows: "The corporation, and their successors, shall for ever be invested in the sole trade to and from all the kingdoms and lands on the east side of America, from the river Oroonoco to the southermost part of Terra del Fuego, and on the west side thereof from the said southermost part of Terra del Fuego, through the South Sea, to the northermost part of America, and into and through all the countries, islands, and places, within the said limits, which are reputed to belong to Spain, or which shall hereafter be found out or discovered within the limits aforesaid, not exceeding three hundred leagues from the continent of America, on the said west side thereof, except the kingdom of Brazil, and such other places on the east side of America as are now in the possession of the king of Portugal, and the country of Surinam, in the possession of the States General. The said company, and none else, are to trade within the said limits; and if any other persons shall trade to the South Seas, they shall forfeit the ship and goods to a double value, one fourth-part to the crown, another fourth-part to the prosecutor, and the remaining two fourths to the use of the company. And the company shall be the sole owners of the islands, forts, &c. which they shall discover within the said limits, to be held of the crown under an annual rent of an ounce of gold, and of all ships taken as prizes by the said company, and their shipping; and the company may seize by force all other British ships trading in those seas." Our author judiciously observes upon this, that it is impossible for any man to imagine that either these limits should be secured to the company for no purpose in the world, or that these prohibitions and penalties should take place, notwithstanding the company's never attempting to make use of the powers. Hence he infers, that new discoveries should be made, new plantations settled, and a new trade carried on, by this new corporation, agreeable to the rules prescribed, and for the general benefit of the nation. This, he apprehends, was provided for, and chiefly considered, in putting the trade under the management and direction of a particular company.

- AWARE of the objection, that this Southern Continent lies absolutely without the limits prescribed by the charter, and that there is also a proviso in the said charter, which seems absolutely to exclude the Terra Australis, he reasons in the following manner: "In this case," says he, "I presume the legislature will not permit the private advantage of any particular company to stand in competition with the good of a whole people. It is upon this principle, I say, that the Southern Continent is within the intention of the South Sea company's charter; because, I presume, the meaning of that charter was to grant them all the commerce in those seas not occupied before by British subjects: for if it were otherwise, what a condition should we be in as a maritime power? If a grant does not oblige a company to carry on a trade within the limits of that company's charter, and is at the same time of force to preclude all the subjects of this nation from the right they before had to trade to those limits, such a law is plainly destructive of the national interest, and to commerce in general. I therefore suppose that if the South Sea company should think proper to revive their trade in the manner I propose, this proviso could be explained by parliament to mean no more than to exclude the South Sea company from settling or trading in or to any place settled in or traded to by the East India company. As this interpretation would secure to each company its rights, and at the same time reconcile the laws for establishing them to the general interest of trade and the nation, there is great reason to believe it to be the intention of the legislature." We have insisted the longer upon this point, as we believe it to be peculiar to the author we have quoted, and of such importance, that, without it is understood in the sense he explains it, there is an end to all hopes of extending trade on this side, which is perhaps the only side on which there is the least probability it can ever be extended; For as to the north-west passage into the South Seas, that seems to be blocked up by the rights of another company. According, therefore, to the letter of our laws, each company is to enjoy its full rights and privileges without infraction, whilst the nation is to have no rights at all.

- If, therefore, the settling of the Southern Continent should devolve upon the South Sea company, as an equivalent for the loss of their Affiento contract, there can be no doubt but it may as well be executed by them as by any others. The trade, as far as we are able to see, may be carried on without the least prejudice to the rights of either the India or the African companies. It is true, if that once a considerable settlement was established in the southern part of the Terra Australis, the company then might fall into a larger commerce in the most valuable East India goods, very probably gold, spices, &c. yet would not these fall within the exclusive proviso of their charter. This proviso undoubtedly must have been intended to prevent their trading in such goods as are brought hither by our East India company. But Reasons why the South Sea company might carry on this trade consistently with the spirit of their charter, and without prejudice to the rights of the East India company.

Arguments in support of this proposal by the editor of Harris's Voyages.

is there any difference, with respect to that company, between our being supplied with cloves, a cinnamon, mace, or nutmegs, by the South Sea company, and our receiving them from Holland? They would certainly arrive in Europe some months sooner by Cape Horn than by the Cape of Good Hope, and consequently cheaper. But if it should still be insisted, that the South Sea company should by no means meddle with East India commodities, we should be glad to know why the West India merchants are permitted to import coffee from Jamaica, when it is well known that the East India company can supply the whole demand of the kingdom from Mocha? Should it be answered, that the Jamaica coffee comes cheaper, and is the growth of our plantations; the reply is ready, that these spices will not only be cheaper, but better, and purchased by our own manufactures; which are reasons perhaps as strong as the others. b

WE have all the assurances that can possibly be obtained in a point of this nature, that spices actually grow in some parts of the Southern Continent. Quiros met with spices of all kinds in the country he discovered. Schouten and Le Maire saw ginger and nutmegs; so did Dampier; and the author of Roggewin's journal asserts, that the free burghesses of Amboyna, and the other islands of the Moluccas, make an annual trading voyage for nutmegs to New Guinea.

WE have hinted before, that had the nation, in the last war with Spain, thought of prosecuting the discoveries in the South Seas, a settlement might commodiously be made in Juan Fernandez, which would equally assist the design of planting colonies, and carrying on a successful commerce with the Terra Australis. Perhaps it might be possible still to affect this by c a reasonable consideration and equivalent to the crown of Spain. The chief difficulty would be to persuade the Spaniards, that our commerce with the Southern Continent would produce no inconvenience to their trade with the Philippines, which we are fully of opinion it would not, or if it did, would be compensated by the advantages it would bring to the Spanish dominions in Mexico and Peru.

Proposals for settling the first colony either in Juan Fernandez or in New Britain.

UPON the whole it is evident, that if a proper traffick with the Southern Continent was opened by means either of a settlement in the intermediate island of Juan Fernandez, or in New Britain, these three consequences must necessarily result from it. 1st, That a new trade would be opened, which would consume a great part of the produce and manufactures of Great Britain, which cannot at present be brought to any market; or if they can, at least not d to so good a mart as if there were a greater demand. 2dly, It would render this navigation, which at present is so uncommon, and consequently so terrible to us, easy and familiar. This might be attended with advantages that cannot be foreseen, especially since there is, as we before observed, another Southern Continent still undiscovered. 3dly, It would greatly increase our shipping and seamen, which are the true and natural bulwarks of this country, extend our naval power, make our marine formidable, and raise the reputation of the nation. The most distant prospect of such blessings, one would think, would warm the soul of the most dastardly, who has the smallest regard for his country, and inspire him with courage to brave all dangers, and to despise the imputations that may be laid upon him as a visionary projector for taking such pains about a matter that can never turn out to his private advantage (A). e

IT is well known what prodigious profits arise from the exportation of the most frivolous toys, in exchange for the commodities of foreign countries, especially the Indies, where the natives are unacquainted with the value of the merchandizes they deal in. It is the rivalry of nations only which gives them any notion of raising their price. When these savages perceive the Europeans striving to forestall and anticipate the markets, it is natural for them to conclude they must have reason for this conduct, and consequently to make their advantage of it. But where one nation only, and the trade of that nation is under the direction of a company, then it is no difficult matter to keep the merchandize at the first price. No emulation appearing, the natives must remain in perpetual ignorance of the value of the goods they give and receive. f

Philosophical conjectures concerning the inhabitants of the Southern Continent.

THE people of the Southern Continent, in particular, would seem to be possessed of a very peculiar sort of philosophy, which consists in calculating whether the fatigue of procuring certain conveniencies of life does not overbalance all the satisfaction they afford. Deciding this matter in the affirmative, they pass their time in an indolence and sloth truly beastly. No foresight, no thought for to-morrow, is taken. They live upon what the earth puts forth spontaneously, clothed with no other dress than what nature afforded, insensible to the rigour of seasons, the burning sun of the day, and the sickly damps of the night, and equally hardened to every suggestion of shame, decency, and what nature would seem to dictate. We speak only of

(A) The greater part of these reflections we found scattered up and down in the new edition of Harris's Voyages, and the French collection of voyages to the South Sea. We arrogate to ourselves, therefore, little merit besides that of having here presented them in one collected view, and adapted them to the present times, and the purpose of our history.

a some of the inhabitants of the continent of New Holland, described by Dampier. They esteem the Europeans great blunderers in political and philosophical arithmetic, for taking such pains to procure things which custom only renders necessary. But how much soever attached to sloth, ignorance, and prejudice, they may be, it is not to be doubted but the establishment of colonies would soon gain them over to a more rational method of acting and thinking. The natural promptitude to society, observable in all men, would make this task both easy and meritorious; for what greater benevolence can be exerted than in impressing the marks of religion, virtue, and knowledge, upon the minds of whole nations plunged in the deepest ignorance, sloth, and barbarity?

b BUT not to insist upon a topic self-evident, we shall beg leave to add a conjecture which seems to be corroborated by the strong similitude in features, complexion, and manners, between the inhabitants of New Guinea and the natives of the coast of Africa. It is, that the thick-lipped, woolly-headed negroes of both, are the primitive natives, the Aborigines of the Torrid Zone; a species of men more stupid, savage, and brutal, than any other on the globe. That these, formed, according to the poet's expression, in a more perfect manner, and finer organization,

Quis meliore luto finxit prœcordia Titan,

c profiting by the natural advantages given them, attacked and drove the original negroes from their possessions in Asia, forcing them to conceal themselves in inaccessible places, where they gradually diminish and decrease. This conjecture will account for the great variety of different people found on the islands, and possessing the continent of New Holland and New Guinea. If we admit that this variety existed from the first peopling of both, it will destroy all the philosophy hitherto laid down concerning national character. This problem has ever been solved by the influence of the climate, as well as the manners and customs prevalent among each. But, in these islands, the natives of one shall in every respect resemble the African negroes, while those of another island, not five leagues distant, shall have European features, long black hair, a sprightliness of wit and understanding, as well as a decorum of manners, intirely unknown to the former. Yet do they all live in the same climate, under the same d parallels, while the characters of each are as strongly marked as those of the most polished but distant European nations. What seems to confirm our conjecture is, that those negroes are found in countries long possessed by Europeans or Asiatics. In America they are greatly decreased since the conquests of the Spaniards. In Africa they are driven from all the coasts possessed by Europeans. In Asia they are no-where to be found but south of the equinoctial, except in the south end of Madagascar, and those parts of Monopotapa, Cafferes, Simbabas, and the country of the Hottentots, south of the line. Sometimes the primitive inhabitants are to be met with in the interior and remote parts of great islands. Upon the whole, perhaps the continents of New Holland and New Guinea are the only parts of the known world where they are found absolute masters of their first possessions.

e IT would really be a curious research to examine by a scrupulous philosophy the primitive nature of man; to make experiments upon those untutored savages; to watch what ideas the human organization, the fingers and toes, would excite; to observe how far this physical sensibility might be the cause of ideas, as the ingenious M. Helvetius asserts; and, in short, to discover whether these negroes are really endowed with the same powers and faculties as the rest of mankind, or whether they are not a distinct species, whose minds are incapable of receiving all the advantages of culture and education, from a defect in the powers of reflection, or the minuter animal organization. But these are inquiries to be left to philosophers. The province of history is to record things as they are, without entering upon nice disquisitions and subtle distinctions. The present occasion, however, so fairly offered itself, that we could not f well avoid hinting this conjecture, which we leave to be prosecuted by, others, who have more leisure and ability.

g HAVING now finished all that is material concerning the discoveries made in the Terra Australis; having recited whatever is to be found concerning the climate, soil, produce, people, their manners, customs, complexion, and other circumstances; we shall proceed to lay before the reader a short view of the labours of the principal circumnavigators, which we apprehend will be an useful supplement to our history of the East Indies and Southern Continent, and no unapt introduction to our account of America. In this particular, perhaps, it is that the moderns can boast of their only, at least their greatest, superiority over the antients; we mean in discoveries made of new worlds by the application of mathematics and astronomy; by a true knowledge of the terraqueous globe, and great improvements in navigation, from the right and happy use of fortuitous principles. This we cannot but esteem as one of the noblest trophies of the human intellect, at least with respect to judicious reasoning upon axioms once established, however those axioms might be the result of accident and chance. It is plain plain from the astronomical tables; calculations of eclipses, and many other particulars remaining in the works of Ptolemy, Archimedes, and Hipparchus, that the antients had no true idea of the figure of the earth; that they were extremely ignorant in practical astronomy, and that they must ever remain children in navigation without a thorough knowlege of the properties of the loadstone. With respect to the figure of the earth, their sentiments were no less various and absurd. One imagined it hollow like a dish; another taught that it was flat, like a table; a third believed it was erect, like a stone column or pillar; and a fourth, more extravagant if possible, than any of the former, affirmed that it floated like a bowl on the water.

 Some described it as approaching to the figure of a drum; and some of the earliest Christian writers imagined the earth was infinitely extended downwards; building this notion upon sacred authority, or rather wresting holy writ in support of their idle conjecture (B). From this diversity of opinions, it is evident, the antients could infer nothing justly either with respect to the parts undiscovered of the terraqueous globe, or the rational means of discovering them. To this a true idea of the figure of the earth was necessary, without which every hypothesis must be in vain, idle, and false. True it is, that the moderns themselves, after the discovery of America and the East Indies, after navigation was brought to its utmost perfection, the magnet discovered, and science arrived at a great height, still differed with regard to the figure of the earth. Some held it to be an oblate, others an oblong sphere. But these differences, although they account variously for some curious problems in astronomy, yet have no influence on the general principles either of astronomy or the art and theory of sailing.

As to astronomy, Hipparchus was the first philosopher who framed a catalogue of the fixed stars, about 150 years before the Christian æra. His tables were corrected by the famous Ptolemy, about 500 years after, and a system erected upon his principles, which lasted for a great number of years, although future ages discovered it replete with absurdities and errors.
 Later discoveries were made by the use of the telescope, an instrument intirely unknown to Hipparchus and Ptolemy, and even to Tycho Brahe, the famous Dane; yet did this philosopher arrive within two minutes of the true longitude and latitude; whereas the former generally erred half a degree in both; a circumstance which every one knows must greatly affect the theory of navigation. But the antients chiefly failed in not being able to determine the four cardinal points, and each of the intermediate ones, with any tolerable degree of accuracy. The necessity they were under of coasting along the shore, having no certain criterion for the north and south poles, made their voyages very limited. In the day, indeed, they were able to find a meridian line by the sun's rising and setting; at night the Ursa Major, and the pole-star in its tail, pointed out the north; but a cloudy sky deprived them of the benefit of this expedient. Another method used by the antients was, by observing the direction they had run in; for knowing the first course in which they had set out, they kept an exact register of the inflections and variations of that course; a method equally tedious, perplexed, and precarious; as a storm, a strong current, or any such accident, immediately destroyed the fruits of their labour.

Of the modern improvements in astronomy and navigation.

By the application of the loadstone, and the nice theory of the needle, all those inconveniences are removed; the meridian line is known with equal ease and certainty; the mariner is enabled to quit the old and timid manner, to steer boldly into the wide ocean, and to force his passage to the most distant parts of the globe by the shortest, safest, and most expeditious ways imaginable. Such was the invention which enabled the Portuguese, in the beginning of the 15th century, to make prodigious voyages and discoveries in the east. The success attending their endeavours gave rise to that series of voyages and travels, which soon became no less advantageous to commerce than to society and science in general. The fables of the antients have been supplanted by true history; every part of the globe is found to be inhabited; the superstitions of antiquity, with respect to giants, anthropophagi, and men whose heads did grow beneath their shoulders, have been refuted; the disproportion between the elements of water and earth has been found less than was imagined, and the products of the torrid and frigid zones more valuable and rich than those of temperate climates, contrary to the universal supposition. We therefore imagine it will not be disagreeable to the reader, that the history of the first circumnavigators be here presented in one collected view, as he will hence be able to determine with accuracy what improvements have been made in the theory of navigation, in astronomy, and even the art of building and navigating ships. It will at the same time reflect considerable light upon the discoveries in the East Indies, which our plan obliged us hitherto to relate diffusely, and only as it regarded the several European nations trading thither;

(B) Those philosophers, in the order in which we have enumerated their sentiments, were Democritus, Anaximenes, Anaximander, Thales, Leucippus, Laërtius, and Augustine. The sentiments of most of those sages are to be found in Diogenes Laërtius and Stanley's Lives of the Philosophers. It would be tedious, however, to refer to every page whence they may be collected.

a but more particularly on the means by which the vast discovery of the Terra Australis and America were made. The method we shall follow is, to recite the material circumstances from the best accounts of those circumnavigators we have; giving at the same time a short history of the lives of those eminent men. Only the principal shall be selected; and those placed according to their dates, with a regular chronology, we shall endeavour to make equally useful and entertaining. We shall distinguish the causes, the consequences, the several improvements in the order of time in which they happened; taking notice likewise of what remains to be done by others, inspired to emulation by the industry, success, and great reputation acquired by those generous discoverers.

b As it is universally believed that Don Christopher Columbus first formed an idea of the possibility of sailing round the globe; as he first, by his just and powerful arguments, engaged all the learned in his sentiments, and as he afterwards proved that his theory corresponded not only with speculation, and the then received system of the world, but with practice too; we shall begin with an account of this philosopher and hero, whose history is scarcely known to this day, through the gross misrepresentations of some material facts. The strong prejudices with which he had to combat, the reluctance of all the princes in Europe to enter into his measures, and the perseverance with which he pursued them, in contempt of difficulties, dangers, and in spite of the malice of all his enemies, are circumstances we shall dwell upon, as they cannot fail both of engaging the heart of the reader, as well as improving his understanding, as they afford him a striking example to what a pitch of greatness the human mind is capable of arriving by constancy, firmness, and an invariable propensity to what it judges to be virtue.

S E C T. VII.

Containing an account of the life and discoveries of Don Christopher Columbus, a Genoese; his various disappointments at the court of Spain; and, finally, his death, owing to the malice, rancour, and envy, of his enemies. Also the life and rise of the celebrated Sir Francis Drake; his several exploits against the Spaniards in the South Seas; the endeavours of his enemies to depreciate his merit; the high sense of his conduct which the queen had; concluding with his death and vindication.

d THE life of Don Christopher Columbus was written by his son Don Ferdinand, who acquaints us, that he was descended of an antient family in the territory of the state of Genoa, but does not determine either the time or the particular place of his birth (A). Christopher had shewn an early passion for the sea, he studied geography and navigation with an uncommon avidity, and, when he was very young, distinguished the extraordinary progress he had made by some charts he laid down after a new method, and several projects he began to frame. The Portuguese were at this time the most famous maritime power in Europe; a circumstance which induced Columbus to visit Portugal, where he married, settled, and commenced a trader to the coast of Guiney. By his wife Philippa Mumiz de Paristrello he had children, which whetted his ardour to increase his fortune by a diligent application to trade, but by means peculiar to himself^a. His voyages to Guiney were subordinate only to his more extended views, of which he never lost sight from the time he had first framed his idea of the terraqueous globe. For this purpose he made himself a tolerable proficient in the Latin tongue, and in several branches of knowledge; but gave his chief attention to the mathematics, on which he knew the success of his projects depended. During his whole life, he maintained the reputation of a man sober, temperate, grave, and devout, of a clear understanding, studious, but enterprising, and indefatigable in his pursuits^b.

e His close application to mathematics and maritime affairs, joined possibly to the relations of mariners he had heard, induced him first to think of new discoveries, though the jealousy of the Spaniards has given an invidious turn to this part of his life, and derogated all in their power from his glory, for no other reason than that he was not their countryman. Mariana

^a PURCHAS, vol. i. P. ii. p. 9.

^b GOMARA, Hist. Gen. c. 14.

(A) The Spanish writers give Columbus the name of Colon, for the easier pronunciation. Herrera says, he was born at Savona. Gomara, a Genoese historian, alleges, that he was born in the little town of Cicuro, in the republic's territory; whereas Peter Martyr, or rather Eden in his preface to that writer, seems to think that Narvi claims with justice the honour of this great man's birth. But these disagreements we rather mention out of a desire to gratify the curiosity of the reader, than as a matter of any importance.

tells us, that Martin Vincent, a pilot, informed Columbus, when very young, that he was once ^a carried four hundred and fifty leagues west of Cape St. Vincent, where he took up a piece of wood wrought by man's hand, and, as far he could judge, without iron, which he concluded must have come from some western island. Pedro Correa had likewise told him, that he had seen at Puerto Santo a similar piece of timber driven thither by the westerly winds. He also sent Columbus some large canes, containing in each knot about two gallons of water, which he reasonably supposed to be the growth of some country to the west, from the wind's having set in that quarter for a course of several weeks ^c. To this was added the relation of the inhabitants of the Azores, who affirmed that strong west and north-west winds had often brought upon the coasts of Graciosa and Fayal certain large pine-trees, canoes formed of the trunk of a tree, and one time two dead bodies of a different complexion, and larger faces ^b than any they had ever beheld ^d. Other circumstances of a similar nature are mentioned by the Spanish writers, which, instead of diminishing the character of Columbus, rather magnify it, by shewing how piercing a wit, how judicious an observer of occurrences, he must have been, who, upon so slender and trivial accidents, could build a project so noble, so useful, and so extensive, as that of the discovery of a fourth part of the globe (B). The fact, however, upon which the greatest stress is laid, is, that, A. 1484, one Alonso Sanchez, of Heuelua, in the country of Niabla, died in the house of Columbus, in the island of Tercera, leaving him all his papers, whence he acquired those lights that directed him in his future great undertakings. Sanchez had traded for many years from Spain to the Canaries, and thence to Madeira. In his last voyage from Madeira he was carried out to sea, and, after a continued ^c course for twenty-nine days, arrived at a certain island supposed to be Hispaniola, where he landed, and took an observation. He kept an exact journal of all the occurrences in his voyage, which, say the detractors of Columbus, afforded him the chief materials for all the discoveries he afterwards made. From hence, say they, he had not only intelligible hints, but a direct plan, a course chalked out for his future operations. But what destroys the credibility of this plausible tale is, that Columbus had actually perfected his scheme, and offered it to his countrymen the Genoese in the beginning of the year, when Sanchez is said to have begun his voyage. Besides, he offered no testimonies from experience; his arguments were founded upon science, deep thought, and pure reason. As the figure of the earth was spherical, it was probable, he said, that the continent on one side was balanced by an equal quantity of ^d land on the other. That as the Portuguese had first discovered islands, and then a vast tract of country, by sailing east, it was in a manner certain, that, by a western course, they should fall in with other islands and another continent. That this was confirmed by the observation in the Cape de Verd islands, that the winds blow for a stated time from the west, which must be owing to a great tract of land on that side; concluding, that this discovery, when ascertained, would be equal in glory, in producing wealth, increasing their commerce, navigation, and industry, to that of the East Indies, which at that time was the admiration and wonder of all Europe.

Reasons for inserting Columbus among the circumnavigators.

His proposal rejected by the Genoese.

HENCE it is evident, that though Columbus did not actually surround the globe, yet that he was the first who suggested the possibility of such a voyage, who attempted it, and pointed out ^c the means by which it was afterwards effected. Hence also it appears, how little he borrowed from the narratives of mariners, of what little use experience could have been to him, and, in short, that his great plan was erected intirely upon a rational idea, an happy turn of thinking, and a sound judgment; that it was a fine theory, consonant to reason, but at the same time confirmed by no trials or experiments whatever. The states of Genoa having rejected his proposal, as much beyond their power, and likely to incur the resentment of several maritime princes, Co-

^c Apud PURCHAS, p. 9.

^d HERRER. dec. 1.

(B) The words of Peter Martyr, contemporary with Columbus, addressing himself to the two patrons of this great man, evidently demonstrate that he did not derive his notions from narratives, and the hearsay evidence of the seamen he conversed with, but from the consideration of the globe, and the harmony observable through every part of it then known. Hence Columbus justly concluded, that the want of this harmony in any point of view was the strongest argument that the whole was not discovered; and that whatever was requisite to establish that harmony, was the part concealed. "Attollite mentem," says Peter Martyr, "audite, sapientissime duo senescentes, novum inventum." "Meminiſtis Colonum Ligurum inſtitiffe in Caſtris apud

"Reges; de percurrento per-occiduos antipodes, novo terrarum hemispherio meminisse oportet. Qua de re vobiscum aliquando actum est; nec sine vestro, ut arbitror, consilio, rem hic aggressus est" (1). But the accounts given of this affair are so various, that it is difficult to fix upon the most genuine. Every writer speaks of Columbus according to his own prejudices, either national or personal. Some of his friends go so far as to affirm, that the utmost pains were taken to render his design abortive, and to blast his reputation, because it was not the interest of the Portuguese that this method of discovery by the West should be pursued.

(1) Vid. Edit. Eden Petri Mart. Epist. 133.

- a Columbus presented it to John the second, of Portugal, in whose dominions he had resided for a number of years. His majesty appointed commissioners to treat with him, to examine his plan, and give in their sentiments to his privy council. So treacherously did this board execute their office, that, after their artifice had succeeded in drawing out of Columbus his whole sentiments of the project; they advised the king to send a ship to make trial whether it was practicable, endeavouring by every low and mean artifice to rob Columbus both of the glory and advantage that might result from the success of the enterprise. The design, however, miscarried through accident, or want of courage and conduct in the persons employed. Columbus discovered the arts made use of to sap his fortune and reputation; and so highly was he incensed at it, that he refused to treat a second time with the king, though his majesty earnestly desired
- b it, resolving to apply to the court of London, for means to prosecute his plan.
- With this view he dispatched his brother Bartholomew Columbus with proper instructions to Henry the VIIth, not doubting but that wise monarch would readily embrace a proposal so manifestly tending to his advantage; but Bartholomew was so unfortunate as to fall into the hands of pirates, by whom he was stripped of every thing, in which poor condition he arrived in England. After some time spent in the utmost distress, he at length found means, an. 1488, to have his proposals communicated to his majesty. They were received with a graciousness and warmth becoming a prudent prince; an agreement was struck up with Bartholomew, in the name of his brother, and all the reason in the world given him to believe that his journey to England would be crowned with success (C).
- c CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS, in the mean time, hearing of the misfortunes of his brother at sea, repaired to the court of Spain, where he conferred with Martin Alonso Pinçon, one of the ablest mariners of his time, and soon made him so thoroughly apprehend the force of his arguments, that Pinçon offered to attend him in the voyage, if he could bring his project to bear. The next application of Columbus was to Juan Peres de Marcheno, a Franciscan frier, in great repute for his skill in astronomy and geography. Marcheno was not only convinced of the propriety and rectitude of Columbus's scheme, but indefatigable likewise in promoting it; and to him it is in a great measure owing that any countenance was ever shewn to it. He first recommended it to two of the chief grandees in Spain, the dukes de Medina Sidonia and Medina Celi. These noblemen, although they did not patronize Columbus with that warmth which his merit so well deserved, yet shewed him great respect, and even countenanced his application to Ferdinand and Isabella, their catholic majesties; induced by no other motives than the steadiness, gravity, integrity, and upright conduct, which they observed in our great discoverer. Nor was the assistance of his old friend the frier wanting upon this occasion, for he furnished him with the strongest recommendations to the queen's confessor Ferdinand Tolavera, a man of probity and erudition, of considerable weight and influence with their majesties. By means of this priest it was, that Columbus, amidst the persecutions of malice, envy, and national prejudice, at length accomplished his design. To so high a pitch were these invidious artifices carried, that he had frequent intentions to leave the court of Spain, and try his fortune in France; but was diverted by the frier, the confessor, and Don Alphonso di Quintaniglia, auditor of the revenue, a sensible judicious man, who had taken a liking to Columbus, entertained him at his table, and supplied him with money and necessaries. Soon after the auditor introducing him to the archbishop of Toledo, and the prelate entering properly into the character of Columbus, his affairs began to wear a more favourable aspect. Queen Isabel so warmly interested herself in his behalf, that only two obstructions remained to be surmounted; these were, the expence that would attend the equipping a necessary force, and the high demands of Columbus. As to the first, it amounted to no great sum; but so exhausted was the Spanish treasury by the long wars with the Moors, that some writers affirm the queen offered to pawn her jewels to make up the sum. This difficulty was at length removed by Don Lewis di St. Angelo, an officer of the revenue, who advanced the greatest part of the money. As to the other difficulty, it was overcome by the inflexible constancy of Columbus, who would abate nothing of his first terms, viz. being made viceroy and admiral of the lands and seas he should discover, and intitled to a tenth part of the clear profits that should redound to their majesties from the success of his labours.

His brother makes proposals to Henry VII. of England.

Columbus goes into Spain, and meets numberless disappointments.

He is at length patronized by the queen.

* HERRERA, d. i. l. i. c. 2.

† J. DE BARROS, d. i. l. iii. c. 11. apud Purchas. tom. i. l. ii. f. 3.

(C) From this account, which we find in all our English historians, and particularly in the collections of Hackluyt and Purchas, as well as in Oviedo's Hist. del Ind. (2), it would appear, that the title of the English to the new world is prior to that of the Spaniards. If they plead against this claim the actual discovery of the islands, we may with equal reason assert the same arguments against them with respect to the continent. However, as this is a point now out of the question, by the division of both that has been made, and confirmed by long possession, we shall not trouble our readers with a detail of the dispute.

(2) Oviedo Hist. del Ind. lib. ii. c. 5.

This he obtained ; and the articles of agreement were signed at Santa Fe, in the kingdom of a Granada, an. 1492^e.

A fleet assigned him, with which he sails in search of discoveries.

PRELIMINARIES being thus adjusted, three ships were assigned him, the Santa Maria, which Oviedo calls the Gallega, commanded by Columbus in person ; the Pinta, Alonso Pinçon, master ; and the Ninna, Vincent Yannes Pinçon, brother to the above-named captain, commander.
 This Vincent advanced Columbus's proportion of the expence, which, according to the articles stipulated, was one fourth. The admiral's ship was a carrack, or decked ship ; the others caravels, or open vessels ; and the whole crews amounted to no more than ninety men, according to Herrera, although Peter Martyr, and other historians contemporary with Columbus, make his complement to consist of 120 seamen ; a force, indeed, very inadequate to the dangers he was about to encounter. Towards the end of July, an. 1492, he embarked at Palos, and weighed b anchor on the 3d of August. On the 4th the Pinta's rudder got loose, which obliged them to put again into port ; an accident that was interpreted into a bad omen by the seamen, but regarded by Columbus in no other light than as it retarded his project. He told the sailors, that no omen was unfortunate where the designs were just, brave, and public-spirited. He bestowed great pains in inspiring them with courage, with just notions of the enterprise they were upon, and with the true principles of navigation and geography, himself performing the office of a tutor, as well as of a commander. By the 11th of this month he had sight of the Canari- es, where he continued instructing and refreshing his men till the 7th of September, when he put again to sea. No sooner had the fleet lost sight of land, than the spirits of the seamen began to sink, notwithstanding all the endeavours of Columbus to animate and rouse their cou- c rage. They now began to esteem it the project of a rash desperado, and an ideal plan, which must soon hurry them into perdition. But Columbus still inflexibly proceeded with a calm resolution, and undaunted courage and presence of mind, which seemed to work a happy effect upon the minds of the greater part of the crew. He even deceived them in their reckonings, persuading the seamen that they had not passed such a tract of ocean, or got at so great a distance from land as they imagined. The 14th he took notice of the variation of the needle,

*The variation of the compass
 first observed.*

which was the first time that phænomenon had fallen under observation. Two days after, grass and herbs, with a great number of grasshoppers and insects, were seen floating on the water, and this he interpreted into a prognostic that land was not far off. For some days following, the same presages, together with sea fowl, and other occurrences, confirmed their conjectures, d and raised the spirits and expectations of the drooping mariners^h. In this train stood affairs, with a favourable gale astern, till the twenty-second, when the wind came to S. S. W. This was no sooner observed by the seamen, than they concluded that God was displeased with the hardy attempt. They reproached Columbus with the most opprobrious and vilifying language ; nor did they even spare the sacred persons of their catholic majesties, who had sent them on this foolish enterprise, at the instigation of a specious and artful foreigner : they even threatened to throw Columbus overboard if he did not immediately alter his course, and make the best of his way home. All this he bore with the patience of a philosopher, and the undismayed resolution of a soldier. He reasoned with his men in the calmest manner, answered their abuse in the mildest and gentlest terms, promised them large rewards if they would persevere in a scheme no e less honourable and advantageous to themselves than to him ; and at last concluded with a solemn promise to return, if, at the end of three days, land was not discovered. With this prudent conduct, and on these conditions, the mutiny was for that time appeased. Before one day out of the three agreed upon was expired, Columbus perceived by the sun setting, that land was nigh, whereupon he slackened sail, acquainted the crews with the reasons upon which his conjecture was founded ; and that same night discovered a fire, to the great joy of all on board.

He discovers land.

About midnight Rodrigo di Niara discovered land, which they found to be an island fifteen leagues in circumference, one of the Lucayas, called by the natives Guanabani, but by Columbus
San Salvador, situate about 950 leagues from the Canaries. Upon going on shore they sung f Te Deum, and took solemn possession of the island in the name of their catholic majesties. The natives, who were themselves naked, greatly wondered at the dress and figure of the Spaniards, but much more at the ships, which they took to be large animals. They were of an ordinary stature, well proportioned, their complexion olive, but painted of various colours ; a custom observed to prevail among the original inhabitants of many of the islands of the East Indies, the Southern Continent, as well as of America. They were wholly ignorant of the use of iron, and the nature of the weapons, innocently rubbing their hands against the edges of the Spanish swords. In their noses and ears they wore gold rings, which they said came from the south, where there was a king very powerful, and his subjects rich in this kind of metal. On the 15th of October, the Spaniards put to sea, and arrived at another island distant about seven leagues

^e HERRERA, ubi supra. HARRIS, tom. i. l. i. c. i.
 tom. i. l. ii. c. x. l. iv.

^h OVIEDO Hist. del Ind. l. ii. c. 5. PURCHAS,

a from the former. This they called Santa Maria de la Concepcion. The 17th they went to La Concepcion Ferdinandanda, the women of which were covered from the waist to the knee with cotton petticoats. Soon after they touched at another island, to which they gave the name Isabella, in honour of her catholic majesty, who had been so great a promoter of the expedition. Of this, as of all the former, they took solemn possession, using the natives with the most obliging kindness, and presenting them with glass beads, and other baubles, so highly prized among the Indians ^a.

b FROM hence Columbus proceeded to Cuba, which island the natives of Ferdinandanda and Isabella told him abounded with gold and pearls. Upon his arrival here, two Indians were dispatched to examine the country. After travelling some time, they came to a village containing about fifty houses, where they were kindly welcomed by the natives. As the Spaniards went thither, they were honoured with incense, the simple natives believing them to be deities; a notion they soon found reason to retract. They made offerings to them of bread and roots, kissed their hands and feet, and performed every other possible act of devotion and adoration. In this country the Spaniards saw cotton spring up spontaneously, without any sort of care or culture, and variety of uncommon trees and birds, with which they were wholly unacquainted. What the Spaniards chiefly regarded was the precious metal which the Indians wore in their noses. After this they made all possible inquiry; to which the natives constantly replied, Cubonacan, meaning that it was found in the middle of Cuba; but a word the Spaniards interpreted into a different sense, imagining they talked of the Chan of Cathay. Before the departure of Columbus from Cuba, Martin Alonso Pinçon, his former friend, becoming jealous of his success, and fearing lest his reputation might be wholly absorbed in the glory the admiral would acquire from such unexpected discoveries, parted with him, in pursuit of honour which could not be shared with him. After this Columbus sailed for Hispaniola, which at that time the natives called Hayti. Here he took a woman, whom he used with great tenderness, and, by engaging her affections, rendered her an useful agent with the rest of the natives. During his residence in Hispaniola, he entered into the most familiar correspondence with the inhabitants. By the report of the female Indian, they had taken so great a liking to the Spaniards, that the king Guacanagari often invited Columbus on shore, and entertained a high respect and warm friendship for him, and the other seamen. Here Columbus built a fort, to maintain the Spanish pretensions, in which putting a garrison of 38 soldiers, he prepared for his return to Spain. Before this he effected a reconciliation with Pinçon, by means of a letter carried by an Indian, who was astonished to find the Europeans could convey their sentiments in a scrap of paper, not doubting but it must be through the mediation of some deity. Columbus left some regulations with the garrison, and a strict charge to live in friendship and harmony with the natives; upon which he set sail for Spain. On his arrival he immediately went to court, where he was graciously received by the queen, and made to sit down in her presence; an honour the highest that could be conferred on a subject ^b.

c COLUMBUS, on his return, was persuaded that the places he had discovered were islands on the opposite side of that continent to which the Portuguese traded. This was consonant to the system he had set out upon, and to the idea of the terraqueous globe he formed to himself. For this reason, therefore, he gave those islands the appellation of West Indies. He made several curious astronomical observations, great improvements in navigation, and inspired the Spaniards with courage to trust themselves in unknown seas, by this voyage. In his way home, Columbus, to preserve the memory of this discovery, in case he was shipwrecked, carefully wrote a journal of every minute particular. This he wound carefully in a cere-cloth, and put into a close barrel, to be thrown into the sea, if any accident had befallen the ship. From the same motive it was, that, before his second voyage, he drew an exact chart of his discoveries, which he put into the hands of his son.

f THE success of this first attempt determined their catholic majesties to send him back the following autumn, on the same pursuit, with a squadron of 18 sail. Of the particulars of this voyage we have no account, farther than that the first skirmishes between the Spaniards and Indians happened on this occasion; that the Indian monarch purchased a reconciliation at the price of a golden crown, which he sent to Columbus, with great store of provision for the fleet, and some important intelligence; and that the discoveries now made had confirmed him the more in his opinion of his having found out a new passage to the East Indies, and the means of circumnavigating the globe. With regard to his third voyage we are left no less in the dark as to particulars. This much we are told, that Columbus had now gained some knowledge of the continent; retracted his former mistake, upon hearing that there was a sea on the opposite side of this continent; and now first received the opinion of there being a passage from the north to the south seas, by which it might be possible to sail to the East Indies. This was such a proof of his sagacity and penetration, that it was with good reason the great Mr. Boyle ^a affirmed that we are no less obliged to Columbus for the discoveries made after his death than for those made by him while living, since they all flowed from his principles, being no more than improvements on the plan he had traced out, and in some measure executed with equal prudence, fortitude, and good fortune. It is likewise remarkable, that some of those discoveries, which are esteemed of much later date, were, in fact, not unknown to him ; particularly the constant motion of the sea from east to west, of which he took notice in his first voyage ; thence explaining the difference between the time consumed in going out and returning home ^c.

^a PURCHAS, vol. i. l. ii. f. 4. HERRERA, ubi sup.

^b PURCHAS & HERRERA, in loc. sup. citat.

Columbus and his friends sent home in irons.

BUT this expedition, although in the main successful, did not terminate without misfortunes and fresh matter of grief to Columbus. The gravity of his behaviour, his undaunted perseverance, his good-fortune, and the strict discipline he maintained during his voyage, created him a number of enemies both in Spain and among his mutinous licentious crew. Appeals from both parties were remitted to court from Hispaniola ; in consequence of which their majesties sent over one Francis Bobadilla, to take cognizance of the dispute, and to do justice, according as things, upon inquiry, should appear to him. Bobadilla, upon a superficial examination of facts, to gratify a bishop, whose resentment Columbus had incurred, caused the admiral, with his brethren, to be seized, put in irons, and, in that condition, sent to Spain. In November, an. 1500, they arrived at Cadiz, from whence Columbus made his appeal to their catholic majesties, who gave immediate orders that he should be released, and expressed the utmost concern for his sufferings. The queen, in particular, who was warm and hearty in her esteem, gave ^b him signal marks of favour and distinction ; but it was some time before he could procure a new governor to be sent to Hispaniola ; which, however, he at length effected. ^c

No sooner had he carried this point, than he solicited leave to make a fourth voyage in quest of farther discoveries ; and, after a great many difficulties and obstructions, obtained it. In this voyage it was that he landed upon the continent, lying some days at the Bastimentos, an. 1502. While he was in the full career of farther discoveries, he was forced to alter his course, and steer for Hispaniola, though for what reason we are not told. Probable it is that new quarrels and mutinies had arisen, which rendered it impracticable for him to continue his pursuit. In the year 1504, he returned to Spain, where upon his arrival, the first news he heard was the death of Isabella the queen, and his firmest friend. So affected was he with this incident, that his health visibly declined, and nothing but his insuperable courage and constancy could enable him to survive a loss which exposed him to all the malice, intrigue, and artifice, of his numerous and powerful enemies. He still, however, persevered in his duty and applications to an ingrateful court, where he was received with a cold respect, very different from what he had been accustomed to from his royal mistress. This, superadded to his former afflictions, sunk so deep in his noble mind, that, after a few months lingering illness, he died equally admired and envied. When the court was informed of his death, then at length they began to perceive the value of a man they had before neglected. His virtues rose upon them in proportion as obloquy and detraction subsided, and they paid those honours to the dead which were refused to the living. Orders were issued that his body might be interred ^d with all imaginable funeral pomp and magnificence ; but Columbus had before given some directions concerning his funeral, which should perpetuate the memory of his hard treatment, by ordering the irons he had worn to be put in his coffin with him. Thus died the great Columbus, the ornament of his age, and the constant butt of fortune, equal in his private and public virtues, and exceeded by none either in prudence, perseverance, courage, or true greatness of mind. With him died that spirit of rancour and malice, which pursued him invariably through the whole course of his life, and which he resisted with a generous and noble resolution. Of this there cannot be a more striking instance than in the famous story of the egg, which is thus related by the best historians of those times, particularly by Peter Martyr. After the queen's death, when it was observed that the king received Columbus with a reserve and coldness, many of the nobility affected to lessen his merit, by insinuating that he was rather fortunate than prudent, his discoveries being rather the result of accident than of well-concerted measures. These suggestions received strength from the artifice of the Pinçons, whose jealousy made them sworn enemies to the superior merit of Columbus. They arrogated to themselves the discoveries that had been made ; affirming, that the pride, stubbornness, and severities, of Columbus were the cause of all the mutinies and discord on board the fleet. Columbus, one day at a public dinner at court, after bearing a great deal of raillery upon this head, ordered an egg to be brought to him ; and, shewing it to the company, asked if there was any one who would undertake to set it upright upon the lesser end. All agreeing that it was impossible, Columbus very gravely cracked the shell, and by striking it gently on the table, enlarged the base till it stood upright. Upon which the company fell a laughing, and cried out that any body might ^e

His death and character.

The story of Columbus's egg.

- a have done as much. “That I do not doubt,” answered Columbus; “and yet none of you thought of it. Thus it was that I discovered the Indies; I first conceived the design of steering that course, and now every miserable pilot can find his way thither as well as I. There are many things which appear easy when once performed, which before were thought impracticable. You ought to reflect on the scoffs I sustained before I put my design in execution; it was then a dream, a chimera, a delusion; and now it is what any-body might have thought of and put in practice.” When Ferdinand was told this story, he was extremely delighted, commended Columbus highly, and made no difficulty of declaring that he admired the grandeur of that spirit, which at the same time he endeavoured to bring down. Many are the reflections which naturally arise from this incident, which cannot fail of inspiring the reader with extraordinary ideas of the understanding, presence of mind, and constancy of Columbus; but they are too obvious to require a recital. Sufficient it is that we observe, that whereas he steadily pursued a settled and regular plan throughout his four voyages, so those who succeeded him were led by no other guide than their avarice, and kept to no other instructions than what they received from the Indians, who, to rid themselves of such troublesome guests, were eternally sounding in their ears the riches of distant countries, by which the Spaniards were often induced to try the truth of their reports. Thus the discoveries of Columbus arose, like those of the great Sir Isaac Newton, from deep reflection, a fine chain of thought, and happy deductions; those of his successors, from accidental experiments, hearsay, and other fortuitous causes, in which they can claim no other merit than that of having improved upon the invention and discoveries of another. Out of this number, however, we must exclude Ferdinand Magliana, or Magellan, a Portuguese gentleman of family, spirit, and great skill, both in the theory and practice of navigation. As we shall have occasion to mention the discoveries of this experienced seaman in our account of America, we shall here pass over his voyage round the world, and proceed to a recital of that performed by our renowned countryman the brave Sir Francis Drake.
- Reasons for not inserting Magellan's voyage among the circumnavigators.*

S E C T. VIII.

Containing the birth and first exploits of Sir Francis Drake; his voyage round the world, together with a short view of his life, a defence of his character, and an account of his death.

- d IN the preceding section we gave an account of the life and discoveries of Columbus, not as an actual circumnavigator, but as a philosopher, whose system gave existence to the voyages of Magellan, Drake, Van Noort, Cavendish, Dampier, Anson, and all the other persons who have since his time sailed round the globe. It has been observed, that Sir Francis Drake resembled the heroes of antiquity not more in his virtues than in his dubious and equivocal descent. We are told by the learned Cambden^a, that he was the son of a clergyman, who, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was vicar of Upnore, on the river Medway. On the contrary, the painful and industrious John Stowe relates, that he was the eldest of twelve brethren, all children of Edmund Drake of Tavistock, in the county of Devon, mariner; and that he was born in the year 1540^b. These seeming contradictory assertions we find ingeniously reconciled by the judicious late editor of Harris's voyages, by supposing that Edmund Drake the father, being a zealous protestant, as suffering much for his religion in the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. and having likewise a competent share of learning, was ordained deacon in the days of Elizabeth, and settled at Upnore. Without examining scrupulously into the truth of this solution of the difficulty, which it must be acknowledged is the best it is capable of, we will proceed to the history of Sir Francis, who received his christian name from his godfather Francis earl Bedford. It does not appear that he ever received any advantage from this honour, or that the earl patronized him with the affection and warmth which might be expected from so near an alliance. In his youth he was sent to sea as an apprentice to the master of a small vessel, trading to the coast of France, who conceived so warm a friendship for him, that, on his death-bed, he bequeathed him all he was worth, his little bark. At the age of eighteen, Mr. Drake was made purser of a merchantman bound to the Bay of Biscay; and at twenty, he made a voyage to the coast of Guinea. During the whole course of his service he distinguished himself by a courage, a quickness and sagacity, very unusual, and greatly superior to his years. In the year

^a Annal. Elizab. 1595.^b Hist. of Engl. p. 587.

His first voyage as commander to the West Indies.

1565, his enterprising genius induced him to venture his whole fortune in a voyage to the West Indies, which proved unsuccessful. Two years after he served under Sir John Hawkins in an expedition to Mexico; from whence he returned disappointed, and almost ruined in his fortunes, but with accumulated reputation and glory. Far from desponding or sinking under those repeated misfortunes, they rather whetted his courage, and set him upon undertakings which otherwise he might never have entered upon. He made two more voyages thither in quality of commander, first in the year 1570, and next in the year following, partly for information, and to qualify him for enterprizes of more importance to his fortune and fame. His courage and constancy had now so raised his character, that he found no difficulty in procuring a number of adventurers to share in any voyage he proposed. His first scheme was to make reprisals upon the Spaniards for the losses he had suffered by them; in which enterprize several considerable merchants embarked a part of their fortunes, in fitting out two ships to cruise in America, under the conduct of Mr. Drake. With these, viz. the Swan of 250, and the Pasta of Plymouth of 70 tons, he sailed on the 24th of May 1572. His consort was under the command of his brother captain John Drake; the little squadron was well equipped and provided; but the whole crews amounted to no more than seventy-three men and boys. Such was the armament he carried into the West Indies, to revenge the damages sustained from the Spaniards. Mr. Drake, however, soon proved what great things may be effected by a well-directed spirit and intrepidity. He sacked the famous town of Nombre de Dios, and soon after saw from an high tree the South Seas; a spectacle that inflamed him with an eager desire of carrying an English ship thither, an attempt never made, perhaps never thought of, before. On his return, a prodigious dividend was made amongst the owners, and captain Drake all at once found himself possessed of a large and affluent fortune, although he scorned to take advantage of some circumstances which another man would have claimed as his right. Of this we have a remarkable and generous instance, in regard to a present made him by an Indian prince on the isthmus of Darien. This prince, in return for a cutlass which captain Drake had given him, expressed his gratitude by a present of four large wedges of gold, which the captain threw into the common stock; saying, that his owners gave him the cutlafs, and it was but reasonable that they should have their share of the produce. His voyage homewards was no less happy than his expedition; for, in 23 days, he passed from the Capes of Florida to Scilly Islands, arriving at Plymouth on the 9th of August 1573^c.

He obtains the queen's commission to make reprisals on the Spaniards in the South Seas.

THE fame of this expedition soon spread over the kingdom, and captain Drake found himself at the pinnacle of fortune both in his circumstances and reputation. People crowded from all parts to visit the hero who had performed exploits so glorious, and a voyage so dangerous, with a force so inadequate and slender. After a short respite from the fatigues of his voyage, he generously resolved to spend the fortune he had acquired by his bravery in the service of his country. For this purpose he equipped no less than three frigates at his own expence, with which he served under that worthy nobleman Walter earl of Essex, and greatly assisted in the reduction of the rebellious Irish. After the death of Essex, he attached himself to Sir Christopher Hatton, then vice-chamberlain to the queen, and afterwards high-chancellor of England. By the interest of this new patron, captain Drake, notwithstanding great opposition, obtained her majesty's commission for that voyage which he had so long meditated, and of which we are now to render an account.

Drake's magnificence.

CAPTAIN Drake was no sooner appointed, or rather permitted, to undertake this expedition, than he applied with unwearied diligence to get every thing in readiness for accomplishing his designs, in which his friends assisted greatly by large contributions towards the expence. Every thing was expected from the vigilance, prudence, and courage, of Drake; and nothing, it was supposed, besides accidents and unforeseen misfortunes, could prevent his returning with fresh laurels and immense wealth. Five vessels were equipped; viz. the Hind, 100 tons, Francis Drake, admiral; the Elizabeth, 80 tons, captain Winter; the Marigold, a bark of 30 tons, John Thomas commander; the Swan, a fly-boat of 50 tons, captain Chester; and the Christopher, a pinnace, captain Moon; the whole complement of men amounting to 164 able-bodied seamen. Every thing necessary for so long a voyage was amply provided; long-boats, staved in case of accident, were put on board; wines, cordials, and medicines also. Nor was pleasure forgot; for Mr. Drake carried with him a band of music, a prodigious quantity of wrought plate, and other rich furniture, by which the nations he proposed visiting might entertain magnificent ideas of the grandeur of his royal mistress and country. Some writers have not scrupled to tax him with vanity, from this circumstance, though we would rather ascribe this conduct to his generous principles and high sense of national honour. It is indeed an easy matter for little minds to give an invidious turn, and blast the reputation of the noblest purposes, by their own base suggestions^d.

^c PURCHAS, vol. i. p. ii. p. 46. HERRIS. l. i. c. i.

^d Sir W. MONSON'S Tracts, vol. iii. p. 350.

a ALL things being now in readiness, admiral Drake weighed anchor from Plymouth on the 5th day of November, an. 1577, under pretence of a voyage to Alexandria; but he was soon obliged to put back, by reason of a violent storm, which did him some damage. In a few days he remedied all defects, and set sail with a more favourable wind on the 13th of December. On the 25th he made Cape Cantin, on the coast of Barbary, which was the first land he fell in with from his departure. Two days after he arrived at the island Magador, distant about a mile from the continent, which, with the island, formed a commodious harbour. Here the admiral set his carpenters to work in building a pinnace; during which employment several of the natives came to the shore with flags of peace, and exchanged hostages with the admiral, promising to return next day with provisions for the fleet. At first some misunderstanding arose, and the natives failed in their agreement; but perceiving, upon examining a prisoner they had made, that the squadron did not belong to the king of Portugal, with whom the king of Fez was at war, but to the queen of England, they released the seamen, and carried presents from his majesty to the admiral^c.

b THE pinnace being now finished, Drake sailed, December the 30th, from Magador, and arrived on the 17th of January at Cape Blanco, where he found a ship at anchor, with only two seamen on board. Of her he made prize, carried her into the harbour, mustered his men on shore, and exercised them to land as well as sea-service. Departing thence on the 22d of January, and carrying with him a Portuguese caravel, of 40 tons, instead of the Christopher, he arrived at the Cape de Verd islands, and took in all necessary refreshments at the pleasant island of Mayo. Thence he stretched to St. Jago, the largest of the Cape de Verd islands, keeping at some distance, for fear of the inhabitants. In Purchas and Harris we are told, that, before he left the island of Mayo, Drake sent out a party to seize upon some magazines of dried cabritos, or goats, yearly prepared for the Portuguese fleet that usually touched there. Here they found grapes in the utmost perfection in the depth of winter, cocoa-nuts, salt, &c. of which last they took but little, the islanders having purposely laid the oldest and worst in their way. In coasting along St. Jago, three pieces of cannon were discharged at the English squadron; an insult which Drake did not chuse to lose time in revenging. Here two sail were descried, to which the admiral gave chase. One of them he took, which proved a Portuguese vessel laden with wine. He gave the command of her to one Doughty, putting the Portuguese, with a sufficient quantity of wine and provision, on board the pinnace, and then discharging them. The Portuguese captain, Nuno de Silva, he took on board his own ship, to serve as pilot on the coast of Brazil, with which he found him to be well acquainted (A).

c PURSUING his voyage from the Cape de Verds, he arrived at the island del Fuego, or the burning island, possessed by the Portuguese, and taking its name from the sulphurous flames issuing out of the bowels of the earth. Being now arrived near the equinoctial, this great and vigilant commander, careful of the health and lives of his seamen, let blood with his own hand of every man on board, to prepare them the better for a change of climate. In a course of 54 days, without seeing land, the squadron met with great plenty of fish, dolphins, bonnetos, and flying-fish, some of which dropt down in the ships, their finny wings being dried with the air. April the 4th, he arrived on the coast of Brazil, in lat. 33 degrees south. Coastng along the Brazils, they parted in a storm with the Christopher, which name had been given to the Portuguese prize; but found her again on the 11th. The place where all the ships, dispersed in search of her, rendezvoused, the admiral called Cape Joy. All the country round was fair and pleasant, the soil rich and fruitful, the climate temperate, the air mild and agreeable. Great store of deer of an uncommon size were seen, but no inhabitants, although the prints of their feet plainly shewed that the country was not without human beings^f.

f ON the 26th, Drake came to the mouth of the Rio de la Plata, or the great river of Plate, where he sounded in 53 fathom fresh water; but, finding no good anchorage, put again to sea. Sailing along, he came to a fine bay, in which stood a number of pretty islands, well-stocked with seals and fowls; by means of which the squadron was well supplied with fresh provisions. The inhabitants came boldly round the admiral upon his landing, seemed willing to trade, but would accept of nothing, unless it was first thrown down on the ground. They were a strong-bodied race, swift of foot, and of a lively and brisk disposition. Their faces were painted, and their cloathing only a furred skin round the waist, with certain wreaths and ornaments round their heads. The Marigold and Christopher being sent out in quest of a more commodious harbour, they soon returned with intelligence of one they had discovered; to

^c PURCHAS, tom. i. p. 47. part ii. p. 171.

^f HARRIS, tom. i. lib. i. c. 1. LEDIARD'S Naval History,

(A) The reason of Drake's making reprisals, and taking the Portuguese ships, was, that, at this time, the crowns of Spain and Portugal were united upon one head. Perhaps, indeed, no part of the expedition can be justified by the law of nations, as, on the present occasion, Spain was not in actual war with England.

which the admiral and whole squadron repaired. News of the fleet was soon spread among ^a the natives, who came flocking down to the shore with large bows and arrows in their hands. They appeared to be not altogether ignorant of martial discipline; for they ranged themselves into tolerable good order. The most convincing proof of their agility they gave, was, in stealing the admiral's hat off his head; a prize they shared among them, one keeping the hat, and others dividing the lace, which on no terms they would give up. This was the people whom Magellan calls the Patagons.

He arrives in the Pacific Ocean.

WEIGHING from this place, he sailed to Port St. Julian, so called by Magellan, where he arrived June the 20th. Here he found a gibbet erected by that famous commander for the execution of some of his mutinous crew. It was Drake's misfortune to be under the necessity too soon of applying to it; for here John Doughty, an able and experienced seaman, but turbulent, ^b haughty, and mutinous, was hanged; an action, says Harris, the most blameable and rash of the admiral's life (A). On the 17th of August, Drake left Port Julian, and on the 20th fell in with the Streights of Magellan, which they entered the following day. The navigation here was extremely difficult; the streight being so crooked, and winding into so many obliquities and curves, that the wind was perpetually shifting. However, after a tedious passage of sixteen days, they at length arrived in the great South Sea, or Pacific Ocean. No sooner was Drake entered into this sea, for which he had long expressed the strongest inclination, than a storm arose, by which he was driven, according to Sir William Monson, 100 leagues to the westward, 200 leagues, say Harris and Purchas, of longitude, and one degree south of the streight (B). He anchored in a fine bay, 57° south latitude, in which stood several islands, ^c affording wholesome water and herbage. Not far from thence he entered another bay, where he saw a number of naked people traversing the streights between one island and another, in search of plants, fruits, and other provisions. Their canoes, he observed, were made with some art, and they managed them with great dexterity. They very readily entered into a commerce with him for such commodities as their country afforded. Here it was that Drake observed, contrary to the then prevailing opinion, that the part of the heavens situated nearest the south pole had fewer visible stars, and these of a smaller magnitude. Three only he could discern of any remarkable brilliancy and size in that hemisphere, which he had not before seen in England. He likewise took notice of two small clouds of the exact colour, and greatly resembling, the Via Lactea, not far from the pole, which the sailors called Magellan's Clouds, ^d they seeming to be fixed and immoveable almost vertically to some of the discoveries of that great navigator ^e.

SAILING northward, Drake discovered three islands, in one of which was such a multitude of birds, especially sea-fowl, as is hardly credible. October the 8th he lost company of the ship commanded by Captain Winter. He now steered away for the coast of Chili, which former maps placed to the south-west, but which Drake found lying north-east and easterly; so that those coasts were rather not fully discovered, or at least not faithfully described, before this voyage. The difference he makes about twelve degrees. On the 29th he arrived at the island of Mocha, where he anchored, and went on shore with ten men. The inhabitants consisted of refugees, whom the Spanish barbarity had driven from their habitations on the conti- ^e

^a MONSON, loc. citat. HARRIS et PURCHAS, ibid.

(A) The editor of the new edition of Harris's Voyages states this affair in so short a manner, that the reader is left to believe this action was an arbitrary stretch of power, owing to the cruelty of Drake's temper; whereas, according to Sir W. Monson, and the most authentic writers, the admiral gave Doughty his choice of being tryed on the spot for mutiny, or sent home to take his trial according to the laws of his country. He chose the former, and accordingly had a jury not of twelve, but of forty of the chief persons in the fleet, by whom he was convicted. This proceeding, we are sensible, was irregular, and, if admitted, would be a precedent of dangerous tendency; yet there are some instances in which we cannot but excuse the commander, although we lament the necessity for such an action. Captain Cheep, in the last war, was acquitted in England for a proceeding infinitely more despotic; the law seeming to look upon those bold actions as the natural cures of so dangerous a malady as disobedience and mutiny. Doughty bore his fate with great resolution, resignation, and an undaunted preience of mind. On the morning before his execution he received the sacrament with Drake, and other officers. He afterwards dined with them at the same table with cheerfulness, took leave of them all by drinking their healths, with the same calmness as if he had been going a common journey. Dinner being ended, he rose from table, and walked without fear or hesitation to the place of his execution, where he resigned his last breath with the composure of a philosopher, and intrepidity of a soldier (1). This conduct of Doughty's it was that spirited up clamours against Drake. The English nation, of all others, shew the greatest compassion for unfortunate courage. Some affirmed, that he was cut off as the rival of Drake's fame; others said, that it was in consequence of secret orders from the Earl of Leicester; but none are hardy enough to deny that he had actually plotted against his admiral's life, and stirred up dangerous seditions in the fleet.

(B) In this storm it was that Drake lost the Mari-gold, Capt. Thomas; so that now, of his whole fleet, only three remained, for the two small vessels were set adrift some time before, on their becoming leaky, and unfit to bear the sea (2).

(1) Monson, V. iii. p. 362.

(2) Purchas, T. i. P. ii. p. 49.

- a went hither, to preserve their liberties and lives. At first they behaved to the English with great civility, bringing them potatoes, two fine sheep, and promising to supply them with water; for which they received some presents. Two seamen went on shore the following day, with barrels for water, and were knocked on the head by the natives, who took this opportunity of revenging themselves on the Spaniards, not doubting but the fleet belonged to that nation. Their design was to kill the whole boat's crew; for they discharged such a flight of arrows against it, that, of the nine men on board, not one escaped being wounded. Drake did not care to revenge an injury which was not intended to him; he therefore continued his course, without entering upon hostilities with those savages, from whom he was sensible nothing could be gained. On the coast of Chili he met with a canoe, on board of which was an
- b Indian, who, mistaking him for a Spaniard, told him there was a rich Spanish ship in the road of Villa Porcifo, or Valbaria. The admiral rewarding the Indian for this intelligence, he offered to conduct him to the place; which he did accordingly (C). This ship was manned with eight Spaniards, and some negroes, who believing Drake to be a Spanish admiral, saluted him with their guns, loud huzzas, and bumpers of Chili wine. They were soon convinced of their error, the English boarding her, shutting the crew under hatches, all except a desperate Spaniard, who flung himself into the sea, and making prize of her and the cargo. After this they landed, and plundered a neighbouring village, in which they found a considerable stock of Chili wine. This village the above writers call St. Jago, but by mistake, that error being corrected in a Latin manuscript written by J. Casaubon, now in the Cottonian
- c library^b. Here likewise were found a silver chalice, two silver cruets, and a rich altar cloth, of which the sailors robbed the chapel, not esteeming it any kind of sacrilege to plunder and spoil the churches of Papists and Roman Catholics. The admiral, setting his prisoners on shore, shaped his course for Lima, the capital of Peru. In his voyage an estimate was made of the booty, which amounted to twenty-five pezoës of Baldivian or the purest gold, with a cross of the same metal set with emeralds (D). This was the cargo of the ship, for in the village was found nothing besides wine, and the trifles we have mentioned^c.
- ELEVATED with this rich booty and prodigious success, the Squadron cheerfully proceeded on its course, the sailors now imagining that no force would be able to withstand them, although as yet they had met with no resistance. But they soon experienced that all their victories were
- d not to be gained in so easy a manner. Putting on shore for water at Coquimbo, fourteen English were attacked by a body of 300 Spanish horse and 200 foot. They, however, made their retreat good, in spite of all the endeavours of the enemy, and got to the ship with the loss only of one man. The next day the English going again on shore to bury the men left dead upon the field, the Spaniards hoisted a flag of truce; but the English, suspecting their fidelity might be upon a level with their courage, did not chuse to trust them; and therefore, carrying off their man, they returned to the ships. Towards the beginning of February, Drake put into a port called Tarapaxa, where they found a Spaniard asleep upon the beach, with 30 bars of silver, in value about 4000 dollars, lying by him. These they carried off, leaving the Spaniard to finish his nap. This is Camden's, Harris's, and Purchas's account; but Burchett
- e reduces the number of bars to 13^d. At a small distance from thence, going on shore for water, they met a Spaniard and an Indian driving eight Peruvian sheep, each sheep being loaded with two bags of pure silver, both amounting to 100 weight. This booty of 800 lb. weight of silver they carried off, permitting the Spaniard and Indian to pursue their journey without farther molestation (E).

Takes a prize,
and plunders
the Spanish settlements.

Drake gets a prodigious
booty.

FROM hence the admiral sailed for Arica, where he found three small barks at anchor. These he plundered; and carried off, besides other valuable merchandize, 57 wedges of fine silver, each weighing twenty pounds. Satisfied with this prize, he did not attack the town, which he imagined might be attended with more hazard and difficulty than the enterprise deserved, but put again to sea, and arrived in the port of Lima on February the 13th. Here

^b LED. Nav. Hist. p. 175.

^c Auct. citat. ibid.

^d Apud Lediard, p. 176.

(C) Harris, Hackluyt, and Purchas, give this road the name of St. Jago, which is a mistake, that city being situated further up the country than ever Drake penetrated.

(D) Thus, according to Hackluyt, Purchas, and Harris, the whole booty was valued at 25,000 pezoës, equivalent to 39,000 Spanish ducats; but, according to the above Latin manuscript of Casaubon's, the gold above weighed 800 lb. besides the cross, chalice, cruets, &c. (3).

(E) According to the author of Drake Revised, these sheep were as large as asses. Their necks resembled camels, but their heads were exactly those of sheep. Their wool is exceeding fine, and their flesh sweet and delicate. Some of them are as large as a cow, and greatly exceed that animal in strength. Three men and a boy, says that author, were set upon the back of one of them, which seemed to give the creature no manner of uneasiness (4). What degree of credit the reader is to give to this account, will appear when we treat of the animals and produce of this country.

(3) Lediard's Nav. Hist. p. 175. See also Drake Revised, p. 45, 46.

(4) Drake Revised, p. 47.

Takes a brigantine, and soon after the Cacafuego plate-ship.

lay 12 sail of ships without a creature on board; and, according to the author last cited in our a note, 30 sail of fine ships richly laden. On board this fleet he found a chest filled with rials of plate, or coined money, besides great quantities of silk, linen, &c. Having cleared those ships of what he thought proper, he received advice of a rich ship called the Cacafuego, bound for Paita. To her he instantly gave chase, and, in his way, took a brigantine laden with naval stores, about eighty pound-weight of gold, together with a rich crucifix of the same metal, studded with jewels. On his arrival at Paita, finding that the Cacafuego proceeded on her voyage to Panama, he resolved to pursue her, and, to animate his men, promised his gold chain in reward to the first person who should discover her. This fell to the share of his brother John Drake, who spied her soon after from the tops, upon which the admiral crouded sail, and bore after her. In the evening he came along-side of the Spanish ship, gave her b three furious broadsides, which brought her mizen-mast by the board, and obliged her to strike. This was the richest prize he had yet made; for in her he found 13 chests of rials of plate, 80 pound-weight of pure gold, 26 tons of silver bars, and a large quantity of pearls and jewels. The author of the Columna Rostrata says, that the wedges of gold and silver were unrefined^c; which seems to be more consistent with truth, and the supposed value of the booty, than the accounts of Hackluyt, Purchas, and Harris; for this was estimated at 360,000 pieces of eight, or near 90,000*l.* sterling. The Cacafuego was taken off Cape San Francisco, about 150 leagues from Panama; the cargo was removed, and the ship then dismissed, the admiral steering his course to Guatocolo, or Guatulio, a place south of Panama. In the Cacafuego were several other valuable particulars, besides those we have enumerated, such as wrought c plate, particularly two fine chased and gilt bowls of a prodigious size; to which the admiral soon after added a beautiful eagle of massy gold, with a large emerald stuck in the breast, which he found on board a small brigantine he met with after taking that great prize^f.

ADMIRAL Drake, on his arrival at Guatulio, found only 15 Spaniards in the town. These he made prisoners, and then ransacked all the houses, the plunder consisting of a bushel of rials of plate, and some other things of value. During their residence in this port, a Spanish ship, bound for the Philippines, imagining the town to be in possession of the Spaniards, put in for water, and was taken, but the cargo was of no considerable value. Having now acquired an immense fortune, raised his reputation to the highest, and revenged the injuries sustained by his country, as well as his own private wrongs, Drake began to deliberate upon d his return home. This was a determination that required the utmost caution, prudence, and resolution. To return by the Streights of Magellan would be exposing himself to the tempestuous weather, which, in that season of the year, always prevails there, and at the same time to the danger of being intercepted by the enemy, who he imagined would probably watch his return. This was actually the case; for Don Francisco de Toledo, viceroy of Peru, had sent two large men of war with this design to cruise about the mouth of the streights. His only resource then was, to steer by the Moluccas, and endeavour to find the track pursued by the Portuguese to the Cape of Hope; but utterly unknown to the English, and all the other Europeans. He therefore boldly resolved to make his passage by North America; and accordingly sailed to the latitude of 43 degrees north, to discover if there was a passage or streight e on that side. Here the air was intensely cold; and the farther he proceeded, the more intolerable was the severity of the climate. Meeting with nothing but thick clouds, open shores covered with snow, and a keenness in the atmosphere, sharp, piercing winds that had almost killed the seamen, he returned to the latitude of 38°^g.

NORTH of California he put into a convenient harbour, where he entered upon a commerce with the natives, whose cottages were ranged along the shore. Notwithstanding the rigour of the winter here, the inhabitants go naked, except a loose garment of bulrushes, which the women wear in form of a petticoat, and a deer-skin over their shoulders. But their good qualities, says Hackluyt, made ample amends for their ordinary dress; for they are to a proverb dutiful to their husbands. Their houses the natives surrounded with a trench, upon the edge f of which they raise great pieces of timber, which join at the top in form of a cone, and make these little huts warm and comfortable beyond belief. They have no other beds than the bare ground, strewed over with rushes; their fire-place being in the middle of the hut, about which they all lie promiscuously, men, women and children. The first present the admiral had made to him was of feathers, and cowls of a kind of net-work; in return for which he entertained them so heartily, as intirely to win their affections. Soon after they brought him another present of feathers and bags of tobacco, attended by a numerous ambassy, who all crouded together upon a little eminence, from which their chief orator harangued him, with an action and voice by no means disagreeable. After this they descended, leaving the women upon the hill, tearing their hair, beating their breasts, and howling in a dreadful manner, g

New Albion or the north side of California, discovered.

^a P. 27. HARRIS, T. i. l. i. c. i. HACKLUYT, &c. in loc. citat.

^f PURCHAS, vol. ii. P. ii. p. 49.

^g PURCHAS, HARRIS,

according

- a according to the usual ceremonies among them at their sacrifices. But not to insist upon particulars, which we shall have occasion to mention at large, when we come to treat of North America; sufficient it is, that, after a visit from the Indian king, and numberless mutual civilities passed, the admiral weighed from California, October the 13th, after he had taken possession of it in her majesty's name, and erected a monument, on which was engraved her picture, arms, title to the country, the admiral's own name, and the time of his arrival there. After his departure from thence, he fell in with certain islands in eight degrees north latitude, whence a great number of canoes came to them, laden with cocoa-nuts and other fruits. The Indians who navigated them, had some peculiarities. Their teeth were jet-black, their nails an inch beyond the ends of their fingers, their ears cropt round the lower part, and then
- b stretched down upon their necks, with heavy pendants. Their canoes were extremely beautiful, hollowed within, out of a solid piece of wood, with great art, and shining without, with the polish and lustre of burnished horn. Both the stem and stern were sharp, with the point turned upwards in a spiral, neatly cut. On each side lay a broad piece of wood, about a yard and a half long, to keep them close to the wind, by embracing a larger body of water. They were of a considerable height, and stuck round with shells of various colours, by way of ornament. Soon after this, Drake got sight of three other islands, viz. Tagulada, Zelon, and Zewarra; the inhabitants of which were strongly attached to the Portuguese. The first of these islands produced abundance of cinnamon^b.
- Without making any stay here, the admiral proceeded on the same cruise, arriving November the 14th at the Moluccas, and steering for Tiridore. Passing along the coast of Matyr, an island belonging to the king of Ternate, his majesty's viceroy boldly came on board, inviting the admiral to sail directly for Ternate, without touching at Tiridore. In compliance with his request, the admiral steered his course thither, and came to an anchor before the chief city on the following morning. He immediately sent his compliments to the king, a present of a velvet cloak, and assurances that he had no other intention than to trade upon the fairest terms with his subjects. By this time the viceroy had been with him, and disposed his majesty to entertain very favourable sentiments in behalf of Drake and the English. In consequence of which, a gracious message was sent to the admiral, expressing his majesty's thanks for the present made to him, and assuring the English of his protection, friendship,
- d and free leave to trade with the natives in any commodities the country afforded; adding, that he was desirous of laying himself and his crown at the feet of so glorious a princess as the queen of England, and making her sovereign over him, with the same authority he had over his subjects. In testimony of this, he sent the admiral a signet, and conferred the highest respect and honours on the English messenger, who staid some days at his court. Intending after this a visit to the admiral, he sent four canoes filled with persons of the first rank in his court, and equipped with the utmost pageantry and pomp, to signify his royal pleasure. This procession was conducted with great decorum, and a ceremony not ungenteel. The nobility were dressed in fine white lawn, or callico. The canoes were covered from one end to the other with large umbrellas of perfumed mats, borne up with an elegant frame of reeds. Their
- e servants clad in white stood round them; and these again were surrounded by a guard of soldiers. On each side, in well-contrived galleries, were ranged the rowers; each gallery containing eight men. The canoes, which were of an extraordinary size, were filled with all kinds of weapons and military stores, disposed in the most regular and beautiful manner. Upon their approach to the ship, they all saluted the admiral in great order, one after another; each repeating his majesty's message. Soon after this came the king in person, attended by six persons of a grave and venerable appearance, and the utmost ostentation of eastern magnificence. He was immediately saluted with a concert of music, with which he seemed greatly pleased; but still more so with the admiral's generosity and hospitality, expressed by the rich presents he made to his majesty and the Ternate nobility. After a repast on board, the king
- f went on shore, promising to return the next day; but first sent a great store of provisions, fowls, rice, sago, sugar, cloves, and a kind of fruit they call frigo. Next day his majesty sent his brother to the admiral, to apologize for his not attending him according to promise, to invite him on shore, and wait on board as a hostage for his safe return. This invitation the admiral declined; but, to oblige his majesty, sent some of the gentlemen of his fleet to court, where they were received with great distinction. Here they met with four Turkish envoys, who had been sent by the Grand Signior to establish a treaty of commerce with the king of Ternate. After the English gentlemen had waited for some time in a great hall, his majesty came to them, attended by twelve lances, a canopy of rich silk embroidered with gold being carried over his head. He was dressed in a loose robe of cloth of gold, his legs bare, but his feet covered
- g with slippers of cordovan. His hair was interwoven with wreaths and circlets of gold; about

The islands of Tagulada, Zelon and Zewarra.
Arrives at the Moluccas.

^b PURCHAS, HARRIS, HACKLUYT, &c. in loc. cit. Etiam LED. Nav. Hist. p. 178.

his neck hung a rich chain of the same metal, and all his fingers were adorned with rings, a richly studded with jewels. On the right side of his throne stood a page, fanning him with an elegant instrument for that purpose, and curiously adorned with sapphires and other jewels. After receiving the English with great kindness, he soon dismissed them, sending one of his council to conduct them safe back to their ships ⁱ.

THE admiral having closed this scene of grandeur, and finished his affairs, put off from Ternate, sailing to a little island south of the Celebes, where he staid some days. Nothing remarkable was observed here, but that the country was woody, abounding with tall strait trees, without branches, except what formed a fine roundish top, with small leaves, resembling those of English broom. A species of shining flies was found in such multitudes, skimming over and perching upon the branches in clusters, as made them appear as if they were on fire. Bats ^b they saw as large as hens, and a kind of land cray-fish, which burrow under the earth like rabbits, and are so large, that one of them will dine four persons. Sailing from hence, the admiral was prevented by contrary winds from running a western course; he therefore altered it to the southward, which he found attended with great danger, on account of the numberless shoals, shelves, and rocks, that lay round him. On the 9th of January 1579, his ship struck upon a rock, where she was fixed from eight o'clock at night till four the next morning. In this distress he was forced to ease her, by unloading three tons of cloves, eight pieces of cannon, and a great quantity of stores and provisions. At length the wind chopping about to the larboard, he hoisted sail, and a happy gale springing up at that moment, intirely disengaged the ship, without any considerable damage to her hull ^c.

Arrives at the
the island
Baratene.

ON February 8th, he arrived at the fruitful island Baratene, or Borateve, where he cleaned and repaired his ship. The natives of this island Purchas describes as handsome and well-shaped; but still more agreeable for the faculties of the mind than for those of the body. They are mild, civil, generous, and strictly honest, hospitable to strangers, and affable to all. The men clothe only their heads and the middle of their bodies; the women from the waist downwards to the heels. They load their wrists with eight or ten bracelets of bone or horn, each weighing about two ounces. Linen cloth is scarce, but much valued by the natives, who make ornaments for their heads and waists of it. Baratene affords gold, silver, copper, sulphur, nutmegs, ginger, long pepper, lemons, cucumbers, cocoa, frigo, sago, and many other fruits, roots, and vegetables of every species. One sort of fruit, resembling a bay-berry in size, shape, ^d and husk, they took notice of as peculiar to this island. It was hard, but of a pleasant taste and delicate flavour; when boiled, it was soft, nourishing, and of easy digestion. In short, in their whole voyage they met with no land pleasanter, richer, or more fruitful in all the necessaries of life, than this island of Baratene ^e.

Java Major.

LEAVING this place, Drake steered his course to Java Major, where he met with a courteous reception from some of the kings. As we have already minutely described this island, the inhabitants, customs, government, and laws, we shall here omit all these particulars. One circumstance we cannot avoid taking notice of; it is the frequency of the lues venerea among the natives, and their extraordinary method of cure. This they effect by exciting a copious sweat through all the pores of the body, by sitting naked for some hours under the scorching heat of the sun, whose subtle rays, says our author, open those fine passages, and give a free vent and emission to the noxious particles. While the admiral lay here, he received advice of some large ships that rode at anchor in a harbour not far distant. As he was acquainted with their force, he chose to avoid it at all hazards; and therefore quitted Java with all convenient expedition. From thence he sailed in one continued stretch to the Cape of Good Hope, which was the first land he fell in with since his departure from Java. Without stopping here, he proceeded to Sierra Leona, on the coast of Africa, where he took in wood and water. Here he saw a great number of elephants, mangroves, and lemons; the two last proving a seasonable refreshment. Staying only two days here, he set sail on July the twenty-second, and by the 25th got sight of the Canaries, where, as he was in no want of necessaries, he did not stop, but continued his course to England, arriving in Plymouth Sound on September the 26th, 1580, after a voyage of two years, ten months, and a few days. ^f

THE report of his return, and his fame, were soon spread over every part of the kingdom. As this was the age when virtue and courage were fashionable qualities, the great rivalled each other who should patronize him most, and shew him the greatest countenance. Every man who regarded the arts, or military virtue, expressed his sense of our admiral's merit by the most profuse praises, and other testimonies of esteem. Epigrams, songs, sonnets, and poems, upon this expedition, were handed about without number. Even the ladies paid him the tribute of their applause, and Drake was at the same time the admiration of the men, and the ^g

ⁱ CAMDEN's Annals, p. 353.
p. 748, &c.

^a STOWE's Ann. p. 107.

¹ HACKLUTY's Voyages, vol. i.

- a darling of the women. But as envy and malice are ever the attendants upon extraordinary and superior merit, so there were not wanting persons who endeavoured to give an invidious turn to this gallant exploit, and to set in a false light the conduct of the brave admiral. His voyage round the world was no more than what had been effected by several Portuguese, upon more generous principles than those of spoil and robbery. They insinuated, that, as there was no declared war with Spain, the nation might come to suffer for his avarice. The English merchants in Spain enjoyed, it was said, a perfect security under the protection of that crown; but whether the Spaniards would not now make reprisals, was a point very doubtful. Abstracted from views of policy, it was ungrateful, ungenerous, and base, to attack and ruin a nation in their distant dominions, while English subjects received all manner of countenance and kindness in the very bowels of Spain. These reports, as is common with every species of scandal, soon gained ground, and prejudiced the minds of numbers of men against Drake; even some of those who had been the loudest in their praises upon his arrival, began now to fall off from the warmth of their friendship, and soon after to join with his enemies against him. To add to his mortification, the Spanish ambassador wrote bitter memorials against his conduct; asserted the right of nations, and used every vilifying art and opprobrious term to sting the mind, lessen the reputation, and break the spirit of this noble commander. His friends (for some friends he still had in spite of malice) found themselves wounded through his sides, and accordingly took the utmost pains to vindicate his reputation, and justify his conduct. They alleged, that he bore her majesty's commission to make reprisals; that he had constantly attacked his enemies with the generosity of a soldier; that besides the national injuries sustained from the Spaniards, Drake in particular had suffered greatly in his fortune by them; that England was under infinite obligations to him, not only for lowering the pride, and checking the insolence of that haughty nation, but for the great addition of wealth and treasure he had brought into the kingdom; that he had extended the dominions of her majesty, and spread her fame and power over the most distant parts of the globe, and lastly, that if Spain had any intention of making reprisals, by seizing upon the effects of the English merchants, the nation was in a capacity to assert her own rights, and could never want a leader both able and willing to avenge any insults upon his royal mistress, while the brave circumnavigator, the terror of Spain, and glory of England, lived.
- d In this train things continued some time, whilst Drake lived in the most irksome suspense, lest, whether after his toil, after all the dangers he had undergone, and after the most enthusiastic spirit with which he had inspired the nation, he should now be declared a pirate or a hero. There is reason to believe that the queen declined, from motives of true policy, to disclose her sentiments. She probably waited to see the effects this conduct would have on the court of Spain. She knew that Philip was prevented from breaking with her, or at least from meddling in her affairs, in expectation of being able to draw so great a treasure out of her hands. To keep him in this expectation, she very artfully consented to part with some small sums to Mendoza, his resident in London. But at last, when things were come to a crisis, she threw off the veil, openly countenanced Drake, dined on board his ship at Deptford, and conferred on him the honour of knighthood; telling him at the same time, that his actions were more honourable to him than his new title. On this occasion, a prodigious concourse of all ranks and degrees attended her majesty; the bridge erected from the shore to the ship, unable to support the loads of people upon it, broke down before her majesty had well set foot on board; yet, of 200 persons who fell into the Thames, not one was hurt or drowned; a circumstance the queen was pleased to ascribe to the good-fortune of Sir Francis Drake. After this public testimony of the royal approbation, the shafts of envy glanced almost unheeded; all ranks of people joining in the general applause, redoubled their congratulations. Sir Francis, upon this occasion, aptly enough assumed the motto, Tu primus circumdedisti me; "Thou first encom-
"passedst me;" but without excluding his former, Divino auxilio. Henceforward his reputation was daily increasing, till he came to be considered as an oracle, both by the court and country, in maritime affairs^m.
- f HAVING dwelt so long upon these circumstances, which we thought necessary to set the character of this great man in a clear light, it is time that we point out the principal advantages flowing from the happy execution of this noble enterprize. It is worthy of remark, that this glorious voyage was not a mere sound, serving no other purpose than to gratify the vanity of our nation. A reputation in maritime affairs is of real and solid benefit to a commercial people. Numbers of grants and favours are obtained merely upon the sense that foreigners have of their power and abilities. The Dutch were so sensible of this, when they first established settlements in the East Indies, that they reported the most ridiculous and vain-glorious fictions of the great power, weight, and character, of their republic. In the cele-

*Endeavour
used to blast
the reputation of Drake.*

Vindication of Drake.

The queen dines on board his ship, where she confers the honour of knighthood upon him.

*The advantages resulting from Drake's going round
the world.*

^m See the authors already cited; also STOWE, CAMDEN, and BURCHET, ibid.

brated collection of voyages on account of the East India company in Holland, Oliver Van Noort is always mentioned with particular honour, although his voyage round the world was attended with no extraordinary discoveries. But the Dutch esteemed it a matter of importance to their reputation, and of consequence to their interest, that a mariner of their country should have done what had been effected by a Magellan, a Drake, and a Candish.^a

SIR Francis Drake would seem, on his first setting out, to have had the honour of his country no less in view than his own reputation. He provided every thing which might dazzle the eyes of foreigners, strike their imaginations, and impress high notions and an admiration of the country from whence he came. The same spirit carried him farther to North America than even the Spaniards themselves had been. Here, under the 38th degree of north latitude, beyond which we know nothing at this day, he extended the fame of the English name, the power of their arms, and left the natives equally in admiration of their generosity, their courage, and their perseverance. Of this there are abundant testimonies, some of which appeared after his death, in letters sent to England by Indian princes, all of which agreed in bestowing upon Drake the highest encomiums, and acknowledging that they had received very respectable ideas of the English nation from the conduct of their admiral. Besides, his descriptions of the countries where he had been are very exact. His observations have corrected several errors of consequence in all the charts both of South and North America. In the latter, particularly, his touching upon the north side of California, to which he gave the name of New Albion, has for ever put it out of the power of the Spaniards to contest that country with us, should ever a north-west passage be discovered, which probably cannot be at a great distance from this part. They must allow us to be the first discoverers, and the first possessors, which at least make our right to New Albion equal to that which they claim to any part of the Indies.^b

It is to be lamented that Sir Francis Drake has himself left no accounts of his voyages and discoveries. From the few letters of his which remain, it appears that he was better qualified to record his own exploits than any of those who have employed their pens on that subject, without we except one late writer, we mean the sensible author of The Lives of the Admirals. We should then probably have at large the reasons that induced him to believe that he might find a passage back by the north. Certain it is, that he looked out for such a passage, and was prevented from continuing the pursuit only by the extreme rigor and sharpness of the weather, against which his crew, after so long a voyage, was but indifferently provided. How it happened, that, from that time to this, no farther experiments have been made in a way that early gave so great hopes, is what we cannot determine. The Spaniards have their political reasons for not publishing their discoveries on this coast; but certainly it was the interest of Great Britain to prosecute with diligence the hints suggested by Sir Francis Drake. We ought thoroughly to have satisfied ourselves whether or not there was such a passage; the most rational manner of doing which, was perhaps the very method he pointed out. There are many circumstances in this voyage which prove him an able navigator. Although, in his course from California to the Ladrones, he made no discoveries, yet his passage was so expeditious as to give us the highest opinion of his abilities and good-fortune. To conclude, it appears that this voyage was executed with a prudence equal to the greatness of the undertaking; that it was, in all its circumstances, perfectly well conducted; and that as Sir Francis Drake made the best use of the glimmering lights afforded him by others, so he left to posterity some clearer directions, and at least a noble example of prudence, intrepidity, and perseverance, which we cannot too much admire, or too closely follow.^c

His further exploits against the Spaniards.

HERE, in strictness, we ought to close this account of Sir Francis Drake, as a circumnavigator; but as his virtues, his fame, and this last exploit, may have raised the reader's curiosity, we will endeavour to gratify him with a concise detail of his succeeding actions. The war in Spain breaking out a few years after his return, Sir Francis was appointed general by land and sea in an expedition to the West Indies, which he executed with the same spirit and good-fortune as had before attended him. Now it was that he had an opportunity of exerting the talents of a warrior, and drawing forth his courage into act. He took the cities of St. Jago, Carthagen, St. Domingo, and the town and fort of St. Augustine, returning with equal glory and advantage both to his country and himself. Yet the profits, though considerable, were far short of his former voyage. They amounted, all charges defrayed, to 60,000 l. Two years after, that is, A. 1587, he had the command of another fleet, with which entering the bay of Cadiz, and afterwards the river of Lisbon, he took, burnt, and destroyed 10,000 tons of Spanish and Portuguese shipping, which had been collected together to invade England. This good-fortune he crowned by the capture of a rich prize called the St. Philip, which the writers of those times say, was the first carrack ever taken and condemned by the English. Again, the year following, he was appointed by her majesty's commission vice-admiral of the fleet sent out against the formidable armada. In this service he even^d

^a Vide DRAKE Revived, p. 52. HARRIS, p. 22 T. i. LFD Nav. Hist p. 130. HARRIS, p. 23. performed

- a performed wonders, having taken in the beginning of the battle two large men of war, the one commanded by the Spanish vice-admiral Oquandos, in person; the other by Don Pedro de Valdez, who, after a gallant resistance, struck rather to the reputation than the power of Drake. When he surrendered to him his sword, he made the English admiral this compliment, that he had determined to die fighting, if he had not fallen into the hands of a man, whose felicity and valour were so great, that Mars and Neptune seemed to wait upon all his enterprises. Sir Francis requited these Spanish flourishes by solid acts of kindness. He paid Don Pedro the utmost respect on account of his brave defence; set him at his own table, lodged him in his own cabin, and made him almost forget that he was his prisoner. The
- b English seamen were well recompensed for their bravery, sharing among them a booty of 55,000 ducats in gold, which they found in Don Pedro's ship. Drake performed other extraordinary feats of courage and conduct in this action, and particularly distinguished himself by advising the use of fire-ships. Some historians affirm, that he even invented them; but this is what we will not take upon us to assert.

- In the year 1589, he was sent with a strong fleet to Portugal, to restore Don Antonio to his kingdom. Here indeed he had a joint command, to which circumstance the admirers of this great man ascribe its ending unfortunately; as if Drake's good fortune could be shared with no other. However, although the chief intention failed, yet the Spaniards suffered great losses, the compliment of an invasion was returned, and they utterly deprived of the power
- c to attempt another descent upon England. Thus we may reckon, that Sir Francis Drake saved the nation from no less than three Spanish invasions. After this, we find but one more expedition he ever undertook, and this was a conjoint one. On this occasion he performed very gallant exploits in the West Indies; but, aiming at something higher, and his usual good fortune not attending his endeavours, the disappointment broke his heart, and he died the martyr of a well directed ambition, a public spirit, and sublime ideas of national and personal glory. In the harbour of Porto Bello, January 28th, 1595, his body was put into a leaden coffin, and committed to the sea, under a general discharge of the cannon from the whole fleet, and, of what was still more glorious, the tears of all the seamen. To conclude this section, “Sir Francis Drake,” to use the words of his best historian, “was a person of low
- d “ stature, but extremely well made, his complexion fresh and fair, his eyes large and lively, “ his hair of a light-brown, and his countenance open and chearful. He was naturally elo- “ quent, expressing gracefully what he conceived clearly; very knowing, not only in his “ own profession, but in all the sciences belonging to it; so that he was able to discharge “ every office in a ship, even that of a surgeon. He was just to his owners, kind to his “ seamen, loyal to his sovereign, and remarkably merciful to his enemies. His many glorious “ exploits justify his title to extensive fame, which, when we remember that he died at 55, “ will convince us, that he shewed the utmost ardour in the pursuit of glory.” A character not drawn by the warm pencil of imagination, but founded upon facts, and, if at all varying from the truth, rather unequal than superior to the merit of the person described.

His death and character.

- e . To this may be added, what we think the greatest praise of Sir Francis Drake, that he first raised the spirit of naval enterprises, and drew forth the latent genius of the English nation for maritime affairs. The hopes of rivalling his fame excited the youth of all ranks to try their fortunes at sea, in such a manner as their abilities and quality would permit. Men of fortune and fashion fitted out vessels at their own expence, which they manned with their dependents. Those in a lower station entered themselves as inferior officers, either in those private ships, or in her majesty's fleet. To such a pitch was this spirit carried, that before the end of the reign of Elizabeth, there were numbers of young fellows of eighteen years of age in the kingdom, capable of navigating a ship to almost any part of the known world. Such is the account of honest Stowe, whose industry was never surpassed, or integrity called in question.
- f So alarmed were the Spaniards at the skill and conduct of Drake, as well as the spirit he had diffused through the nation, that strict orders were issued that no draughts should be made, no journals published, or even written, of their discoveries in America^p. But all their precautions were in vain; the English now became acquainted with their own strength, their natural talent and genius; nor could all the arts, first of Spain, then of Holland, and lastly of France, prevent their rising to their present high and glorious pitch of maritime power.

^o HARRIS'S Voy. T. i. l. i. c. 1.

^p STOWE, ubi supra.

S E C T. IX.

Philip II. sends a Squadron to the Streights of Magellan, under Pedro Sarmiento, who fortifies them; Sir Thomas Candish's voyage round the globe; his birth; procures a commission; engages the Spanish fleet; arrives at the Streights of Magellan; miserable end of the Spanish settlement there; Candish enters the South Sea; visits Moro Moreno island; burns Paita; plunders and destroys Puna; takes the St. Ann Acapulco ship; loses the Content; has an interview with the casiques of Cabul; his letter to Lord Hunsdon; reflections on his voyage and character; his death.

Sarmiento
fortifies the Streights of Magellan.

PHILIP the Second, of Spain, was so alarmed with the easy and successful passage of a Drake into the South Sea, through the Streights of Magellan, that he immediately sent a squadron to make a thorough discovery of that passage, and, if possible, to block it up, to the utter exclusion of all other nations. Pedro Sarmiento, the best seaman in the Spanish service, was chosen to execute this important commission; who, sailing from Lima, actually passed from the North to the South Sea; and, on his arrival in Spain, gave his majesty the strongest assurances, that the Magellanic Streights might be so fortified, as absolutely to prevent the entrance of any foreign ships^a. The king, greatly delighted with this intelligence, sent a squadron of 23 sail, with 3500 troops on board, to execute this plan. Sarmiento, with 500, were appointed to garrison the intended works; and the whole court was filled with the notion of Spain's becoming absolute master in the South Sea. After an unfortunate voyage of b two years, the fleet arrived in the streights, built a town and fort, which they called Nombre de Jesus, where they left a garrison of 150 men. The great settlement was founded fifteen leagues distant from this, in the latitude of 53° 18', in the narrowest part of the streights. It was called Ciudad del Rey Felipe, fortified with strong walls, bastions, a great number of cannon, and 400 men, with provisions for eight months. This was one of the best contrived colonies the Spaniards had ever planted; but it failed^b. Sarmiento some time after was made prisoner, and sent to London, after many fruitless attempts to relieve his young colony: the garrison, having consumed all their provisions, perished with hunger; Sarmiento fell into disgrace; the whole project dropped, and the South Seas again became open to every nation that chose to push the advantage. The Dutch, the French, and English, followed the c footsteps of the great Sir Francis Drake, the first instance of which we have in the remarkable voyage performed by Sir Thomas Candish round the globe, of which a short abstract has already been given in our account of the English East India Company. As this voyage was attended with many remarkable circumstances, we shall here give his journal at large, and in such a manner as may conduce most to the reader's satisfaction and improvement. There we selected only such parts of the voyage as related to the English East India Company; here we shall attend him through the whole course, remarking particularly on such circumstances as we imagine to be of the greatest importance.

Voyage of Sir
Tho. Candish round the globe.

His birth and inclination to the sea.

THOMAS CANDISH, or CAVENDISH, of Trimby, near Ipswich, was a gentleman of an antient family, and considerable fortune. His vicinity to a town at that time a mart of great d trade, had given him an early inclination for the sea. He was of an open, liberal, and even expensive, if not a profuse disposition, setting no value upon money, but as it was necessary to his pleasures. Some writers affirm, that the decline of his fortune had first inspired him with the notion of repairing it by an application to maritime affairs^c. Others, again, are no less positive that he had a natural propensity to this employment; which, as soon as he was of age, he gratified by converting part of his lands into money, and equipping a ship of 120 tons, called the Tyger, at his own expence^d. Certain it is, that with this ship he accompanied Sir Richard Grenville to Virginia, A. 1585, and that he surmounted many dangers and difficulties in this voyage, but without any profit.

NOT discouraged with this rub of fortune, he deliberated, and soon prepared for, a greater e and more hazardous enterprise. In his voyage he had seen a great part of the Spanish West Indies, made a number of curious observations, and conversed with some intelligent persons who had surrounded the globe with Sir Francis Drake. Upon these hints he formed a project for retrieving his fortune, gratifying his curiosity, and raising his reputation, if not equal to Drake's, at least second to none but his. As soon, therefore, as he returned, he applied him-

^a Hist. des Navig. aux Terres Aust. T. i. art. 14. p. 200.
HARRIS, ubi supra.

^b PURCHAS, T. i. P. ii. page 56.

^c Tracts by Sir W. MONSON, T. ii. p. 274. CAMDEN'S Annals, p. 555.

^d HACKLUYT, P. iii. p. 803. PURCHAS, V. i. B. ii. p. 57.

- a self diligently to every measure necessary to his great design. He either sold or mortgaged the remainder of his estate, to make up a sum sufficient for building two stout ships; and so expeditious was he, that in six months his little squadron was ready to put to sea. The largest ship, which he called the Desire, was burthen 140 tons; the smaller, to which he gave the name Content, about 60 tons. To these he added a bark of 40 tons burthen, all manned, completely provided and equipped for the voyage, solely at his own expence. On board he had 126 seamen and officers; some of whom had served under Drake, but all of them able-bodied, and men of experience. The fleet had stores for two years; and, to prevent all disputes, quarrels, and discontents, either on or after the voyage, Candish entered upon a fair agreement with respect to the proportion in which all prizes should be shared. He laid up
 b magazines of journals, charts, draughts, and maps, of all those places and seas he proposed visiting. He also procured a commission from the queen, by the favour of Lord Hunsdon, then lord of the bed-chamber, and his patron^c.

He procures a commission from the queen.

- ALL things being thus in readiness, he embarked at Harwich on the 10th of July 1586, and sailed with the Desire for Plymouth, there to join the rest of his squadron. From thence he proceeded on his expedition on the 21st, and fell in with a fleet of eight sail in the Bay of Biscay, one of which attacked the admiral. The engagement was sharp for about an hour, when the enemy was obliged to sheer off, though greatly superior in force to the Desire.
Candish was prevented from giving chase by the darkness of the night, and the fear of losing company with his consorts. The 5th of August he got sight of the island of Fortventura, c and soon after arrived on the coast of Guiney. By this time the scurvy appeared among his men, which obliged him to set them on shore for their recovery as soon as an opportunity offered. On the 23d he fell in with Sierra Leona, where he destroyed a negro town, and lost one of his men by a poisoned arrow. His boat ran four miles up the harbour, returning with a cargo of fish and lemons. September the 7th he departed from one of the Cape de Verd islands, distant 10 leagues from Sierra Leona, and by the 1st of November got to the Brasil coast, sailing between the island St. Sebastian and the continent. Here he cast anchor, landed his men, erected a forge, and built a pinnacle. He sailed the 23d, and on the 26th fell in with the coast of America, in 47 degrees 20 minutes north latitude, running along a large steep shore, till he came under the 48th degree. Next day he fell in with a harbour which he d entered, calling it, after the name of his ship, Port Desire. This harbour he found convenient on account of the ebbing and flowing of the tide, and extremely commodious for cleaning, graving, and repairing ships. Here two of his men were wounded with an arrow made of cane, and pointed with flint, which the natives discharged at them. They are described as a rude, savage, and gigantic race, the footstep of one of them measuring eighteen inches. His whole description of this country coincides exactly with what Magellan relates, as shall be more particularly pointed out when we come to give an account of America. The editor of Harris's Voyages says, that the name Patagonia was given to this coast by Candish; which is a mistake, Magellan having before given it, from the extraordinary stature of the inhabitants, who are said to be five cubits, or seven feet and an half, in height (A).

Engages a Spanish fleet in the Bay of Biscay.

- DECEMBER the 28th he left Port Desire, and anchored near an island three leagues to the southward, keeping along the coast south-west-by-south. On the 30th, in 48° 30', about five leagues from land, he discovered a rock, which, for the benefit of future navigators, he describes distinctly. Still he kept coasting along the shore, amidst multitudes of seals and sea-calves, till the 3d of January, when he fell in with a white cape, from which runs a long beach about a league to the southward, stretching to the mouth of the Streights of Magellan. On the 6th he put into the streights, which he found five or six leagues wide in some places, but narrower in others. Next day he took a Spaniard belonging to the garrison of the Spanish fort prisoner. From him he learnt, that, of the whole garrison of Ciudad del Rey Felipe, only twenty-three remained^f.

Arrives at the Streights of Magellan.

- f CANDISH describes the mouth of the streights in 52° south latitude; a stretch of 14 leagues to the narrowest pass; from hence to Penguin Island 10 leagues, the course west-south-west, and a little to the south. At this island they anchored, and, having killed a great number of penguins, salted them for ship-provision. The 9th of January, Candish passed south-south-west of the largest Spanish settlement, which he found in a ruinous condition, the cannon dismounted, many of them buried, the houses deserted, and the church, with some handsome ornaments, left to be possessed by the birds and beasts. The garrison, after having struggled

The miserable end of the Spanish settlement there.

^c Ibid. Etiam HARRIS, T. i. B. i. c. 1.

^f PURCHAS, T. i. B. ii. p. 59.

(A) Candish and Magellan, as well as late travellers, agree in this circumstance. If we take the usual proportion between the foot and the rest of the body, which is supposed to be as 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ or 6 to 1, then the height may be tolerably ascertained from the footstep. Candish was a man of sense and a scholar; consequently could not be ignorant of this method of computation, which however is not very exact.

with cold, hunger, and every other misery, for the space of two years, living wholly upon a shell-fish, and being at length reduced to the miserable remnant we have mentioned, retired to the small fort. Candish relates, that they were at perpetual war with the neighbouring Indians, the implacable enemies of the Spanish name. That, when their necessities obliged them to go in search of deer, the settlement, in the absence of the party, was presently attacked, and the party hunted like wild beasts through the mountains; often cut off from the garrison, and suffering the most extreme hardships and fatigues before they could return. Thus would they die, like rotten sheep, with pinching cold and insupportable hunger, the stench from their bodies so infecting the survivors, that with one consent the settlement was abandoned, and the soldiers rambled along the shore, the cruel sport of fortune, till, happily for them, they at length became prisoners to the English^e.

On the 14th, Candish made Cape Froward, in latitude 54 degrees, and the southermost land of the streights. After this, he saw Elizabeth Bay, and two leagues further, a fine river, in which he towed up the boat for three miles. The country, and banks of the river, were pleasant, plain, and open; the inhabitants a strong, well-made, barbarous, and brutish race, who had eat up many a Spaniard. They had laid a plot for feasting upon the English, but were disappointed by the vigilance of the admiral, who saluted them with a brisk discharge of harquebusses, that did great execution. Leaving this river, he steered to St. Jerom's Chanel, two leagues further. Hence he sailed westward about four leagues, to a cape lying north of the chanel, from which, to the mouth of the streights, the course runs north-west and north-west-by-west. The distance from this cape to the entrance into the South Seas is 34 leagues, so that the whole streights measure in length about 90 leagues. 'Tis farther observable, that both openings into the South and North Seas are much in the same latitude, 52° 4' south. For several days the fleet was forced to lie to on account of storms of wind and rain, which burst with such violence from the mountains, that they were brought into extreme danger; nor were they less distressed with famine than by the inclemency of the weather, being prevented by this from ranging the country for supplies. One happiness attended them, that the coasts supplied convenient harbours on both sides the streights, at almost every two miles distance^h.

Candish enters the South Sea. At last, on the 24th of February, Candish entered the South Sea, observing on the south side of the opening, a high cape, with a low point annexed to it, north of which were four or five islands lying about six leagues from the continent, and surrounded with sunk and broken ground. The first of March he lost company with the bark, in a storm that blew at night, lat. 49 degrees, and 45 leagues from land. The bark had sprung a leak, and was driven far to sea in the most distressed condition; however, by the vigilance and good conduct of the captain and crew, she joined the admiral on the 15th, between the island of St. Mary, and the continent. The Desire and Content had sheltered themselves, during the storm, on the lee side of the island of Mocha, where some of their men, going on shore well armed, met with a warm reception from a body of Indians. They belonged to the district of Arcano, a country rich with gold, that had often tempted the avarice of the Spaniards, but to no effect, as they were constantly defeated by the obstinate bravery of the Indians. After this skirmish, the admiral ran under the west side of St. Mary Island, where he rode secure at six fathom water. It lies in 37° 30' south latitude, and is well stocked with hogs, poultry, and a variety of delicious fruits. The inhabitants are in such abject slavery to the Spaniards, that they dare not touch the most trifling production of their own country without leave from the usurpers, thus starving in the midst of the most luxurious plenty. The admiral, going on shore with a party of seventy men well-armed, was met and welcomed by two Indians of quality, who conducted them to magazines filled with hogs, poultry, dried fish, potatoes, and maize, or Guiney wheat. This courtesy the admiral returned by inviting them on board, where, after the wine had begun to work its effects, and they discovered he was not a Spaniard, they talked with great freedom; complained of the insolence, cruelty, and avarice, of that nation; telling him, that if he crossed the country to Aranco, the natives would grant that to his obliging manner which they had ever denied to the arrogant Spaniards, and put him in possession of the rich mines of their country. However, their intelligence was neither explicit, or well enough understood, for the admiral to venture with so weak a force upon an enterprize so dangerous. He knew he should have to encounter a numerous, warlike, and resolute nation, whose prejudices it would be difficult to remove, especially as their language was spoke by no one on board. He therefore prosecuted his voyage, leaving this place on the 18th, and sailing about 10 leagues that day north and north-east, he anchored under Conception Island. The 30th he came into the bay of Quinero, in 33° 6' south; and the day following a party of sixty men, well armed, marched eight miles up the country. They met with large herds of

^e PURCHAS, ubi sup. Etiam HARRIS, T. i. p. 25.

^h LED. Nav. Hist. p. 230. PURCHAS, p. 60. cattle

- a cattle, with horses, dogs, hares, rabbits, partridges, and other fowl and game. After marching till they were tired, without meeting with any extraordinary adventure, they retired in good order to their ships, without being molested by the Spaniards, who, on receiving intelligence of their arrival, assembled in a body of 200 horse, but without venturing to attack them. Next day, however, while some of the English were busied in filling their casks with water, the Spaniards, seizing the opportunity, attacked them with a large body of cavalry that came pouring down from the hills. Their superiority in number enabled them to kill two or three, and to make an equal number of prisoners; but the arrival of fifteen more seamen soon altered the fortune of the day, snatched the victory from the Spaniards, killed 24 upon the spot, and obliged the rest to seek their safety in a precipitate and shameful flight.
- b After this exertion of spirit, the English watered with security, scoured the country, and, after supplying themselves with every thing necessary, weighed anchor, steering north and north-west¹.

APRIL the 5th, they fell in with Moro Moreno, lying in $23^{\circ} 30'$ south latitude, under the tropic of Capricorn. An island with a passage into the bay at each end forms a fine harbour here. The admiral, landing with thirty men, was met by great numbers of Indians, bringing wood and water to the ship on their backs. They are a simple, ignorant people, living under the greatest awe and subjection to the Spaniards, who treat them with a savage barbarity. They conducted the admiral and his party to their huts, about two miles from the harbour. These habitations were composed only of a few rafters laid across, supported by forked poles stuck in the ground, and covered with leaves and boughs spread over them. The skins of wild beasts laid on the ground were their beds, and their food stinking raw flesh. It is usual, when any of them dies, to bury his effects with him, that is, his bow, arrows, and even his canoe, if he be worth one. Their canoes are neatly constructed, being formed of two skins resembling bladders, which are blown full at one end with quills. A couple of those being joined after their manner with thongs made of the hides, but more frequently the tendons and sinews, of wild beasts, and then put into water, puff and swell to such a degree, that nothing can be more tight, compact, and firm. In these boats they put to sea in all weather, loading them with great quantities of fish, part of which is paid by way of tribute to the Spaniards, and the remainder suffered to stink for their own use^m.

- c
- d HOISTING sail from hence, he arrived May the 3d in a bay, at the extremity of which are three small towns, Poracco, Chinca, and Pischa, the latter standing in $13^{\circ} 20'$ south latitude. Here a party landed, and took some provisions out of the houses, as wine, fowls, figs, and other things. A high sea prevented their putting to shore at the last towns, where they could be plentifully supplied. About this time, though we are not told whether it was in this bay, the admiral made prize of two rich ships laden with sugar, melasses, maize, Cordovan skins, Montego de Porco, Indian carts, marmalade hens, and packs of Pintadoes, &c. The richest would have yielded 20,000 l. at a proper market; but here neither were of any farther use than merely to supply the Squadron with what they most wanted. This done, they set fire to the ships, and steering their course for Paita, arrived in that road the 26th. The town lies
- e in five degrees four minutes south latitude, containing at that time about 200 houses. Here the admiral landed with sixty men, had a skirmish with the inhabitants, drove them out of the town into the mountains, seized all the effects they had carried with them; and afterwards, upon their attempting to rescue the town, intirely defeated them. Here the seamen found abundance of household furniture, some of it rich; store-houses filled with all kinds of merchandize; and twenty-five pounds weight of silver in pieces of eight. After having plundered it of what they most commodiously could carry off, they set fire to the town, which they burnt to ashes, and with it to the value of 6000 l. in merchant goods, and then departed for *Puna*ⁿ.

- f ON their arrival at Puna, they found in the harbour a ship of 250 tons burthen, riding at anchor, which they sunk, and went on shore. The chief of this island was by birth an Indian, but married to a Spaniard, whose religion he embraced, obliging his subjects to follow his example. He had by the sea-side an elegant and well-contrived palace, with fine gardens extending along the coast, which made a grand appearance towards the water. All the inhabitants were kept in perpetual drudgery, making cables, which is one of the best commodities of the island; yet does it abound with every necessary of life, which we shall enumerate under the article of South America. In the gardens of the casique, or chief, was found plenty of the most delicate and luxurious fruits, in the utmost perfection. May the 25th, the admiral sailed to a small neighbouring island, into which the casique had conveyed all his valuable moveables. This island the seamen plundered of what they thought proper, burnt
- g the church, after having robbed it of its bells and ornaments. They were soon attacked by a

The island of Puna plundered and destroyed.

¹ PURCHAS, B. ii. T. i. p. 60.

LED. NAV. HIST. p. 231. HACKLUYT, p. 806.

^m HARRIS, T. i. l. c. 1.

ⁿ PURCHAS, B. ii. T. i. p. 60.

party of 100 Spaniards, whom, after a sharp engagement, they defeated, with the loss of 12 English killed and taken, but of 46 Spaniards left dead on the field. Next day the admiral, landing with 70 men, was a second time attacked by 100 Spaniards, armed with muskets and swords, and 200 Indians with bows and arrows, the usual weapons of the country. A fierce conflict ensued, which terminated in the entire defeat of the enemy, the spoiling of their fields and orchards, the burning of four ships on the stocks, the plundering, sacking and total destruction, of the town, which contained between 2 and 300 houses; an unnecessary and wanton act of severity, which has ever been the ruin of all our expeditions. The best settled island on all this coast, and perhaps the most pleasant in the Spanish plantations, was totally effaced, and reduced to rubbish, only to gratify the humour of the seamen, without drawing a single advantage from the miserable condition in which they left the industrious natives ^a.

WEIGHING from hence, the squadron watered at Rio Dolce, and, on the 12th, passed the line, keeping a northerly course for the remainder of the month. On July the 1st they had sight of Nueva Espana, being under lat. 10° north, and four leagues distant from the continent. On the 9th he took a ship of 120 tons, the most valuable prize he had yet made, in which was one Michael Sancius, a Marseillian, and good seaman, whom the admiral appointed his pilot. This man gave the first hint of the Anna Maria, which the admiral afterwards took. The 26th the admiral came to an anchor in the river Copalita, after having taken a bark going to alarm the country. The same night he rowed in the pinnace with 30 men to Agatulio, which he burnt, together with the custom-house. The latter they plundered of 600 bags of anise, each bag worth 40 crowns; 400 bags of cocoas, which the natives use both for meat and money, every bag valued at 10 crowns (B). Harris says, that the town he destroyed was in 15° 40' N. lat. and that he rowed back the same night to Agatulio; but he does not oblige us with its name. August the 24th, with a party of men, he went into the haven of Natividad, in the latitude of 19 degrees, where the Marseillian pilot acquainted him he should meet with a prize; but she was sailed before his arrival twelve leagues further, to fish for pearls. Here he burnt the town, took a mulatto, sent to give notice all over the coast of Nueva Galicia of the arrival of the English; destroyed two ships, of 200 tons each, upon the stocks; after which exploit he returned to his ships. The 26th he came into the bay of St. Yago, where he met with fresh water, fish, and a quantity of pearls. Soon after putting into the bay of Malacca, he set out from thence with a party of 30 men, demolished an Indian town, consisting of 30 houses, and then retreated to the fleet. ^b

ON the 8th of September he came into the road of Chacalla, and next day defeated a party of 40 men with Sancius as guide, who returned with plantains, oranges, and lemons, after having travelled two leagues through a woody, mountainous country, without meeting with any other habitations than those of a few poor Spaniards, Portuguese, and Indians. Two of the former they carried off, the Spaniard being a carpenter. On the 12th he came to the island of St. Andrew, where he met with great store of fowls, seals, and a kind of lizard called Iquano, which proved excellent food. Hence he went to the road of Massatlan, under the tropic of Cancer. There is a large river running into the bay, which abounds with a variety of fresh-water fish. On the coast they found some good fruit. In a little island two leagues distant they found some excellent spring water, upon digging about two feet in the sand, although it afforded not the least prospect of a relief so seasonable. The 14th of October he fell in with Cape Lucar, on the west side of California. Within this is a large and commodious bay, called by the Spaniards Aquada Segura. Here he watered, and remained till the 4th of November, being detained by a westerly wind, and desirous of watching the Acapulco ship. This day, as he was beating up and down off the headland of California, one of his men from the tops descried a sail; which being signified to the crews of both ships, all things were joyfully prepared for action. They bore up with the ship, which they found to be the St. Ann, of which Sancius had given intelligence, of 700 tons burthen. He immediately ran along-side, and some of the men boarded her; but were so warmly received, and hotly pressed, that they retreated with the loss of four men. Candish, unwilling to lose such a prize for one rebuff, renewed the attack with redoubled vigour, first pouring in his great and small shot till he cleared the deck, and then intending to board her; but a lucky shot between wind and water rendered this unnecessary. The enemy was forced either to sink or surrender; the latter of ^c

Takes the St. Ann, a rich Acapulco ship.

• Hist. des Navig. aux Terres Austr. tom. i. art. 16. p. 227.

(B) These descriptions are proofs of the inquisitive and curious disposition of Cavendish, as well as of his sincerity. The cocoas are like almonds, but less pleasant to the taste; they afford both meat and drink, at the same time that they pass for money in trade, 150 being equal in value to a rial of plate (2). Every-body knows that from them chocolate is made.

(2) Purchas, p. 61. Hackluyt, tom. iii. p. 806.

a which being their choice, a white flag was hoisted, and the Spanish colours struck. This prize rewarded all the toil of Candish, having found in her 122,000 pezoës of gold, an immense quantity of rich silks, sattins, damasks, musk, with various kinds of other valuable merchandize, and all manner of provisions, as acceptable to the English at that time as any part of the cargo. He put the Spaniards to the number of 150 on shore, chusing a fruitful spot for them to live in, and supplying them plentifully with wine and provisions, the sails of the ship to build huts with, and every thing else in his power to compensate the necessity he was under of taking away their ship.

After this glorious acquisition of honour and wealth, the ungrateful business of distribution involved the admiral in difficulties from which nothing but his generosity and contempt of money could extricate him. Forgetful of the compact entered upon at their first setting out, quarrels and contentions, even to mutiny, arose in both ships, especially on board the Content. All, however, was compromised and settled by the candour and liberality of Candish, who made up all deficiencies out of his own proportion. Of the Spanish crew he retained two Japanese boys, a Portuguese who had been in China and Japan, and a Spanish pilot, perfectly skilled in all the parts between Acapulco and Nueva Espanna, thinking they might prove useful in his voyage. After giving a sum of money to the Spanish captain, arms and ammunition to defend himself against the Indians, he set fire to the galleon, destroying above 500 tons of rich merchandize with her, which he was unable to carry off. This great business ended, he determined to steer for England. Soon after he weighed from Puerto Seguro he had the misc fortune to lose the Content, and, in her, the vice-admiral, who had staid behind in port after the Desire was under sail. He every hour expected she would again join him; he lay by, slackened sail, and took every precaution to meet with her, but all to no purpose^p. In 45 days he ran from Puerto Seguro to the Ladrones, a stretch of 1800 leagues. On January the 3d he had sight of the island of Guam. Here he was met by 60 canoes filled with savages, and loaded with cocoas, plantains, potatoes, and fresh fish, which they bartered for bits of old iron, and other things of equal value. After the traffick was ended, and the goods delivered on both sides, they crouded so close to the ship, that two or three canoes were broke in pieces, though none of the crews were drowned. They still continued round the ship; nor would they part company till the admiral ordered the harquebusses to be discharged, being apprehensive of their d having some design upon the ship. Notwithstanding they were large fat men, so expert and active were they in diving, that the journalist questions whether any of them were hurt by the shot. It was amazing to see with what agility they leaped into the water, and returned to their canoes as soon as they apprehended the danger was over. Their canoes were neatly made, considering they were not wrought with iron tools. They were seven or eight yards in length, and half a yard broad, their heads and sterns shaped in the same fashion. The star-board side was made of rafts and reeds; their masts of bamboo or cane, and their sails of sedge, under which they fly either before or against the wind with incredible velocity^q.

He loses the Content, his consort.

The 14th he got sight of the Cape de Spiritu Santo, or headland of the Philippines, distant from Guam 110 leagues. The same day he entered the streights between the islands Luan and Cambaia. The next day he anchored in a bay in the island of Capul, where a canoe, with one of the casiques, or chiefs, rowed along-side of the ship. The English passing themselves for Spaniards, traded with the natives for roots and fruits. They were all naked, and the casique's skin painted over with some monstrous figures. He came on board the ship, and dispatched one of his attendants to invite his six colleagues to visit the admiral. They soon arrived, and with them a large train of hogs, fowls, and a whole market of cocoas and potatoes. Here the Spanish pilot, taken out of the St. Ann, was hanged, for a plot he had contrived to betray the ship. As Candish lay off this island for nine days, he was furnished with many opportunities of making his remarks upon the manners and customs of the natives. Their religion is the grossest idolatry and paganism. They go naked, except a girdle with a small apron round the waist; and are of a tawny olive complexion. The rite of circumcision is almost universal among them; besides which the males undergo another operation, hardly practised any-where else but in Pegu. They perforate the glands of the penis with a slip of tin split in the lower end, and rivetted, which they take out occasionally. This custom had its rise, 'tis said, from an order of the magistrates, in order to prevent the frequency of a certain unnatural crime, to which the men of the island were greatly addicted. Just before his departure the admiral summoned all the casiques, with 100 of the chief inhabitants, to appear before him. He discovered himself, told them that both he and his men were English, and implacable enemies to the Spaniards, gave them in money the full value of the tribute they had paid to him as a Spanish admiral; and no less surprised them by the discovery than with his generous treatment. They admired his conduct and liberality so much, that they offered to assist him with

His intercourse with the casiques of Capul.

^p PURCHAS, tom. i. l. ii. p. 67.

^q Histoire des Navigat. ibid. PURCHAS, ibid.

with all their forces, not only against Spain, but against all the powers on earth ; after which a they took their leave, and the admiral weighed anchor ^b.

On June the 24th, he ran along the coast of Manila, steering between that island and the island of Masbat. They observed that the Spaniards kept a strict watch, by great fires on the hills, and the discharge of minute-guns for the whole night. The 29th, they passed the streights between Panama and Negro island. On the former of these the admiral landed a Spanish prisoner, with a message to the captain of a ship lying in the road. It imported a piece of advice to the said captain, to provide a sufficient quantity of gold against the admiral returned that way ; and that he would now have weighed his Spanish gold in English scales, but for want of a pin-nace large enough to land his men. After this bravado, he steered for the island Batochino, in one degree north latitude, continuing his course to Java Major, where he staid some days. b Here he wooded and watered, the natives shewing him great civilities. They came with ten canoes deep-loaded with hogs, fowls, eggs, sugar, cocoas, and other kinds of fruit. Some Portuguese who came on board to inquire after their king Don Antonio, gave the admiral a very explicit and distinct account of the manners, customs, laws, and government of the natives. Their king, at this time, was a man much respected, and who had acquired a dominion more absolute than any of his predecessors. His power extended so far over the liberty and property of his subjects, that the most common bargain could not be concluded without leave from him, or some of his officers. He had an hundred wives, and his son fifty. The fate of these, after the king dies, is very particular and extraordinary. Five days after the royal body is burnt, and the ashes laid in an urn, the dowagers assemble in an appointed place. The lady most c favoured by the king in his life-time throws a ball, the spot where it rests being the place of the future tragedy. The women one by one go to the spot with drawn daggers in their hands, with which they stab themselves mortally, besmearing their bodies with the blood till they drop down dead ; a barbarous sacrifice peculiar to this country, and as savage as extraordinary. The men in general are a bold, hardy, resolute people, that sliak at no orders of their king, of whatever nature. Should he order them to plunge a dagger in their breasts, leap off a precipice, or perform any other the most desperate and unnatural act, they obey without reluctance, glorying in the sacrifice they make to duty and loyalty ^c.

An extraordinary custom which he observed among the natives of Java.

HAVING gratified his curiosity with respect to Java, the admiral steered directly for the Cape of Good Hope, spending the remainder of the month of March in traversing the vast d ocean between Java and the continent of Africa, and making observations on the appearances of the stars, the weather, the winds, and tides, the bearing and position of lands, and other matters equally entertaining and useful. On the 16th of May he arrived at the Cape of Good Hope ; the 9th of June he made St. Helena ; the 20th of August he had sight of the island of Flores, and arrived safe at Plymouth, after a terrible storm, on the 9th of September. We are told, that he made his entry into Plymouth harbour under silken sails, displaying his good fortune in the most magnificent and ostentatious manner. 'Tis probable that the loss of sails he sustained in the late storm obliged him to make use of a silk grass, a beautiful and shining manufacture, which the common people might mistake for genuine silk. Be that as it will, his vanity, if it was so, he supported fairly at his own expence. None of those who embarked e with him had the least cause of complaint ; on the contrary, the just, nay generous, distribution of the prizes he had made, gained him little less reputation than the fame of his voyage and the circumnavigation of the globe.

NOR was his gratitude inferior to his other qualities ; for, on the day of his arrival, he wrote to his patron the lord Hunsdon, the queen's near relation, in terms so warm and obliging, in a style so uncommon and concise, and in a manner so expressive of his character, that we doubt not but the letter will be thought deserving of the reader's perusal.

“ Right honourable,

“ AS your favours heretofore have been most greatly extended towards me, so I humbly f “ desire the continuance thereof ; and though there be no means in me to deserve the “ same, yet the uttermost of my services shall not be wanting, whensoever it shall please your “ honour to dispose thereof. I am humbly to request your honour to make known to her “ majesty the desire I have had to do her majesty service in the performance of this voyage ;
 “ and as it hath pleased God to give her victory over a part of her enemies, so I trust ere long
 “ to see her overthrow them all : for the places of their wealth, whereby they have maintained “ and made their wars, are now perfectly discovered ; and if it please her majesty, with a very “ small power, she may take the spoil of them. It hath pleased the Almighty to permit me “ to circumnavigate the whole globe of the world, entering in at the Streights of Magellan,

^b HARRIS, l. i. c. i. tom. i.

^c Hist. des Navigat ubi sup.

“ and

- a " and returning by the Cape of Buena Esperanza; in which voyage I have either discovered or " brought certain intelligence of all the rich places of the world that ever were known or dis" covered by any Christian. I navigated along the coasts of Chili, Peru, and Nueva España, " where I made great spoils, sunk, burnt, and destroyed 19 sail of ships, small and great. All the " villages and towns that I ever landed at, I burnt and spoiled; and had I not been disco" vered upon the coast, I had taken great quantity of treasure. The matter of most profit to " me was a great ship of the king's, which I took at California; which ship came from the " Philippines, being one of the richest for merchandize that ever passed through those seas,
 " as the king's register, accounts, and merchants, did shew; for it did amount in value to—
 " in Mexico to be sold; which goods, for that my ships were not able to contain the least part b " of them, I was enforced to set on fire. From the Cape of California, being the uppermost
 " part of all Nueva España, I navigated to the islands of the Philippines, hard upon the coast " of China, of which country I have brought such intelligence as hath not been heard of in " these parts; the stateliness and riches of which country I fear to make report of, lest I should " not be credited. For if I had not known sufficiently the incomparable wealth of that " country, I should have been as incredulous thereof as others will be that have not had the " like experience. I sailed along the islands of the Moluccas, where, among some of the " heathen people, I was well-entreated, where our countrymen may trade as freely as the " Portuguese, if they will themselves. From thence I passed by the Cape of Buena Esperanza, " and found out by the way homeward the island of St. Helena, where the Portugals used to c " relieve themselves; and from that island God hath suffered me to return to England. All
 " which services, with myself, I humbly prostrate at her majesty's feet, desiring the Almighty " long to continue her reign among us; for, at this day, she is the most famous and victo" rious prince that liveth in the world. Thus humbly desiring pardon for my tediousness,
 " I leave your lordship to the tuition of the Almighty".

Plymouth, this 9th of September, 1578.

" Your honour's most humble

" to command,

" Thomas Cavendish."

- d SUCH was the harmony in these golden days between the sovereign and the subject. The one offered his all, and the other accepted no more than the absolute exigences of the state required.

- THIS voyage must by the curious be esteemed of great value, on account of the accurate search and nice description Cavendish has given of the Streights of Magellan. His exact account of the Philippines was, in those times, of great importance; but, above all, his map and descriptions of China, which were much the best then known, and till the Dutch had made some considerable progress in this trade. The best judges, therefore, of this and other nations have bestowed the highest praises upon this gentleman, who shewed through the whole voyage, the prudence and courage of a great officer, with the abilities and diligence of an able seaman.
 e The success of this expedition must considerably have enlarged his fortune; but we are nowhere told the amount. Hackluyt says it was sufficient to have purchased a fair earldom; a general expression from which no particular inference can be drawn. Whatever the sum was, certain it is, that his liberality and generous disposition rendered it necessary for him in a few years to meditate another expedition. He maintained, at a princely expence, all those persons whose experience could by any means improve his knowledge of maritime affairs; a public spirit greatly to be admired, and worthy of imitation, if not carried beyond the limits of prudence and œconomy, necessary to keep a man easy in himself, and lastingly useful to his country. Hence it would seem, that he looked upon his voyage round the world only as an introduction to future attempts. In this light, what to many appeared to be profusion and f extravagance, owing to a vain and ostentatious disposition, was really done by him with a view of laying the foundation of a more extensive fortune, in a way glorious to himself and useful to his country. By his will it appears that he died without debt, and possessed of very considerable effects, after all the expences he had been at, and the losses he sustained in his second attempt to pass into the South Seas.

*Reflections upon his voyage
 and character.*

THE ships fitted out for this voyage were the Leicester, Roebuck, Desire, Dainty, and Black Pinnace, all, as in the former expedition, equipped at his own expence. With this squadron he sailed from Plymouth on the 6th day of August, an. 1591, falling in with the coast of Brazil in November. Here he took the town of Santos, and burnt that of St. Vincent. From hence he continued his voyage to the Streights of Magellan, encountered by nothing but storms, disappointments, and misfortunes ; various accounts of which are given. The most copious detail ^a is by himself, addressed to Sir Thomas Gorges, sole executor of his last will. Here he attributes his miscarriage to the desertion and villainy of Davis ; he complains of dissensions, quarrels, and mutinies ; of the south-west winds and winter-storms, by which he was driven from shore to shore, with such snow and frost as he never before saw or felt. For these reasons he was obliged to return to the Brasil, where he sickened and died of grief. Thus ended the expedition and life of Sir Thomas Cavendish (for he was knighted after his return from his voyage round the world), which greatly affected maritime knowledge and the interest of seamen in general ; many of whom were turned abroad in the world, and obliged, for bread, to offer their services to foreigners. After what has been said, it would be unnecessary to sum up the character of this great man, which was chequered with noble virtues and splendid vices ; ^b whose faults, at the same time that they impaired his fortune, and impeached his prudence, raised his reputation, were useful to merit, to science, and to his country.

^d PURCHAS, tom. i. part ii. p. 70, 71.

^e Idem ibid.

His death.

S E C T. XI.

The voyage round the world of Oliver Van Noort ; the rise and intention of it ; his arrival at the Brasil after many previous misfortunes ; his distresses in the Straights of Magellan ; his entrance into the Pacific Ocean ; the success of his cruises on the coasts of Chili and Peru ; his arrival at the Ladrões, Philippines, and his sharp engagement with the Spaniards off Manila ; his arrival at Borneo, at the Cape of Good Hope, St. Helena, and lastly in Holland.

Oliver Van Noort's voyage round the world.

THE low condition to which the Hollanders were reduced by their long and vigorous ^c struggles for liberty with Philip II. of Spain, gave them the first notion of establishing a commerce with the East and West Indies. The late successes of the English against the Spanish plantations and shipping, their own repeated disappointments in search of a north-west passage, and probably the ambition of rivalling their neighbours in the fame of circumnavigating the globe, were the motives which occasioned this expedition of Van Noort. The design was originally set on foot by some eminent merchants in the Low Countries ; and the success, they were sensible, depended in a great measure on the choice of an able, vigilant, and brave general ; for by that appellation the Dutch distinguished in those days the commanders in chief, either by land or sea. No man more likely to answer their purposes could be thought of ^d than Oliver Van Noort, then in the flower of his age, of an established character, great maritime abilities, and a strong passion for glory. The scheme was accordingly communicated to him, and he embraced it with a readiness that gave happy omens of success. The necessary measures being concerted, and the terms settled, the adventurers proceeded to build two stout ships, and to appoint officers every way qualified for so important and hazardous a voyage. These vessels were called the Maurice and the Henry Frederick, which were to be attended by two yachts, the Concordia and the Hope ; the whole manned with 248 able-bodied seamen, well provided with arms, ammunition, naval stores, provisions, and every thing necessary to make the expedition secure, successful, and easy. All imaginable care was taken to put the officers in a condition to maintain their authority ; a precaution ever since attended to by the Dutch, ^e and the want of which has been fatal to the enterprizes of almost all other nations.

The wise precautions of the proprietors to establish the authority of the admiral, and prevent mutiny on board.

^f THE squadron being completely manned, and all things in readiness to enter upon their voyage, the proprietors presented a petition to the board of admiralty at Rotterdam ; upon which the parties concerned were summoned before the board, the regulations for their government read to them, and every man sworn to their strict observance. These rules had been drawn up by the company, revised and approved by the stadtholder, and afterwards perused by the admiralty. This circumstance deserves notice, as it shews the early attention paid by that wise republic to the commerce of her subjects, by putting a check upon those who might attempt to abuse their authority. The laws even of private traders became the laws of the state ; by receiving the public sanction they became of equal force with those of the country ; and they suffered the same penalties who were hardy enough to break through them. Mellish, the favourite and companion of Candish in all his voyages, who had offered his service to the Dutch East India company, then in its infancy, was appointed pilot to this voyage, and heartily engaged in the cause by a reward equal to his merit, and the nature of the service. On the 13th of September, an. 1598, the little squadron sailed out of Goree harbour, and pursued their voyage to Plymouth, where Mellish came on board. The 21st, Van Noort set out from Plymouth,

- a Plymouth, the wind blowing a fresh gale at north-east. Next day he observed that the shallop, with the men belonging to his vice-admiral, had been left behind. He was deliberating whether he should not set out for them, when he was hailed by an English privateer, who told him that they had wilfully run away, and his returning would be to little purpose, as they were probably concealed. This raised some doubts and jealousies on board concerning the capacity and vigilance of the vice-admiral, which were soon increased by his losing this shallop which he had in tow, with a man in her. Now his carelessness was loudly taxed by the seamen, who promised themselves but little success under an officer, who, at the first sitting out, had given such manifest proofs of supineness and indolence. Van Noort, however, by his authority restored the seamen to their former humour, and secretly enjoined the vice-admiral to be more, upon his guard; assuring him that vigilance was a chief quality in a commander. On the 4th of October, he met at sea with a small fleet of English, French, and Dutch, from whom he had advice of the terrible plague on the coast of Barbary, which had swept away above 250,000 people in a short space of time; a circumstance which determined him not to touch upon that shore. December the 4th, he made Cape Palma, in $3^{\circ} 30'$ north latitude, and, on the 10th, had sight of Prince's Island, lying in 1° north latitude. Having sent his boats before to make discoveries and soundings, he entered the bay with a flag of truce, and met a negro canoe, with the same pacific emblem. His demand for provisions was granted upon fair and amicable terms; but, while this point was adjusting, a party of the inhabitants sallied out of their ambuscade, and cut several of the Dutch in pieces. The brave English pilot captain Mellish was among the slain, whose loss Van Noort lamented as being irrecoverable. Not contented with this, the treacherous Portuguese pushed their villainous conquest to the utmost, drove the Dutch to their boats, killed and took a considerable number, among the former the admiral's brother, and were near making prisoners of all the rest. In revenge for this outrage, it was determined, in a council of war, to attack the fort; which experiment being tried, it was soon dropped, as too dangerous. However they destroyed all the sugar-works, took on board fresh water, and then set sail ^a.
- b On the 25th they arrived off Cape Gonsalvo, where they observed the sea and land breezes, but in a manner unusual in other countries. They were informed here of the misfortune of captain Verhagen, on the same island where they had lately suffered. On the 9th of January they arrived at Rio Janeiro, and after some further losses, owing to the treachery of the Portuguese, arrived at St. Sebastian, where they met with the comforts of a good harbour, fresh water, and plenty of provisions, but no fruits. On March the 14th, the vice-admiral and the Hope were parted from the fleet in a violent storm; but afterwards joined on the 17th. The scurvy appeared in the fleet, which, together with the approach of winter, made Van Noort desirous of putting in at St. Helena; but, missing that, he resolved to steer for Ascension, or some other island capable of supplying them with fresh provisions. It was his hard fate to be carried to a barren island, where nothing was found besides a few sea-fowl, which the men knocked down with clubs. Sailing from thence in hopes of meeting with Ascension island, he found himself by the first of June on the coast of Brasil. The Portuguese denying them the liberty of coming on shore, the admiral sailed for the island of Clara, lying in $21^{\circ} 15'$ S. lat. This small island, but a mile in compass, afforded nothing but herbs, and a species of four plumbs, which, in the space of fifteen days, cured all the scorbutic patients. After much bad weather, the admiral reached Port Desire, September the 20th. He furnished himself with abundance of fish and penguins, at an island three miles south of the harbour. Of the latter sort the seamen took 50,000 as large as geese, well stored with eggs, which proved excellent food. They went up the river on October the 5th, on the banks of which they saw a kind of stags, several buffaloes and ostriches. Some of the nests of those birds they met with contained 19 eggs. On the 20th, the admiral went on shore, to examine the country, leaving orders with those who guarded the boats not to stir a foot from them; which charge they disobeyed, and suffered for it. They had gone but a little way from the shore, when they fell into an ambuscade, in which three were killed, and one wounded. The savages were tall well-proportioned men, naked, and armed with bows and arrows. On the 24th, Van Noort made Cape Virgins, and had several struggles to enter the streights; in all of which he was frustrated, and beat back by tempests of snow, hail, wind, and rain. They lost their anchors, and broke their cables. Sicknes, and then contention, were superadded to their other calamities.
- c He is prevented by storms from entering the Streights of Magellan.
- d He is prevented by storms from entering the Streights of Magellan.
- e He is prevented by storms from entering the Streights of Magellan.
- f He is prevented by storms from entering the Streights of Magellan.

THINGS remaining for some time in this situation, it was fifteen months after their departure from Holland, before they could enter the Streights of Magellan. They observed the land to lie south-west from Cape Virgins, and the mouth of the streights to be about fourteen miles distance from it. They saw men upon two different islands lying near Cape Nassau. These were hardy enough to bid defiance to the Hollanders, brandishing and flourishing their weapons at them. The Dutch, notwithstanding this menace, landed and pursued the savages to a cave, where they put every man of them to death, after they had defended themselves to the last drop of their blood. The Dutch, entering the cave, found the wives and children of those brave unfortunate men in the darkest part of the recess, bewailing and lamenting their loss. Taking compassion on their sufferings, the Dutch left them unmolested, carrying off only four boys and two girls of their number. One of these boys having learned to speak Dutch, gave a description of the islanders, which we shall insert in its proper place.

^a See the Latin Journal translated in PURCHAS's Pilgrims, p. 71. tom. i. part ii. to which we refer the reader for the rest of the voyage, as to particulars.

On the 28th they steered towards the continent, entering the mouth of a pleasant river, the banks of which were well stored with wood, and beautified with numerous flocks of parrots green and grey. This they called Summer's Bay, on account of the pleasant prospect it afforded. Next day they bent their course to Port Famine, the land leading here so far to the south, that the island of Pantagons and Terra del Fuego seemed at a distance to meet. Not the least vestige could they discover of Sarmiento's city, except a heap of stones and rubbish, which shewed there had once been buildings. Sarmiento, when he laid the proposal of building a city before Philip, acquainted him, that the streights in this place were no more than a mile in breadth; whereas, according to Van Noort, they measure at least four miles, the hills on each side being lofty, deep, and covered the whole year with snow. In Port Famine they cut down large trees to make a boat, the bark of which they found of a hot pungent taste, biting the tongue like pepper. After this, doubling Cape Froward with some danger, they anchored at four miles distance, in a fine large bay. Here they met with sneeze-wort, and a plant which they affirmed occasioned a delirium for some time, and afterwards a coma, heaviness, and stupefaction, which could not be overcome but by long sleep. In this bay they met with Sebastian de Weert's ship, separated with another vessel from Verbagen's squadron, and driven hither out of the South Sea. De Weert had spent five months in the streights, having but 38 men left out of a crew of 110 able seamen.

He meets de Weert in the streights, and arrives in the South Sea.

VAN NOORT, on the first of January, directed his course to Maurice Bay, which, he took notice, extended eastward, receiving several rivers that pour into it from the surrounding mountains. This was the summer season in that climate, yet could they not touch the bottom at 10 fathoms sounding, so thick was the ice, which blocked up the mouths of the rivers with mountains of congealed snow, that seemed to have continued for years. After sustaining a variety of hardships from famine, extreme cold, and storms of hail and rain, to crown their misfortunes, they lost company of the vice-admiral, for whom they waited several days in vain. Van Noort, upon this, held on his course to the island of Mocha, in the latitude of 38 degrees south. Here the seamen bartered knives, hatchets, and toys, for sheep, fowls, maize, bachelas, &c. They visited the town, which consisted of 50 houses thatched with straw, in which they were entertained by the natives with a liquor made from maize steeped in water, which they called Cici. Van Noort informs us, that polygamy is practised here in such a manner, that the man who has the happiness to have a large family of daughters, is sure to make a fortune by the sale of them to husbands. If a man commits murder, the kindred of the slain are his judges and executioners. They have no magistrates of justice, that being entirely left to the sufferers; yet is it no uncommon thing for a criminal to buy off his punishment by a bribe of Cici. Their clothes are made of the wool of a large species of sheep, which they likewise use as beasts of burden.

At St. Mary's Island, distant about 18 miles from the former, the admiral met with a Spanish ship laden with meal and lead for Aranco and Conception. To her he gave chase, and had the good fortune to take her, which proved a seasonable relief to the crew. By the pilot of this ship he was acquainted, that the south winds would prevent his getting back to St. Mary's Island, and that at Arica lay two Spanish men of war. This determined him to steer for Val Paraiso, by which he lost all hopes of again joining the vice-admiral. Val Paraiso stands upon the sea, in 33° south latitude, and distant from St. Jago about 18 miles, the latter lying up the country. They took two ships, and killed some Indians in a skirmish in the bay. Here they received letters from the captain of the Flying Hart, a ship belonging to Verbagen's squadron, separated from him by a storm, and led into the hands of the Spaniards, by a mistake in the common maps, which placed St. Mary's Island as high as 38°, though in fact it lies in 37° 15' south latitude. Hence we see of what importance it is to lay down exactly the parallels of places. A party marched up to St. Jago, where they intercepted some letters which informed them of the wars between the Spaniards and the natives in Chili. The latter, revolting, sacked the town of Baldivia, putting great numbers of Spaniards to the sword, and carrying off troops of captives. They set fire to the houses and churches, and struck off the heads of the images, crying, Down go the gods of the Spaniards. They crammed their mouths with gold, bidding them satisfy themselves with that dust, for the sake of which their voraries had committed such barbarities, cruelties, and massacres, amongst them. After this, a this, laying siege to the city Imperiole, they almost starved the garrison to death; the whole party of Indians, that performed such exploits, amounting to no more than 5000 foot and 3000 horse. But such is their valour, and hatred to the Spaniards, that no danger could dismay them, no difficulties overcome them. To such a pitch of fury do they carry their resentment, that they tear open the bowels of all the Spaniards they lay hands on, gnaw their hearts with their teeth, and imagine they give a higher relish to their liquor by drinking it out of a Spanish skull. But we shall have occasion to speak of this warlike nation elsewhere.

His observations and incursions upon the Spanish colonies.

APRIL the 1st the admiral entered the bay La Guasco, which he left on the 7th, arriving on the 11th at Moro Goreb, ten miles from Moro Moreno. All this tract to Arica, and up to St. Francis Hill, is subject to constant south winds, although in the adjoining sea they are exceedingly variable. The 20th the air was obscured and quite darkened with an Arcual, or cloud of dust, raised so thick, that a man cannot see before him at the smallest distance. They are frequent in these parts, being carried off from the adjacent shores by the violent gusts of wind. As the admiral approached the famous city of Lima, he first got intelligence of the value of the prize of which he was robbed by the malice of the Spaniards. Joseph a prodigious prize. Nicholas Peterson, who had been made captain of the prize, told Van Noort that he was certainly informed by a negro, that the ship had on board three tons of gold dust; a circumstance the more to be credited, as the negro was employed in shipping it. Whereupon the Spanish pilot was closely examined; but he refused to make any confession, till another negro asserted it. Upon this he owned, that they had on board 52 chests, each containing four arbes of gold; besides 500 bars of the same metal, weighing from 8 to 10 lb. each; all which, with the private adventures of the ship's crew, the captain ordered to be thrown overboard, to prevent its falling into the hands of the Dutch. The whole cargo of gold weighed 10,200 pounds weight, valued from its fineness at 2,000,000 of pieces of eight. This they owned was brought from St. Mary's Island, where gold mines had been discovered about three years before, defended at this time by no more than three or four Spaniards and about 200 Indians. The admiral ordered the strictest search to be made through every part of the ship, and all the crew to be closely examined; but all he found was a pound of gold-dust in the pilot's breeches. He bore his disappointment with fortitude, determining, if an occasion offered, to repair it, as far as caution and courage could be of use.

d SEPTEMBER the 5th he had sight of the Ladrones, putting in on the 16th at Guana, where he supplied himself with fresh fish and fruits of all kinds. Frequently 200 canoes would surround the ship, crying out, Hiero, Hiero, Iron, Iron, the men overturning their canoes, and all with eagerness to snatch this much valued commodity. The 17th Van Noort sailed for the Philippines. On the 20th he met with ice in the latitude of 3° north; a phenomenon that greatly surprised him. In October he came to Bogla Bay, where, pretending to be a Spaniard, he was plentifully supplied with every necessary; but did not follow the example of the generous Candish, in throwing off the disguise, and paying liberally for whatever he had taken. However, he was soon detected, upon which he steered for the Streights of Manila, where he was overtaken by a storm, which carried away his masts, and greatly damaged the ship. When they approached land, some of the men went on shore, and, eating heartily of palmetoes, were seized with the bloody flux. On the evening of the 24th he passed the island of Capul, near which he found whirlpools, bottomless as far as he was able to discover. November the 7th the master of a China junk laden with provisions for Manila acquainted him, that there were two large ships which came yearly from New Spain, and also a Dutch ship bought at Malacca; that the town was walled, and the harbour defended by two forts: that this port drove a prodigious trade with China, no less than 400 ships coming yearly with silks, and other rich merchandizes, from Chincao; adding, that two ships were every day expected from Japan, laden with iron and provisions.

On the 15th the Dutch took two barks loaded with fowls and hogs, the tribute paid by Van Noort the Indians to the Spaniards. Passing the streights between the islands Bankingle and Mindore, takes several the admiral anchored in a bay on the opposite island of Luffen, in 15 degrees north latitude, small prizes. waiting here for the Japanese ships. December the first he took one of them, of 50 tons burthen, and a very peculiar construction, besides that the sails were made of reeds, the anchors of wood, and the cables and ropes of straw. The 9th he took two barks, one laden with cocoa-wine and aqua vitæ, the other with rice and fowls. On the 14th he met with the Spanish ships returning from Manila home, when immediately a fierce engagement commenced. The battle having continued for some hours, the Dutch, overpowered with force His brave action with the Manila ships. and numbers, were reduced to great distress, the admiral being once boarded, and very nearly taken. Van Noort, seeing that, without a desperate push, all would infallibly be lost, roused the courage of his men by despair, threatening, that, if they did not speedily clear the decks of the Spaniards, he would blow the ship up. Upon this the Dutchmen, hurried on by fear and rage, fought with incredible fury, cut down all before them, cleared their own ship, boarded the Spanish admiral, and sunk the ship in their heat of blood. This brave action cost them them no more than five lives, but they had 25 wounded. As to the enemy, above 300 were a either killed or drowned, and near 100 wounded ^a.

AFTER this exploit, which gained Van Noort immortal honour, he sailed for Borneo. On his arrival he sent a messenger to the king, requesting leave to trade with the natives ; but his majesty, suspecting him to be a Spaniard, refused that permission upon any terms, till his officers had thoroughly examined the ship, and fully satisfied themselves that she was Dutch. After this, Van Noort traded with the Palanees for pepper to a considerable amount.

In the mean while the Borneans formed a plot to seize the ship ; to effect which, they surrounded her with 100 praws, pretending they brought presents from the king ; but the Dutch, suspecting some treachery, gave them notice to keep at a distance, or they should be constrained to fire their cannon upon them ; the very mention of which sufficiently terrified the Borneans, and made them drop their design. On the 4th of January, in the night, four Borneans were discovered in attempting to cut the ship's cables, and to bring her aground. They were immediately so closely plied with grape-shot, that, quitting their design, they left their praw a prize to the Dutch, who took her in the room of the shallop they had lost. Next day the admiral set sail, and, in his way, met with a Japanese junk bound to Manila. By her he received advice of a large Dutch ship forced by tempest to Japan, so distressed by famine and disease, that, of all her crew, only 14 remained. She first put in at Bongo, from whence, by the king's order, she was removed to Atonzi, where the men enjoyed a safe harbour, liberty to trade, and leave to build a new ship ; after which they were permitted to go where they pleased. From this account Van Noort doubted not but it was Verbagen's ship, or at least one belonging to his squadron. Dismissing the junk, he crossed the line a third time, sailing with the utmost hazard and dread for want of a pilot, or accurate charts to guide him through shoals, islands, and rocks innumerable. Providence, however, soon delivered him out of his distress, by sending in his way a junk of Jor, out of which he took a pilot perfectly acquainted with these seas. Nothing could be more welcome or seasonable than this unexpected accident ; for such was his condition, that he now had but one anchor left, and the cable almost worn out. He was an intire stranger to the navigation of these seas, and so was every man on board ; nor, from past experience, could they have any confidence in the too general and erroneous charts hitherto published. Now he sailed with courage, and a joy equal to the greatest success and most prosperous voyage. On the 28th he came to Jortan, upon the island of Java, where he received advice of some Dutch ships lying at Bantam. Thither he proposed sailing ; and, on his way, saw a Portuguese ship of 600 tons stuck upon the shoals, and in the utmost danger of foundering. He was told by the crew, that she was bound to Amboyna ; but Van Noort, suspecting she had been sent out in quest of him, left her, with a true Dutch brutality, to perish with 700 men on board, without offering the smallest relief. After this, he steered for the Cape of Good Hope, arriving at St. Helena without any remarkable occurrence. In his way from thence to New Holland he met six Dutch ships bound to the East Indies, James Heemskirk admiral. By him he was told, that he had engaged thirteen Spanish ships off the Salt Pits, in which he lost his vice-admiral and pinnace. Steering away for Holland, he met with some Emdden merchantmen, with whom he exchanged rice and pepper for beef and bread ; after which he arrived at Rotterdam on the 26th of August, after a perilous voyage of near three years. d

He arrives in Holland.

Reflections on the voyage.

His conduct was greatly approved by the proprietors, although they reaped no great advantage from the voyage. It was rather looked upon as an affair of national benefit, and of future more than present advantage. The Dutch now reaped not only the benefit of some new lights thrown upon the navigation of the South Seas ; but likewise shared with the Portuguese and English the glory of having surrounded the globe, a circumstance that highly delighted them. e

ONE thing very remarkable occurs in this voyage performed by Van Noort ; it is, the rigorous discipline maintained and felt not only by the inferior officers and seamen, but by the very highest in authority. Even the vice-admiral experienced the weight of that power necessarily lodged in the hands of the general ; he was tried with much solemnity and caution ; proceeded against for breach of the articles established and sworn to before the board of admiralty ; had full time allowed him for his defence ; and, after a fair and impartial hearing, was condemned to be deserted in the Streights of Magellan, with a slender pittance of provisions, where he probably fell a prey to hunger, or the furious rage of the savages against all foreigners. A circumstance omitted in the journal of the voyage, but mentioned by other historians, particularly De Weert's journal, inserted in that curious collection of Harleian voyages ^b. The dread of such punishments keeps within bounds, and to their duty, those whose errors are most fatal in such expeditions. From a deficiency of authority in the commander in chief, many great under- f

^a Histoire des Voyages aux Terres Austr. art. 21. p. 291. HARRIS, tom. i. l. i. c. 1. 452 ; also in Histoire des Voyages aux Terres Austr. tom. i. art. 21. p. 293.

^b Tom. vii. p.

- a takings have fallen, a competition between the officers being naturally attended with faction, discord, and mutiny, among the seamen. The gratification of private ends, of resentment and pride, is constantly preferred to the public good ; to the consequences of which we may well apply that observation of the Latin poet,

Quicquid delirant reges, plebuntur Achivi.

- THIS voyage of Van Noort's, although attended with no striking advantages, served to increase the ardour of the United Provinces, and particularly of the East India company, after farther discoveries in the South Seas, and a more complete intelligence of the passage of the famous Magellan. For this purpose a commission was granted to George Spilberg, or Spilbergen, a seaman of great experience, merit, and reputation. Six ships were appointed him, completely equipped, and the nomination of officers left in a great measure to his own discretion, which they imagined would prevent all jealousies and disputes on board. On the 8th of August 1614, this fleet sailed out of the Texel with a strong gale at south-east. Nothing remarkable, besides storms and tempests, occurred till his arrival in the height of the Cape de Verd islands, which he observed stood in $14^{\circ} 30'$, whereas in all preceding charts and maps they were laid down in 17° south latitude. By the 12th of October he fell in with the Brazil coast, having happily escaped the shoals of Abrolhos, lately fatal to the Portuguese. On the 20th, anchoring in the road of Ilas Grande, he erected tents on shore for the sick, keeping three distinct corps de garde for their security, as he was in perpetual apprehension of the Portuguese. Soon after he hoisted a white flag, as a signal for holding a council of war. Here it was resolved to send the shallops to water at a river two leagues distant from the fleet, with the Huntsman yacht to convoy them, the captain having strict orders to anchor so close to the shore, that the cannon could cover the men at work in filling the barrels. This order he neglected, the consequence of which was fatal, the Portuguese having cut off every soul that had been put into the shallops. They had two stout frigates concealed in a little harbour, inaccessible to strangers, formed by two high islands, which forced Spilbergen to set sail without attempting to revenge the insult.

- ON the 1st of January 1615, a conspiracy, formed on board the admiral's ship, to carry her off, was happily discovered. The ringleaders were hanged up at the yard-arm, and the rest put in irons, and distributed among the different ships. In case of separation, certain places were appointed for a rendezvous, and the necessary precautions taken for effecting a junction ; after which he steered directly for the streights, having taken a Portuguese bark in their way. Several jesuits were on board, who offered a ransom of plate, pictures, and some fair manuscripts of value ; but these being already the prize of the Hollanders, they refused parting with them but for an equal number of Dutch. On March the 7th Spilbergen's Squadron was in extreme danger from a violent storm, which came on under latitude $52^{\circ} 6'$ south. This produced a mutiny, which the admiral crushed in the bud, by throwing the most turbulent overboard, without inquiry or form of trial. The 28th he entered the streights, and was driven back by strong winds and tides ; upon which some of the crew cried out to winter in Port Desire, others being no less eager to hold their course for the Cape of Good Hope, a thing impossible in their circumstances. Spilbergen, without giving ear to either, re-entered the streights ; and, after passing through numberless dangers, and surmounting almost insuperable difficulties, arrived on the 6th of April in the Pacific Ocean, where he was welcomed by the most dreadful storm he had yet encountered. Soon after he had sight of Chili and La Mocha, at which island he did all he could to draw the inhabitants into a traffick with the seamen. The governor and his son dined on board the admiral, and seemed rejoiced to see so complete and strong an armament fitted out against the Spaniards. The natives of Chili were also glad to see so strong a body of soldiers, and, in token of their regard, exchanged sheep and fresh provisions for hatchets and coral. The remarks made by Spilbergen on the animals, and other produce of this country, tally so exactly with what we have related, that the reader will excuse our not repeating them. Putting into harbour, he narrowly escaped being cut off by an ambuscade laid for him by the Spaniards, who had invited him to dinner. They suffered, however, for their treachery, the party appointed to way-lay the Dutch being discovered and cut in pieces. After this, the Dutch, without mercy, set fire to their houses, plundered every thing, carried off 500 fowls, a great number of sheep, and other provisions equally useful to them. Here they received intelligence of three large ships, having 1000 men on board, sent in quest of the Dutch squadron, which was now spoiling and plundering their country. This determined Spilbergen to seek them in his turn, for which purpose he steered his course for Conception. Not finding the Spanish squadron here, he sailed for Val Paraiso, meeting in his way with a Spanish ship, which the crew burnt, and abandoned on his approach. From hence he went to Quintero, where he watered, then turning his course to Arica. Every-where, on his

Spilbergen
meets, engages, and destroys,
the royal
squadron.

his approaching the coast, he found the people alarmed, and prepared to receive him. Leaving Arica, he took a small vessel with some treasure on board; after which, on the 16th, a man from the tops descried a squadron of eight sail. This the captain of the prize told him was the royal squadron of Peru, come out in search of the Dutch fleet, against the advice and remonstrances of the council. Don Rodrigo de Mendoza, the viceroy's kinsman, was admiral, a vain-glorious, arrogant, and haughty man, who boasted, "that with two of his ships he would make England tremble; much more those Friesland, half-starved, weather-beaten, hens." So conceitedly full of his own power was this Thraso, that he imagined the Dutch would strike at the sight of so superior a fleet, and to the terror of his name, which, by the way, they never before heard of. His relation the viceroy, upon his remonstrances, had given him the liberty to put to sea, and to bring the Hollanders bound hand and foot into his presence, the admiral swearing he would never return till he had accomplished it, if perchance they were not all killed in battle. With a fleet completely equipped, armed with brass ordnance, and filled with seamen and mariners, he joyfully hoisted sail in quest of Spilbergen, and now met with him. As it was late in the evening, he deferred engaging, by the advice of his vice-admiral, till the next morning, when the light might prevent their making their escape, and render the victory more complete, conspicuous, and glorious. Notwithstanding Mendoza assented to this advice, yet so impatient was he to acquire honour, that about 10 o'clock the same night he made a signal to attack, and bore down with his own ship on the Dutch admiral, who gave him a reception very unlooked for. Spilbergen pressed upon him with so much courage, and poured in his shot so expertly and vigorously, that the Spaniard was soon discomfited, and would have struck, but for the intervention of his vice-admiral, who disengaged him from the Dutch vice-admiral, with whom he had been in close fight. After a short contest, in which Mendoza behaved with an intrepidity uncommon in a boaster, his whole fleet was intirely defeated and destroyed. Of the 460 men on board his own ship, not 50 remained alive, and these covered over with wounds. The other ships suffered proportionably; two of their smaller vessels were sunk with their crews, and as complete a victory obtained by Spilbergen as Mendoza had promised to the viceroy. On the side of the Dutch 30 men were slain, and above 50 wounded; but the glory resulting from this brave action made the survivors not repine at the loss.

IMMEDIATELY after the engagement Spilbergen sailed for the road of Cabo de Lima, imagining Mendoza had escaped out of the battle; but here he learnt, that the ship, and the few remaining hands on board, had sunk before day-light appeared. Passing by Peyto, the squadron was hotly plied by the heavy batteries on shore, a 36 pounder having nearly sunk the Huntsman yacht. An army of 4000 foot, and several squadrons of horse, were seen drawn up on the shore, commanded by the viceroy in person. Spilbergen was now cruising for the Manila fleet, being desirous of raising his fortune in some degree proportioned to the glory he had obtained by the late empty victory. Orders were issued to the captains of all the ships to take the utmost care to prevent a separation; a circumstance which had thrown them into great danger and perplexity in the late action. It was also concerted, that if a Spanish ship should strike, the captain and chief officers, without leaving their own ship, should order the enemy to come on board in their boats, to prevent the confusion which avarice had so lately occasioned, and which had almost been fatal in the late engagement. The 28th he arrived in the road of Guarme, 10 degrees beyond the line, a pleasant place and safe port, but deserted on their approach by the inhabitants. The 8th of April Spilbergen came before Paita, and landed 300 men, who, after skirmishing with the enemy, returned to the fleet, having found the town too strongly fortified for an attempt by so small a body of men. The ships were brought to bear upon the walls, which they battered for the whole day, the city being esteemed impregnable towards the sea. They remained in the road till the 21st, without effecting any thing. Then the fleet put to sea, and anchored two days after at Rio Tumba. After their departure from hence they were afflicted and tossed about with tempestuous weather till the 13th of the next month. The 20th of September Spilbergen got sight of the coast of Nueva Espanna. At length, having beat off the coast till the 12th of October, surrounded by a thousand dangers, and eternity every moment before their eyes, the storm continuing without intermission for several weeks, he entered the haven of Acapulco, within shot of the castle, hanging out a white flag. Two Spaniards came on board, and settled a cartel for prisoners, who were to be exchanged for fresh provisions. Soon after Melchior Hernando, the viceroy's nephew, made the Dutch admiral a visit, to gratify his curiosity with respect to the strength of that armament which had defeated the royal squadron of Peru. He was received with marks of great distinction, which he returned with florid and high-strained compliments to Spilbergen, upon his courage and conduct.

Spilbergen
meets with a storm.

- a He now determined to steer for Manila, which he did on the 18th, arriving there on the 9th of February. The Indians refused to trade with him, because they said the Dutch were enemies to the Spaniards. This, however, was a very cogent argument with others for transferring the whole trade into his hands. At Capul, where he arrived the 11th, the natives to a man freely traded with him, and even gave the Dutch the preference to the Spaniards. The Indians of this place wear long coats like shirts, are remarkable for the profound veneration in which they hold all the clergy, before whom they will prostrate themselves, and take it as the highest mark of honour to be permitted to kiss their hands. On the 19th, he dropt anchor on the coast of Luconia, the chief island of the Manilas, in which stands the city of Manila.
- b The 24th he passed the high and flaming mountain Allaca; two days after he saw the further end of the streight; and, on the 28th, anchored before the island Mirabelles. On March the 5th, he took several barks, which had been sent to collect the tribute paid to the Spaniards. Now it was that he received advice of a fleet of twelve sail, manned with 2000 Spaniards, besides Indians, Chinese, and Japanese, sent to the Moluccas to drive the Dutch out of those islands, and wrest the trade from them. This determined Spilbergen to set all his prisoners at liberty, and proceed with all expedition after the Spanish fleet; not doubting but he should soon meet with a reinforcement of Dutch, which would render him in a condition to cope with the enemy. It accordingly fell out as he expected; for, on his arrival at Malaya, he found twelve large ships, which, joined to his squadron, composed a very formidable armament. It was debated whether an attack should be made on Tidore; but it was only debated; for the high disputes among the officers prevented their coming to any resolution. Those discords pointed out the necessity there was for electing a commander in chief of the united fleets. Accordingly Laurence de Real was invested with this authority.
- c Soon after Spilbergen received the governor's commission and orders to sail with two ships to the island of Java and city of Bantam, with instructions to settle the trade on such terms and in the manner he should think proper. He arrived at Batavia on the 7th of September, where he found it necessary to carry his ships, and provide sheathing, which he did with the utmost caution, lest he should be surprised by Don Juan de Silva, who was expected to sail from Molucca upon a cruise against the Dutch. His apprehensions on this head were soon eased by certain advice he received, that Don Juan had died suddenly, not without suspicion of having been poisoned, just as he was on the point of departing; and that, in consequence of this accident, the Spanish fleet, which sickness had before greatly weakened, was now returned to the Manilas. Thus a Spanish armament, supported at a great expence for four years, dwindled away into nothing, without striking a single blow; a circumstance that greatly impaired the reputation of that people in the Indies.
- d While they were thus employed at Tacatra, the rapid increase of the Dutch trade through all the colonies was observed with great joy. In the short stay made here, no less than four ships loaded with spices, and four with valuable cargoes, arrived from the Moluccas, and from Holland. The ships from Europe brought a reinforcement of soldiers to the garrisons, and supplies of ammunition, and all kinds of warlike stores, which were much wanted. About this time arrived Schouten and Le Maire, of whose voyage we have given an account, and of Roggewin's arrival at Batavia, and the seizure of his ship. To add more weight to our assertions concerning the jealousy of the Dutch East India company, lest a traffick should be opened with the Southern Continent, we shall repeat the words of the author of Spilbergen's voyage. The reader will hence see with what diligence the company endeavoured to depreciate the merit of any new discoveries by that route, and even discredit the authenticity and reality of the pretensions some persons had made to such discoveries. Speaking of the arrival of Le Maire, "In the course of their long voyage," says the author of Spilbergen's expedition, "those people discovered no new countries, no new nations, with whom we might trade. They only pretended to have discovered a passage, different from that through which ships hitherto passed. But there was little appearance of this, since, by their own account, they had spent fifteen months and three days in their course from the streights to the island of Ternate, though they had fair winds all the way, and notwithstanding the advantage a single ship has over a fleet, where the best sailor must stay for the worst. These pretended makers of discoveries, who boasted of having found out a new streight, were very much surprised to hear that admiral Spilbergen had waited so long at Ternate, and arrived so much sooner than they, notwithstanding his fleet was composed of such large ships, and had been so much and so often retarded, had fought so many times, had been put back, stopped and trafficked in so many parts, and yet come out but scarce eight months before them, and spent only a year and seven months in all their expeditions to the time of their arrival at the Moluccas."

He arrives at the island of Capul.

The great Spanish armaments dwindle away without having effected any thing.

The endeavours the Dutch East India company used to discredit the discoveries of Le Maire.

^a PURCHAS'S Pilgrims, tom. i. l. ii. c. 6.

^b PURCHAS, ibid.

In this remark the reader will perceive a strange mixture of truth and falshood, of vanity, ^a prejudice, and injustice, founded partly on conceit, partly on selfish and narrow views. Great praise undoubtedly is due to admiral Spilbergen; and his voyage must be regarded as one of the most successful that ever had been performed through the South Seas by the Dutch, or any other nation; yet to what but jealousy can we ascribe his depreciating the labours of another, and calling in question a fact at that time so well attested, and since so thoroughly proved.

To proceed; Spilbergen, on the 14th of December, an. 1616, weighed anchor at Bantam, to proceed on his voyage to Holland, with two ships, the Amsterdam and Zealand. On January the first, 1617, the Amsterdam lost sight of her consort. March the 6th, he arrived at St. Helena, where he found the Zealand; both arriving in Holland, after a prosperous course, in the month of July. Their return was extremely grateful to the company, who loaded them ^b with praises, particularly Spilbergen, whose prudence equally redounded to the advantage of the company, his own honour, and the glory of his country. Multitudes of people flocked to see him and his ships; an extract of his voyage was immediately published; and, from the day of his return, the Dutch East India company may be said to date their first power, grandeur, and wealth. Reputation they acquired by the very act of surrounding the globe; and power and wealth were the necessary result of the conquest of the Moluccas; in which Spilbergen not only assisted but brought home the first intelligence.

Remarks on Spilbergen's
voyage.

ONE remark on this voyage we cannot avoid making. The defeat of the royal squadron of Peru by Spilbergen is the clearest proof of the great superiority the free spirit of a republic will ever maintain over the most refined politics of an arbitrary court. The king of Spain ^c was by no means ignorant of the importance of his colonies in America. He had their support, and the interest of commerce, really at heart; and yet we see in how short a time not only the English, but the States General, who, a little before, had been slaves to the Spanish monarchs, were able, on their own private accounts, and through the courage of their officers, to cope with all the naval power of this kingdom. Hence it appears, that, to raise a maritime strength in any country, nothing is so requisite as freedom, a wise and honest administration, and a confidence in the people, that they may enjoy in security what they have acquired with danger and labour. This encourages them to support disappointments, to exert their utmost strength and diligence in equipping armaments, and to persevere, with unshaken constancy, in the prosecution of what appears to be their interest, at the same time they are protected ^d as pursuing the interest of the public. Hence it appears, not only how soon a naval force is raised by these means, but how soon it declines, when freedom, liberty, and spirit begin to droop. Not many years before, the Dutch were so ignorant in navigation, that they were obliged to have recourse for skilful pilots to the English; but, twenty years after, they sent out powerful fleets, aiming not at plunder, but conquest, and defeating that maritime power which had acquired such reputation by the discovery of one of the Indies, and prodigious strength by the possession of both. "Reputation will vanish," says a judicious historian, "and power ^e must necessarily decline, when men grow wanton with wealth, and employ the blessings " and gifts of Providence for other purposes than they were designed." As the industry and virtue of the Portuguese and Spaniards began to slacken, by the abuse of rewards, which were now applied to the maintenance of an empty magnificence, an effeminate luxury, and a proud indolence; so the Dutch rose by their just estimation of merit, by their diligence, their frugality, and public spirit. The Spaniards prided themselves in being absolute masters of other nations; the Dutch struggled to be their own masters. The prodigious flux of wealth, and extent of dominion, ruined the one; the poverty, the narrow limits, and the oppression of the haughty Philip, roused up the others unto an exertion of their strength, and enabled them to perform actions superior to their natural abilities. Such reflections as these naturally arise from perusing the first accounts of a rising commerce; and happy are the people who pay a due attention to their importance. Corruption and luxury are equally fatal to all; and whenever we see them prevail in a maritime state, the foundation of whose power and grandeur is in ^f commerce, we may, without any extraordinary share of penetration, venture to foretel that her decline is approaching, and her total ruin and destruction not very remote.

S E C T. XIII.

The voyage of Jaques Le Hermite round the world, with the squadron commonly called the Nassau Fleet. His passage through the Straights of Le Maire; his attempts on Calao de Lima; and the other occurrences of the voyage.

a MOST of the maritime powers began now to be sensible, that the true method of distressing his Catholic Majesty was by plundering his ships and destroying his settlements in the South Seas. Sir Francis Drake, and other English officers, led the way; the Dutch followed with perhaps more success, as the advantages they gained were of a more lasting nature. To destroy the fortified towns, and lay the South Seas open to the incursions of privateers and small squadrons, it was necessary first to send stout ships and strong armaments, with authentic and proper commissions. In the year 1622, prince Maurice of Nassau was at the head of the admiralty in Holland, and the first spring of the administration. With his approbation, if not at his motion, a resolution was taken of sending a strong squadron into the South Seas, for the above purposes. This squadron it was intended should not pass by the Straights of Magellan, but by those of Le Maire, that it might the sooner be in a condition to commence hostilities against the Spaniards. The prince not only countenanced this project, but likewise assisted it, by a considerable sum of money out of his own private purse. A fleet of no less than eleven men of war, besides smaller vessels, was fitted out, and the necessary instructions for accomplishing it given to the admiralties of Holland, and to the East India company, who appointed certain commissioners to inspect and preside over this equipment^a.

The voyage of the Nassau fleet round the world, Jaques Le Hermite commander.

b THE necessary preparations were forwarded with such diligence and vigour, that, in the spring of the following year, the fleet was in readiness to put to sea. The chief officers were appointed, and the command of the whole given to Jaques Le Hermite, an experienced seaman, enured to the fatigues of long voyages, and accustomed to an extensive command, which for many years he executed with great reputation in the service of the India company. Hugo Scapenham was made vice-admiral, the sweetness of whose manners, and the integrity of whose life, were no less recommendations than his great naval abilities, to the trust reposed in him. The whole force of the fleet amounted to 1637 men, of which 600 were regulars, divided into five companies, and 294 pieces of cannon, brass and iron. It is necessary to observe, that the government of the United Provinces differed, at this period, from what it was before, or has been since. It was in fact rather a monarchy than a republic; the prince of Orange, then Stadtholder, having a true regular influence, weight, and authority. Under colour of necessity he assumed the supreme executive power; every thing passed through his hands, and the Stadtholder in reality held the reins of government, but in the name of the States. Most of the officers in this expedition were appointed by prince Maurice, who in this, as in every thing else, had in view the establishment of his own power, as well as the good of the public. Hence the reader will easily perceive the original source of the many misfortunes and miscarriages of this voyage. Sea-officers were made by court-favour; and a land-general, who pretended to no skill in maritime affairs, consequently could be no proper judge of the merits of the persons he appointed. These are the reflections of John De Witte, the most celebrated statesman, and the best political writer of his nation and age, without we except the learned Grotius.

The preparations for this voyage.

c To proceed; the Nassau fleet sailed from the Goeree, April the 9th, 1623. In the evening of the 30th, the Eagle sprung a leak, which obliged Le Hermite to put into the Isle of Wight for repairing her. May the first, the whole fleet, except the Hope, anchored at Portsmouth. The captain of this ship, out of mere caprice, must take a different course, which was almost attended with fatal consequences. He run her a-ground, and was with the utmost difficulty saved by the vigilance of the vice-admiral, who assisted him with the shallows of the whole fleet, eased the ship of her guns, and took every other effectual measure to save both ship and crew. On the 14th, the admiral gave the signal for sailing, by ordering a gun to be fired, which, by some unhappy accident in the charging, burst, blew up a part of both decks, demolished the cabin near it, and had almost communicated with the powder-room.

Some unlucky accidents at their first sailing.

f THE admiral gave orders that, in the day, the fleet should extend itself as far as possible, without losing sight, in hopes of intercepting the plate-fleet, each ship returning at night to the flag. It was also resolved in council to keep as close to the Spanish shore as possible, in ^a The remainder of this voyage is extracted from HARRIS's Collection, T. i. l. ii. p. 11. to which we refer the reader, without specifying every page.

He falls in with some corsairs, who give him intelligence of the Spanish fleet.

order to make prizes, from which the proper intelligence might be procured. On the 31st a they spoke with three Turkish corsairs, who acquainted them, that they had been chased off Cape St. Vincent by six Spanish men of war. Next day they fell in with two more corsairs, out of which they took several Dutchmen who had been made slaves, contrary to the treaty subsisting between the States General and the piratical states of Algiers and Tunis. On the 14th of June they gave chase to a fleet of ten sail, which proved to be Spanish, homeward-bound from Fernambuco, and laden with sugar. The admiral was acquainted by the captains of some of the prizes, that there were not less than thirty sail of Spanish men of war cruising in those seas; a circumstance that required the most cautious and prudent conduct in him. He therefore resolved to call a council of war, and to be determined by the sentiments of this assembly in what manner he should proceed. Here it was strongly debated, whether, their ships being deeply loaded, it would not be next to impossible for them to use their lower tiers of guns, without easing their ships of many things necessary to the success of the voyage? Hence it was concluded not to enter upon action with a fleet so superior, which would probably terminate in the destruction of the design they were upon, if not the squadron. This being the opinion of a majority, a resolution was taken to bear away to the road of Sassa, where there were several Dutch ships, on board of which they might put the goods taken in the prizes, to be transported to Holland. Here they met the Overyffel man of war, with some other Dutch ships. The captain of the Overyffel acquainted Le Hermite, that his crew had mutinied, and deprived him of the command; upon which Le Hermite ordered the ringleaders to be put in irons, tried, condemned, and hanged at the yard-arm; a necessary severity, to reduce the rest to obedience. Three others, who had been turbulent, though not authors of the conspiracy for running away with the ship, were ordered to be keel-hawled, and afterwards to serve on board without wages.

A mutiny punished on board one of the squadrons.

He arrives at Sierra Leona.

THE fleet anchored in the road of St. Vincent on the 5th of July, where the admiral determined to disarm the ships, and wait the proper season for doubling Cape Horn. The 25th he weighed from these islands, in order to prosecute his voyage. On the first of August they came within sight of the high coast of Sierra Leona, where the admiral put in to repair the leak in one of the squadron. Here the negroes insisted upon having made a present to them, before they would permit any of the seamen to go on shore. Accordingly two bars of iron, two pieces of cloth, and a few ribbons, were given them, with which they appeared to be highly satisfied. Next day they came on board to visit the admiral, to whom they presented an elephant's tooth and some fowls, for which they were amply rewarded. Among the visitors was the king's brother, dressed in a suit of striped cloth, made after the Dutch fashion, and scarlet slippers. He was attended by a captain of the guard, a man who seemed to set a high value upon his reputation. Some of the ship's crew found a species of nuts on shore, greatly resembling nutmegs. They were so delicious in the taste, that the men eat heartily of them; but were all taken ill soon after; and one dropt down dead, with his body covered over with livid spots. The rest escaped by proper medicines and care.

The admiral's ship is in great danger.

THE 25th of August the Maurice, a capital ship, had been almost lost through carelessness; for, after careening her, they forgot to shut the scupper-holes, by which she had eight feet water in the hold before it was perceived. September the 4th, the admiral, who was confined to his bed with sickness, ordered anchor to be weighed, and the fleet got under sail, steering to the island Annaboa; but a contrary wind and a storm arising, they were driven back, and almost with the loss of the admiral and vice-admiral, both of which struck upon a sand-bank. After the whole fleet had been alarmed, and put in confusion, they were both got off without any considerable hurt. The admiral, in a shallop, assisted in person the men employed at this work, in order to inspirit and encourage them by his presence and example. This, and a cold he contracted, brought on a relapse, which he never afterwards recovered. While the fleet was at anchor in the road of Cape Lobos, a circumstance fell out, which, on account of its singularity, deserves to be mentioned. A great number of seamen died on board the Maurice, and it was observed that they were taken ill immediately after the surgeon's medicines

The villainous design of a surgeon discovered.

were administered, with symptoms very suspicious. The matter being debated in council, and the facts clearly proved, the vice and the rear-admirals were directed to send for the surgeon, James Verger, and closely to sift and examine him. This they accordingly did, but with the utmost address, though to little purpose. All their exhortations and entreaties could extract nothing from him; upon which the torture was applied, by hoisting him up to a great height, with weights to his feet and hands, and then letting him fall suddenly down. All this he suffered not only with constancy, but with insolence and contempt, laughing at his judges for their vain endeavours to put him to pain. His insensibility induced a suspicion, that some charm or incantation he was master of prevented the effects of the torture. He was searched accordingly; and in a little bag, which hung round his neck, were found the skin and tongue of a serpent. Some days after this another examination was appointed; of which when the criminal

- a criminal had notice, by their coming to take him out of irons, he sprung out of the hands of the persons ordered to conduct him, and, though he was pinioned, plunged himself over the ship's side into the sea. A sailor, who was near him, leaped in after him, and endeavoured to save him; but the surgeon made such strong efforts that he had certainly drowned both, if another sailor had not had resolution and presence of mind enough to throw himself after them, and keep the surgeon's head above water, till all three were laid hold of by the men in the shallop. Perceiving, after this attempt, that he would be too strictly watched to find such another opportunity, he made the following horrible confession; viz. that he was a native of Louvaine, descended from Spanish parents, and a licentiate in physic and surgery; that he had wilfully destroyed seven men, because they had given him a great deal of trouble, without any emolument resulting to him from it; that he was resolved to attempt some extraordinary cures, and, if he succeeded, to demand, as a reward, an order from the admiral to dine at the captain's table; that, if this favour was denied him, he resolved to poison the admiral, the vice-admiral, and every officer he suspected would oppose his request; that he had determined to enter into a contract with the devil, and had, for that purpose, often invoked him, but without effect; that, since he had been in irons, he had often attempted to destroy himself, and, among other methods, had endeavoured to stifle himself with his pillow. There appeared strong reasons for suspecting him of other crimes, no less shocking and unnatural; he was therefore, by the unanimous consent of the council, condemned to death; and accordingly He is put to death. had his head struck off on the poop of his own ship; a death too mild, if there could have been a more complete punishment inflicted on a wretch that had revolted from every dictate of virtue, of reason, of conscience, and of the human heart.

- By the time the squadron arrived at the island of St. Thomas, the scurvy had so prevailed, that, despairing of having hands sufficient to work the ships to Annobon, the admiral appointed a day of fasting and solemn prayer, and the chaplain had instructions to compose a discourse suitable to the occasion, humbly imploring the divine favour towards those who were sick, the preservation of those who were yet in health, and the giving an happy issue to the endeavours of the officers in seeking a proper place for the refreshment and recovery of the crews. They then altered their course, steering westward, in order to meet with a south-east wind, when, on the 29th, to their great astonishment, they saw the island Annobon, at the distance of ten leagues, and at a time when they did not think it possible to fall in with it from the course they held. The 30th they anchored in the road of Annobon, and next day the vice-admiral and fiscal went on shore, where they were received with a flag of truce. The governor, Le Hermite arrives at the island Annobon. Don Antonio Nunez de Matos gave his consent that they should traffick and barter with the natives for whatever they wanted; take in water, gather what number of oranges they thought fit; and that they should place a guard at the watering place, for the security of their seamen; upon this single condition, that they behaved discreetly, without giving molestation or offence to the inhabitants. The Dutch had received fowls, hogs, oranges, &c. in exchange for salt; upon which it was resolved to make the governor a present worth 300 livres, with which he was by no means satisfied. Besides this, the seamen had given other causes of discontent, by The noble conduct of a Portuguese governor. insulting the negroes, and taking from them their fowls without paying for them, which, with some other grievances, so provoked the governor, that he was very near arresting the vice-admiral, and some other officers who were on shore. However, reflecting that they came in confidence of the promise he had given, he suffered them to retire, telling them withal to be cautious how they relied for the future on the word of an officer, for that it was then in his power to have carried them up to the mountains, from whence double the force of their whole fleet would not be able to rescue them. After this they parted, with mutual civilities. It must indeed be acknowledged, that the conduct of the Dutch officers was rash and imprudent, in putting themselves in the power of a Portuguese officer, from whom they had little to expect, and merely upon his bare promise. But, however they were to blame, we cannot enough f admire the generous behaviour of the governor, who, by no indignity or affront, could be prevailed on to break through the laws of honour and hospitality.

- AFTER leaving the island of Annobon, they saw a great number of sea-gulls, and a quantity of herbage floating on the water, whence it was conjectured they were not far distant from the Southern Continent. On the 16th the sea appeared as red as blood, which they afterwards found proceeded from an infinity of small shrimps floating on the surface. On the 28th they lost sight of their bark with eighteen men on board, which they never more beheld, although they were afterwards told that she had reached Holland, the men having endured all the extremities of thirst and hunger. On the first of February they made Cape de Pennace; but the admiral's instructions restraining him from touching on the coast of Brasil, north of Rio de la Plata, they did all in their power to discover that river, but soon found that the south-west winds had driven them too far eastward. At length, on February the 2d, they found themselves at the mouth of the streights, which they discovered accidentally, by means of a Spanish pilot on board; so little skilled in navigation were the best officers on board, in the g Mod. Hist. Vol. V. Z admiral's

The Dutch
fleet began their voyage at a wrong season of the year.

admiral's absence. Having gained the entrance of the streights, they saw two ships at anchor ^a in the bay, which they afterwards called Valentine's Bay. From Le Hermite's having spent nine months in his passage hither from Holland, the reader may be led to imagine that the voyage must be extremely tedious and dangerous, which it by no means is, if undertaken at a proper season of the year. It is obvious, that the Dutch fleet sailed too soon in the year, and thence crossed the line in the worst season: had they deferred this till the end of October, or beginning of November, they would then have had a physical certainty of meeting with the north wind between the tropics; a circumstance which would greatly facilitate the passage through the Streights of Le Maire.

The natives of the streights murder some Dutchmen who went on shore.

FEBRUARY the 6th, the fleet had sight of Cape Horn, which then bore from them three leagues north-north-east. They were on the 11th, in $58^{\circ} 30'$ south lat. the weather so exces- ^b sively rigorous, that the seamen, who were at short allowance, found it almost insupportable. On the 14th, a great variation was observed in the compass, which they were unable to adjust, as all the compasses in the fleet varied from each other; a phænomenon that greatly perplexed and surprised the most experienced seamen on board. This day the admiral called a council, to deliberate about the currents, and procure the opinion of all the pilots in the different ships. At the instant when the white flag was hoisting as a signal, Cape Horn was discovered about seven leagues to the west, whence it was obvious, that the currents had carried them strongly to the east; whereas they imagined they had set to the west, according to Le Maire's account. On the 16th, they were in the latitude of $56^{\circ} 10'$, Cape Horn lying then east. They likewise sailed in sight of two islands situated about 15 leagues west of the cape, which ^c were not set down in the charts. While the shallows were watering in a bay, a storm arose, which drove them to sea, leaving 19 men on shore, two only of which were found alive the next day, when the shallows returned, the rest had been knocked on the head by the savages. As only five bodies cruelly mangled could be found of the seventeen that had been murdered, it was supposed the savages had carried off the rest for food.

The difficulty in returning through the streights, from the South to the North Seas.

THE vice-admiral, being sent in the Greyhound to examine the coast, reported, that he had found the Terra del Fuego, as marked in the charts, divided into a number of islands; and that it was not at all necessary to double the cape, in order to enter the South Sea; but that they ought to leave it on the south, and enter in on the east, the bay of Nassau passing into the open sea by the west of the cape. He likewise gave it as his opinion, that there were ^d several passages out of the bay of Nassau into the Streights of Magellan. Till the time of Le Hermite almost all navigators had been of opinion, that it was easy to go from the Streights of Le Maire to Chili and Peru; but that it was scarcely possible to pass from them, by the streights, into the North Sea, because, according to their opinion, the south winds blow constantly in those seas. But Le Hermite found it quite different, the frequent tempests from the north-west-and-by-west rendering it incomparably more easy to pass from Chili and Peru into the North Sea, than it was to reach these through the streights from the North Sea. The winds that rage here with more violence than is known in any other country, and indeed with a fury altogether inexpressible, blow constantly from the west, and may be reasonably supposed to arise from watry exhalations. Such ships, therefore, as are bound westerly, ought to avoid ^e this coast with a scrupulous caution, keeping as much as possible to the south.

Le Hermite
arrives on the coast of Chili.

Preparations for a descent on Arica.

THE strong westerly winds, still continuing, gave the admiral great uneasiness, as they prevented his complying with his instructions from the States to proceed directly to Juan Fernandez, as soon as he had passed the streights. A council was called, that a resolution might be taken as to a fit place for the rendezvous of the fleet in case of being dispersed, or of wintering if these tempests continued. A majority were of opinion, that the most prudent resolution would be to wait two months for better weather, and to employ their utmost endeavours to double the cape, and get into the South Seas. On the 8th they were in 61° ; on the 14th in 58° ; and on the 18th, 19th, and 20th, they had a fair and fresh wind from the south-east. The weather likewise became warm, so that, after all the tempestuous blowy season they had suf- ^f fered, they now began to imagine themselves in another climate. On March the 28th they saw the coast of Chili lying east-south-east. The admiral, who was at this time confined to his bed, being informed that they were within a few leagues of the coast of Chili, expressed an eager desire to put into the port of Chiloe; but at the same time declared, that it was contrary to his instructions to touch, before he entered upon action against the Spaniards in Peru. This determined him to make the best of his way to the island of Juan Fernandez, there to prepare every thing necessary for annoying the Spaniards, attacking the galleons in the port of Arica in case they were there, and making themselves masters of that place, in order to extend their conquests by the assistance of the Indians. On April the 1st, the vice-admiral was forced to keep his bed, and appeared to be so much exhausted and worn out with fatigue, that the crews were under great apprehension of losing both the admiral and him before the voyage was at an end. When they anchored at Juan Fernandez, every ship's company had orders to ^g provide

- a provide themselves with as many chevaux de frise and pallisadoes as possible ; and the vice-admiral, being somewhat recovered, visited all the artillery in the fleet.
- ABOUT this time five of the seamen being convicted of breaking into the hold, and stealing from thence several barrels of wine, were for that offence condemned to be hanged, but pardoned by the admiral. On the 13th of April, all things being in readiness for the intended attack, the fleet weighed from Juan Fernandez. As it was not possible to determine how soon they might be obliged to enter upon action, the necessary instructions were distributed to all the captains, and the fleet was directed to sail for the future in three divisions. On May the 8th, they took a bark off the coast of Peru, in which, besides the captain, there were four other Spaniards, and six or seven negroes. From these the admiral was informed, that the plate-fleet had sailed the preceding Friday, being the third of that month, from Calao for Panama, consisting only of five sail, with two men of war and five merchantmen, richly laden. They were further informed, that the Spanish admiral was still at Calao, a fine ship of 800 tons, and 40 brass cannon ; with two pataches of 14 guns each, with 40 or 50 merchantmen of no force. That all the shipping was towed on shore, and secured there by three strong batteries, with other stone works, mounted with upwards of 50 pieces of cannon, all ready prepared for the reception of the Dutch, of whose motions they had early and certain intelligence. That the viceroy had formed a body of men, amounting to 400, well armed and disciplined ; but that lately hearing of the near approach of the Hollanders, he immediately summoned the whole force of Peru, so that it was not doubted but he would be soon at the head of an army of several thousand men. Experience proved the truth of this information procured from the Spanish prisoners, than which nothing could be more reasonable. A council was assembled on board, and a resolution taken to delay the attack no longer than the next morning. As the admiral was absolutely incapable of fatigue, the vice-admiral, assisted by his brother-in-law Cornelius Jacobson, took the command. Besides the companies of soldiers on board, it was thought necessary to have an equal number of seamen formed into companies, and headed by their own officers. As the boats were not sufficient to land the whole together, it was resolved that the soldiers should debark first, and fortify themselves by throwing up a breast-work, till they were joined by the seamen.
- MAY the 10th, the vice-admiral, putting himself at the head of the land forces, got into the boats, and rowed for a considerable time along the shore, but without finding it possible to land, though, if he could, there was a great appearance of his being joined by the natives and negroes. The admiral ordered that the Greyhound yacht should draw close to the shore, and protect the boats, and cover the landing by a perpetual fire ; but the Spaniards, aware of this, had thrown up a strong battery on the only part of the coast where it was possible for a ship to ride. The yacht was soon disabled, and this design frustrated ; notwithstanding this, the Dutch two companies, with twelve shallops, armed with small cannon, began at midnight to row directly to the fort of Lima, having on board a great quantity of combustible matter. A false attack was at the same time made to the north of Calao, to draw the Spaniards thither ; which had the effect, the shallops entering the port during the confusion the feint had occasioned, and distributing their combustibles among fifty sail of shipping, thirty of which perished. No sooner had the Spaniards discovered the design of the Dutch, than they made a furious fire ; but to little purpose, the shallops sheltering themselves behind the burning ships, and firing from thence on the enemy with great success. After this action had continued with great obstinacy for several hours, the Dutch, having finished their business, retired with the loss of seven men killed, and 15 wounded. The attempt was extremely bold, hardy, and well conducted ; but the consequences by no means corresponded with its merit. Nothing could be gained from burning the Spanish ships ; glory was all the reward ; and that, to a penurious Dutchman, is of less value than perhaps to any other European. What increased the disappointment was, that, after the ships were in a flame, they perceived, if they had carried hatchets with them, the cables might have been cut, and the whole fleet made prize of with equal loss to Spain, and with infinitely more advantage to Holland than empty praise. The greatest loss was sustained in the admiral's shallop, with which he desperately attempted to board one of the pataches in the middle and hottest of the enemy's fire. Early the next morning nine of the burning ships broke from their moorings, and fell down with a gentle breeze on the Dutch squadron, which obliged them to weigh with all possible dispatch, and screen themselves behind the island of Lima, of which a captain's command took possession. Here the Dutch threw up strong works, that they might screen their shallops, then in a leaky and shattered condition.
- AFTER this miscarriage, a council, to deliberate on their future operations, was held. As their instructions directed them, in case of any disappointment in a descent, to apply their whole force to the distressing the Spaniards, by taking their shipping, this they resolved upon. In their instructions, this reason was given for blocking up the port of Lima, and stopping all commerce, viz. that by this means a trial should be made of the inclinations of the natives, and and possibly a total revolution brought about. Prince Maurice had received, before the sailing a of their fleet, some general intelligence with respect to the disaffection of all the negroes in the Spanish colonies, particularly in Peru; this was the foundation of that article of the instructions, which, admitting it to be true, the fleet had no opportunity of proving, either by the negroes or natives. The prudent precaution of the viceroy rendered both the negroes and natives incapable of any attempt. They were immediately disarmed; a body of Spaniards raised; all the works put into their hands; a company of free negroes assembled, who were so proud of their liberty, that they became the greatest oppressors of their own countrymen, and the most zealous partisans of their old masters; pride, interest and gratitude, all co-operating to make them discharge the trust reposed in them with fidelity. As the whole fleet was not wanted to block up Calao, Cornelius Jacobson, with four ships, was ordered to cruise b to the south, and make as many prizes as possibly he could. Here they appear to have varied from the spirit of their instructions, which was, to attack and plunder Arica; and this might easily have been done, supposing it in the defenceless state they believed in Holland; after which they might have stretched their conquests to the inestimable mines of Potosi, where their acquisitions would at once more than indemnify the States and prince Maurice for the expence of the fleet; the greatest injury would have been done to Spain, the most decisive blow struck, and the sailors fully recompensed for all the dangers and fatigues they had undergone. Whether it was that they found Arica in a different condition from what was believed in Holland, well fortified, garisoned, and supplied with every necessary to render c the design of the Dutch impracticable, we are not told in the journal of this voyage. Yet it is probable, that some such reasons deterred the admiral from the attempt, since we find, by other accounts, that this was the state of Arica a few years after, and that neither of the Dutch admirals had hitherto afforded any handle to impeach their courage. As for Potosi, there were certainly 2000 Spaniards assembled there, capable of bearing arms, soon after the attempt on Calao. Thus all the fine projects formed in Holland, of rich and extensive conquests in India, appeared to the admirals, upon trial, to be wild chimæras, romantic dreams, founded upon an imperfect intelligence, and false estimate of their own and their enemies strength. Among ourselves we have of late fatally experienced many similar instances.

The miscarriages of the fleet owing to false intelligence received in Holland.

An attempt to burn the galleon frustrated.

MAY the 14th, Jacobson sailed with his division to cruise off La Nufca, Pisco, and the coasts south of Lima. During his absence, the vice-admiral converted two of the prizes into d fire-ships, determining, if possible, to destroy the galleon lying in the harbour, and at the same time to seize on the town of Guiaquil, either by force or stratagem, which he heard was a place of no considerable strength. Both attempts miscarried. The town was found to be well fortified and garrisoned. As to the fire-ship, she was carried into the harbour, filled with 2000 weight of powder, fire-works, and shells, and brought with great danger within a short distance of the galleon, when it was perceived that the whole project was frustrated, by a bank of earth that separated the galleon and fire-ship. The Dutch then retired with great precipitation to their own fleet, amidst showers of shot that came pouring down among them, but happily with no effect.

Jaques Le Hermite dies.

ON June the 2d, Jaques Le Hermite, admiral of the fleet, expired in the port of Calao de e Lima, after a long illness, which he bore with the courage of a soldier and the resignation of a Christian. His sickness and death have undoubtedly been the cause of numberless miscarriages in the expedition. In him the States reposed the chief confidence, and the bad state of his health prevented his exerting himself in the manner his own honour, spirit, and courage, dictated, and that was expected in Holland from his known reputation. The vice-admiral suffered his flag to remain flying in the Amsterdam, that the enemy might have no notice of Le Hermite's death. Next day he was buried on the island of Lima with great decency, and all the pomp their circumstances would permit. All the prizes were adorned with streamers and flags; in order to deceive, the guns were fired over the admiral, as on rejoicings for their f success in the South Sea. After this, a second attempt was made to fire the galleon, but to as little purpose as the foregoing. The fire-ship, navigated by the supercargo of a Dutch ship, entered the harbour boldly, and, finding that the galleon rode in a basin every way defended, the Dutchman endeavoured to escape; but the enemy fired upon him so briskly, that, forced to set fire to the train, the fire-ship blew up with a dreadful explosion, but no damage to the enemy, and he retreated in the shallop to the fleet. Such was the end of this enterprize, which cost them much labour, danger, and money.

JUNE the 13th, the Spanish prisoners representing that the viceroy was disposed to treat for their ransom, it was determined to make him the overture. In consequence whereof, an officer with a flag of truce was sent in a small vessel on shore. Notice of the arrival of the Dutch being carried to the viceroy, he gave orders that the seamen in the vessel should have their g hands tied, and their eyes covered, while the shallop remained on shore, and that the officer should be conducted to him in the same manner. In the evening the seamen were set at liberty, a liberty, and all imaginable pains taken to engage them in the Spanish service, which they all to a man rejected with scorn. After this, the viceroy gave this answer to the Dutch admiral's proposal: That he had nothing besides powder and ball at his service; that he would enter into no negociation or treaty of any kind with him; that he would not ransom the prisoners at any price whatsoever; and that if any of the Dutch should hereafter, upon any pretence, or under any pretext, enter the port of Calao with a flag of truce, he would have them instantly hanged up with the flag about their necks, since he could not but esteem them as traitors to their king, enemies to their country, to the laws of nations, of nature, and of honour. When this answer was reported to the council of war, they resolved to hang up all their prisoners, giving the following reasons for so inhuman a proceeding: they were greatly straitened for provisions, b and had hardly any water left; it was therefore impossible to keep the prisoners, and, if they did, no ransom could be expected. On the other hand, to set them at liberty was equally against the laws of prudence and of war, since it would only serve to expose their weakness, and render them the scorn and derision of their enemies; weak arguments indeed to combat the feelings of the heart, and that compassion which every generous breast owes to the unfortunate. On the 15th, in the morning, this cruel resolution was put in execution, with a The Dutch barbarity that justly renders them infamous to posterity, and which can hardly be paralleled in hang up all the Spanish history, excepting by the shocking affair of Amboyna. Certain we are, that no people, pretending to civilized manners, and the Christian religion, ever disgraced both by a more flagrant instance of a rude, savage, and callous heart, dead to all the warmer and nobler feelings of c the mind! Twenty-one Spaniards were actually hanged up at the yard-arm of the mizen-mast of the admiral, in the sight of an infinite number of people on the shore, and amidst the brutal insults of the sailors on board. Three old men were sent in a bark to Calao, with a message to the viceroy, importing, that as they had no quarter to expect from him, they were determined to give none to such as fell into their hands; that therefore he ought to esteem this action as the necessary consequence of his own brutal conduct.

In the mean time, Jacobson returned from his cruise. His report was agreeable to the d appointments the whole fleet had hitherto met with, but not with the expectations of the admiral. He had landed at Pises on the 4th, with much difficulty and danger. Marching within musquet-shot of the town, he found it regularly fortified, with a wall round it of fifteen feet, a garrison of 2000 foot, 200 horse, and every other requisite for a long and obstinate defence. In these circumstances Jacobson was under the necessity of throwing up an intrenchment for his own security, and, instead of laying siege to the garrison, was under the greatest apprehension of being surrounded and cut off by it. Under cover of the night he retreated to his ships, with the loss of five men killed, sixteen wounded, and thirteen deserters, happy that he got off so cheaply. Hitherto there never had been a more disastrous expedition undertaken with so potent an armament. It begun with misfortunes, which continued in one uninterrupted chain till the death of the admiral, which would seem to crown the mishaps of this unfortunate voyage. The consequences of Cornelius Jacobson's attempt.

BEFORE the resolution was formed of sailing for Chili, a gunner was hanged at the yard-arm e in sight of the whole fleet, for endeavouring to desert. From the intelligence they received of the condition of Chili, they had reason to promise themselves a happier issue to their enterprise than so unlucky a beginning seemed to forebode. The natives had now been in arms against the Spaniards for more than thirty years. They had taken the city and port of Baldivia, which they kept. The Chilians were at that time the most warlike nation of America, f different in manners, customs, and government, from the rest. Their horse especially were excellent, and greatly superior to the Spanish. The usual method with them was to raise an army of 3 or 4000 men, to lay waste the country, block up the fortresses, starve the garrisons, and harass the encampments of their enemies. Their perseverance was equal to their courage; and their activity could be exceeded by nothing but their caution. Willingly, if we may pay any credit to the historians of those countries, would the Spaniards have abandoned Chili; but they dreaded the loss of Peru. The brave Chilians, they were sensible, could not enjoy their own liberty, without giving freedom to their neighbours; and their resentment was directed against tyranny, not against the Spaniards, if their conduct had not rendered them the same object. The state of Chili, and the disposition of natives.

As to the Spaniards, they had for many years contented themselves with recruiting their exhausted forces by fresh supplies of transported malefactors. A little before the arrival of the Dutch, they had augmented the garrisons by a supply of regulars from Buenos Ayres. Hence a new mischief arose; these people finding themselves ill-treated, and the service hard, mutinied, and dispossessed their officers of the command. Thus all things were thrown into confusion; g no one acknowledged a superior, and the army was divided into little bodies, acknowledging no other authority than that of the viceroy, which no one was hardy enough to dispute. In this situation were things when the Dutch admiral received the last intelligence. Circumstances of the Dutch.

Expectations

The scurvy makes terrible havoc in the fleet.

Intelligence received from deserters.

Skirmishes with the Spaniards.

The vice-admiral takes the town of Guiaquil.

He throws the prisoners into the sea.

such as these naturally inspired him with hopes of being able to draw an advantage from them. The appearance of the Dutch fleet off the coast, it was not doubted, would give many discontented persons an opportunity of declaring themselves, revenging their injuries, and establishing their power, it would at least, they all agreed, bring over a considerable body of the natives. But after the resolution of quitting Lima had been formed, the admiral found it necessary to wait for the Hope and Maurice, then on a cruise, to prevent their falling into the enemies hands. During this stay, the scurvy raged so extremely in the whole fleet, especially the four ships returned from the cruise under Jacobson, that scarce hands sufficient to navigate them were left. Thus, notwithstanding their late great hopes, affairs now grew worse, and tended almost to despair. One day, however, a Swiss, who was likewise infected, took it into his head, to climb to the very summit of the highest hill in Lima. Here he met with great plenty of a species of herbage he had been acquainted with in his own country ; of which eating heartily for some days, he soon recovered. This, as soon as known, induced the other seamen to make the experiment; and parties were every day sent out to furnish the fleet with the salutary vegetable. The effects answered their warmest wishes, and every seaman in the fleet was, in the space of a few days, restored to perfect health.

JULY the 18th, two Spanish deserters from Calao, who having murdered the captain of the Spanish horse in a fray about a woman, took sanctuary with the Dutch, gave the admiral all the intelligence he could desire concerning the state of that town. Their report was such as served to convince the Dutch how imperfect were all the advices received in Europe, and how impracticable their attempts would be. The town, they reported, was completely fortified ; the walls mounted with eighty pieces of cannon ; a strong ship in the harbour ; forty companies of foot within the town, sixteen troops of horse, besides several bodies of militia, employed to defend the watering-places, in case the Dutch should attempt to land. They also reported, that the Maurice and Hope had taken four ships near the island of Puna, had burnt the town of Guiaquil, with the royal galleon upon the stocks there.

FROM this time to the 29th, they were engaged in continual skirmishes with the Spaniards, who attacked them vigorously. They were encouraged to continue their insults, by observing that the Dutch, who were preparing to sail for Chili, were extremely saving of their ammunition ; but three or four warm receptions their visits met with made them soon alter their opinion.

AUGUST the 5th, the vice-admiral, agreeable to the patent from prince Maurice, was invested with the authority and dignity of admiral, on board the Delft, where he received the oath of fidelity from the fleet, the ship's company that lay nearest going on board first. He was succeeded as vice-admiral by the rear-admiral, and his place filled up again by Cornelius Jacobson, who left Holland in quality of counsellor to the admiral. In the evening the admiral, attended by the shallops of the whole fleet, sailed towards the ship Orange, to receive the oath from the crew, and the other ships that lay near her. This the Spaniards observing, attacked the shallops in their passage, but were repulsed by the vigorous resistance of the Dutch.

A FEW days afterwards the vice-admiral returned with the Maurice and Hope to Lima. The account he gave of his proceedings was, that he had found three ships in the road of Puna, two of which he burnt, and the third he brought along with him ; that he run up the river as far as the town of Guiaquil, which, contrary to expectation, he found well-fortified and garrisoned. Notwithstanding this, he determined to make a descent, which he effected with the loss of thirty men, and then attacked the town. At first his soldiers, oppressed with numbers, began to fall back in disorder ; but captain Schutte, their officer, desiring them to reflect, that nothing but victory could preserve them, their countrymen, and the ships, they made so furious an assault, that the Spaniards, in their turn, were put in confusion, the town entered and plundered, and above one hundred of the enemy killed on the spot. In the warehouses he found a great deal of rich merchandize ; but being unable to carry it off, or to garrison the place, he burnt both, and retired to his ships, with seventeen prisoners. These he soon after threw into the sea, having discovered a conspiracy they had formed against him. Putting to sea, he met with contrary winds, which drove him as far as Arica ; which place he would have attempted, but the wind shifting again, rendered it impossible. After which, with great difficulty, he rejoined the fleet. This junction being effected, the whole fleet was under sail on August the 14th, arriving the same evening with their prizes at the Piscadores, under one of which islands they anchored. After watering here, they steered for Puna. When the fleet came within sight of the island of Santa Clara, the admiral sent three shallops to acquaint the Indians with his approach, to assure them of protection and liberty, and to gain what intelligence they could of the situation of things at Guiaquil, which it was determined to revisit.

IN the morning of the 25th, the whole fleet came to an anchor in the road of the island of Puna, where the shallops had arrived a few hours before ; in which time they made them-

- a selves masters of a little bark laden with merchandize. The large ships being here eased of their guns, in order to be careened, the lesser vessels were sent to make a second attempt on Guiaquil, where they were repulsed with the loss of twenty-eight men. The miscarriage was owing to the inadvertency of some of the officers, and the rashness of the common soldiers, who, after their late success, imagined the Spaniards durst not venture to face them. It was indeed a very unnecessary and imprudent expedition; the town had been lately set on fire, the warehouses destroyed, and little could be expected if they succeeded; nothing truly sufficient to compensate the hazard of the attempt. Captain Schutte, that brave officer, whose spirited conduct had been the cause of the former success, had received a shot in the shoulder, which, however, did not make him discontinue encouraging his men. It was indeed extraordinary, that an equal force with that which had taken it, when the fortifications were complete, the garrison neither lessened by slaughter, nor dispirited by a defeat, should not now succeed against a place burnt, ruinous, and half the garrison killed. But this was attributed to the unequal abilities of the officers. Schutte was now in an inferior station; and captain Emerson, a man in capacity by no means his equal, had the chief command. The soldiers, who ever fight with courage under a brave officer, soon perceived the difference between the commanders; and, as if they would confirm their opinion by experience, suffered themselves to be shamefully defeated, by the remnant of that garrison they had so lately discomfited.

- c SEPTEMBER the 9th, in a full council, it was determined to lay aside their intended descent on Chili, and to bear away for Acapulca, as their instructions directed, there to cruise for the Manila ship. If afterwards the condition of the fleet would permit, they were to return to Chili. In pursuance of this resolution, they set fire to the town of Puna; after which they departed, bending their course for the Galapagos.

- d ON the 28th of September the fleet arrived before the harbour of Acapulca, where the admiral fell upon a stratagem, which he hoped would procure him intelligence of the Manila ship, and the time she was expected to arrive. He sent a message to the governor, importing, that he had made a great number of prizes in the South Seas, on board of which were some persons of distinction, now his prisoners, whom he would set at liberty, in consideration of a reasonable ransom, as he proposed to proceed to the East Indies. He therefore desired that an officer might be sent on board his fleet, to treat with him; for whose security he was ready to send another as a pledge for his return. To this message the governor answered, that he neither would give or receive hostages; but if the admiral had any such prisoners, and would send them on shore, he should faithfully be paid the ransom. Thus the admiral's scheme was disappointed, and the treaty broke off.

It was then resolved to cruise about the coast for the Acapulca ship; and, to prevent her passing unnoticed, the fleet was ordered to extend itself in as long a line, and take in as great a compass of the ocean, as possible. But after spending several weeks, the admiral was compelled by the crazy condition of the fleet to bear away at length to the East Indies, without effecting his purpose. The fleet sails to the East Indies.

- e ON the 5th of March following, the admiral arrived at the Moluccas, where, after concerting measures with the governors of the different settlements, he left his fleet to be employed in the service of the East India company, and make conquests there; himself taking his passage to Europe in a homeward-bound ship, on board of which he died.

- f IN this manner ended the celebrated and much-talked of expedition of the Nassau fleet; a fleet so powerful as to raise the hopes of all men, and so unsuccessful as only to disappoint them. Hence it appears that neither unforeseen untoward accidents, nor want of force, but want of conduct, frustrated the great views of the States and prince Maurice. We may conclude likewise from hence, that however able and expeditious the Hollanders might be in equipping a squadron, yet that they were certainly inferior to us in the knowledge of maritime affairs. To their Stadtholder they owed the spirit and alacrity with which such schemes were undertaken; but to him also they owed the miscarriages consequent on a wrong choice of naval officers. The enterprizes of private merchants were generally successful, because, in these, officers were preferred for their merit, not by interest. Of this the expedition of Schouten is a pregnant instance, which, though supported by a few proprietors only, was attended with a felicity that perfectly evinces the necessity of having merit the sole guide to preferment in enterprizes of such a nature. Had Jaques Le Hermite enjoyed a sound state of health, it is probable that many of the unfortunate occurrences of this voyage would never have happened; but first his long illness paved the way for misconduct, and his death laid it open to every kind of mismanagement. The intention of the voyage was laudable, and the scheme well calculated to distress the Spaniards, and promote the trade of the United Provinces; but the means were erroneous, and most of the instruments injudiciously chosen for the execution of such a trust. To pursue right ends by wrong measures is really more prejudicial to a state than the absolute neglect of them. The one makes the ends fall into eternal disrepute Reflections on this voyage.

disrepute with the people ; the other occasions only a temporary suspension of the endeavours ■ to attain them. Sir William Monson, an excellent judge of naval affairs, observes indeed, that the situation of things in the Spanish West Indies was greatly altered from what they had been when Drake, Candish, and Spilbergen, undertook their voyages ; but then it may be said, that the first step which ought to have been taken was the obtaining undoubted intelligence of all the circumstances of change and variation. Without this, no success could reasonably be expected ; and so capital an error can never be pleaded as a sufficient excuse for their miscarriage. Admitting, however, that the Spaniards were fortified in a different manner from what they had been when the former expeditions were undertaken ; yet still their strength was insufficient to oppose and every-where baffle so potent an armament, had it been properly conducted and directed. At Guiaquil, half the number under one officer took the place well b fortified, which twice the force under another officer failed of taking, when these fortifications were ruinous. After the death of the admiral, all their projects were unsteady, wild, and ideal. The resolution of going from Puna to Acapulca, and then returning to Chili, was absurd ; betraying equally their ignorance of navigation and the first principles of war.

BUT the circumstances of this voyage, which demand our greatest attention, are, the extraordinary care taken of the fleet in the East Indies, and that it was not enjoined to return by the Streights of Magellan. The first points out the great harmony and sameness of interest between the States and the India company, the ships of the former being employed, without any particular permission, in the service of the latter. The second is, the clearest proof that the States General of the United Provinces did not intend that their exclusive charter to the East c India company should prevent other ships from entering the South Seas, or even to the East Indies, upon their lawful occasions, and without prejudice to the India company's trade. Had it been otherwise, this fleet would, by their instructions, have been directed to return by the Streights of Magellan. At that time it was presumed there was no passing from the south to the north seas by the Streights of Le Maire ; and this voyage it was that shewed the fallaciousness of that opinion ; as indeed daily experience does of many speculative points in navigation.

To conclude ; there breathes a spirit of freedom and republican boldness in the narrative of this voyage, which we cannot but admire. Some countries there are where liberty is as much the cry as in Holland ; yet had any writer censured the conduct of commanders, and laid d open the causes of a miscarriage, with the same freedom our journalist has done, his labours would have been construed into an affront to the administration, and resented, if not treated as a libel. Certain, however, it is, that, in such countries, one miscarriage or false step begets another, going on in progression, till either the constitution is altered, or the state undone ; mischiefs these which deserve to be harshly treated, to have the public roused against them, and to be better guarded against than any inconveniencies flowing from the free animadversions, the acrimony, and even the lash of liberty, and the freedom of the press. Errors can never be corrected, where it is penal to discover them ; nor is it possible that suspicion should be avoided, where inquiry and scrutiny are discouraged. In the instance before us, it was not only the total loss of the immense sum this expedition cost, but of their hopes also, of that spirit which had been raised of indemnifying themselves from the expences of a consuming e continental war, by a proper application of their marine in the Spanish West Indies, that disappointed the people. The neglect of this incurred such a load of debt, that nothing could have saved the state, but the alteration of the government, the suspension of the Stadtholder-ship, and the frugal and wise administration of the De Wittes. The republic, without this, must have sunk under corruption, and perhaps tyranny, after her long and glorious struggle for liberty. She must have become the slave of a citizen, who, for a series of years, had resisted the despotism of the most potent and haughty monarch of Europe ; and she must have lost her power, her grandeur, and freedom at home, after having laid the basis of a great empire in the most distant countries of the earth.

S E C T. XIV.

Containing the birth and education of Dampier; the variety of scenes he passed through before he wholly applied himself to the sea; his engagements with the buccaneers; their resolution to cruise in the South Seas; their arrival at the Gallapagos; Dampier's account of the tortoise; the descent of the buccaneers on the Spanish coast; Dampier's project for establishing a settlement on the isthmus of Darien; the buccaneers take the city Leon and Santa Pecague; Dampier's scheme for settling in the Philippines; an account of the Piscadores islands; and conclusion of the voyage round the world.

- a AFTER this expedition of the Nassau fleet, there is a wide chasm in the history of the circumnavigators. Many voyages had been made on account of the English and Dutch companies to the East Indies; but these were performed by the route discovered by the Portuguese round the Cape of Good Hope. Several expeditions were likewise undertaken to the West Indies; but all these terminated on the north side of the Streights of Magellan, Le Maire, and Cape Horn. The first circuit which we find after this of Le Hermite, is that of captain Cowley, our countryman, who, from Virginia, sailed round Cape Horn up the Spanish continent, arrived at the Gallapagos, from thence at Guam, proceeded to China, then to Borneo, and at last to Batavia, where he quitted his ship, and took passage to Europe in a homeward-bound Dutchman. As this voyage contains nothing very entertaining or remarkable, we shall pass it over, to give an account of Dampier's voyage round the world; who, as he was one of the best seamen of his time, had a particular talent at rendering his journals agreeable and interesting. We have already mentioned him as one of the discoverers of the Southern Continent; at present we are to speak of him as a circumnavigator, although this voyage furnished him with the first hints and materials for the expedition he afterwards undertook to New Guiney and New Holland^a.

A wide chasm in the history of the circumnavigators.

Captain Cowley's voyage the same with Dampier's.

- b DAMPIER's character has been variously represented, according to the different notions entertained by men guided rather by their passions and prejudices than by truth. His works appeared under great disadvantages; they were published in detached pieces, without method or order; wrote without the elegance of the scholar; obscure in some places, prolix in others, and every-where filled with promises of giving the world more accurate and explicit accounts. This naturally sunk the reputation of the book, and of the author; yet, under all these disadvantages, the voyages of Dampier will always be entertaining and useful to the judicious and thinking reader.

Character of Dampier's voyages.

- c CAPTAIN William Dampier was descended of genteel parents in the county of Somerset, where he was born A. 1652. During the life of his parents, he had such an education as was thought necessary to fit him for a trade; but losing father and mother at a very early age, his guardians finding him of a roving disposition, much inclined to the sea, resolved to comply with his humour. A. 1669, at the age of 17, he was bound to the master of a ship at Weymouth, with whom he made a trading voyage to France. The following year he went to Newfoundland; but, pinched with the severity of the climate, he returned to his friends, much cooled of that ardor he had shewn for the sea. Hearing of an outward-bound East India ship from the Thames, his former eagerness recurred upon him, and he set out for London, entered himself on board the John and Martha, as a foremast-man, and in her made a voyage to Bantam in the island of Java; by which he acquired great improvement and experience. After his return, he entered himself, A. 1672, on board the Royal Prince, commanded by that brave officer Sir Edward Spragge, and was in two engagements that summer against the Dutch. He fell sick before the third battle, in which Sir Edward fell; being put on board an hospital-ship, he was no more than a spectator. Residing after this at his brother's house, colonel Hillier, a gentleman of a large estate in Jamaica, persuaded him to accept of the management of his plantations. With this view he went to Jamaica, in the spring of the year 1674, where he resided above a year; but disliking his situation, engaged himself among the logwood-cutters, at the persuasion of captain Hodsdel. He embarked for Campeachy in August 1675, and applied himself diligently to his employment for the space of a year; when, after sustaining a variety of hardships, he returned with great difficulty to Jamaica. He soon after returned to Campeachy, better provided for the business, resided some time there,

Birth and education of Dampier.

His first voyage.

He goes in quality of supervisor of an estate in Jamaica.

^a The whole account of this voyage is extracted from the first volume of Dampier's works; to which we refer the reader.

He enters upon the business of logwood-cutting in the bay of Campeachy acquainted himself perfectly with the manner of cutting and trading in logwood, which enabled him to form some projects for the advancement of his fortune. a

He enters with captain Cooke, and prepares for his first voyage round the world.

In Campeachy it was that he introduced himself to the acquaintance of the buccaneers, and acquired the first notion of a life in which he was afterwards engaged, and of which, it is certain, he lived to be very much ashamed. Hence we may account for his passing over in silence many circumstances in his first voyage round the world, which we find mentioned by captain Cowley. The accounts given of those two circumnavigators are in fact but the journals of the same voyage, written by different persons. Dampier made his first tour round the globe with Cowley; but as his journal is by much the most entertaining, we have given it the preference. Dampier arrived in England in 1678, and the year following set out for Jamaica, with intention to follow the logwood cutting and trading in the bay of Campeachy. This resolution he changed for that of purchasing a small estate; soon after which he engaged with Coxon, Hawkins, and Sharpe, all buccaneers, with whom he went upon an expedition to Porto Bello. It would engross too much of our time to recite the various transactions through which he passed as a buccaneer; sufficient it is, that the resolution was at length taken of making a voyage into the South Seas, which it was not doubted would sufficiently repair their fortunes, shattered and broken with disappointments. Captain Cooke was the projector of this enterprise, to which Dampier and others readily acceded. In this voyage it was, that Cowley acted in quality of master, although the true intention of the expedition was concealed from him. A French prize they had made was equipped for this voyage. They mounted her, according to Cowley, with eight pieces of cannon; but Dampier, with more probability, says with 18; it being unreasonable to suppose that, with eight great guns only, they would undertake an expedition of hazard to the South Seas. These two officers differ no less in the number of the hands on board; the first calling it 52, but the latter affirming the crew amounted to 70 able-bodied men. Such was the force with which they sailed from Ackamack in Virginia, on the 23d of August, A. 1683, steering directly for the Cape de Verd islands. Here they staid some time, which gave Dampier an opportunity of examining the islands with accuracy, and giving a minute and exact description of them. From hence they steered to the Streights of Magellan, first touching on the coast of Guiney, at the mouth of Serborough river, where there was an English factory, south of Sierra Leona. On January the 28th, they made the three islands of De Weert, in $51^{\circ} 25'$ south latitude, where Dampier prevailed on the captain to anchor, apprehending danger in passing the streights at that season of the year. The road, however, proving unsafe, and water being scarce, they weighed again, and by the first of February got sight of the Streights of Le Maire. With a stiff gale at north-north-west, they came within four miles of the entrance into the streights, when they were becalmed, and found a strong tide setting out of the passage to the north; but whether it flowed or ebbed, they could, from the irregularity of the tide, form no judgment. They next held their course to the south, in order to sail round to the south of Cape Horn, the southernmost point of Terra del Fuego. Passing through the Streights of Le Maire, they came up with a sail, which at first they took to be a Spanish merchantman, bound from Baldivia to Lima, but found it to be captain Eaton from London, bound also for the South Seas. d

They overtake and join company with captain Eaton in the streights.

An account of a Musqueto Indian that had been left on Juan Fernandez.

HAVING got safely through the streights, they arrived on the 24th of March at Juan Fernandez, where their first inquiry was after a Musqueto Indian the buccaneers had left there about three years before. When captain Watling deserted him here, the Indian's whole stock consisted of a gun, a knife, and some powder and shot. He had frustrated all the endeavours of the Spaniards to take him; and such were his activity, his wiles, and his cunning, that they began to look upon him as the apparition of some corpse on the island. When his powder and shot were exhausted, he sawed his gun-barrel into small pieces, which he made into harpoons, hooks, and other instruments, without the assistance of forge, anvil, or tools, besides those he had made out of a hard stone. With the instruments he made he used to strike goats, birds, and fish, upon which he lived plentifully. His hut, about half a mile from the shore, was made of goat-skins, his bed and clothing of the same materials. When the ship came to an anchor, another Musqueto on board, discovering his countryman, plunged out of impatience into the sea, swam ashore, and embraced him with all the marks of tenderness and affection. Both melted away in tears in each other's arms, after which the banished Musqueto came to salute his old friends, entering again into their service with great cordiality. e

Remark on the island.

DAMPIER describes Juan Fernandez very particularly; one observation he makes which we find in no other navigator. The goats, he remarks, that feed towards the west end of the island, are much fatter and better eating than those of the opposite extremity; yet in the last the grass is finer, and in greater plenty, the vallies equally well watered with sweet and pleasant brooks, and the whole circuit of the island but 12 leagues. Taking the fact for granted, we leave the phænomenon to be explained by the naturalists and minute philosophers. After laying for fourteen days at anchor off this island, they set sail, in the words of Dampier, for the f

g

the

- a the Pacific Ocean, properly so called, being that part of the Mare de Zur, extending, from south to north, betwixt 30 and 40 degrees south latitude. "Here," says he, "have I sailed for 250 leagues without any dark or rainy clouds, tempests, tornadoes, hurricanes, or any other winds except the trade winds. Yet the sea runs high at the new and full moon, and makes landing very unsafe. I have, however, frequently taken notice of heavy and foggy weather in the morning, so as to hinder the observation of the sun."
- CONTINUING their course eastward, or rather north-east, to the line, in sight of the continent of America, Dampier remarked, that the vast tracts of land belonging to Chili and Peru were exceeding mountainous; and that from 24 to 10 degrees south latitude it still exceeded the former in height, the mountains within the country overtopping those nearer the coast, and elating themselves into the clouds, far, in his opinion, beyond the celebrated peak of Teneriff. From hence he deduces the reason why but few, and those very small, rivers exonerate themselves into the sea, scarce any being navigable, and most of them dried up at certain seasons of the year. We must acknowledge, however, that we do not see the propriety of this deduction. All this while keeping company with captain Eaton, they descried a sail under latitude 9° 40' south, to which Eaton gave chase. He soon took her, and found Eaton takes a prize. she was loaded with timber, a commodity no-ways valuable to them in those parts. On May the 10th they anchored at the island Lobos de la Mare. Here they found nothing besides penguins in great abundance, and a species of blackbird which burrows at night in holes made in the sand. He describes the penguin and sea-fowl about the size of a duck, with membranous feet; a down instead of feathers, and very short wings. They are common all over the South Seas, the coasts of Newfoundland, and the Cape of Good Hope. Upon examining the prisoners lately made, they found reason to imagine they had been discovered by the Spaniards, although they had used their utmost endeavours to keep out of sight from the coasts. Hence it was concluded, that the Spaniards would lay an embargo on all the rich ships, to prevent their falling into their hands. This determined them to hazard an attack upon some place, which might compensate their disappointment of prizes. Truxillo, tho' a populous city, and of difficult access, They determine upon attacking Truxillo. was thought the most commodious; an attempt upon it was therefore resolved on. A muster were getting in readiness for a descent, three sail of ships were discovered at sea, to which they gave chase. On coming up with them, they immediately struck, their lading consisting of flour going from Guanebagno to Panama. In one of them was found a letter from the viceroy of Lima to the resident at Panama, intimating, that, having intelligence of some enemies lately arrived in the South Seas, he had sent him a quantity of flour to relieve his wants, and enable the garrison to stand out a siege. The prisoners acquainting them likewise, that a fort was erecting at the mouth of the harbour of Guanebagno; a piece of intelligence that made them drop the attempt on Truxillo. Their next resolution was, to bear away for the Gallapago islands, of which they got sight May the 31st. Dampier observes, that the hydrographical charts have not placed these islands enough to the west; yet have almost all the charts since his time retained the former situation, placing them in 181° longitude, and extending to 176°, according to which the longitude from England west is 68°. The Spaniards, the first discoverers, lay down the Gallapagos extending from the equator to five degrees north; but Dampier says they stand under and on both sides the line. He could discover but 15 different islands, some of which were seven or eight leagues in length, and half as much in breadth. Four or five of those situated most to the east were rocky and barren, without trees, shrubs, herbs, or goats, excepting a little by the sea-side. In the Gallapagos, Dampier found the tree called the Dildo, a species of shrub about the size of a man's leg, 10 or 12 feet high, without fruit, leaves, or any other excrescence than strong prickles from the top to the bottom. He found some fresh water in ponds, and the cavities of rocks, but no natural springs. Some of these islands he describes to be low, flat, and fertile, producing many trees and shrubs well known in Europe. The islands lying to the west are large, and produce a variety of curious trees, particularly the tree called the mammee-tree, remarkable for bearing an elegant kind of fig. These islands have also large rivers and brooks of fresh water, the sea breezes by day, and the land breezes by night, without intermission. Hence the air is purified, cooled, and refreshed, so as to make these islands more temperate and wholesome than most places so near the equator. When they approached the shore, they discovered a great number of tortoises sunning themselves at noon-day on the shore; upon these they fed during their stay. Dampier observes, that no part of the globe is so well stocked with guanoes and land tortoises as the Gallapagos. The guanoes are fat, tame, and of an extraordinary size. The land tortoises are so plenty, that an hundred men might live upon them a considerable time, weighing from 150 to 200 pounds, fat and delicate as a pullet. His description on this subject, being really curious, we will present it to the eaters of turtle in his own words: "the land tortoises here A full account of the tortoise. measure from two feet to two feet six inches over the back; whereas in any other place I never met with them above 30 lb. weight, though I have heard it said, that at St. Laurence,
- " or

“ or Madagascar, there are also very large ones. One is by the Spaniards called Hackatec, a “ which keeps chiefly in fresh water ponds. Their legs are small, necks long, their feet flat,
 “ and they commonly weigh betwixt ten and fifteen pounds. The second sort they call Teno- “ pen, much smaller than the former, and of a rounder make; but, for the rest, not unlike “ them, except that the shell on the back is naturally coloured with a curious carved work.
 “ Both sorts afford very good meat, and these last delight in marshy and low places, and are “ in vast numbers on the Isle of Pines near Cuba, among the woods. The tortoises in the “ Gallapagos islands are in shape like the first, with long necks and small heads; only they are “ much bigger. Upon the shoals there grows great plenty of turtle grass, which makes the “ chanel between the islands abound in that kind of sea tortoise commonly called the green “ turtle. Of sea tortoises there are four or five different sorts; the trunk tortoise, the logger- b “ head, the hawk’s-bill, so called from its long small mouth. The trunk tortoise is bigger,
 “ and has a higher and rounder beak than the rest; but its flesh is neither wholesome nor well “ tasted, any more than that of the loggerhead, which feeds on the moss of rocks, and bor“ rows its name from its large head. The hawk’s-bill, besides its mouth, is likewise the “ least of the three. It is this that bears the so much valued shell of which cabinets, boxes, “ combs, &c. are made all over Europe. Of this shell each has from three to four pounds, “ though some have less. The flesh is but indifferent, yet somewhat better than that of the “ loggerhead; though those taken betwixt the Sambeloes and Porto Bella occasion violent “ vomitings and purgings in those that eat of them. It is further remarkable, that the flesh of c
 “ the hawk’s-bill differs according to their food; for those that feed upon moss among the “ rocks have a much yellower fat and flesh, and not so well tasted, as those that feed on grass; “ besides, their shell is not so transparent. These hawk’s-bill tortoises are in divers parts of “ the West Indies, and have their peculiar islands where they lay their eggs, and seldom inter-“ mix with any other kind of tortoises. However, these, as all other sorts, lay their eggs in “ the sand in the same manner. Their laying-time is about May, June, and July, a little “ sooner or later; and they lay three times each season, eighty or ninety eggs at a time, round, “ of the bigness of a hen’s egg, but covered only with a tough film or membrane of a white “ colour. In some of the bays on the north side of Jamaica, the hawk’s-bill turtles lay their “ eggs, as likewise on the bay of Honduras, and in divers places on the continent of America, d
 “ from Trinidad to Vera Cruz, up the bay of New Spain. After a sea tortoise gets ashore “ to lay, she is an hour before she returns, because she always chooses her place above high-“ water mark, where she makes a large hole with her fins in the sand, to lay her eggs in;
 “ which done, she covers them up two feet deep in the same sand she had raked out before.
 “ Sometimes they will take a view of the place before-hand, and be sure to return to the same “ next day to lay. They take the tortoises upon the shore in the night, when they turn “ them upon their backs above high-water mark, and fetch them away next day; but a large “ green tortoise will find work enough for two hearty fellows to turn her upon her back. The “ hawk’s-bills are also found in the East Indies, and on the Guiney coast, but I never met with “ any in the South Seas. The green tortoise derives its name from the greenish colour of the “ shell, which is better coloured than the hawk’s-bill, but has a round and small head; and e
 “ the body is of such a bulk, as to weigh from 200 to 300 pounds. Its flesh is accounted
 “ the best of any, though there is a considerable difference as well in the bulk as in the flesh.
 “ At Blanco in the West Indies they are larger than any in the North Seas, weighing generally “ 250 or 300 pounds; their fat is yellow, the lean white, and both very good. But those “ of Boca Toro, to the west of Porto Bello, are neither so large, nor have so white or well-“ tasted flesh; and those found in the bay of Honduras and Campeachy are less than these, and “ their fat of a greenish colour. I was told, that at Port Royal, in the bay of Campeachy, they “ caught one of these green tortoises which was four feet thick from the back to the belly, “ and six feet broad; a boy of ten years old went in the shell, instead of a boat, on board his “ father’s ship, then at anchor a quarter of a mile from the shore. The fat of this creature f “ yielded eight gallons of oil.

“ THE tortoises found on the little island of Cuba, on the south side, are some bigger,
 “ some less, and their flesh sometimes green, sometimes yellow. These are carried to Port “ Royal in Jamaica, where they are kept in weirs made with stakes. The green tortoises feed “ upon grass six inches long and a quarter of an inch broad, growing in four, five, and six “ fathom water. It is greatly different from the Manatees grass, which has a slender blade.
 “ The tortoises of the Gallapagos are a bastard kind of green turtle, their shell being thicker “ than the others, but their flesh not so good. Besides, they are much larger, and two or “ three feet thick, their bellies five feet broad. In the South Sea is another kind of green tor“ toise, no bigger than the small hawk’s-bill. As they feed on moss, so their flesh is rank, g “ though fat. Both these kinds differ from all the rest; for, whereas in other places the “ female only goes on shore, and that in the night-time; among those, both the male and “ female

- a " female go together in the day, and retire together at night. Both are very fat at first ; but " when they are ready to return, they are lean, though the female not so lean as the male.
 " It is the common opinion that they are nine days engendering, the male on the back of the " female in the water. This is certain, that at that time he will not forsake her, who is " more timorous, and often endeavours to get away ; but that the male keeps her with his " fins, so that if you strike the she, at their first coupling time, you are sure of the he. They " are supposed to live many years, because they are a long time coming to their full growth.
 " In the South Seas, on the west end of the coast of Mexico, is another kind of green tor-" toises, much smaller than the rest, but their flesh well tasted. There is one thing extremely " surprising in all those creatures ; that for three months, while they are laying their eggs, b " they forsake their usual places of resort, and seek others where they lay their eggs ; and it " is generally supposed that they neither eat nor drink all that season. The most noted places " where they breed are, the island Caimanes in the West Indies, and the island of Ascension in " the Western Ocean. No sooner is their coupling time over than they are all gone ; though " it is certain they must swim a great way to come to either of these places, since it has " been taken notice of, that all the before-mentioned tortoises have been found at Caimanes
 " in breeding-time. The nearest place from whence they can swim thither is the island of " Cuba, about forty leagues distance. Those that breed at the isle of Ascension, coming from " the continent, must swim at least three hundred leagues, it being certain, that their places " of constant residence are always near the shore. Thus in the South Seas they go from the c " Gallapagos to lay their eggs on the continent, above an hundred leagues thence. It is farther " observable, that not all the tortoises leave their ordinary places at breeding time, but many " remain there ; and those that go are followed by great numbers of fishes, especially sharks,
 " so that those coasts are left destitute of fish till they return."

- DAMPIER, having staid twelve days here, acquaints us, that the ship then sailed, at the instance of a native of Rio Leja, to that place, which he affirmed to abound with riches. They took their course $4^{\circ} 40'$ latitude. With fair weather and favourable winds, they got sight of Cape Blanco, on the continent of Mexico, by the first of July. On the coast of the North Sea, captain Cooke, who had been confined to his bed from their departure from Juan Fernandez, died, just as they were within a few leagues of land. Here Dampier observes, this is d extremely frequent at sea, people often dying within sight of that very object which themselves and all about them believed would be their cure. While the men were busied digging a grave for him on shore, three Spanish Indians came up to them, and expressed an impertinent curiosity, which the ship's crew gratified in the manner most convenient, watching a fit opportunity to seize them ; which accordingly was done, one of them however escaping before they got them on board. The others confessed they had come as spies from Nicoya, a small Mulatto town twelve leagues distant, which being a place convenient for refitting ships, the governor of Panama had sent advice to the admiral of the arrival of the English in those coasts. After a great deal of other intelligence, they added, that near this place was a beef pen, where the crew might provide themselves with as much beef as they pleased. This news being extremely e grateful to the seamen, Dampier, with twenty-three more hands, went in two boats in quest of the booty. One of the Indians led them to the place, where they found a number of black cattle feeding. Some were for killing three or four immediately ; others thought it better to wait till the next morning. Upon which, Dampier, with eleven more, returned on board, expecting the rest to follow. Hearing nothing of them, at four o'clock, the following afternoon, a party was sent to look for them. The boat was no sooner come into the bay where they landed before, than Dampier saw his comrades upon a small rock half a league from shore, up to the waist in the sea, and almost perished with thirst and hunger. There they had taken refuge against a party of fifty well-armed Spaniards that had assaulted them, and must soon have been lost by the flowing of the tide, had not the long-boat come so opportunely to their f relief.

- THIS transaction passed in the bay of Caldera, where, on the 19th of July, Mr. Edward On captain Davis was elected captain in the room of captain Cooke, deceased. Next day, in company Cooke's death with captain Eaton, they steered for Rio Leja, where they arrived in three days. On their Davis is chosen approach to the harbour, they took a canoe with three Indians, placed as a watch on the little in his room.
 island at the mouth of the harbour, to give notice of the English, of whose coming the governor was apprised. They observed at the same time on the continent a horseman riding full-speed, probably to give intelligence of their arrival. Thus finding themselves discovered, the attempt of the town was laid aside, and they steered their course for the gulph of Amapalla.
 This gulph Dampier describes as a large branch of the sea, entering eight or ten leagues deep g into the country. On the south side of its entrance is Cape Caswina, and on the north-west St.
 " Michael's Mountain, at $12^{\circ} 40'$ north latitude. Between these lie two islands, Mangera and Amapalla, of a black, deep, and stony soil, producing large and lofty trees. The latter has two towns two miles distant from each other, both of them beautified by handsome churches.

Dampier remarks, that, in all his voyages, here only he saw the hog plum-tree growing close to the shore.

Land on the island of Amapalla.

Manners of the inhabitants.

An accident frustrates the design of Davis.

CAPTAIN Davis being sent before with two canoes into the gulph, to procure, if possible, some prisoners, he landed at Mangera, where he took an aged priest and two boys, who were unable to fly with the speed of the other inhabitants. These he made his guides to Amapalla, marching up with them to the nearest town. The inhabitants who were assembled on the top of a hill, were ready to fly into the woods, but prevented by the secretary, an enemy to the Spaniards, who persuaded them that the English were friends, come to request their assistance against the common enemy and oppressors. Upon this, they bid Davis and his men welcome. After the first salutation, they proceeded to the church, the usual place of all public meetings, whether for consultations, mirth, or amusement. Here they keep their vizards, hautboys, strumstrums (a kind of cittern or guitar), and other musical instruments. They dance, sing, play, with antic dresses and gestures, the night preceding a holiday. Dampier observes, that their music has in it something melancholy, and expressive of the Spanish servitude under which they groan. When captain Davis found them all assembled, he endeavoured to excite them against the Spaniards, and was supported strongly by the priest. An accident, however, frustrated their endeavours; for, entering the church, a seaman happened to jostle an Indian, which the latter mistaking for a prelude to rougher usage, took to his heels, and was followed by all the rest of his countrymen. Captain Davis imprudently ordering his men to fire upon them, the secretary was killed, and with him ended the whole project. Davis returned to the ships, carrying along with him the priest, who advised sending for the casica, whose influence was the greatest now the secretary was dead. This accordingly was done, and that chief came attended by six Indians, who did them considerable service in supplying the ships with beef and fresh provisions. Our author remarks, that some years after a company of English and French landed at Amapalla, and went from thence to the continent, marching by land to the Cape river. At the source of this river, they made barcolongos, by which they passed into the North Seas. However, they were not the first discoverers of this passage, as Dampier observes; it having been found out by a party of English, who, thirty years before, went up the Cape river in canoes into the North Seas, and thence to an inland town called Segovia. This they effected not without incredible difficulty, and in no less than the space of a month, the cataracts obliging them to drag their canoes over large tracts of land. Dampier had often conversed with some of the men engaged in this expedition, and he imagines that captain Sbarpe was of the number.

Cape Blanco
the most difficult point of land in the South Seas to double.

The English
take and burn Paita.
A project formed against Guiaquil mis-
carries.

On the 3d of September 1684, they sailed for Amapalla, and arrived on the 20th at the island Plata, situated in $1^{\circ} 10'$ south latitude, having now fallen in with the place where our author begins his voyage, after encompassing the whole continent of South America. On the 30th of October, they doubled Cape Blanco, the most difficult point of land in the South Seas, the spring current setting at north-west preventing the ships from standing to sea. November the 2d, they lay six leagues off Paita, sending their canoes manned with 110 men, to attack the town. Next morning they landed early, and made some prisoners, from whom they received intelligence, that the governor of Piara, with 100 men, had reinforced the garrison of Paita. The English, however, attacked a little fort on an eminence, and took it with little opposition, upon which the governor and inhabitants evacuated the town. The English soon entered it, but found it emptied of money, goods, and provisions. Here they staid for six days in expectation of having the town ransomed, but perceiving the Spaniards had no such intention, they set fire to it, and returned to the fleet. After this exploit they sailed for the island of Rana, to execute a project they had formed against Guiaquil. In their voyage hither, they took a bark laden with Quito cloth, a coarse woollen manufacture worn all over the kingdom of Peru. From the master of this vessel they learnt, that three canoes filled with negroes would come out the next tide. Upon this the English embarked all their men on board canoes, leaving only five men in the bark, with orders not to fire at any thing before eight o'clock next morning, by which time they imagined they would have taken the town. On their approach they met and took one of the barks with the negroes on board. By them they were informed, that the other two would not come out till the next tide. This determined them to push forward, and conceal themselves in a creek, in order to watch the intended barks. By some mistake the project failed, and, of the whole, they only took the two masters, as they were endeavouring to escape on shore. This miscarriage occasioned great confusion, as from thence it was concluded the town would be alarmed, and their scheme frustrated. Some were for returning to the ships; others, of which number was captain Davis, were for penetrating by land, and instantly attacking the town, before it could be put in a posture of defence. Accordingly, with fifty men he began his march; but, after four hours, was forced to abandon the attempt, thick woods and deep marshes preventing his progress. As the tide now answered, it was resolved to row up to the town, and, in case of their

- a their being discovered, to retreat with all possible expedition. At first only one light appeared, but, upon turning a point of land, a great number were observed, which some deemed a sure token of their having been discovered, while others were no less obstinate in the opinion that it was no more than certain orgies and ceremonies usual on the eve of a festival, as the following day happened to be. Captain Swan, and those who maintained the first conjecture, were upbraided with cowardice. A descent was therefore resolved on, and a landing effected about two miles from the town; but as the whole space to the town was over-run with thick wood, they were forced to wait for day-light. This circumstance, and the desertion of one of their guides, disconcerted the whole measure, upon which they retreated to Puna. In their way they seized upon the three above-mentioned barks, on board of which were no less than 1000 stout negroes. They kept 60 of these, and dismissed the rest; a piece of conduct which Dampier greatly blames, and exclaims against as an unpardonable oversight. They ought, Dampier's says he, to be carried to Santa Maria, on the isthmus of Darien, to work the gold mines on ^{project for} that side. By erecting a fort or two at the entrance of the river Maria, and the assistance of ^{establishing a} their friends among the natives, of the English and French privateers, who would naturally ^{settlement on} flock in to them, they would be able, he is of opinion, not only to maintain themselves against ^{the isthmus of} all the power of Spain, but also to extend their conquests to the coasts and gold mines of Quito.

- After this disappointment, it was unanimously resolved, that after providing themselves with fresh water and provisions, they should proceed to Lavelia, a town in the bay of Panama.
c They steered to the river St. Jago, chusing this on account of its vicinity to the island of Gallo, abounding with gold, and affording good anchorage. This river they entered on the 27th ^{The English} of December, by the lesser branches, meeting with no natives for six leagues up, when they ^{enter the river} discovered two huts thatched with palmeto leaves. Soon after they saw several canoes of ^{of St. Jago} Indians, their whole families and household goods, paddling against the stream, but with great rapidity. In the huts they found a few plantanes, a hog, and some fowls. Not perceiving that there was any encouragement to proceed, they returned to the mouth of the river, proposing to pursue their way to Gallo, where they had appointed to meet the ships. Gallo is a small uninhabited island, seated under 3° north, in a spacious bay, three leagues from the river Tomaco. It is pretty high, and well stored with lofty trees; affords fresh water, and a good anchorage.

- d JANUARY the first, after making prize of a small vessel belonging to a Spanish knight, they seized upon a packet of letters going from Panama to Lima, to hasten the plate fleet, the ^{They intercept} armada from Spain being arrived at Porto Bello. This news made them determine to watch ^{letters which} the motions of these rich ships, and cruize off the pearl islands, by which all ships from ^{give them in-} Panama to Lima must necessarily pass. With this view they were under sail on the 7th, and ^{telligence of} the following day took a ship laden with flour. The 16th they took a prize off the pearl islands, bound from Lavelia with maize, beef, salt, and fowls. On the 20th, they made another prize laden with hogs, beef, fowls, and salt. During their stay at Tobagilla, they narrowly escaped being destroyed by a pretended merchant of Panama, who, under colour of ^{A plot of the} carrying on a contraband trade with them, had introduced in the night a fire-ship into the ^{Spaniards to} midst of the squadron. Some of the English suspecting the affair, hailed her to come to an ^{destroy the fleet} anchor, which she refusing, they fired at her. The crew, terrified at their being discovered, set fire to the train, and took to their canoes, which obliged the English ships to cut their cables to save themselves. Captain Swan likewise perceived an Indian upon a float coming towards him, which he suspecting to be loaded with combustibles, sunk it. The fireship was conducted by one Bond, an Englishman, who had deserted the buccaneers. Dampier says, that without his assistance they could not have fitted her out, all those of that nation in the South Seas being grossly ignorant of the art of war, especially in naval affairs.

- NEXT morning, while captains Swan and Davis were busied in recovering the anchors they had cut the preceding night, they observed a whole fleet of canoes pass the coast of Tobagilla.
f This proved to be a body of English and French privateers, who crossed the isthmus of Darien ^{They join com-} from the North to the South Seas. It was composed of 200 French and 80 English, the latter ^{pany with a} of whom were taken on board captains Davis and Swan, and the former put to man a prize. ^{large party of} With this force they sailed to the continent, to meet captain Townley, who, they were told, was likewise crossing the isthmus with 180 men; a junction with whom, they doubted not, would enable them to undertake great exploits. They soon met with Townley and his crew, in two Spanish barks laden with wine and oil he had taken. The whole fleet now amounting to nine sail, they went with confidence to their station, to watch for the plate fleet, of which they had an account by intercepted letters. They were 1000 men strong, had one ship of ^{They skirmish} 36 guns, another of 16, and the rest well provided with small arms. On the 25th they got ^{with the Spa-} fight of the Spanish fleet, which consisted of 14 sail, besides periagoes, or boats of 12 oars. ^{nish squadron;} The ships mounted from 8 to 48 guns, and had about 3000 men on board. Night coming ^{but are defeat-} on ed in their design by the artifice of the enemy.

on before the fleets came near enough to engage, a stratagem of the Spanish admiral gained him the weather-gage before the morning, and rendered the engagement still more unequal. When the dark came on he hung out a lanthorn at his top-head, as a signal to anchor. This light he soon after took down; but in half an hour it appeared again, whence the English concluded that he remained in his former station. No sooner had day approached, than they discovered their mistake, the lanthorn being fixed to the top-mast of an empty bark left at anchor to the leeward, while the Spanish fleet was discovered on the windward bearing down upon them. Every thing being now in confusion, the English, instead of compensating their long toils by rich booty, were happy to get off, and save themselves by a running fight. Thus this great project, which had cost them so much pains in contriving, so many hazards, dangers, and difficulties, in pursuing, vanished in smoke. b

They take the city of Leon.

AFTER this they encountered various dangers and disappointments, till at length they made an attack on the city of Leon. This city stands 20 miles up the country, in a sandy plain, the way to it from the sea being through a champain country, covered with long grass: 470 men were landed for this expedition, who marched up to the city, captain Townley with 80 chosen men leading the van. Advancing two miles before the main body, he drove a party of 70 horse back into the city, which he entered with little resistance: 500 foot and 200 horse were drawn up in the principal street, and made a shew of engaging, but, on Townley's approach, they were disconcerted with the courage of such a handful of men, and retreated precipitately, leaving the city in possession of the English, having removed every thing of any value. Next day the governor sent a trumpet, offering to ransom it; but the English asking 30,000 pieces of eight, he dropped the negotiation, and they set fire to the city, after which they retreated to their ships. The English took here a few prisoners, among the rest a Spanish gentleman, who was released upon his parole to pay them 150 head of oxen at Rio Leja, a promise which he punctually performed. At this latter place captain Swan and captain Davis parted company, the latter intending to return to the coast of Peru, the other purposing to proceed farther west. Dampier, being curious to see the northern parts of the continent of Mexico, quitted Davis's ship, and accompanied Swan. c

They make several descents on the coast of Mexico for provisions.

BEFORE they left Rio Leja, their men began to be much afflicted with fevers, which they attributed to the remains of a contagious distemper that had reigned in the place before their arrival. On the 3d of September they weighed anchor, and steered a westerly course till October the second, when they endeavoured to make a descent upon the coast, in hopes of obtaining some refreshments; in which they were disappointed by the difficulty of landing. Some days after, captain Townley again attempted a descent near the harbour of Guatulco, but with as little success as on the former occasion. The troops indeed were fairly landed; but, after marching fourteen miles up the country, they could meet with nothing worth the trouble they had taken. The 23d, they landed again at Port Angels, in the latitude of 15 degrees north, where they met with store of beef and fresh water, as well as of hogs, maize, and poultry. The 2d of November, some canoes were sent to cut a ship out of the harbour of Acapulco, which they did without opposition. Captain Townley's vessel being extremely leaky, he exchanged her for this, which proved a stout ship and good sailer. On the 11th of December they arrived at Cape Corientes, in 20° 28' north latitude. The ship from the Philippines necessarily making this point in her way homewards, captain Swan resolved to cruise off here. The ships took their stations in such a manner as they imagined would render it impossible for her to pass unnoticed; but as the squadron was in want of provisions, 50 men were detached in canoes to examine what the country afforded. They returned the 17th, without any purchase. After this, captain Townley landed in the beautiful valley of Valderas, where his party was attacked by 150 Spaniards, who were soon put to flight, with the loss of their commander, and 17 troopers. The reward of this victory was no more than 50 bushels of maize, which Townley carried on board: an acquisition of great importance in the present circumstances of the fleet. After this the fleet came again before the valley of Valderas, where they killed a great number of black cattle, and fully supplied the whole squadron with beef; but, in the mean while the Manila ship escaped from them; a loss which was attributed to the obstinacy of Townley. Dampier launches out into severe invectives against this officer, which shews how much he was chagrined at the loss of so rich a prize. Hitherto they had a double design in view, either watching the Manila ship, or examining the coast for rich towns and mines; but the first intention being frustrated, discord arose; in consequence of which Swan and Townley parted, the former holding his course, and the other going back to the east. f

The fleet separates.

STILL Dampier kept by Swan, resolving to make a complete tour. Seven leagues north-north-west of the islands of Chametty, a party was landed in 24 degrees, where they were encountered by a party of Spaniards, who made but a short resistance. From some Indian prisoners made, the English had intelligence that the town which presented itself was called Massatan; g

- a Massatan; and that five leagues farther were some rich gold mines. The English were, however, so much distressed for provisions, that, neglecting the mines, they went in search of maize; of which they picked up a few bushels. This quantity not being sufficient for their purpose, they sailed towards the fine river of St. Jago. Entering it with their canoes, they rowed for some time, and then landed under a field where the natives were gathering maize. One of them they made prisoner, and by him were informed, that a few miles up the country was a town called Santa Pecaque, where they would find provisions. Thither the party immediately took their march, and entered it without opposition. They found here abundance of maize, sugar, salt, and salt-fish. Captain Swan directed that one half of the party should carry provisions on board, while the other defended the town; but receiving advice that 1000 Spaniards were on their march from St. Jago, about three leagues distant, to attack him, he ordered all the horse possible to be got together, on which he piled provisions, and marched with them to his canoes. Notwithstanding all their expedition, they were way-laid by the Spaniards, a great part of their provisions retaken, some of their men killed, and others made prisoners. Among the slain was Mr. Ringrose, who published captain Sharpe's journal, and a history of the buccaneers.

They take Santa Pecaque; but are way-laid by the Spaniards.

- c CAPTAIN Sharpe returning on board with the remainder of his men and booty, it was determined in a general council to sail to Cape St. Lucas in California, in hopes of a commerce with the Indians there, and consequently in the lake of California. This lake is a chanel, or part of the sea, between an island and the continent; but little known to the Spaniards, or else concealed by them, lest the other nations of Europe should discover that way to the mines of Mexico. They vary considerably concerning its situation in their charts; some make it an island, others the continent; but none of them give any account of the tides, the soundings, or the harbours near this lake; whereas their hydrographical maps describe the coasts towards Asia, on the west side of the island, from Cape St. Lucas to 40 degrees north. The vast distance of this country, and the reasons we have given, have prevented other nations from penetrating to the mines of Mexico. Several attempts have indeed been made for the discovery of a north-west passage; but if we may be permitted to offer our opinion, wrong methods have been taken. Instead of searching for the passage through Davis's or Hudson's Bay, we would think it promised more success by beginning the scrutiny with the South Seas, thence along California, and so a passage made back into the West Seas. The same rule might be observed in searching for a north-east passage; viz. wintering about Japan, Corea, and the north-east part of China, and hence taking advantage of the approaching spring and summer to go along the coast of Tartary, whence you may have time enough to reach Archangel, or some other port on those coasts.

The lake of California either little known or concealed by the Spaniards.

Proposals for a new method of searching for the north-east and north-west passages.

- e SAILING from Cape Corientes on March the 31st, they got sight of Guam, one of the Ladrones, on May the 20th. Having secured fresh provisions here, they steered for the Philippines, where they arrived on the 21st of June. Our author is extremely circumstantial in respect to the history of the Philippines, of which we shall here say nothing, having reserved that subject for another place. At Mindanao the author was present at the circumcision of the king's nephew, the son of Rajah Daut, which was performed with extraordinary pomp and magnificence. He acquaints us, that the natives were extremely urgent with the English to settle in the island, as a bulwark between them and the Dutch, whose cruelty and avarice they dreaded. Dampier is at great pains to demonstrate that a more prudent measure could not, in their present circumstances, be followed than establishing such a colony. They were provided with all kinds of artificers, carpenters, bricklayers, shoemakers, taylor, and also with convenient tools, arms, guns, and small-arms, sufficient for a beginning; and they might reasonably expect supplies from England, in the space of 18 months from their first settling. Captain Swan was invited on shore by Rajah Daut, who promised to furnish him with all the provisions he wanted; but desired he would in the mean time secure his ship in the river against the approaching storm. This the captain, after some deliberation, agreed to; but the river being narrow it was with great difficulty she could get a quarter of a league above its entrance. Here she was moored fast, and the inhabitants of the city of Mindanao frequently came on board, inviting the English to their houses, where they entertained them in a hearty manner with tobacco and betel. As for the captain, he was every day entertained at the Rajah's house, and boiled rice, fowls, and buffaloes flesh, given to such of his men as had no money. Notwithstanding these external marks of friendship, Swan began to suspect the Rajah's integrity and sincerity. This prince had been mean enough to borrow several sums of money of captain Swan, which he could never get from him. This, and many other doubts concerning his designs, determined the English to quit the island. January the 13th was appointed for their departure; but many of them, unwilling to leave the island, had dispersed themselves up and down the country, by the encouragement of the Rajah. A majority, however, were for quitting the island at the appointed time; and the captain not being ready to depart, they deposed him, chusing in his room

Dampier's proposal for settling in the Philippines.

captain Tate. Swan, with about 40 of the men, were left on the island, besides 16 they had a buried.

A prodigious size of bats.

ANCHORING on February 3d in the latitude of $15^{\circ} 9'$ north, on the west side of the island of Sebo, they saw in the bay a low woody little island, inhabited only by a kind of bat of an incredible size, the wings, when extended, being seven or eight feet from pinion to pinion. Every night they took their flight to the great island, returning before dawn to thick haunts in this solitude. On the 23d they took a Spanish bark off the island of Luconia. A canoe came to them from Manila, offering to convey their letters to certain merchants in the town, who would be glad to carry on a clandestine trade with them. By these Indians they were informed likewise, that no less than thirty sail were lying in the harbour of Manila, Chinese, Spaniards, and Portuguese. The 23d of March they came to the island of Ubi, forty leagues west of Pulo Condore, lying near the south-west point of land that forms the long cape or promontory of Siam, called Cambodia. May the 21st, returning to Pulo Condore, some of the English going on board a Malayan vessel, ten of them were stabbed by the crew, of which wounds they soon died; however, it was not convenient for the rest to revenge their death. In June they arrived on the coast of China, anchoring at the island of St. John, on the coast of Canton, in $22^{\circ} 30'$ north latitude. After encountering a violent storm, they steered to the Piscadores

*They arrive at the Pisca-
dores islands.
An account of
those islands.*

in 23 degrees north lat. Here they were civilly received by the Tartarian governor, who sent them refreshments and other presents; in return for which Mr. Read, now captain of the ship, sent him a silver-hilted sword, a carbine, and a gold chain. The Piscadores islands are in general high and rocky, with fertile and pleasant vallies, which, besides fine grass, produce plantains, bananas, pine-apples, pumpions, sugar-canes, potatoes, and some cotton. These islands afford fine brooks of fresh water, are well-stored with hogs, fowls wild and tame, with every other necessary of life. The natives are short, thick, round-visaged, with low foreheads, and thick eyebrows. Their eyes of an hazel-colour, and small. Their noses are flat and short, their lips and mouths of the ordinary size; their teeth white and regular, their hair long, lank, and black, and their complexion of a dark copper colour. They go always bare-headed, and the greater part wholly naked, with only a small bit of rag tied round the waist. Some have jackets of plantain-leaves, but rough as a goat's skin. The women have a short petticoat of coarse callicoe, of their own manufacture, reaching a little below the knee. Both sexes wear ear-rings of a yellow metal like gold, having its weight and malleability, but something paler in the colour. Dampier is doubtful whether, for this reason, and that he observed it lose its brightness, it be true gold; concerning which we, however, have no kind of doubt, as every chymist knows it to be possessed of the true requisites of pure gold, viz. its weight and ductility. As for the colour, it is adventitious, and may easily be given to artificial gold; but the other two qualities are what constitute its real value, and never yet could be imitated.

ONE experiment which Dampier mentions would seem, however, to contradict our opinion; it is the custom the natives have of putting it into a quick fire till it was red-hot, after they had besmeared it with a red earth or loam. By this means they refine it without melting, all the sulphurous particles flying off.

*R marks on
the Pisca-
dores islands,
with an account of the natives.*

THE houses of the natives are small, scarce five feet high. They stand in little villages upon the sides of a rock, three or four rows one above the other. The rocky precipices seem to be formed by nature into different shelves or stories running parallel, upon which they build a row of houses, and a second up to them, a third and so on as far as the nature of the rock favours their design. Each row communicates with ladders set up like flights of stairs. By this they are not only exceedingly sociable, but secure; these ladders being removed, there is no access. Nor are they less expert in building their boats and larger vessels, of which they make great use, fishing being their chief employment and amusement. They never kill hogs or goats, but feed upon the intrails of such as die by accident or disease; even their skins they eat, after having burnt off the hair. Another extraordinary dish is in great esteem at certain seasons of the year; we mean a dish of locusts, which they take in their nets, and boil or bake in an earthen pan. Dampier says, that it eats deliciously; and perhaps it is prejudice only which nauseates the stomach of an European at the thoughts of it. Their common drink is simple and pure water; but at festivals, and all other extraordinary occasions, they use a sort of liquor boiled out of the sugar-cane, mixed with black berries. This they put into jars, suffer it to ferment, refine, and settle; after which it become a pleasant and strong wine, resembling in taste and colour our English beer. They call it Bashee, whence the English sailors called one of those islands by this name. Dampier says their language bears no affinity to the Chinese, Malayan, or any other language he had ever heard.

THEIR only weapon is a kind of lance, headed with iron. A sort of armour they use of a buffaloe's hide, without sleeves, close about their shoulders, reaching below the knee, and there about

- a about three feet wide; the whole stiff, hard, and impenetrable as an oak plank. Dampier could observe no kind of religion among them. They seemed to have neither idols, worship of any kind, laws, or government, except a certain family precedency, and respect which children paid to their parents, and young people to old men. However, he imagines that they have some laws established by antient custom; for he saw a young man buried alive for theft. The wife stands in great awe and obedience to her husband; insomuch, that our author suspects he has the power of life and death over her and her children. The boys are bred up to fishing, and the girls to working under their mothers in the plantations, which are smaller or larger in proportion to the family; no riches being requisite here, and nothing more required than to supply the wants and calls of nature. They are a peaceable, hospitable, and civil people both to strangers and to each other. During the stay of the English there, not the smallest difference arose either among themselves or with the sailors in the course of commerce, tho' there were not wanting occasions, had they been of a quarrelsome humour.

- After laying in a stock of fresh provisions, and making the necessary observations, they weighed anchor with intention to pass to Manila, there to cruise for the Manila galleon; but a violent storm disconcerted their measures, terrified the men from continuing in those seas, and determined the captain to bear away for Cape Comorin. Captain Tate's opinion to go round the east side of the Philippines, keeping south of the Spice islands, to pass to the Indian Ocean, prevailed. By the 29th of December they discovered two islands south-west of Timor, from which they stood off south towards New Holland. Here Dampier affirms, in the most positive manner, that no part of New Holland lies by forty leagues so far north as is laid down in all preceding hydrographical charts. His reasons are, that a shoal placed by those charts under $23^{\circ} 5'$ south-west from the east end of the island of Timor, did not appear to them till they had sailed fifty or sixty leagues further; and that they found the tides on the coast of New Holland keeping their constant course, the flood running north-by-east, and the ebb south-by-east. On January the 4th they fell in with the coast of New Holland, at $16^{\circ} 5'$ south latitude. His observations here are such as we have taken notice of in his voyage expressly made for discoveries in the South Seas. May the 5th they arrived at Nicobar, where Dampier quitted the ship, and took passage in a large canoe to Sumatra, whence he embarked in an English Indiaman to Togaia, from thence to Madrafs, afterwards to Benculi, and at last to England, where he arrived in July 1691.

Thus ended the voyage of the Buccaneers round the world; the reputation of which recommended our author to the favour of the most ingenious and public-spirited persons of the age. As the earl of Pembroke was the most powerful in his patronage, so were his professions the warmest and most sincere. His countenance chiefly it was that enabled Dampier to undertake the expedition we have already mentioned to New Guiney and New Holland. Although he had no command in the present circuit, yet the accuracy of his journals, and the genius he discovered for observation, gave him the chief reputation of it, and pointed him out as a person qualified for making discoveries in the South Seas.

S E C T IX.

Containing a concise view of the voyage round the world performed by Captain Woodes Rogers. Next an introduction to Mr. Anson's expedition round Cape Horn; the distresses he suffered in his passage; the loss of the Wager sloop, and misfortunes of Captain Cheap; the taking of Païta. The dreadful situation of the Centurion before her arrival at the Ladrões; the happiness the seamen enjoyed at Tinian; Mr. Anson's departure for China; his transactions there; his cruise for the Acapulco ship; the taking of the galleon; his second arrival in China; his visit to the viceroy of Canton; and lastly his arrival in England; with reflections on the voyage. To this account is annexed a short view of Admiral Pizarra's squadron sent from Old Spain to intercept the commodore; with the numberless distresses he encountered in his attempt to double Cape Horn.

An account of Woodes Rogers's voyage into the South Seas.

IN the year 1708, an expedition was set on foot by the merchants of Bristol, which terminated in a voyage round the World. Captain Woodes Rogers, an active, resolute, and vigilant officer, was appointed commander in chief of two stout privateers, well-manned and provided for a long voyage and desperate attempts. Woodes bore away for the Cape de Verd islands, where, by his courage, he suppressed a dangerous mutiny on board, sails for the South Seas, takes a prize, performs several gallant exploits on the coast of Mexico and Peru, arrives upon the coast of California, where he entered upon commerce with the natives; takes a Manila ship richly laden, after a warm engagement; he engages three other Manila ships, but, after a long struggle for victory, is forced to abandon the enterprize; he continues his voyage to Batavia, and thence proceeds for England, where he arrived in October 1711. This expedition was supported with abundance of spirit, and the plan so well laid that it could not fail of success. Captain Rogers's wound that he received in the first engagement was some impediment to his succeeding in the next; but the loss of so rich a prize as the Manila squadron ought wholly to be attributed to the great superiority of the Spaniards. There is a variety of curious occurrences in this voyage, that render it well deserving of the reader's perusal; but our limits will admit of no more than a brief recital of the contents. After this the voyages of Clipperton and Shelvocke were undertaken in the year 1719; but as we have already given a short account of these, we shall proceed to that of George Anson, Esq; in the Centurion, as commodore of a squadron of British ships (A).

The voyage of George Anson, Esq; with a British squadron, into the South Seas; with the importance of keeping open that navigation.

FROM the time that Spain possessed herself of the West Indies and the southern continent of America, it has been deemed a maxim of state, that the best way to reduce her power, and humble her pride, is by attacking her in the South Seas. This maxim was cultivated with great diligence and equal success, under the glorious reign of Queen Elizabeth. Even in that of her indolent successor, when a quarrel with Spain broke out in 1624, the first thing thought of by our patriots was an expedition either to the West or to the South Seas. The project was called the West India Association, supported and approved by men the most eminent for birth, opulence, and ability, of any in the nation. This scheme, however, shared the fate of most other public-spirited, bold, and honest projects of that reign. It was entered upon with vehemence, pursued with languor, and suffered to vanish into nothing, through indolence and corruption. The next rupture with Spain, which was under the protectorate of Cromwell, produced the same designs, but with effects as different as were the dispositions of James and Oliver. By this latter Father Gage was encouraged to publish his account of the West Indies; a circumstance which that active and enterprising usurper converted into immediate advantage; for, upon Gage's account, the project upon Hispaniola was formed, the consequence of which thing, however, of any considerable importance appears in these expeditions, we shall proceed to that of Mr. Anson, and gratify the reader with as minute a detail of this curious voyage, as the nature of our design, and the limits of this work, will permit. For the rest, we must refer him to the general account digested of it from the papers of Mr. Waiter, by the ingenious Mr. Robertson.

(A) In the Histoire des Navigations aux Terres Australes, we have, previous to this of commodore Anson's, now Lord Anson, an account of voyages performed by Gentil de Barbinais, A. 1716, by Antoine Contova in 1731, by Lozier Bouvet in 1739; and, subsequent to Lord Anson's in the year 1747, a voyage through the Streights of Le Maire was performed by Henry Brignon. As no-

a was the conquest of Jamaica; an island the most valuable perhaps of all the British colonies. After the restoration, notwithstanding Great Britain was on terms of friendship with Spain, Charles sent Sir John Narborough, in the year 1669, by the Streights of Magellan, into the South Seas. To acknowledge the truth, our privateers, Sbarpe, Davis, Swan, and others, were continually infesting South America; so that our seamen were no strangers at that time to any of the passages into the South Seas. It was then no unusual practice with the merchants of London and Bristol to fit out ships for these parts; but whether for the purposes of trade, or for the less fair but easier profits of privateering, is, at this distance of time, a point we cannot clearly determine. Whatever their purposes might have been, certain it is that frequent expeditions were made into the South Seas, and no complaints heard of the danger, fatigue, and b hardships of such a voyage. This sufficiently evinces the necessity of keeping every branch of navigation open, if we would always preserve ourselves in a condition to secure and extend our trade, and maintain the reputation of Great Britain as a maritime power. After the revolution, several proposals were made, and received with approbation, for establishing a commerce in the South Seas. It is even beyond doubt that King William gave instructions to admiral Bembow to inquire how far any of these projects were practicable. On the breaking out of the general war in the reign of Queen Anne, all the world expected that the first thing the maritime powers would have tried, would be the effects a squadron would have in the South Seas, either for the service of Charles, the prejudice of the duke of Anjou, or the general advantage of the confederates. The British nation, in particular, was earnest that the war might be carried on c in this way; and, to give them hopes, the legislature so far approved the sentiments of the people, that a bill was introduced into parliament, and passed by the house of lords, for the better carrying on the war by sea and land in the West Indies. It was, by ministerial craft, lost in the house of commons, and all designs of that nature laid aside, for reasons with which the public has never yet been made acquainted. The only expedition during the whole war was that of the Duke and Duchess ships, under captain Rogers, just mentioned. Clamours, on a change of ministry, were raised upon this head, and a sudden resolution was taken to secure all the advantages the nation could expect from a South Sea trade. This ended in erecting a company with the name and title, but without advancing the wishes of the people in their favourite scheme, by the manner of their establishment. The nation soon discovered that the d company was an empty name; that other measures were wanted to bring this trade to any degree of height; and till more effectual methods could be taken, the merchants once more began to send privateers, which produced the voyages of Shelvocke and Clipperton. Hence it is apparent what the sense of the nation has been for a series of years, in regard to attacking the Spaniards in their colonies and plantations. One additional reason for sending a squadron into the South Seas concurred in the last war with the others we have mentioned; the nation had been long deprived of the liberty of sending ships, even in profound peace to the South Seas, which was not the case before the establishment of the company. It was therefore not surprising, that as soon as the last rupture with Spain happened, the general voice of the nation should dictate such an expedition, as might revive the navigation in the South Seas, and likewise affect

e the enemy in a tender part. Hence was it that so universal a joy spread itself over the nation at the time this enterprize was first undertaken, and a fleet for that purpose equipped. During its stay at Portsmouth, there was a most general expectation of its performing things of the highest consequence to Great Britain, and reducing the enemy to reason.

At London every one spoke of it as a design that must necessarily be attended with consequences highly advantageous, if properly conducted. Their hopes of success were raised to the highest pitch, when it was known that captain Anson was named to the command. He had, upon all occasions, shewn himself an officer equally vigilant in his duty, and moderate in the exercise of power; correcting the enormities of his inferiors by example rather than harsh reproof; by which he had acquired, in the course of his services, the esteem of the officers, and f the affections of the seamen; qualities rarely blended in the same person, but justly ascribed to him.

The great expectations of the British nation from this expedition of commodore Anson.

ALTHOUGH his majesty's instructions to the commodore were dated January the 31st, 1740, yet he did not receive them from the duke of Newcastle, the principal secretary of state, before the 28th of June. Afterwards a variety of accidents continued to hinder his departure. On his arrival at Spithead, he found the squadron wanted 300 seamen of the full compliment; a deficiency that was not supplied till the latter end of July, and even then but imperfectly. Instead of 300 able sailors, his fleet was augmented by no more than 170 raw men, of which 98 were marines. To increase his mortification, 500 invalids, collected from Chelsea college, were substituted in the room of Bland's regiment of foot, and three independent companies of 100 men

g each, which he had been given to expect. Indeed as these out-pensioners are reputed to amount to 2000 in number, there was a possibility of being able to cull out 500 men capable of discharging their duty. But, alas! they had been before draughted; and, instead of rough hardy veterans, an aged, feeble, and decrepid detachment was sent to make the circuit of

The various disappointments he met with before sailing.

the globe. The commodore was chagrined at the disappointment, and the old soldiers disgusted at being thus hurried away from the repose their services merited, to perish by disease in a long voyage before they could arrive at the scene of action. Many of them were above 70, most of them exceeding 60 years of age, and all of them much fitter to spend the remainder of their lives in the enjoyment of peace and tranquility than amidst the perils of storms and the frowns of war. The consequence was, that above a third deserted, and their place was supplied by 210 marines draughted from different regiments, being a raw undisciplined corps.
Thus the commodore's land-force was composed of young men, who knew not the use of arms, or of veterans who had long lost the ability of using them. The squadron, however, being put in the best condition that such circumstances would admit of, he made the necessary dispositions for sailing.

THE squadron consisted of the following ships of war, and others; viz. (B)

The number and strength of this squadron.

	Commanders.	Guns.	Men.
Centurion , —	Commodore George Anson ,	60	- 400
Gloucester , —	— — — Captain Norris ,	50	- 300
Severn , —	— — — — — Legge ,	50	- 300
Pearle , —	— — — — — Mitchel ,	40	- 250
Wager , —	— — — — — Kidd ,	28	- 140
Trial sloop,	— — — — — Murray ,	16-8	- 100-80
Tenders.		Tons.
Anna Pink ,	— — — — —	400
Industry ,	— — — — —	200

were to attend the squadron till the provisions on board were so far consumed as to make room for that on board the tenders, after which they were to be discharged.

He sails at length from St. Helen's.

WITH this squadron of six men of war, and a body of land-forces commanded by lieutenant-colonel Cracherode, the commodore sailed from Spithead to St. Helen's on the 10th of August, where, for want of positive orders, he was detained till the 18th of September, when, joining another squadron under Sir Chaloner Ogle, he got under sail by ten that evening. It was then observed, that no ships destined for the South Seas had ever begun their voyage at that season of the year; yet perhaps in this remark was less truth than was generally imagined; for Sir John Narborough, one of our best seamen, did not weigh from England before the 26th of the same month. Commodore Anson tided it, and cleared the channel in four days, arriving at the Madeiras on the 28th of October; a tedious passage, which made the seamen more clamorous against the dilatory proceedings that prevented their sailing several weeks sooner.

He arrives at the Madeiras.

After continuing about a week at the Madeiras, in wooding, watering, and providing the fleet with necessaries, the commodore gave orders for weighing. Previous, however, to this, a small alteration was made in the command, owing to the ill state of health of captain Norris, who obtained leave to return home. Captain Kidd, of the Wager, was appointed to the Pearl; Mitchel, of the Pearl, removed to the Gloucester; Murray, of the Trial sloop, succeeded to the Wager, and his ship was given to lieutenant Cheap. Just before his departure from the Madeiras, the commodore received advice from two English privateers, that 10 sail of ships, supposed to be Spanish, were cruising off to the westward. He sent one of the privateers in quest of them, but she returned the next day without any intelligence, upon which the squadron weighed to proceed on their course. The island of St. Catherine's, on the coast of Brazil, was appointed for the rendezvous of the whole squadron, in case of separation. On the 13th of December they crossed the tropic of Capricorn; and on the 19th had sight of the island of St. Catherine's, after having lost a great number of men by the intemperance of the climate.
Many besides were confined to their hammocks, in calentures, past all hopes of recovery, and some in a very languid condition with dysenteries, fluxes, and tenesmus's, the common attendants on the recovery from a calenture. It was with great joy they arrived at a place where they expected refreshments. They moored the ships, wooded and watered, cleansed the vessels, examined the rigging, and, above all, took every precaution for the recovery and ease of the sick, for whom a tent was pitched on shore.

Sickness in the fleet which greatly reduces the crews.

THE season of the year growing every day less favourable for their passage round Cape Horn, the commodore was very desirous of leaving the island, but was detained in securing the masts of the sloop till the 18th of January, when he again proceeded to sea. After all the care taken properly to refit the Trial sloop, she was still in a crazy condition. On the 24th, the head of her mainmast being carried away, and her foremast sprung, she was taken into tow by the Gloucester. On February the 8th the crews were put to short allowance, having two quarts of water a day. On the 13th they found themselves off Cape Blanco, which at a distance

(B) Some accounts affirm that the Centurion had 513 Mr. Walter's account admits of. See Harris's Voyages, men, the Gloucester 350, the Severn the same number; vol. i. p. 338.
in short all of them a greater proportion of men than

- a appears like a long table. Three days after they fell in with a sail, to which the Gloucester gave chase. It proved to be the Pearl, separated from the squadron by a hard gale some days before. She had been chased by five large Spanish men of war, from which she escaped by favour of the night. This was Pizarro's squadron, who had received so minute intelligence of every thing belonging to the British squadron, that by exactly imitating the red broad pendant of the commodore at the main-topmast-head, he had nearly drawn in the Pearl to her destruction. On the 18th the British squadron anchored in the bay of St. Julian, on the coast of Patagonia, situated in the latitude of 49 degrees 11 minutes south latitude, and in the longitude of 80 degrees west from London. The captain of the Pearl having died during her separation from the fleet gave room for another promotion. Captain Murray succeeded to the Pearl, and his command was filled up by captain Cheap, who had for his successor Mr. Saunders his lieutenant. There was a report through the fleet, that captain Kidd should, on his death-bed, have declared, that this voyage, entered upon with such high expectations, would in the end produce poverty, vermin, famine, and every other misery that could complete the measure of their destruction. But however current this rumour passed, it is probable that the prophecy, so unbecoming a man of sense and a seaman, had no foundation in truth. An English officer knows his duty too well to serve his country only for the increase of his fortune, or to breathe discontent and despondency amongst his sailors. This story, therefore, was probably forged by certain persons, as an excuse to colour their own ill conduct. Without doubt it was attended with unlucky effects, and the dejection it inspired contributed not a little to produce the mischiefs it predicted.

The Pearl brings him intelligence of Pizarro's squadron.

Some promotions in the squadron.

- THE squadron remained a week in port St. Julian, over-haling the rigging, receiving their proportion of stores out of the tenders and Trial sloop, and taking in salt. As no water could be found on that coast, the men were restricted to one quart a day, and three pints for the sick. The 27th the squadron weighed; but the Gloucester, not being able to purchase her anchors, cut away, leaving her best bow anchor and the third of a cable behind. March the 4th the commodore had sight of Cape Virgin Mary, at the entrance of the Streights of Magellan, bearing south-west-by-south. Immediately before their sailing a council of war was held on board the Centurion by the sea officers and colonel Cracherode, when the commodore acquainted them, that it was an article in his instructions to endeavour to secure some port in the South Seas, where the ships might be careened and refitted; he therefore proposed, that their first attempt should be on the town of Baldivia, the chief frontier of the district of Chili. To this proposition the council unanimously acceded; and, in consequence of this resolution, new instructions were given to the captains, directing them, in case of separation, to cruise off the island of Neustra Seniors de Socoro for ten days; whence, if not joined by the commodore, they were to proceed and cruise off the harbour of Baldivia. If, in 14 days more, they were not joined by the rest of the squadron, they were then to proceed to the island of Juan Fernandez, and to regulate their future proceedings by their former orders. But as the separation of the fleet might be attended with the worst consequences, each captain was enjoined not to keep his ship at a greater distance than two miles from the commodore. On the 6th they first saw Terra del Fuego, and the day following got sight of the Three Brothers, at the very mouth of the Streights of Le Maire. At length, after a continual series of hardships, and the greatest calamities that sickness, want, and tempests, could bring along with them, the commodore arrived in the South Seas. It would greatly exceed our bounds to relate every minute circumstance; sufficient it is, that fancy cannot picture to itself dangers more perilous, and distresses more pressing and severe than those the squadron suffered. Above 200 men were dead, most of the crews confined to their hammocks; those who were able to keep the deck were too feeble to be of use in working the ship; and the few healthy men that remained were pinched by hunger and thirst, and fatigued to death with continual watching, and the business of their respective ships.

Mr. Anson makes some stay in the port of St. Julian.

The commodore acquaints a council of the officers with his instructions, in consequence of which certain resolutions are taken.

Mr. Anson arrives in the South Seas, after an unhappy passage round Cape Horn.

- f APRIL the 19th they parted with the Gloucester and Wager, the latter of which they never again saw; an unaccountable accident, considering they had now better weather than any time since their passing the streights, and were but a moderate distance from Juan Fernandez. The Centurion and Gloucester were, of all the squadron, in perhaps the most pitiable condition; with hands scarce sufficient left to work the ships, the living were pestered with rats, and the most disagreeable animals. Their sick men had even their toes eaten off by that nauseous vermin, and their bodies miserably mangled by those rapacious enemies. On the 9th of June the commodore descried land, which proved to be the island of Juan Fernandez, a piece of intelligence received by the seamen with incredible transport. The Centurion was in an inconceivable state of debility, their water exhausted, and the officers without distinction obliged to assist in navigating the ship. But the emotions of the seamen are not to be described when they approached near enough the shore to behold the prospect of a pure limpid stream of fresh water that poured down in a crystal cascade from a rock an hundred feet high into the sea. The 11th they entered the harbour, being the same day joined by the Trial, which had lost 34 of her men men since their separation, and sustained hardships little inferior to those suffered by the Centurion. This island, which stands 110 leagues from the coast of Chili, is perhaps the only commodious place where British cruisers can refresh and recover their men after a passage from the North Seas, and where they may remain for some time without alarming the Spanish coasts. This rendered the situation of the commodore the happier, especially as he was to wait so long for the junction of the rest of the fleet.

The Gloucester and Wager are separated from the squadron.

He arrives at Juan Fernandez.

The condition of the crews.

HOWEVER eager their desire might be to free the sick from their loathsome confinement, and their own impatience to get on shore, they had not hands sufficient to prepare tents for their reception before the 16th. On that and the two following days, they were busied in landing them, the whole amounting to 179 persons, 12 of whom died in the boats, occasioned by the too violent pressure of the air upon their enfeebled and spiritless bodies. As this was a work of great fatigue to the few healthy men, the commodore and other officers lent their aid without distinction of station or quality. They now expected an immediate recovery to their infirm companions, from the happiness of the climate, and the refreshments the island afforded; but, to their great mortification, it was 20 days after their landing before the mortality ceased, or even abated. For the first 12 days they buried six or seven in a day, and those who promised a longer life recovered by slow and almost insensible degrees. On the 27th they had sight of the Gloucester; and conjecturing, from their own situation, what hers must be, sent a lieutenant with a few hands in the yawl to inquire into her condition. Captain Mitchell thought proper to detain the hands to assist in working his ship, not above 80 of his whole crew being able to keep the deck. He continued for a whole week off and on, within four leagues of the island, sometimes endeavouring to bring the ship in tow to the harbour, at other times changing this ineffectual measure for some other. At last, on the 10th of July, in spite of all his efforts, he was driven quite out of sight, when the people on shore began to despair of ever again seeing the companions of their misfortunes. On the 16th she was again within sight of the island, fired two guns, and made a signal of distress, having then but one puncheon of water left. This want the commodore immediately supplied by his boats, sending likewise wine and other refreshments. The 19th she was a second time blown off to the lesser island of Juan Fernandez, about 20 leagues south-south-west of the greater. Here the Gloucester attempted to send her boat on shore for water, having sight of several rivulets, but to no purpose. On the 23d they made the larger island once more, and that day came to an anchor; upon which the commodore dispatched some hands, to assist them in mooring.

The distressed condition of the Gloucester.

Four ships of the squadron still missing.

As the men on shore were now tolerably recovered, they diligently fell to cleaning their ships, filling water, cutting wood, and preparing for the prosecution of their voyage. Four ships of the squadron were still missing, which inconceivably afflicted the commodore, who represented them to his imagination in circumstances the most deplorable. Captain Mitchell having discovered an island called Masu Fuero, lying about 22 leagues to the westward of Juan Fernandez, it was thought possible that either the other ships might have mistaken this for the place of rendezvous, or at least have it out of their power to proceed further. The commodore ordered the Trial sloop to proceed thither, to see whether the event would justify their conjecture; but she returned without being able to bring the smallest intelligence. In the mean time the commodore ordered coppers for baking bread for the sick to be erected on shore; but it happened that the greater part of the flour was on board the victualler the Anna pink, which obliged him to shorten the allowance of the seamen.

The Centurion
takes a prize,
and is joined by one of the tenders.

SEPTEMBER the 7th a sail appeared in the offing; upon which the commodore, slipping his cables, gave her chase. The next day they lost sight of her; but soon discovered another, which they took, returning with her to Juan Fernandez. The prize was called the Camilla, and had on board, among other things, 140,000 pieces of eight. Soon after this they were joined by the Anna pink; but on her arrival she was found unfit for further service, unloaded, her rigging taken out, and condemned. After this the fleet weighed, in order to cruise upon the Spanish shore, having sent the Trial sloop before, to cruise in a certain latitude, till joined by the commodore. After the Anna pink there remained missing of the fleet the Severn, Pearl, and Wager, the other victualler having delivered her provisions, and been discharged before their arrival in the South Seas. These ships all underwent very signal disasters. The Severn and Pearl parted company with the commodore off Cape Noir, put back into the Brazils; whilst captain Cheap, in the Wager, seemed to have all the complicated misfortunes suffered by the rest of the squadron united and discharged upon his head. He had on board a few field-pieces mounted for land-service, some cohorns, several kinds of artillery stores, pincers, tools, and other materials, intended for the operations on shore. This made the commodore and captain Cheap extremely desirous, that as the enterprise at Baldivia was projected, every thing might be in readiness for the execution, if the squadron should rendezvous off that coast (B). As the Wager, with the loss of the Wager, and the misfortunes of Captain Cheap.

An account of

(B) We have extracted from Harris the account published by the gunner and carpenter; an account which ought to be read with attention, and merits regard, as it stands uncontradicted by any future publication, except

- a this view, was making the best of her way to the first rendezvous, whence she proposed steering for Baldavia, she made the land on the 14th of May, and at half an hour past four in the afternoon struck upon a rock at about the latitude of 47 degrees south. The crazy condition of the ship, being little better than a wreck, prevented her from keeping off to sea, and entangled her more and more with the land, which occasioned the present misfortune. She was grounded between two sharp rocks, presently bulged at about a cannon-shot from shore, and was intirely lost, but not before the crew had time to escape to land in the boats, with a considerable quantity of provisions. They were now on a desolate coast, with every circumstance of horror presented to their imaginations; a deplorable state, rendered still more terrible by the ungovernable impetuosity, anarchy, and mutinous inclinations, which prevailed among the crew.
- b From this disposition followed those bitter revilings, those fatal diffensions, and malevolent humours, which nearly terminated in their total destruction. Captain Cheap, anxious for their general safety, and without any bias or partiality, resolved, if possible, to fit up the boats in such a manner as to bear the sea, and to proceed to the northward. As he had with him above 100 men, and fire-arms, he doubted not, if he should meet a Spanish ship, to be able to take her, and accommodate his crew better. The neighbourhood of Chili, it was probable, would furnish him with many opportunities of making the experiment; and this course he determined to follow: at least, whether he succeeded in his project or not, he stood a chance for falling in with the commodore. But, however prudent this scheme was laid, it met with obstruction from the greater part of the crew. As they were fatigued with the distresses and dangers they had already encountered, and allured with the delusive hopes of returning to their native country, they disrelished the pursuit of an enterprise already attended with so many disastrous incidents. Their common resolution, therefore, was to lengthen the long-boat, and with that, and the rest of the boat, to steer to the southward; to pass through the Streights of Magellan, and to range along the eastern coast of South America, till they should arrive at Brasil, whence they expected to find a passage for England. Although this project appeared unspeakably more dangerous and tedious than the other, yet did they persist in it with inflexible obstinacy. Cheap remonstrated first in gentle and persuasive terms against a resolution so ideal, and a proceeding so opposite to the first intention of the expedition. He afterwards opposed it with his authority, and with so steady an opposition as to incur their dislike and resentment; inso-
- d much that they insulted him with the most provoking scurrility and abuse. At last the long-boat was nearly completed, and every thing in readiness for pursuing their design; but, finding that the captain was likely to influence so strong a party as might frustrate their chosen project, they seized upon a favourable pretext to secure him from any such attempt. This was the death of a midshipman, fatally and rashly committed by the captain, on a suspicion of mutiny; an action we will not pretend to excuse, although it may admit of palliation on account of his ticklish and precarious circumstances. On this pretence he was confined, and threatened with being carried a prisoner to England (C), to be tried for the murder. However, when they were just ready to put to sea, they released him, leaving the few that chose to share his fortune no other means of escaping from famine, and the desolate island, besides the yawl and barge.
- e Thirty died on the island, about 60 went off in the long-boat converted into a schooner, and nineteen were left with the captain. Among these were Mr. Hamilton, lieutenant of marines, the honourable Mr. Byron, Mr. Campbell, midshipman, and Mr. Elliot, surgeon. That captain Cheap behaved with great spirit and firmness during this whole transaction, is a point not to be questioned; but it is a little extraordinary, that the same insolence of temper should appear in the midst of adversity as characterised the man in prosperity. Captain Cheap seems to be justly accused of governing despotically on board, without consulting his officers, or taking pains to acquire the affections of his people. His authority he constantly made the measure of their obedience, and this manner of acting he affected when shipwrecked on a desert island. Instead of encouraging the people to live in harmony and friendship, he shut
- f himself up in his tent, and thence issued out his commands with great loftiness, and a supercilious, if not ridiculous dignity; this at least is the charge brought against him by the gunner, which remains uncontroverted. He used gentle measures, it is true, to endeavour to dissuade cept what the captain made in his own justification, where both were parties concerned. Certain indeed it is, that the captain's arrival in England set a different face upon matters; but as part of his defence was founded upon the denial of circumstances well attested; viz. the rendezvous at Juan Fernandez, it is still a dubious point how far his conduct stands acquitted. Without entering upon the merits of the argument, we shall briefly recite the adventure.

(C) A spirit of mutiny had appeared on board before either the project for returning to England was laid, or the midshipman killed. First, a boatswain got a quarter-deck gun to bear on the captain's tent, the ball of which grazed over it without any damage. Soon after, eleven of them formed a design to blow up the captain, surgeon, and a lieutenant of marines, in their tent. They were discovered, and the train they had laid for their villainous purpose was an undeniable evidence of their intention; but whether the midshipman, Mr. Henry Cozens, who was shot, had been a party, was never clearly proved.

them from the project of returning to the Streights of Magellan; but it was after he had perceived, in other instances, that his authority was disregarded.

To return: captain Cheap and his associates, after the departure of the long-boat, proposed passing to the northward in the yawl and barge, but they were prevented from putting to sea till the 14th of December. They then began their voyage; and were, after many difficulties and struggles, in which they lost five or six of their company, forced to return to their former station, after having spent near two months at sea. It was the middle of February when they arrived the second time at the desert island, to which they gave the name of Wager Island, quite spiritless, dejected, and almost famished with hunger. Not long after their return, two Indian canoes happily came to the island, having on board a native of Chiloe, who spoke broken Spanish. With him they bargained, that, if he could prevail on the Indians to carry them to Chiloe, they should have the barge with all that belonged to her, in reward for their services. While the captain, officers, and surgeon, were on shore, the six of their surviving companions put off with the Chiloan, leaving them to the most melancholy reflections, without provisions, arms, or amunition, either to support them against hunger, or to defend their lives against any attempts which might be made by such Indians as should perchance stop on the island. But, while they were revolving the various circumstances of their calamity, they perceived at a distance the other canoe belonging to one of the Indians they had before seen. Convinced of the safety of his companion, he ventured on shore, took them on board; and, after a tedious passage, carried them to Chiloe, where they were entertained with the most humane compassion by the Spaniards. They had buried Mr. Elliot in the way, and now remained only the captain, lieutenant Hamilton, Mr. Byron, and Mr. Campbell. From Chiloe they were sent to Val Paraiso, and thence to St. Jago the capital of Chili, being every-where generously treated by those enemies against whom they had been sent. Here they continued for a year; after which, a cartel being settled, they returned to Europe on board a French ship.

Nor did the long-boat undergo misfortunes at all inferior to those the captain and officers had sustained. The miseries they suffered in passing through the streights are such as cannot be described; the reader may suggest to his imagination the sufferings of men labouring under all the rigours of fatigue, sickness, hunger, delirium, in which state they generally died laughing, their number being reduced to little more than a third, in which deplorable manner a few of the survivors arrived at Rio Grand, the rest being left by unavoidable accident on that part of South America stiled Terra de Pampas. Such is the account given by the gunner, Mr. Bulkley, who, with his companions, had a passage to Portugal, and thence to England, where he arrived an. 1743, after having received instances of the greatest kindness, humanity, and tenderness, from the Portuguese.

Mr. Anson leaves Juan Fernandez.

To return to the commodore: He proceeded after the Trial with the Centurion and Gloucester, who, after all the ease and refreshment procured at Juan Fernandez, were but in a weakly condition. The former had lost one half, and the other near two thirds, of her crew, since their departure from England. When the commodore weighed from the island of Juan Fernandez, the Centurion had but 214 men alive, and the Gloucester no more than 81; but the victualler being condemned as unfit for service, her hands amounting to 16 men, were distributed among the other ships. Thus the whole force of two ships of the line did not exceed 311 men, many of them of little use on account of their age, and the remnants of their late disorders; a number greatly below the complement of the Centurion alone, and consequently very insufficient to navigate two large ships in a hazardous and difficult long voyage, with all their vigour, experience, and courage. This unfortunate reduction was the more alarming, as they dreaded falling in with Pizarro's squadron, and had some imperfect intelligence of a force fitting out at Callao against them. However, in this condition it was resolved to sail down the coast, and touch in the neighbourhood of Panama, in hopes of being able over land to open a communication with the squadron under admiral Vernon. The commodore was, indeed, enjoined by his instructions to transmit, by any occasion he could, over land to Porto Bello, or Darien, an account of what he had done, or intended to do; and, lest any such intelligence should fall into the hands of the enemy, he had a cypher given him to correspond with whatever British admiral might be in the North Seas, or the commander in chief of the forces in America. He was likewise acquainted, by his instructions, of the destination of the troops sent to the West Indies under lord Cathcart; and was ordered, that, if those forces should go to Porto Bello or Darien, with intention to proceed to Panama or Santa Maria, to make the best dispositions to assist them, supply them with cannon, or any other necessaries he could spare, without too much weakening the squadron; and, if they should want soldiers, to reinforce them with those on board his ships, with consent of the proper officer. Imagining, therefore, that Porto Bello might be in the hands of the English, the commodore hoped, on his arrival at the isthmus, to procure an intercourse with the garrison, or some mercenary Spaniard, who might prefer his own private interest to that of his country, and gain to honour or honesty. He even flattered himself,

The design to open a communication with admiral Vernon cross the isthmus of Darien.

- a himself, that by this means, and settling with the commander in the North Seas, a prudent plan of operations, to take Panama, and thence obtain possession of the isthmus of Darien, and the treasures of Peru. Nor can it be denied, that, had the forces in the West Indies had the wished-for success, these views were the most rational that could have been concerted. October the 20th, 1741, the commodore, with his two prizes (for the Trial sloop had taken a ship of considerable value), were off the islands of Lobos. Two days after he saw a sail, to which he immediately gave chase, and took her; but the prize was of little value to persons in their situation, being loaded only with iron and plank. As he had a design upon the little town of Paita, so often taken by the English privateers, but now well recovered, and in a flourishing condition, he obtained all the possible intelligence he could from the prisoners, whom he entered with the utmost civility.

He receives advice of the situation of Paita, and resolves to attack it.

- b IN consequence of the information received from them, the resolution was adhered to. On November the 9th, he arrived before the place, and immediately prepared for attacking it. Before his arrival here, his crew was augmented by the hands of the Trial sloop, which had the misfortune to spring her mainmast; which accident, together with the crazy condition of the ship, induced the commodore to sink her. As soon as he came before the port, proper dispositions were made for attacking the place, from which they were not distant above five leagues. Unluckily, however, a vessel to which the Gloucester gave chase, got into Paita, and acquainted the governor of the approach of the English fleet; upon which all hands were employed in removing the treasure to Paiva, a town fourteen leagues within land. Notwithstanding the commodore received advice of this, he resolved to proceed in his design, and with all possible dispatch, in order to intercept a ship, on board of which the treasure of some merchants was shipped, who imagined it unsafe in the customhouse. Besides the treasure he expected, there was the greatest reason to believe that the ship might be supplied with abundance of fresh provisions; a circumstance alone that would render the attempt eligible. Another co-operating cause was the desire of setting the prisoners at liberty for an equivalent, as they were numerous, and made a greater consumption of the ships stores than those found on board the prizes were capable of supplying. Accordingly Mr. Brett, second lieutenant of the Centurion, had the command of a body of sixty men, embarked in three boats, one of 18 oars, each of the rest of eight oars; one of the Spanish captains being his guide. Brett kept under shore for the beginning of the evening; entering the port about ten at night, he landed safely with all his men, without being perceived either by the ships or the fort. Thence he marched directly to a little fort, which, had any conduct been shewn, he might have taken by surprize. This, indeed, was not owing to Brett, who did all in the power of a good officer to keep them within their duty; instead of which they shot at random, as any person, Spaniard or Indian, happened to move near them. By this the alarm was given, and several stragglers ran up to the fort, crying, The English dogs are here! Upon this the lieutenant hastened his march, and was conducted by the Spanish captain to the entrance of a narrow street, where he was securely screened against the fire of the Spanish fort. Hence he marched to the parade, a large square at the further end of this street, the fort being on the one side of the square, and the governor's house on the other. The shouts and cries of this animated detachment, joined with the noise of their drums, and favoured by the gloom of night, which never fails to increase the confusion occasioned by such a surprize, had augmented their numbers, in the opinion of the enemy, to at least 300 men. The inhabitants were so intimidated, that they immediately sought the means of flight, without a thought of resisting or opposing the danger. As Brett entered the parade, he received the fire of the merchants, and a few others, who ranged themselves before the customhouse; but this he returned so briskly, that they were put in confusion, and dispersed. He then divided his men into two bodies, ordering the one to surround the governor's house, whilst at the head of the other he marched up to the fort, with intention to force it. But, on his approach, he found it abandoned, the garrison having made their escape over the walls. By this time the governor's house was surrounded and taken, after he had escaped half-naked, leaving his wife, a lady of seventeen years of age, to whom he had been married a few days only, a prey to the English. She had, however, the good-fortune to be carried off in her shift by two bold centinels, just as the sailors took possession of the house. The greatest part of the inhabitants, surprized in their beds, fled in the wildest consternation and hurry; so that the few remaining in the town were no-ways formidable, and were easily dispersed. Thus the town of Paita was taken in less than an hour from their first landing, with no other loss than one man killed, and two wounded; though the honourable Mr. Van Kepple had a narrow escape from a ball that shaved his cap off close to his temples. Brett, after this happy success, placed a guard at the fort, another at the governor's house, and appointed centinels at all the avenues, to prevent a surprize, and to secure the effects against embezzlement. He then seized on the customhouse, where the treasure was deposited, confining the inhabitants he took in a church under strong guards. All his endeavours could not, however, ever, prevent the sailors from entering the houses in search of plunder, and covering their dirty jackets and trowsers with the embroidered silk garments of the Spaniards. Those who came last, not finding mens cloaths sufficient, dressed themselves in womens apparel, and made a most ridiculous motley appearance, when the drum beat for drawing up on the parade.

Paita taken.

DURING the attack on the town, the commodore lay by with his ships till one o'clock in the morning ; after which, supposing the detachment landed, he proceeded under an easy sail to enter the bay. At day-light he had a view of the town, and perceived the English colours flying on the fort ; upon which he plied into the bay, and, at eleven, the Trial's boat came on board him, laden with dollars and rich merchandize, as well as church-plate. The commanding officer then made him acquainted with the transactions of the preceding night ; with which he was extremely pleased, only regretting the escape of the governor. He had particularly enjoined Brett to secure him, hoping by this to procure a valuable ransom for the town. Anchoring in the afternoon at about a mile from the town, he had a more immediate intercourse with the party on shore. Hitherto they had proceeded without molestation in removing the treasure ; but the Spaniards assembling from all parts of the country, having among them 200 horse well armed and mounted, began to make their appearance on a hill behind the town, where they paraded with much ostentation, founding their military music, and practising every art to intimidate the English to abandon the town. Their menaces, however, had no effect ; for Brett, as long as day-light continued, went calmly on in sending off the treasure and live-stock, of which there was by no means the supply that was expected. At night the commodore sent a reinforcement on shore, and the Spaniards continuing quiet, the work of the former day was renewed as soon as it was light. They were now convinced of what importance securing the governor's person would have been ; for, finding himself at the head of a little army, he refused all the terms offered by the commodore about the ransom of the town. He was in expectation of forcing it, as his troops were greatly augmented, and much superior in strength to the whole English squadron. This made him arrogantly despise the repeated overtures to him, and the menaces that, if he did not settle a ransom, the English would set fire to the place. However, the vigilance of captain Brett disconcerted all his schemes, and deterred him from making any attempts to dislodge the seamen. The treasure being all embarked, the boats were employed on the third morning in carrying off the most valuable effects ; after which the commodore released all his prisoners to the number of eighty, giving orders to captain Brett to set fire to the town, and make the best of his way to the ships. His instructions were punctually executed ; for Brett, finding large quantities of combustibles in the town, had them distributed in different parts ; so that, the place being at once fired in several quarters, the destruction might be more violent and sudden, and the Spaniards, after his departure, less able to extinguish it. After nailing up the cannon, he set fire to the train, and marched to the beach, where his boats waited ready to put off. The Spaniards perceiving his retreat, detached sixty horse to intercept him ; which might easily have been done, had their courage been equal to their advantages and number. The enemy marched down the hill with apparent resolution ; but no sooner had Brett ordered his men to halt and face about, than the Spaniards stopped their career, hesitated what they were to do, and at last permitted the English to embark, without firing a shot. The spreading flames had soon seized upon every part of the town, owing to a fresh gale that blew, to the lightness of the materials with which the houses were built, and to the proper disposition of the combustibles, till the whole was destroyed in one general conflagration. Besides a great quantity of rich effects, some live-stock, and other provisions, the booty in specie amounted to 130,000 pieces of eight, exclusive of two chests of jewels and household plate, and one of church plate. This plunder was equally divided among the whole squadron, as well those on board as those upon the attack, the commodore thinking this the most equitable and encouraging distribution. As to the Spaniards, their greatest loss arose from the burning the town, by which an immense value of rich merchandize, broad-cloths, silks, cambricks, velvets, &c. were consumed. By a representation transmitted to the court of Madrid, the whole loss was estimated at a million and a half of dollars. Besides the booty taken in the town, the commodore made a valuable acquisition in the harbour, where he found a fine ship, the Solidad, and five other vessels, fitted out with intention to defend the coast. The Solidad, being a fine sailer, he added to his squadron, giving the command to captain Hughes ; the rest he destroyed and burnt.

THIS exploit being ended to his satisfaction, he weighed from Paita on the 13th, ordering the squadron to extend the line as far as possible, in hopes of falling in with the Gloucester. With her they came up the next morning, and found she had taken a small bark, supposed at first to be laden with cotton only ; but, upon a strict search, they found several jars stuffed at the top with rags, filled with gold, the whole amounting to 120,000 pieces of eight ; a prize as welcome as it was unexpected. On the 26th of October, she fell in with another prize, which he likewise took, laden chiefly with Piscaya wine, but having also on board plate

The Spaniards assemble a body of men to recover Paita.

The governor refuses to ransom Paita ; in consequence of which it is burnt by order of the commodore.

The booty taken in Paita.

The Gloucester takes a prize.

a plate to a considerable amount. They likewise affirmed, that, in passing by Paita, they saw a smoke; but the commodore suspecting this to be a fiction contrived by the men to intitle them to a share of the plunder, he ordered the officers journals to be brought on board, and sealed up, directing them for the future to keep their journals in other books. As on inspecting the papers found on board the Carmela prize, the commodore was apprized of the unfortunate attempt on Cartagena, he laid aside his design against Panama, there being no prospect of a reinforcement cross the isthmus, and his own squadron unequal to the enterprize. He therefore resolved to proceed to California, or the adjacent coast of Mexico, to cruise for the Manila galleon, which he knew was at sea, bound to the coast of Acapulco, where she could not arrive before the middle of January. Before this time, he doubted not of being on a proper station b to intercept this valuable ship; he therefore imparted his design to the crews, which was received with general approbation; every man indulging his imagination in the most unlimited prospects of the wealth that must accrue to himself from such a capture. As there was a c necessity, however, for a fresh supply of water, he proceeded to the island of Quibo, where all the squadron, except two prizes, which he scuttled and sunk in his voyage, arrived on the 6th of December. The Gloucester had likewise parted company; but they afterwards fell in with her on the 12th, as they steered for the coast of Mexico. She had sprung her top-mast, which disabled her from keeping to windward, and the commodore issued fresh instructions to the captains of the men of war, and commanders of the prizes, directing them to use all possible expedition in getting north of the harbour of Acapulco, where they were to endeavour to fall in with the land between the latitude of 18 and 19 degrees. Thence they were to beat up the coast, at the distance of eight or ten leagues from shore, till they fell in with Cape Corientes, off which they were to cruise till the 14th of January. Afterwards they were to shape their course for the middle island of the Tres Marias; and if then they did not join the commodore, they were, after wooding and watering, to proceed for Macao on the coast of China. They had little doubt of arriving soon at their station; but, by contrary d winds, and a series of disappointments, they were prevented from obtaining this desirable end till the 28th of January. Their arrival now was too late to yield them any prospect of meeting with the galleon. This caused great uneasiness, especially as they remained in a state of suspense till the 19th of February. The Centurion's barge had been dispatched to discover the e harbour of Acapulco; from whence she returned with some negroes the seamen had surprised. From those intelligence was received, that the galleon was arrived in port on the 9th of January; a circumstance that would have thrown the whole fleet into the greatest despondency, had not their hopes revived on hearing that, upon unloading and taking in fresh provisions and stores, she was to return; and that her departure was fixed by proclamation on the third of March. This last advice was received by the seamen with the utmost joy, as it was more eligible to seize her in her return than it would have been before her arrival. She was now freighted with treasure, before she was laden with merchandize; the greater part whereof could be of no use to them in their present circumstances. As they were now certain she must fall into their hands, all the crews were animated with the highest spirits and fluctuation of joy on so probable an event, which afterwards happily corresponded with their wishes, and repaid the fatigues and dangers they had undergone.

THE commodore's squadron now consisted of the Centurion, the Gloucester, the Trial's
prize, the Camilla and Carmin, all three taken from the Spaniards, and the whole fleet manned with no more than 340 hands, boys included. Every necessary preparation for intercepting the galleon was made; signals and positions to be observed were regulated, the whole squadron lying in a sweep of 24 leagues, the cutters being within shore for closer observation, and the whole fleet impatient for a sight of this prize, which had so elated their hopes. At last the third of March arrived, and no appearance of the galleon. On the 15th the commodore began to suspect that he had been discovered, and consequently the ship detained in port.
f He therefore formed a project for possessing himself of the town of Acapulco, because he had no doubt but the treasure was lodged there till the ship was ready to put to sea. The place, he was sensible, was too well defended to afford any prospect of succeeding by open force. Besides the garrison and the crew of the galleon, the negroes had informed him that a thousand men well-armed had marched thither as guards to the treasure, when it was brought from the city of Mexico. Besides, had his force been equal to the attempt, yet a declared attack would frustrate the end of it, and give the enemy time to remove the treasure up the country, and beyond the reach of his power. The surprisal of the town was therefore the only means that could answer his purpose; and this was the plan he determined to act by. He proposed sailing in the evening, time enough to arrive at the port in the night; and as g there was no danger on the coast, standing boldly for the mouth of the harbour, into which he might possibly enter before the Spaniards were apprized of his designs. As soon as he had entered the harbour, 200 men were immediately to be landed to attack the fort which defended

The commodore proceeds to Quibo.

He resolves to cruise for the Manila ship.

The strength of the squadron.

The commodore forms a plan for surprizing Acapulco, which he lays aside on further intelligence.

the entrance, while he with his ships were employed in battering the town with their cannon. ^a Such was the plan of operations, of which the commodore formed a general idea in his own mind; but when he came to inquire into particular circumstances, difficulties arose, which, being found insuperable, occasioned the attempt to be laid aside. On examining the prisoners concerning the winds which prevail near the shore, the commodore learnt, and their testimony was afterwards confirmed by the experience of the officers of the cutters, that near the land there was a perfect calm for the greater part of the night; and that towards morning, when a gale sprung up, it was constantly off land; so that sailing from their present station in the evening, and arriving at Acapulco before morning, was a thing impracticable. But as the whole project was formed upon an opinion unsupported by intelligence, that he had actually been discovered, the commodore determined to continue the cruize upon his present station, imagining ^b it possible that the galleon might still put to sea, and that she had hitherto been detained by other accidents than those he had suggested to himself. As the cutters had instructions to remain before Acapulco till the 13th of March, the squadron was ordered to keep the same position till that day; after which they were to make the best of their way for Cbina. This prolongation was a very prudent measure, and the only remaining chance for seizing a treasure for which they had so long waited in irksome suspense. On the 24th the cutters returned, without any intelligence of the galleon; upon which a signal was made by the Centurion to speak with the commanders. Upon inquiry into the stock of water on board, it was found to be very slender; by which they were obliged to quit their station, and procure a fresh supply. For this purpose, the port of Chequetan, being the nearest, was thought the fittest; to which ^c it was resolved to make all the dispatch possible. But that they might not intirely abandon all hopes of the galleon, the cutter to the Centurion was ordered, under captain Hughes and six of the best seamen, to cruise off Acapulco for 24 days. It was imagined that as soon as it was known the English squadron was at Chequetan, the galleon might venture to slip out. In such an event the cutter was to return with immediate notice to the commodore. In pursuance of these resolutions, they plied to the westward, and, by the 5th of April, were so near Chequetan, that it was thought expedient to send out boats to discover the watering place. They soon returned with advice of a place proper for the purpose, about six miles west of the rocks of Sequatancio; for which the whole squadron stood on the seventh. That evening the Centurion and Gloucester came to an anchor, though the other ships, having fallen to leeward, ^d did not arrive till two days after. Thus the squadron remaining at sea four months from the time they had left Quibo, arrived very seasonably at Chequetan, having only six days water on board. This port, situated about 30 leagues to the westward of Acapulco, lay at a convenient distance for favouring his designs on the galleon, and was secure against the incursions of the Spaniards, there being but one narrow path from the country to it. This he blocked up by a sufficient guard; so that his men wooded and watered with the utmost safety. As the country along the coast, extending to Acapulco, had the appearance of being populous, Mr. Anson was in hopes of being able to procure some fresh provisions, and other refreshments, of which the squadron was in great want. To facilitate this view, he detached a party of ninety men, well-armed, on shore. Fifty of these were employed in securing the watering-place. The ^e rest were ordered to march into the country, to discover some village, with which they were to set on foot a correspondence, if possible. They were directed to proceed with the utmost caution and circumspection, making as little ostentation of hostility as might be. He was sensible that no wealth was to be expected in these parts; and as to necessaries, they would be more readily supplied by an honest open traffick, than by violence and force of arms. But all his endeavours to gain this end proved ineffectual. The party, after penetrating ten miles into the country, returned wearied and jaded, without being able to discover one village.

He goes to the port of Chequetan to water.

The transactions during his stay there.

THE seamen found great difficulty in filling their water, owing to the smallness of the stream. This necessarily prolonged the time employed in this business. For their greater security, the commodore ordered trees to be cut down, and a barricado formed across the path leading from ^f the harbour through the woods into the country, as it was apparent from this pathway's being beaten, that it was not unfrequented. As soon as this defence was formed, the principal intention of which was to guard against any sudden attack, and prevent the sailors from straggling singly from their posts, proper centinels were placed upon it, and the strictest orders given them to suffer no person whatsoever to pass it. Notwithstanding this precaution, some of the men rambled into the woods, and one Leger in particular, a Frenchman, was kidnapped by the Spaniards. The Spaniards afterwards assembled in a considerable body, forming a circular line round the watering-place; but never ventured to attack the seamen. Soon after the captivity of Leger, lieutenant Brett was sent with two boats, and a detachment of 16 men, to examine the coast eastward, and particularly to observe the watering-place at Pataptan. As he was ^g preparing to land, he perceived, on the opposite side of the bay, three squadrons of horse parading it in a hostile manner upon the beach. Upon this he put off, and stood over the a the bay against the Spaniards, who at first made some motions as if they would oppose his landing; but, on seeing him determined, changed their resolution, and retreated without firing a gun.

b THE commodore having thus unsuccessfully attempted to engage the inhabitants in an amicable traffick, contented himself with what his men could procure in the neighbourhood of the port, where they caught fish and tortoises in great plenty. Birds they likewise had in abundance, particularly pheasants; some of them uncommonly large, but dry and tasteless food: and the fruits and vegetable refreshments were neither plentiful nor excellent in their kinds. During his stay here, he unloaded two of the prizes of their most valuable effects, and then destroyed them. Soon after the Trial's prize was also condemned, which was indeed in good repair, but as the number of hands on board the whole Squadron did not amount to the complement of a fourth-rate ship of war, it was found impossible to divide them in three ships, without rendering them all incapable either of navigating or fighting with safety. The Gloucester was reinforced with the best part of her crew, and the Centurion with the remainder. After this the commodore and Gloucester weighed anchor, and, on reaching the offing, a canoe was left fixed to a grapple in the middle of the harbour, with a bottle in it well-corked, containing a letter for captain Hughes of the cutter. As the time limited for his return was considerably elapsed, he was directed to go immediately to his former station before Acapulco, where he would find the commodore, who would cruise for him there for some days; after which he would return to the southward to rejoin the rest of the Squadron. This last paragraph was added to deceive the Spaniards, if the letter, as happened, should fall into their hands.

c As now there was a vast tract of ocean to be crossed, without a single port to touch at, Mr. Anson was desirous of running off the coast as soon as possible. He had no further views in the American seas, and he expected to have met with no disappointments from steering to the westward the moment he had quitted the harbour of Chequetan. His greatest uneasiness arose from the long stay of captain Hughes, as he suspected the cutter had been discovered, and taken by the Spaniards; however, as this was no more than mere conjecture, he stood to the eastward, along the coast, in search of her. On the 2d of May he advanced within three leagues of the harbour of Acapulco; and then, seeing nothing of her, she was given over for lost. It was still the general opinion, that she had been seized; the commodore therefore sent

d a letter to the governor, acquainting him, that he would release all the prisoners on board, in exchange for the cutter and her crew. The letter was dispatched by a Spanish officer with a launch, and a crew of six other prisoners, who gave their parole of honour for their return. The wind being unfavourable, the ships were happily driven a great way from shore till the 5th, when they discovered the cutter. She had kept the sea for above six weeks, having been forced by a strong adverse current to the eastward, in spite of all their endeavours to the contrary. The crew had suffered incredible hardships, being so feeble, when taken up by the ship, as to be unable to stand (A). As the commodore now wanted no answer from the governor, he resolved to run off the coast with all expedition; but, not to deprive his prisoners of the liberty they were made to expect, he embarked them, being 57 in number, on board e two launches belonging to the prizes. He then, in company with the Gloucester, made sail to the south-west, proposing to get a good offing from the land, where he hoped in a few days to fall in with the regular trade winds.

He sails from Chequetan.

The deplorable situation of the cutters, left to cruise off the harbour of Acapulco.

f FORMER navigators had always esteemed these winds more steady and brisk in this sea than in any other part of the globe, it being deemed no extraordinary passage to run in two months from Mexico to the easternmost of the Asiatic islands. It was not without reason, therefore, that the commodore flattered himself with a short voyage, his ships being as capable of sailing as any that had ever made that course before him. On the 6th of May he for the last time lost sight of the coast of Mexico, with a full assurance that in a few weeks he should reach Canton in China, where he hoped not only to meet with Englishmen, but to enjoy the pleasures of a well-frequented port, inhabited by a polished people, and abounding with the conveniences and luxuries of a civilized life; blessings to which, near twenty months, he had been a stranger. He stood far to the southward, in order to fall in with the trade wind, that being a point of the utmost consequence; but all his efforts, after repeated experiments, were for a long time unsuccessful, it being seven weeks from their departure from the coast of Mexico, before he came within its influence. But, besides this delay, there were other mortifying circumstances which rendered the situation of this unhappy crew as terrible as it had been in any

The commodore abandons his design upon the galleon, and resolves to steer for Canton.

(A) The crew were driven to the last extremity for want of water, being forced for the space of twelve days to drink turtles blood to quench their thirst. They never again expected to fall in with the commodore, and had given themselves over for lost, knowing they must in a day or two perish for hunger, or fall into the hands of the enemy; an alternative no less dreadful to them than death itself; so injurious notions had they entertained of the pride and cruelty of the Spaniards; notions refuted by facts, to which they however were strangers.

of their former calamities. Both ships were extremely foul, crazy, and leaky, to a degree of a fatigue to the poor men, whose number and strength were unequal to eternal pumping. Besides this, the foretopmast of the Gloucester rolled to the board, and the cap broke in two. The foretopmast sprung in several places by the weight of the fall, breaking the foreyard in the flings; upon which she made a signal of distress, and was taken in tow by the Centurion. Before this accident, the commodore had got into the trade wind, which continued, without fluctation, to favour him from the latter end of June almost to the end of July. By the 26th of this month, it was concluded he had run above two thousand leagues, so that by calculation, he could not be above three hundred leagues from the Ladrones. A westerly wind now sprung up, which continued for four days; a dispiriting incident, that greatly increased their chagrin from the late accident: but, however mortifying these circumstances were, b they were only a prelude to greater misfortunes. The Gloucester was scarcely refitted, before a most violent storm arose from the west, which forced them to lie-to. At the very beginning of this tempest the Centurion sprung a leak, and received so much water, that all the hands, officers and others, indiscriminately, were employed constantly at the pumps. Nor was the condition of the Gloucester a whit more desirable, having her foretopmast again by the board, and seven feet water in the hold. This obliged her to make signals of distress, which the violence of the storm rendered the commodore unable to answer. As soon, however, as it was subsided, he sent his boat on board to inquire of captain Mitchell into the circumstances of his distress. The boat returned with a representation of her several defects, signed by the captain, and all his officers. From hence it appeared, that she had sprung a leak, which, c according to the report of the carpenters, it was impossible to repair at sea. The crew was greatly reduced, and of the survivors, who, officers included, were but 77 men, 18 boys, and two prisoners, only 16 men and 11 boys were capable of keeping the deck, many of these too being infirm. On perusal of this melancholy remonstrance, the commodore ordered captain Mitchell to put his men, and all the stores he could get while the ship could swim, on board the Centurion, with all possible dispatch. The removal of the stores and provisions gave full employment for two days; and she rolled so much, that it was with the utmost difficulty the prize-money could be got into the boats. Such prize goods as were on board, amounting to several thousand pounds in value, were given up as lost in the ship; nor could any more provisions be got out than five casks of flour, three of them damaged by the salt-water. The sick d were conveyed with all possible tenderness into the boats, yet three or four of them expired before they could reach the Centurion. In the evening of the 16th of August, every thing was got ready for destroying the Gloucester, and at eight the captain laid the train, but it was fix the following morning before she blew up. The scurvy was now so malignant on board the Centurion, that scarce a day passed but eight or ten of the crew were carried off by it, and those who till now had enjoyed a perfect health, began to feel the sad effects of this dreadful disease. On the 17th the Centurion sprung a leak, although it continued calm ever since the late storm. The carpenters at last discovered, that it was in the forehold on each side the stern, under the breast-hook; but, though the leak was discovered, the artists agreed, that it was impossible to stop it without coming at it on the outside, which was a matter not to be attempted till they arrived in port. All that was possible to be done within board was tried; and e so far succeeded, as greatly to reduce the leak. The Centurion was now in very great distress, her rigging worn and rotten, her hull crazy and leaky, her crew sickly, and diminished to one third of her complement; water so scarce, that the men were reduced to half a pint a day, and nothing to give them relief but their resignation, and the generosity and courage of the commodore, who animated them both by his discourse and practice, having given each man a pint of Madeira a day out of his own stores, to mix with their water.

He was now endeavouring to gain some of the Ladrones, in which he met with numberless disappointments from the adverse currents. This occasioned great dejection of spirits among the crew, who began to despair of ever again seeing land; however, a brisk wind springing f up on the 23d of August, soon cheered them with the discovery of two of the islands they sought for; a discovery attended with ineffable joy to all on board. Anatacan was the nearest of these islands, distant from them about fifteen leagues. With this they were extremely impatient to get in, hoping they should meet with anchorage, and the refreshments at least of water and vegetables; but the wind was so variable, that they could not reach within four miles of it till noon the following day, when boats were sent off to examine it. The return of the boats spread a general melancholy on board, by reporting that there was no possibility of anchoring at this island. The commodore, therefore, bore away, and lost sight of it on the 26th, the whole crew dreading that it was the last land on which they should ever fix their eyes. However, the following morning three other islands were descried to the eastward, at g the distance of ten or twelve leagues from them. These were the islands of Saypan, Tinian, and Aguigan. Their hopes began again to cheer up, and their former gloom to brighten into joy.

The Gloucester was damaged and burnt.

The deplorable condition of the Centurion.

Mr. Anson arrives at one of the Marian Islands.

- a joy. Steering their course to Tinian, the middle island, they discovered a proe under sail to He arrives at Tinian. the southward, between Tinian and Aguigan. Thence it was conjectured the islands were inhabited; and, knowing that the Spaniards kept a garrison at Guam, the necessary measures for their own defence were taken. That intelligence might the more easily be obtained, the commodore shewed Spanish colours, and hoisted a red flag at the foretopmasthead. By this stratagem, he hoped to give the Centurion the appearance of the Manila galleon, and to decoy some of the inhabitants on board. The scheme answered his expectation; for, in the afternoon, the ship being near enough to send the cutter on shore to find a proper anchorage, a proe, with one Spaniard and four Indians, put off to meet her. These were easily made prisoners by the cutter, and conveyed on board by the pinnace, while the cutter proceeded to
- b examine the soundings. The Spaniard being interrogated concerning the produce and circumstances of Tinian, his account surpassed their most sanguine hopes. He related, that though it was uninhabited, it abounded in all the conveniences to be found in the best cultivated countries; assuring them, in particular, that it afforded plenty of good water; that cattle, hogs, and poultry, ran wild in such numbers as were incredible, all of them excellent in their kind: that the woods afforded oranges of all sorts, limes, lemons, cocoa-nuts, besides delicious fruits, peculiar to the island: that, from the quantity and excellency of the foods produced here, the Spaniards from Guam used it as a store to supply their garrison; and that he himself was a serjeant of that garrison, who, with 22 Indians, had been sent to Tinian to jerk beef for Guam, which he was to load on board a small bark of 15 tons lying at anchor close by the shore.
- c Nothing could be more satisfactory and joyful than this account of the Spanish serjeant. They now found themselves at a delightful island, where all their wants could be supplied in the most abundant manner, their sick recovered, and their enfeebled crew be once more refreshed, and enabled to put to sea. The pinnace was immediately dispatched to seize the bark, and prevent the escape of the Indians, lest intelligence of their arrival might be had at Guam; and then, about eight in the evening, the Centurion let go her anchor in twenty fathom. The bark proved an acceptable prize, being laden with pork, beef, fowls, and fruits. Immediately preparations were made for landing the sick, and every hand employed in unshipping materials for tents and other conveniencies for them. At this juncture all the men capable of duty the commodore could muster, including those absent with the boats, and some negroes
- d and Indian prisoners, amounted to no more than seventy-one persons, most of these weak and feeble, unfit for any of the harder exercises of the ship, except on very extraordinary emergencies. Such was the reduction in the crews of the Centurion, Gloucester, and Trial, which, on leaving England, exceeded 1000 men, soldiers and sailors.

AFTER the Centurion had been moored in Tinian road, a party well armed was sent on shore to secure the landing-place. They found a number of huts which the Indians, employed in jerking beef, had abandoned on their approach, betaking themselves to the woods for protection. These huts were marked out for hospitals for the sick, who were immediately removed, to the number of 224 persons, wrapped up in their hammocks, eight of them dying in the boats before they reached the shore. The greater part were so feeble and e exhausted, that they were carried from the boats to the huts on the shoulders of their companions, at which humane employment the commodore and all his officers assisted without distinction. The healthfulness of the situation, and the abundance of wholesome and delicate provisions of cattle, fowl, and vegetables, most exquisite in their several kinds, soon recovered the sick. Notwithstanding their extreme debility, they soon felt the salutary influence of the land. On the two first days they buried 21 men; but not above 10 more during the remainder of their stay, which was about two months. The diseased in general were able to walk without assistance round their tents in the space of a week, and such as had been less reduced were restored to their pristine health and vigour; nay, even the most healthy of the crew found an additional strength and stability of body from the freedom of air and exercise.

- f No sooner were the sick removed, than the carpenters were set to work upon the leak, which, after all their endeavours, they could not remedy till an opportunity offered of heaving down the ship. This could not possibly be done in Tinian, nor indeed was there one convenient port for the purpose in that part of the world. All that could be done, was, to reduce the leak, and patch it up in the best manner the circumstances would permit. By the 12th of September, several of the sick were so well recovered as to be fit for duty. These were therefore sent on board, and others landed in their room, to taste of the pleasures of this happy isle. The commodore, who was ill of the scurvy, had a tent pitched for him on shore, where he went with a view of establishing his health, being convinced by experience, that no other method but living on land, exercise, and fresh air and provisions, was a radical cure for
- g this malignant disease. As the new moons were approaching, when they apprehended violent gales, every precaution for the security of the ship was taken: provisions and water were every day carrying on board, the ship washed and scrubbed, and every thing by the 19th was prepared for their departure, which an unlooked-for and almost fatal accident retarded. The

The Centurion
drove to sea from her moorings at Tinian, while the commodore is on shore.

The despondency of the crew left with Mr. Anson in Tinian.

The Centurion
discovered at sea, and the joy of the commodore.

new moon entered on the 18th of September, when, the Centurion riding safe that and the three a following days, the officers began to imagine themselves fully provided against all hazard by the measures they had taken. All three days they had hard gales; but on the 22d the wind blew with such fury from the east, that they soon despaired of riding out the storm. At this time the commodore, some of the officers, and 113 men, were on shore, so that in this dreadful extremity, they could muster no more than 108 persons on board, negroes and Indians included. All communication with the shore was cut off, there being no possibility of a boat's withstanding so violent a tempest. Thus the Centurion was obliged to ride it out till her cables parted. The sea broke with a terrifying noise round her, and, as the night came on, the violence of the storm increased. The ship was greatly damaged, and the crew thrown into the deepest affliction, from a consideration of the unhappy circumstances of themselves, and b companions on the island, if they should be driven out to sea. They despaired of being able to navigate her back to Tinian, should she even outlive the hurricane, which they thought by no means probable. In this distress lieutenant Saumarez, who commanded on board, ordered guns to be fired, and lights to be shewn, as signals to the commodore of his condition. At last, about one o'clock, the night exceeding dark, a strong gulf, attended with lightning and rain, drove the ship to sea, leaving the commodore, and others on shore, under the most dreadful apprehensions of spending the remainder of their days on this uninhabited island; whilst the crew on board, utterly unprepared to combat with the rage of seas and storms, expected each moment to be their last. The first bid adieu for ever to their country, their friends, their families, and all their domestic endearments: the latter had every other reflection c absorbed in that of their immediate danger. The former might be thought to receive some consolation from the plenty, beauty, and convenience, of this little Indian paradise; but the supposed loss of liberty threw a gloom over the whole scene which they lately admired with rapture, and every object appeared with a different aspect. Besides, they could not doubt but the governor of Guam must soon receive intelligence of their circumstances, in which case they could expect nothing more favourable than being made prisoners for life, and lose their freedom, without one circumstance of situation to alleviate the loss. From the known policy, and the imagined cruelty, of the Spaniards, it was to be supposed that the governor would make their want of commissions, which were on board the Centurion, a pretext for treating them as pirates, and hence for depriving them of their lives with ignominy. With these d melancholy thoughts the commodore, though apparently he ever preserved his usual composure and firmness, passed many bitter moments. He was fully persuaded, that either the ship would perish in the storm, or be unable to return; and that now all his views of distressing the enemy, and of still signaling his expedition by some important exploit, were at an end. To convey, however, some comfort to his company, the commodore, after consulting with the most intelligent persons about him, proposed to hale the Spanish bark on shore, to saw her asunder, and to lengthen her 12 feet, by which means she would be enlarged to 40 tons burthen, and able to carry the whole crew to China. Here he persuaded the crew, that they might probably meet with the Centurion; a hope that made them enter upon the project with the utmost alacrity. But their situation was in some respects still more distressful than that e of the Wager's crew, had not the imprudence of the latter heightened their misery. The Centurion's people had not the benefit of a wreck, from whence sea stores and materials might be drawn at pleasure; all was gone with the ship, and, in her, the best seamen and ablest hands.

As soon as the commodore had once banished despair, he entered into a regular deduction of whatever would be requisite for the accomplishment of his design. He assigned to every man his proper department, and took upon himself not only the business of a general supervisor, but of a workman too, supporting all the fatigue of even the meanest offices. His example was equivalent to the addition of a considerable number of hands; for, seeing their superior always busy, no man else had an inclination to be idle. This universal industry f attended with the happiest consequences; at the same time that it kept them employed in the main pursuit, it diverted their thoughts, preserved their spirits in a regular motion, inured them to action, and confirmed their health. This too was greatly forwarded by the behaviour of Mr. Anson, who was always serene, always easy, delivering his orders cheerfully, pursuing his plans steadily, so as to be in a condition either of supplying the ship with what was wanting to complete her stores in case she returned, or to finish in a few days the scheme in hand.

EIGHTEEN days were now elapsed since the Centurion had been driven out to sea, in which time the commodore's labours and projects were coming to a crisis. On the 12th of October, in the morning, lieutenant Gordon, of the marines, having accidentally walked up a hill, discovered the ship at sea, and running down hastily to the commodore, halloed in an ecstasy, g "The ship! The ship!" Mr. Anson, on hearing such pleasing and unexpected news, threw down

- a down his ax with which he was then at work, and, by his joy, broke through for the first time the equable and unvaried courage and steadiness he had hitherto preserved. As to the rest of the crew, they ran down to the sea-side in a kind of frenzy not to be described, or even conceived by such as were not partakers of it. Here they feasted their eyes with a sight they had so ardently longed after, and which for some days past they had despaired of ever obtaining. By five in the evening they could plainly distinguish the ship in the offing to be the Centurion; upon which the commodore sent off a boat with eighteen men to reinforce her, and comfort the crew with fresh water, fruits, and provisions. On the following morning she happily got to an anchor in the road, where Mr. Anson immediately went on board, and was received with the most sincere and hearty acclamations of the crew. Although, in encounter-
- b ing the difficulties and hazards to which the Centurion had been for 18 days exposed, she had lost but one man, yet were the whole crew excessively fatigued with the laborious employment of working a large ship without intermission, since the rise of this disastrous incident; for the day after leaving Tinian, the wind continued to blow a perfect hurricane, so that a fore-shroud and strap of the bobstay broke. A number of other accidents, only intelligible to seamen, succeeded this. On the 28th, the leak, which had been imperfectly patched up, broke open; the ship was filled with water, and both pumps kept in continual employment, till, on the 10th of October, she got into the road of Tinian.
- c THE commodore now resolved to continue no longer on this island than was absolutely necessary to complete his stock of water, which was immediately set about with the utmost diligence. However, on the 14th the ship was by a sudden gust of wind driven out to sea a second time, forty of the men, employed in killing cattle in the woods, being left behind. But as the weather was favourable, and the ship now better manned than before, they in about five days returned to the road, and relieved those that had been left behind from their fears of being again deserted by their ship. Indefatigable pains were now taken in securing the Centurion against a farther accident, and getting on board the stores. By the twentieth of October, she had fifty tons of water, which was judged sufficient for a passage to Macao. Having gathered a great quantity of oranges, limes, lemons, cocoa-nuts, and other fruits of the island, the commodore set fire to the Spanish bark and proe, and got under sail, steering directly for Macao, not without some regret at leaving this beautiful and enchanting island.
- d As the wind proved very favourable, the Centurion ran near fifty leagues a day; but, a high hollow sea pursuing her, the leak was increased, and great damage ensued to the rigging, which was now entirely rotten. However, as the crew were happily in full health, and strength, they were able to support the fatigue consequent on such circumstances with cheerfulness. All went through their several parts without murmuring or complaint. On the 4th of November, they were off the south-east end of the island of Formosa, which they could just discover, being 476 leagues to the westward of Tinian, and 33 leagues to the eastward of Canton in China. On the 5th they made the coast of China, but did not arrive at Macao before the 12th, when they happily anchored in the road of that city. The day before their arrival, the ship ran aground, through the ignorance of the Chinese pilots on board, who were unacquainted with the soundings, and the depth of water the ship required. We shall pass over the description of this city and island in the mouth of the river Ta, as the reader will find it in another part of this work. As soon as the commodore was arrived in an amicable port, after a tedious and unfortunate voyage of near two years duration, the whole crew resumed their wonted spirits, joy was spread over every countenance, and mirth and jollity now prevailed where but lately despair and sorrow reigned. Here they found a civilized people, a place abounding with all the conveniencies and luxuries of life; and what above all contributed to their satisfaction was, that they were in a well-frequented sea-port, where they imagined their rigging might be repaired, their ship refitted, and rendered capable of prosecuting her voyage to Europe. The river Ta is the only Chinese port universally frequented by Europeans, and on many accounts, a more commodious harbour than Macao; but the peculiar customs of the Chinese, solely adapted to commercial affairs, made the commodore apprehensive lest he should embroil the East India company in disputes with the natives, if he insisted upon being treated on a different footing than the merchantmen. This made him determine rather to go to Macao than proceed up the river Ta. It is certain that he could have nothing to fear besides laying the British trade under some inconvenience, as the Centurion might have entered the river, and even the port of Canton, in defiance of the naval power of the whole Chinese empire. It was well known that the Chinese exacted a duty from all ships entering the river Ta, in proportion to their tonnage. As they were strangers to the privileges due to kings ships, who are exempted in all foreign harbours from every kind of port-charge, Mr. Anson thought it would derogate from the dignity of the British flag, to submit to this duty in China. On his coming, therefore, to an anchor before Macao, he dispatched an officer, with his compliments to the Portuguese governor, requesting his advice in what manner it would be proper to

The distressed circumstances of the Centurion.

The Centurion driven to sea a second time. Her return, and the commodore's resolution to depart from Tinian.

Mr. Anson arrives at Macao.

His resolution not to pay the customs exacted from merchant ships.

ast to avoid giving offence. In the evening, the governor sent two officers to the commo- a dore, to acquaint him, that if the Centurion entered the river, it was his opinion the duty would be expected; and therefore, if the commodore approved of it, he would send him a pilot who should conduct him into another safe harbour called Tyfa, about two leagues from Macao, and every way commodious for refitting the ship: here, he said, in all probability, the duty would not be demanded. Mr. Anson acceded to this proposal, and weighed anchor under the auspices of the Portuguese pilot, steering for the harbour of Tyfa. On his arrival here, he paid a visit to the Portuguese governor, soliciting him to grant a supply of provisions,

He received civilities from the Portuguese governor.

and such naval stores as were wanted for refitting the ship. He was assured in a friendly manner by the governor, that he would clandestinely afford him all the assistance in his power; but frankly acknowledged, that, to serve him effectually, an order from the viceroy was neces- b sary, since the Portuguese authority was but subordinate, and subject to controul. Upon this declaration, Mr. Anson repaired immediately to Canton, to visit the viceroy in person. Here he found four English Indiamen, and seven other European ships. Upon consulting the English supercargoes and officers concerning the manner of procuring the order he wanted, they recommended to him their own method of transacting all matters relating to the government, which was, by the mediation of the chief Chinese merchants. Upon application to them, they seemed willing to negotiate the business, and confident of success; but, after keeping the commodore in suspense for near a month, with ingenious and well feigned excuses, they at last avowed their perfidy, and acknowledged that they neither had nor could apply to the viceroy.

He goes to Canton, to solicit the viceroy for stores and provisions.

Mr. Anson, now assured that nothing could be effected by the interposition of the merchants, c returned on board his ship, which he found in a condition totally unfit for the sea, before she was thoroughly refitted. Determining, therefore, at all events, to have this brought about, he wrote a letter to the viceroy, acquainting him, that he was the king of Great Britain's admiral, with the circumstances which had brought him into China, the condition of his ship, and his want of provisions. He desired immediate orders for refitting his ship, and for stores and provisions, that he might be enabled to pursue his voyage homeward. Two days after,

The chief mandarin comes on board.

three mandarins, attended by a considerable retinue of servants and officers, on board eighteen half galleys, finely ornamented, and accompanied with music, came on board the Centurion by order of the viceroy, to examine into the condition of the ship. After inquiry, the chief mandarin, perceiving that the commodore had given a faithful account of his situation, told d him, that he should that night proceed for Canton, where, on his arrival, a council of mandarins would be assembled, who, he doubted not, would speedily and effectually supply all his wants. The commodore then acquainted him, that the custom-house officers at Macao had forbid any provisions to be carried on board him, by which means the crew were deprived of those refreshments, of the utmost consequence to the establishment, and even preservation of their health, after a long and sickly voyage. This the chief mandarin undertook to remedy by his own authority (B), desiring, at the same time, a list to be given him of the quantity of provision necessary for the daily consumption of the ship. Under this he wrote a permit, delivering it to one of his attendants, and directing him to see that quantity sent early every morning on board; which order was punctually observed. e

An account of the treasure of the Gloucester.

On the 5th of December, the following account was taken of the treasure removed from the Gloucester before she was destroyed; viz. a box of gold; a box with 1000 dollars; a box with 3000 dollars; another box with an equal number of dollars, several jewels, and a bag of bits; a box with 1225 dollars, forty-nine pounds of loose plate; and, lastly, a box with 17 pounds averdupoise of loose plate. Such was the equivalent the nation received for the loss of a fine fifty gun ship, and near 300 men. After the mandarin's departure, the commodore with great impatience, expected the resolution of the council, and the proper authorities for refitting his ship.

The intrigues of the French at Canton.

The intrigues and address of the French at Canton for a long time delayed f any determination, occasioned warm debates, and at length had nearly foiled all the interest of the commodore, the chief mandarin, and equity itself, as well as the laws of hospitality.
The French had always declared their merchantmen to be ships of war, and their officers were apprehensive lest any distinction paid to the English commodore should diminish the importance they assumed, render them less considerable in the eyes of the Chinese, and establish a prepossession at Canton in favour of ships of war, by which they, as trading vessels, would

(B) It was not till the viceroy had received Mr. Anson's letter that the Chinese had formed just notions of the commodore's quality and commission. They had never seen an European man of war, and were consequently ignorant of the privileges granted to kings ships.
He was taken by the common people for a pirate, treated with a cold indifference, on his arrival at Canton, by the better sort of people, while the lower class dreaded and viewed him with fear, and even horror, calling him thief and robber, both in Chinese and broken Portuguese. The day after his departure from Canton, a Chiampan, or guard-boat, anchored close by the Genturion, to observe her motions. Had not the English merchants belonging to the India company supplied him secretly with provisions, his crew must have starved in the midst of plenty; and the Chinese jealousy of all dishonest and illicit practices in trade would have seduced them into a fatal barbarity.

suffer

- a suffer in their dignity. As they had a French jesuit, who perfectly understood and spoke the language of the country, residing on the spot, a man well acquainted with the venality of the people, with the persons of the magistrates, of great address, and unfathomable cunning, they were at no loss for traversing the assistance desired by the commodore. At length justice prevailed; the French were baffled, and an order issued by the viceroy for refitting the Centurion, and supplying the crew with all they wanted; though perhaps the force of the ship was an argument of no small weight with his excellency. For it was observed, that the mandarins had surveyed every part of the vessel with extraordinary attention, and proportionable astonishment at the size and number of the guns. Besides, they had been indirectly acquainted by the commodore with what facility he could do himself justice by force of arms, should it be
- b denied by the law of nations. They were soon made sensible that the Centurion alone was far superior to the whole maritime power of the vast Chinese empire; and that he could sink, burn, and destroy, all their shipping, without the smallest hazard or risque to himself. After this order was issued, the chief mandarin, either from curiosity or design, paid another visit to the Centurion. He examined and surveyed her with greater attention and admiration than before, expressed extraordinary satisfaction at the skill of the English workmen, the progress that nation had made in the art of war, and at the prodigious naval power of the king of Great Britain. Having gratified to the full his curiosity, he was elegantly entertained by the commodore, and saluted at his departure with eleven guns.

- c ON the 9th of January came the order for heaving down the Centurion, when the hands immediately began to unmoor, weighed anchor, and warped out to the northward for that purpose. The commodore contracted for 100 workmen, smiths and carpenters, all Chinese, to assist in careening the ship, and two junks to hold the stores, and other goods taken out of the Centurion. He likewise caused a tent to be erected on an adjacent island, and placed a guard there for the security of the effects that were put on shore. As the workmen refused to be employed by the day, it was agreed the carpenters should have 600 l. for their share, and a proportionable reward to the smiths and other tradesmen. This being regulated, and the Centurion heaved down, the state of her bottom was examined, and all imaginable care taken to have the leak effectually repaired. An hundred Chinese caulkers were set to work on her decks and sides, who went through their employment with an address that greatly surprised
- d the English, considering their ignorance in ship-building. As Mr. Anson had given the greatest encouragement for expediting the repairs, every thing went on with such alacrity, that by the end of March the ship was made perfectly tight and strong; by the 6th of April she was rigged, and the same day they began to unmoor. The commodore, instead of being discouraged by his former disasters, was now resolved again to risque the casualties of the Pacific Ocean, for intercepting the Manila galleon. The greatest mortification which he received from the delays of the council, was, lest thereby he should so long be retarded as to let so rich a treasure escape him. From the 12th of November to the 6th of January, was consumed in procuring the viceroy's order; and now the utmost diligence could not render the Centurion in a condition to put to sea before the third of March, when, to the great joy of the
- e commodore and crew, she again appeared completely equipped. Mr. Anson was not without apprehension of being attacked by the Spaniards in this defenceless situation; nor were his fears altogether groundless, as he afterwards learnt by a Portuguese ship, that the governor of Manila, having received advice of the commodore's intention to careen in Tupa, had summoned a council, in which it was resolved to attempt burning the Centurion in the harbour; an enterprise that, if properly conducted, might have greatly distressed the commodore, and frustrated all his future designs. He was farther told, that a sea captain had actually engaged for 40,000 dollars to accomplish the design, and bring the resolution of the council into execution, however dangerous it might appear. The governor's avarice proved the security of Mr. Anson; for, pretending there was no money in the royal treasury, he insisted on the
- f merchants advancing the sum, and their scruples to comply with the demand disconcerted the whole project.

The commodore obtains an order for refitting his ship.

He employs a great number of Chinese artificers.

He receives advice of a design formed by the Spaniards to burn the Centurion.

- g BEFORE the commodore had fully completed his stores, the Chinese expressed great uneasiness, and a strong desire that he would leave their coast, being either ignorant, or pretending that they did not know, this was a point he was as eagerly set upon as they could be. On the 3d of April, two mandarin yachts came on board to press his departure; a request that had often been repeated before, although they had no reason to suspect the commodore of affected delays. In answer to this last message, Mr. Anson told the mandarins in a determined tone, that he desired they would give him no farther trouble on this head, for he would go when he thought proper: "A noble instance," says our author, "of the resolution of this truly
- " British commander, who thus honourably supported the dignity of his king and country, and challenged a respect for the British flag in an empire till then too arbitrary to pay the least deference to any European." This resolute reply of the commodore was attended with

*The viceroy
revokes the order.*

some inconveniences to the crew, for from that time it was strictly prohibited that no provisions should be carried on board. The greatest care was taken to enforce those injunctions, so that from that time nothing could be purchased at any price, and all the supplies the ship could receive were secretly conveyed by means of the English supercargoes. By their assistance the stores were at last completed, and the crew somewhat augmented by a number of Lascars and Dutch taken on board; upon which the commodore determined to proceed on his voyage, and cruise for the Manila galleon.

S E C T. XI.

Containing an account of the Manila trade; Mr. Anson's departure from Typa; his cruise in search of the Manila ship; his engagement with her, and return to Canton; his transactions in that port; his voyage to Java, thence to the Cape of Good Hope, and his arrival in England in June, A. 1744; with reflections on the voyage.

AS the possession of the Manila ship, so celebrated for its immense wealth, was now the principal object of Mr. Anson's future designs; and since the trade carried on by the galleons between the city of Manila and the port of Acapulco is the most valuable of any in the universe, it may not be disagreeable to the reader, that we here give an abstract of that trade, notwithstanding we have treated of it more largely in another part of this work.

*An account of
the Manila
trade.*

WHEN Charles V. was emperor of Germany, Don Ferdinand Maglianes, or Magellan, a disgusted Portuguese, had been sent by that politic prince, with a squadron to make discoveries to the westward of America. Magellan sailed from the port of Seville in Old Spain, in August 1519, and soon had the good fortune to discover that passage into the South Seas, which has since been called after his name, and laid the foundation of that immense commerce and wealth the Spaniards draw from the Southern Continent of America. Having happily accomplished the first part of his scheme, after some continuance on the coast of Peru, he set sail again to the westward, with a view of falling in with the Spice islands. In this long run across the Pacific Ocean, he first discovered the Marian or Ladrones islands, about 2,280 leagues west of Acapulco. Pursuing his course, he at length reached the Philippine islands, situated in the most eastern parts of all Asia. The happy situation of these islands induced the Spaniards carefully to establish and maintain a correspondence between them and their colonies on the coast of Peru. They soon dispossessed the Indians, and became themselves proprietors of the most valuable of the Philippines. The chief residence was fixed in the city of Manila, in the large island of Luconia, which speedily became the mart of all Indian commodities, as spices, silks, calicoes, chints, and gold-work, bought up by the inhabitants, and annually exported to the southern coast of America. Formerly they were carried to Callao in Lima; but at present the trade is confined wholly to Acapulco. This commerce between Manila and Acapulco is usually carried on by one, or at most by two, annual ships, which sail from the Philippines in July, and arrive at the continent in December, January, or February following. Having there unloaded, they return commonly in March, and arrive at Manila in June, July, or August; so that the voyage is seldom completed in less than one whole year. The Manila galleons are stout ships, seldom less than 1200 tons burthen, mounted with fifty guns, and manned with 400 sailors, frequently 600, passengers included. As these ships are commissioned and paid by the king, one of the captains is usually stiled the General, and he carries the royal standard of Spain at the main-top-gallant-mast head. The trade is not laid open to all the inhabitants of Manila; but is limited by very particular restrictions, analogous to those of the register-ships from Cadiz to the West Indies. They are confined to a certain value, which the annual cargo ought not to exceed, though it commonly does. The sum specified is 600,000 dollars; but few of these ships are worth less than double that sum; and the return from Acapulco is generally computed at 3,000,000 of dollars.

THE feeble condition of the Spanish provinces, bordering on the South Seas, was the most favourable conjuncture Great Britain could have seized for reducing that crown to the necessity of suing for peace; but the misfortunes sustained by Mr. Anson's squadron rendered his force unequal to any considerable enterprize. He therefore confined his views wholly to the intercepting the Manila galleon, well knowing what damages the Spaniards would receive from such a capture, and how just a reward this good fortune would be of all the toils and dangers his crew had undergone. To execute this purpose, every thing being in readiness, the Centurion weighed from Typa on the 6th of April, and warped to the southward. By the 15th the commodore got into the road of Macao, and, on the 19th, he made sail, and stood to sea, after giving out, that he was bound for Batavia, and thence to England. It is true, the westerly

- a westerly monsoon was then set in, at which time the passage to Batavia was deemed impracticable; yet the confidence he had expressed in the strength of his ship, and the experience of his hands, persuaded not only the Chinese, but his own crew likewise, that this was really his intention. So strongly was this report believed, that several packets of letters for Batavia were sent on board the Centurion by the inhabitants of Canton and Macao (A). The commodore thought it probable, that this year there would be two Manila ships, since his cruise before Acapulco might possibly have prevented one of them from putting to sea the preceding year. He thought now of fixing his station off Cape Espiritu Santo, on the island of Samal, which is the first land the galleons always make on their return to the Philippines. The month of June is commonly the time of their arrival there; he doubted not therefore of getting
- b soon enough to his station to meet with them. The inferiority of his strength by no means discouraged him, as he had the utmost confidence in the courage and skill of his men, who amounted to no more than 227 hands; a force greatly disproportioned even to one galleon. As there was a continual intercourse between Manila and Macao, it was intirely necessary to the success of his project, that his designs should be kept with the most profound secrecy, while he continued at Macao; but, being now at sea, he resolved to communicate his intention to the crew. Summoning, for this purpose, all the men upon the quarter-deck, he acquainted them with his intention of cruising for the Manila ships, of whose wealth they were not ignorant. He told them he should chuse a station where he could not fail of meeting with them; that, notwithstanding their strength, he doubted not but the vigour of his
- c men, and the exertion of their usual spirit, would surmount every difficulty, and bring into their hands a prize that would sufficiently reward all their toils, and make them easy and happy for the remainder of their lives. He said, that many ridiculous stories had been propagated concerning the strength of the sides of these ships, which, it was said, were impenetrable to cannon-shot; but these were fictions contrived to palliate the cowardice of those who had formerly engaged the galleons. He hoped that none of his men were weak enough to

The commodore
leaves Macao.
His speech to his crew.

(A) So firmly were the Chinese persuaded of the truth of the report the commodore had propagated, in order to keep secret his real design, that his friend the chief mandarin used all methods to dissuade him from the enterprize, by explaining to him the nature and danger of the monsoons. As our readers may not perhaps have a clear idea of this term, we shall endeavour to explain it to his satisfaction. Monsoon is an Indian word, which, in its strict meaning, signifies no more than a strong wind. It is applied to the stated trade-winds no otherwise than because they blow remarkably steady and violent. They are distinguished into the East and West Monsoons, the former setting to the north of the equator in September, and blowing till April, attended usually with fine, fair, and pleasant weather; and the latter continuing from April to September, accompanied for the most part with heavy rains and dreadful tempests. Thus the months of April and September are the shifting months; and, previous to the fixed monsoons, there is a various and unsteady wind that blows for some days. Yet, upon the whole, the general alteration of these winds is no less steady than the seasons of the year in our hemisphere. Upon them depends the whole navigation to India; all who trade thither embracing these changes either for their going or returning. Hence they came by the name of Trade Winds. At the change of these Trade Winds, there are constantly high storms, which they particularly call Monsoons, or still more particularly Tyfoons, a Chinese term, perhaps of Greek origin, except it be more probable that the Greeks borrowed the noun τύφος, or the verb τύφω, from the Chinese. But without entering upon this equally dry and useless disquisition, sufficient it is that those Tyfoons, Typhons, or violent gusts of winds and storms, happen near the full or change of the moon, preceded usually by fair weather, gentle breezes, and a serene and clear sky. They veer about from the true trade-wind, and usually shift almost quite round the compass. Immediately before the storm a black cloud appears in that quarter from whence it may be expected, always suspended near the horizon; the upper edge of a bright flame-colour, which increases in beauty and lustre, till at last it fades away to a whitish glaring cloud. It is a very awful and terrifying spectacle, continuing frequently for twelve hours before the storm. As soon as the cloud begins to move, immediately the wind follows it, and blows with incredible fury at north-east for about the space of twelve hours, accompanied with horrible and astonishing claps of thunder, large flying sheets of lightning, and a deluge of rain. Nor does this storm abate gradually of its violence; it subsides all at once, and, in less than an hour after, a perfect calm takes place. Then the wind rises at the opposite point, and blows at south-west, with rain, hail, and storms of thunder and lightning, for about the same time as it did before.

Varenius, a geographer in some esteem, has given us a large description of this tempest, which deserves the reader's perusal. "A Typhon," says he, "is a strong swift wind blowing from all points, wandering about all quarters, and generally coming from above, and considerably higher than the horizon. It is frequent in the oriental seas, especially those of Siam, China, and Japan, and between Molucca and Japan. It breaks out violently almost from the western point, and, turning with a rapid force round the horizon, performs the revolution in 24 hours, till, increasing in strength, it raises those seas with its strong gyrations to a prodigious height, every tenth wave higher than the rest, and clashing against each other with such impetuosity as deprives the seamen of all hopes of life. On account of these storms, sailing from India to Japan is extremely dangerous; insomuch that if one ship in three gets safe there, it is reckoned extraordinary;"—which might have been true at the time when Varenius wrote, as the seasons, and this navigation, were not then well ascertained. "The Typhon," says he, "rages most in summer, and more than can be conceived by those who have not seen it; so that it is no wonder that the ribs of the strongest ships should be loosened; you would think the heavens and earth were falling into their original chaos, overturning houses, rooting up trees, and conveying large ships a quarter of a mile from the sea." The cause of it is, without doubt, that the wind pushing to a certain point is obstructed, and reflected back on itself. Hence this whirling, this gyration of the sea, and vortices, it occasions.

credit

credit such tales; for his own part, he assured them, he would fight so close that they would find his bullets, instead of being stopped by one side, would penetrate through both. This speech was received with universal joy, the sailors expressing their applause and satisfaction by three strenuous cheers, declaring at the same time their resolution to succeed or perish in the attempt, whenever the opportunity offered. As they firmly relied on the assurances of the commodore, that they should certainly meet with the galleons, so they were too sanguine to harbour the smallest doubts of mastering them. In fact they considered themselves as already in possession of those invaluable prizes.

He arrives at his station, where they impatiently expect the gal-leon.

Mr. Anson departing from Macao, stood for some days to the westward, and, by the 3d of May, fell in with the southernmost part of the island of Formosa, lying east-by-south at the distance of ten leagues, and affording a delightful prospect. Hence he steered to the southward, and two days after was in the latitude of the Bashee islands, in $21^{\circ} 4'$ north. After leaving Botet Tobago Xima, he steered between S. and S. W. for Cabo Espiritu Santo, and, on the 20th of May at noon, first discovered that Cape, bearing S. S. W. at about the distance of eleven leagues. The commodore knowing that there were centinels placed on this Cape to make signals to the Manila ship, when she fell in with land, ordered the helm to lee, the ship to tack, and the top-gallant sails to be taken in, to prevent his being discovered. This being the station where he resolved to cruise for the galleons, he kept the Cape between south and west, endeavouring to confine himself within the latitude of $12^{\circ} 50'$, and $13^{\circ} 5'$. The month of June now approaching, the crew of the Centurion passed each hour with the utmost impatience and expectation of the happy crisis that was to balance the account of all their former calamities. Nor was the commodore's anxiety a bit inferior to theirs, though his prudence suppressed those emotions the other officers could not avoid discovering. Every necessary preparation was made for the reception of the galleon; the long-boat was hoisted out, and lashed along-side the Centurion, that the ship might be ready for engaging, if they should happen to fall in with the enemy at night. There now being but little employment for the crew, to preserve their health, keep up their spirits, and amuse their minds, the commodore ordered them every day to be exercised in working the great guns, and in the use of the small arms; a practice he had maintained more or less, in all convenient seasons, during the course of the voyage. An excellent method, which deserves the imitation of all our sea-officers, the advantage of it being fully proved by the effects it had upon the men, and the labour of it recompensed by the success of his engagement with the galleon. All this while Mr. Anson was solicitous to keep at such a distance from the Cape as to avoid discovering himself; lying commonly from ten to fifteen leagues distance, though, by means of the current, he was once within seven leagues of land. It was afterwards, however, known, that, in spite of all his care, he was frequently seen, and intelligence of him sent to Manila, where it was at first disbelieved, till repeated advices alarmed the merchants, who applied to the governor. Upon this, his excellency undertook, at the expence of the merchants, to equip a force, consisting of two ships of thirty-two guns, one of twenty guns, and two sloops of ten guns each, to attack the Centurion on her station. Some of the vessels actually weighed with this intention; but the capital ship not being ready, and the monsoon being against them, the merchants and governor quarreled; by which the enterprize was defeated.

THE month of June being pretty far advanced, the English seamen on board the Centurion began to lose all patience, and to fear that the galleon had been detained as the former year, or escaped them unobserved. However, the 20th, precisely a month after gaining his station, the commodore was relieved from his disagreeable suspense, one of the men having at sun-rise discovered a sail from the mast-head. The news was immediately spread through the ship, and a joy equal to what might be expected after victory took place in every breast. They had no doubt but this was one of the galleons, and they every moment expected to see the other. The first part of their suggestion was soon confirmed by the near approach of the ship. As to the galleon which their cruise had detained the preceding year in the port of Acapulco, instead of returning in company with the other galleon, as was expected, she sailed alone from Acapulco much earlier than the usual time, and got into the port of Manila long before the Centurion had reached her station at Cape Espiritu Santo.

THE galleon now in sight was called the Nostra Signora del Cabo Dongo, commanded by General Don Feronimo de Montero, mounted 42 guns, 17 of which were brass, but was pierced for 64, and manned with 550 stout seamen and marines. She had besides 28 swivel guns and pateraroes in her gunwale, quarters, and tops; each of which carried a four-pound shot. She was well-furnished with small arms, and secured against boarding by close quarters and a strong net-work of two inch rope laced over her waist, and defended by half-spikes. Under the conduct of Don Feronimo de Montero, reputed the most expert and valiant officer in the Manila service, she was in force, in bulk, and every particular but the weight of metal, superior to the Centurion. Mr. Anson was first discovered by the galleon, who might possibly have escaped a escaped, had she attempted it. But such was the account the Spaniards had received at Guam of the condition of the Centurion, that they despised her weakness, and proposed nothing less than carrying her a prize to Manila. As soon as she approached near enough to distinguish with certainty it was the Centurion, Montero, elated by the confidence of his superiority, told his officers that he did not doubt of having the honour of entertaining the British commodore that day at his table. Such were the hopes of the Spaniard; but British courage, supported by fortune, determined otherwise. Mr. Anson instantly bore down on the galleon with all the fail he could carry; and, by half an hour after seven, she became visible from the deck of the Centurion. Now the galleon fired a gun, took in her top-sails, and continued to bear down on the commodore, who hardly believed what afterwards appeared to be the case, that she knew his ship to be the Centurion, and as such determined to fight her. When the commodore first spied her through his glass, the first glimpse appeared like two ships; upon which he said with the utmost composure, "My lads, we will fight them both." As she approached nearer, he discovered his mistake, and seemed disappointed. About noon he was little more than a league distant from the galleon, and could fetch her wake; so that there was no danger of her escaping. Soon after the galleon haled up her fore-sail, and brought to under top-sails, with her head to the northward, hoisting Spanish colours, a red flag, and the royal standard of Spain, at the main-top-mast-head. Mr. Anson had in the mean while prepared all things for engaging on board the Centurion; he had taken every possible measure for the full exertion of his small strength, and for avoiding the confusion too frequent in actions at sea. He picked thirty of the choicest men, and best marksmen, whom he distributed in his tops; a precaution which fully answered his expectation, by the signal services they performed. As his hands were too few to quarter a sufficient number to each gun, in the usual manner, he therefore appointed on his lower tier only two men to each great gun, who were to be wholly employed in loading it, while the rest of his crew were divided into different gangs of ten or twelve men each, continually moving round the decks to fire such guns as were loaded. By this wise management and skillful finesse, he was able to keep up a constant fire without intermission, instead of a whole broadside with intervals between them; a conduct that greatly disconcerted the Spaniards, and procured him very important advantages. It is customary with the Spanish seamen to fall down upon the decks when they see a broadside preparing, and to continue in that posture till it is given; after which they rise, presuming the danger to be over for some time, work their guns, and fire with great vigour till another broadside is expected; a precaution rendered wholly useless by the commodore's new plan of engaging. All things being thus in readiness, and the two ships drawing nearer, there happened several squalls of wind and rain, which often obscured the galleon, and made the commodore apprehensive that she might find some means of escape; but, whenever the weather cleared up, he observed her resolutely lying-to. About one o'clock, being within gunshot of the enemy, he hoisted his broad-pendant and colours; and perceiving that they had neglected clearing their ship till then, as they were observed busy in throwing cattle and other lumber over-board, the commodore ordered the chace-guns to be fired upon them, in order to disturb their present employment; though his general directions had been to hold their fire till they came within pistol shot. The galleon returned the discharge with two of her stern-chace; and now the ships running along-side yard-arm and yard-arm, began the fight with all the fury imaginable. The commodore took place on the quarter-deck, with his sword drawn, and giving his orders with a surprising calmness and composure, while the hon. Mr. Van Kepple, son to the late lord Albemarle, and now commodore Kepple, gave his directions between decks. As soon as the Centurion came within the proposed distance of the galleon, she began a constant, quick, and even fire, which for a while was answered by Montero with abundance of skill and courage. Mr. Anson took great pains to keep a-breast and to the leeward of the enemy, to prevent their putting before the wind, and gaining the port of Jalapay, from which she was about seven leagues distant. He now made use of a feint, by lashing his sprit-sail fore-and-aft; that being the usual sign to board; a stroke of military art that persuaded the Spaniards he had his full complement of men. What confirmed them in this opinion, was his shewing his whole force, consisting of 227 men, all on one side, which he had an opportunity of doing by their fighting so close. The enemy were greatly amazed and intimidated to find his condition so different from what it had been represented at Guam; however, Montero continued the action undismayed. For the first half-hour, the Centurion over-reached the galleon, and lay on her bow. In this situation, by the great width of his ports, Mr. Anson could traverse almost all his guns upon the enemy, whilst only a few of theirs could be brought to bear. Soon after they came to a close engagement, the mats of the galleon, with which her netting had been stuffed, took fire, and burnt with violence, blazing up as high as the mizen-top. This accident was occasioned by the wads of the Centurion, and threw the Spaniards into the utmost consternation; nor was the commodore without apprehension that the galleon might be burnt, and his men not only deprived of the treasure, but the Centurion might might be endangered by her driving on board. At length, however, the Spaniards suppressed a the fire, by cutting away the netting, and tumbling the whole mats all in flames into the sea. During this interval, the Centurion kept her advantageous position, firing with great order and vigour with her cannon, while the men in her tops made prodigious havock of the enemy exposed on the deck to their fire, killing every officer, but one, that appeared, and wounding in particular the Spanish general himself. After the action had continued in this manner for half an hour, the Centurion lost the superiority arising from her station; for now she was close along-side the galleon, without bearing on her bow as before. In this condition the Spaniards continued to fire near an hour longer, but with great inferiority, as their decks were constantly swept by the Centurion's grape-shot. The number of their slain was now so considerable, that they began to fall into disorder, and abandon the guns; and the more, as Montero, who b was the soul of the action, was no longer able to exert himself. This confusion was distinctly seen from the Centurion; for the ships were so near, that some of the Spanish officers were seen running about with great diligence to prevent the men quitting their quarters. Of this Mr. Anson made his advantage, charging now with more vigour than ever. At first he was sparing of his ammunition, having but a small quantity on board; but now resolving to push the advantage, and prevent the enemies recovering their spirits, his shot was poured into the galleon in such a manner, as rendered ineffectual all the endeavours of her officers to keep the hands to the guns. The galleon having, as a last effort, fired five or six guns with more judgment than any of the former, at length yielded up the contest; and the colours being burnt off the ensign staff, she struck the royal standard at her main-top-gallant-mast-head. c This, however, was not done till the ship was rendered incapable of continuing the fight; and a Spanish officer, who stood near the colours, refused to strike them till he perceived the impossibility of longer defending themselves.

The loss on both sides.

THUS, after a warm action of about an hour and three quarters, the Centurion's crew got possession of a treasure, which they thought an ample equivalent for all the unfortunate incidents they had run through. The acquisition was still the more valuable, as it was obtained with the loss only of two men killed, lieutenant Brett and fifteen men wounded, fifteen shot in the hull of the Centurion, her fore-mast, main-mast, and bowsprit, wounded, and some damage, but less than might be expected, done to her rigging. Whereas the enemy received fifteen shot in her hull, many of which were between wind and water; her masts were d grievously wounded, and her rigging totally destroyed; so that the commodore, as soon as she struck, was forced to send ropes and blocks on board to refit her. She had 67 men killed in the action, and 84 wounded, three of which expired the same night they were taken; and the survivors, except such as were left for navigating her, were removed on board the Centurion. Mr. Anson expended fifty hundred weight of round shot, four rounds of grape, four of double-headed shot, and twenty-four barrels of powder. The Spaniards loaded their swivels with seventy musquet-balls, often with rusty nails, flints, and slugs. They likewise fired a great number of chain-shot, some double-headed with barbed points; a cruelty seldom practised among civilized nations. To prevent their being intimidated by the number of the slain, Montero, during the whole action, had twenty men employed in throwing the dead e over-board, and cleaning the decks, that the rivers of blood might not strike terror in those who performed the duties of the ship. From which circumstances it may be perceived how hotly the galleon was plied by the Centurion.

Value of the prize.

WHEN the Spaniard lowered her royal standard, the commodore ordered his cutter to be hoisted out, the rest of the boats being rendered unserviceable in the action, and sent on board lieutenant Saumarez to take possession of her. The cutter soon returned with the governor of Guam, the Spanish pilot, and some of the chief officers and passengers. As for the general, his wounds being dangerous, it was thought advisable not to remove him, Mr. Anson ordering him to be attended with all imaginable care on board his own ship. Four days were employed in removing the treasure on board the Centurion; it consisting of 1,313,843 pieces of eight, f 35,684 ounces of virgin silver, several bags of cochineal, and some other commodities, the whole amounting to 313,000 l. sterling. Mr. Anson appointed his first lieutenant, Mr. Saumarez, to command the prize, giving him fifty English, with some Spaniards, to navigate her; after which he resolved to make the best of his way with both ships for China. The greatest caution was used to secure the prisoners in such a manner as to render himself safe, and yet preserve that tenderness which noble minds ever shew to the unfortunate and vanquished. Their number, however, gave the commodore great disturbance, it being no easy matter, with the few hands he had, to preserve that medium between safety and humanity. The prisoners were near double the number of his men; and some of them, when they were brought g on board, observing how weakly the Centurion was manned, and the large proportion which the boys bore to the able hands, could not help expressing themselves with great indignation at being thus defeated by an handful of children; at the same time that they did justice to the conduct a conduct of the commodore, to whose prudence they ascribed their disgrace. They soon had no less reason to applaud his humanity, than before they had done his courage and skill; for the sick in particular, and indeed the whole prisoners, were treated with such tenderness, that, after the 25th, not a single man died.

STANDING with his prize for the river Canton, he got sight of the Cape Delangano, and on the next day made the Bashee Islands. On the 28th he discovered Sapata, and three days afterwards taking on board two Chinese pilots, both ships came to an anchor off the city of Macao. On the 15th of July, both ships were conducted through the narrow passage of Bocca Tigris; the commodore, on the following day, sending his lieutenant to Canton, with a letter for the viceroy. In this he acquainted him, that he had taken shelter in this port against the approaching hurricanes; but, as soon as the monsoon shifted, he would sail for England; that he proposed repairing to Canton, to visit his excellency, as soon as the circumstances of affairs would admit of his absence; and that, in the mean time, a supply of provisions and stores would oblige his Britannic majesty, whose servant he was. The lieutenant was civilly received, and a promise given him that the commodore should have an answer to his message the next day. Next morning the lieutenant returned in his barge, bringing with him a supply of fresh provisions, but no licence for proceeding up the river, as was desired and expected. He acquainted the commodore, that a mandarin of rank would speedily be sent from the viceroy to inform him of the resolution taken in reference to his letter. Upon this notice great preparations were made on board for the reception of this Chinese officer, who arrived on the 20th, attended by twelve Chiampons. He desired that the commodore would pass over the ceremony of saluting him, because his guns being large, the noise would disturb him extremely. He assured him, that the viceroy would be glad of a visit from him and the captain of the other ship. He then presented him with an order for a daily supply of fresh provisions; but, intimated, at the same time, that the usual duties would be expected from him, as in China no distinction between men of war and merchantmen was ever made. To this Mr. Anson replied with thanks for the viceroy's obliging invitation and order; but said, that the king of England's ships were never treated upon a footing with merchant-ships in any port; and that he was absolutely restrained by his instructions from paying any acknowledgement for anchoring in the harbour of any prince whatever. The mandarin behaved with great politeness, and shewed the utmost satisfaction at the reception he had met with; promising, at his departure, to expedite the licence for proceeding up the river; for want of which they had not yet been able to pass the bar.

IN the mean while the commodore permitted several of the Spanish officers to repair on their parole to Canton. No sooner had the prisoners arrived there, than they were sent for by the regency, who examined them minutely by what means they came into the hands of an enemy so inferior in power. On this occasion the prisoners were honest enough to declare, that as the kings of England and Spain were at war, they intended to take the Centurion; but that the event had been contrary to their hopes. When they were questioned concerning the usage they met with in their confinement, they frankly acknowledged, that it was much better than they believed the English would have received from them, had the issue of the engagement been reversed. Such a confession from an enemy had great weight with the Chinese, and proportionably raised the reputation of the commodore. Till then they had only revered his military force, at the same time that they considered him as a lawless freebooter, uncommissioned by his king and country for the revenge of public injuries. But now their opinion was wholly altered, and they esteemed him a prodigy of valour, virtue, and humanity; to which perhaps the vast treasure of his prize might not a little contribute; the acquisition of wealth being a matter greatly adapted to the esteem and reverence of the Chinese, as well as European nations.

FOUR days after the mandarin came on board, two French ships entered the road; upon which the commodore put the Centurion and her prize in a post to receive them, in case they might act as enemies. However, upon sending his pinnace on board, the captains assured the English officer that no war had been declared between the crowns of France and Great Britain. Next day the Harrington East Indiaman entered the road, and, in passing the commodore, saluted him with twenty-one guns, which was returned by nineteen. On the 24th, three Dutch ships came in, and honoured Mr. Anson with the compliment usually paid to the king's ships; and, on the 27th, the licence for proceeding up the river arrived, with pilots to conduct the ship up to the second bar, within thirty miles of the city of Canton. Three mandarins had been sent upon this message, and also to excuse the viceroy from receiving the commodore's visit, during the then extreme heat of the weather, because assembling the mandarins and soldiers necessary to that ceremony would occasion great inconvenience and fatigue. In September, the mandarins said, his excellency would be happy to be honoured with a visit from the commodore and the English captain of the prize. As Mr. Anson was informed that an express had been sent to Pekin, with an account of the arrival of the Centurion and her prize, the subterfuge of the Chinese to decline it.

Mr. Anson releases the Spanish prisoners.

prize, he had no doubt but the chief motive for postponing this visit was to give time to receive instructions, the regency not caring to do it by their own authority in this unusual affair. After the mandarins had delivered their message, they began to mention the business of the customs to be paid by his ships; but the commodore immediately told them, that he could never submit to any demand of that nature. The mandarins being cut short on the subject of the duties, said they had another matter to mention, the only one with which they would then trouble him; this was a request to the commodore to release the prisoners he had taken on board the galleon, as the viceroy apprehended that the emperor might be displeased, if he should be informed that the subjects of a king, his ally, and carrying on an extensive commerce with his dominions, were under confinement in a Chinese port. This was a request no way disagreeable to the commodore, although he raised scruples, in order to inance the obligation. He was no less desirous than either the Chinese or Spaniards of being disburthened of such an incumbrance. On his first coming to Macao, he had released a great number upon their parole, and yet 400 remained with him. He therefore suffered himself to be prevailed on, at length agreeing to put them on shore, if his excellency would appoint boats for that purpose. This important affair being adjusted, the mandarins departed, pleased with their influence over the British commodore, and the address with which they brought this affair about. On the 28th of July, two junks were sent from Canton, to carry the prisoners to Macao; the Centurion furnishing them with provisions for eight days to serve them during their passage down the river. On the 29th, the commodore made the signal to weigh, and each ship advanced up the river as far as the second bar, anchoring before the custom-house. Soon after this, the commodore received advice that a ship belonging to the English East India company was arrived on the coast of China, in a very distressed condition, from a storm she had met with at sea, he immediately sent the pinnace, with an officer and thirty men, stores, ropes, anchors, and fire-arms, to her assistance. The reasons for sending the latter were, to secure her against any attempts from the Spaniards at Macao, who, chagrined with their loss, might embrace this opportunity of revenging themselves. Although Mr. Anson's fears upon this occasion were without foundation, yet were they the suggestions of prudence and attention to the interest of his country. A conduct that gained him the esteem of every man in the service of the East India company, and indeed of all the Europeans at Canton, who could not help admiring the fidelity with which he discharged his commission, and the signal protection he afforded to commerce. Of this he gave testimonies as often as the opportunity offered; and he soon had occasion to exert all his prudence, address, and presence of mind, in a nice and delicate conjuncture that occurred.

Mr. Anson's public spirit and prudence.

*He goes to
Canton.*

ALTHOUGH the commodore, in consequence of the viceroy's order, found no difficulty in purchasing provisions for the daily consumption of the ships, yet it was impossible he could proceed to England without laying in both a large quantity of provisions and naval stores, for his performing the voyage, as well as for the immediate occasions and repairs of his ships. The procuring this supply he foresaw from the scruples about the customs, and the intrigues of the French, which he had experienced when he lay in the Tupa, would be attended with some trouble. In fact it proved so, the contractors having never taken the least step to comply with their agreement. Towards the end of September, perceiving that the viceroy had not, according to promise, invited him to an interview, he determined to proceed to Canton, and notify to the governor that he waited for his appointing a day for the audience. He was determined not to comply with any demands that might be made for the duties, not chusing to establish so dishonourable a precedent, and took all possible precautions to prevent the Chinese from insisting upon it. However, to secure the ships, and the great treasure on board, against any designs that might be formed, he appointed lieutenant Brett to command in his absence, and particularly directed him, if he should be detained at Canton for the duties in dispute, to set fire to the galleon, and fall down the river with the Centurion, and to remain at the entrance of the Bocca Tigris, till further orders from him. These precautions taken, he acquainted all the supercargoes of the English, Danish, and Swedish ships, of his intention; and that he would be glad of their attendance at his audience of the viceroy. They accordingly came on board the 13th of October, at nine in the morning, and the same afternoon the commodore, lieutenant Saumarez, lieutenant Van Kepple, the captains and supercargoes of the East India ships, put off in the barge, rowed by eighteen chosen men in new jackets of scarlet, and blue silk waistcoats, the whole trimmed with silver buttons, besides badges on their jackets and caps. The barge was immediately joined by the boats of all the India ships in the river, the crew of the Centurion giving three cheers as they went off, and saluting the commodore with 19 guns. As he passed by Wamps, he was complimented by all the European ships except the French; and in the evening he arrived at Canton. On his landing, his officers and attendants marched in a slow and solemn procession towards the viceroy's palace, the commodore himself being carried in a chair. The retinue was marshalled in the greatest order, and the whole ceremony conducted with more decorum, and even magnificence, than could be expected

- a expected in his circumstances. As the Chinese, like all other eastern nations, are extravagantly fond of shew and pomp, this procession had a very proper effect, it being regarded with profound silence and respect. On approaching the palace, he was met by some mandarins, who acquainted him, that his excellency would appoint a day for the interview, and now desired leave to conduct him to the lodgings provided for him. Here he was visited by the principal Chinese merchants, by whose artifices, and the chimerical fears that had seized the English supercargoes, the day of audience was postponed; however, this time the commodore employed in making farther inquiries into the manner in which he was to contract for provisions and stores. When he had finished his contracts, and all to shipping the stores was completed, he resolved to demand an interview, as he was persuaded that, without this ceremony, the
- b grant of an order to take them on board would meet with numberless obstructions. With this intention he sent one of his officers, on the 24th of November, to the mandarin who commanded the principal gate of the city, with a letter to the viceroy. When the officer delivered this letter, the mandarin received him with great civility, taking down the contents of it in Chinese; and promising that the viceroy should be immediately made acquainted with it; but that it was not necessary for the officer to wait for an answer, because a message would be sent to the commodore himself.

- ABOUT two days after a fire broke out in the suburbs of Canton, which consumed an hundred shops, and eleven streets full of warehouses, threatening destruction to the whole city. In this general confusion the viceroy came thither, and sent to the commodore, requesting his
- c advice and assistance, with assurances that he might take any measures he thought most conducive to the public safety. Upon this notice, Mr. Anson, attended with about forty English, part of his own crew, and part of the English East India ships, flew to that quarter of the city that was in flames, where the seamen, in sight of the viceroy, and all the inhabitants of Canton, exerted themselves in so extraordinary a manner as in that country was altogether without example. Rather animated than deterred by the flames and falling buildings among which they worked, they behaved with a boldness and activity peculiar to British sailors, extinguishing by their address a fire that otherwise must have soon laid the whole city in ashes. Many thousand Chinese stood astonished, terrified, and unactive spectators, admiring the intrepidity which they had not the courage to imitate. The conduct of the English became the
- d general topic of conversation, every one striving who should the most loudly extol their unparalleled vigour and spirit. Next morning a number of the principal inhabitants waited on the commodore, to acknowledge the high obligations they lay under to him; frankly owning, that he had preserved their city from a conflagration, as they could of themselves never have extinguished the fire. Immediately after a message from the viceroy arrived, appointing the 30th of November for an audience; which sudden resolution, in a matter so long in agitation, was intirely owing to the extraordinary services performed by the English, of which the viceroy retained the deepest sense of obligation. All the necessary preparations were made by the commodore against the day appointed for the audience; and Mr. Finch, an English gentleman belonging to the English company, who spoke Chinese fluently, was engaged for his interpreter.
- e Nor could a better be chosen, Mr. Finch repeating with great boldness and exactness whatever was delivered him in charge; a part which no Chinese linguist either would or could do with exactness and spirit. When the day arrived, a mandarin waited on the commodore, to acquaint him, that the viceroy was prepared; upon which, with his retinue, he immediately set out, in much the same order as in the former procession.

A terrible fire in Canton extinguished by the English sailors.

The commodore has an audience of the viceroy.

- As soon as he entered the outer gate of the city, he found a guard of 200 soldiers ready to receive him, who attended him to the great parade before the imperial palace, where the viceroy resided. Here a body of ten thousand men was drawn up under arms, making a fine appearance, but rather splendid than warlike. They were all new clothed for the ceremony, their arms bright, and every thing adapted to strike the Europeans with high ideas of the vast
- f power and opulence of the Chinese empire. The commodore and his retinue, having passed through the center of the troops, who opened to the right and left, were led to the great hall of audience, where the viceroy was seated under a rich canopy, in the imperial chair of state, incircled by his council of mandarins. A vacant seat was placed for the commodore, in which he was seated on his arrival, ranked the third in order from the viceroy, the chiefs of the law and treasury, who in China have the precedence of all military officers, being placed above him. As soon as he was seated, he addressed himself to his excellency by his interpreter, reciting the various methods he had formerly taken to procure the present honour; and adding, that he attributed the delays he had met with to the insincerity of those persons he had employed: that at length he had no other means left than sending, as he had done, his own officer with a
- g letter to the gate. Here the viceroy interrupted the interpreter, bidding him assure the commodore, that the first knowledge he had of his being at Canton was from that letter; an assurance, however, in which there was less truth than politeness. Upon this, the commodore proceeded ceeded to acquaint his excellency, that the subjects of the king of Great Britain, his master, ^a had complained to him, the commodore, of the vexatious impositions of the merchants and inferior custom-house officers, to which they were often obliged to submit, on account of the difficulty of access to the mandarins, who alone could grant them redress : that it was his duty, as the servant of the king of Great Britain, to lay before his excellency all grievances of the British subjects, which he hoped he would take into consideration, giving orders that they should be removed, and all cause of future complaint be obviated. Here the commodore paused, waiting some time for an answer ; but nothing being replied, he asked Mr. Finch if he was certain the viceroy understood what was urged ? Mr. Finch told him, that it was certainly well enough apprehended, but that he imagined no answer would be made. After dispatching this and some other business regarding the ship Hastingsfield, with which the East India supercargoes ^b had intrusted him, he entered upon the affairs of his own squadron, telling the viceroy, that the proper season for returning to Europe was already set in, and that he wanted an order for shipping his provisions and stores, which were all ready : that as soon as this was granted, and he had got his necessaries on board, he proposed leaving the river Canton, and making the best of his way to England. To this the viceroy immediately replied, that the licence should be issued without delay, and proper assistance afforded him in shipping his stores, and repairing the ship. Perceiving that the commodore's business was ended, his excellency continued the conversation for some time upon indifferent matters, acknowledging in polite terms how greatly the Chinese were obliged to him for the courage and conduct exerted by his men in the late dreadful fire. Then observing that the Centurion had been a long time on their coast, he concluded his dis- ^c course by wishing the commodore a prosperous voyage. Mr. Anson, after thanking him for his civility and assistance, took his leave, highly satisfied with his reception, and his success in establishing an authentic precedent, by which all British ships of war should for the future be exempted from all demands of customs in any Chinese ports. Upon his leaving the hall of audience, he was conducted into another apartment, where was provided a magnificent enter- ^d tainment. Finding, however, that the viceroy was not to be present, he declined it, leaving the retinue to do honour to this politeness of his excellency. The entertainment consisted, after the manner of the country, of a multitude of small dishes filled with a variety of minced meats ; after which, at a proper interval, there followed a rich desert of dried fruits and sweet- meats ; the whole concluding with tea of a most delicate flavour. On the commodore's leav- ing the city he was saluted with three guns, which are as many as they ever discharge upon any occasion, excepting an imperial salute.

An entertainment given by the viceroy.

The commodore
leaves the river Canton.

THE viceroy punctually executed his promise, sending the order for shipping the stores, and with it, some presents to the commodore ; four days after which the commodore embarked at Canton, for the Centurion. With such diligence did he pursue the preparations for putting to sea, that he was ready to sail on the 7th of December. That day the Centurion and her prize unmoored and stood down the river. They passed Bocca Tigris on the 10th, and two days after anchored before Macao. The 13th both ships anchored in the road of that place in five fathom water, where the prize was cleared of her powder, dry provisions and water, after which she was sold to the Portuguese for no more than 6000 dollars, they taking advantage of the necessity the commodore was under of parting with her. Mr. Anson had been sufficiently ^e informed by the English at Canton, to judge that the war with Spain had not been yet terminated, and that probably the French might join the Spaniards before he could reach Europe. Knowing likewise that no advice could be received in Europe of the prize he had taken, and the treasure he had on board, before the return of the merchantmen from Canton, or at least intelligence from Manila to Spain, which, on account of the monsoons, could not be much sooner, he determined to make all possible dispatch. This, among other reasons, induced him so cheaply to part with her, not caring to raise her price at the hazard of losing the whole. Having delivered the galleon to the Portuguese merchant, on the 15th of Decem- ber, he the same day got under sail. On the 16th in the afternoon he was out of sight of Macao, ^f having brisk gales with rain aftern. The ship was found to be so leaky, that in two hours the waters rose seven inches in her pumps, which it was judged was owing to their not having caulked the gun-ports. On the 22d, being entered the sea between Malacca and the island of Borneo, they sounded, and found 53 fathom water. Two days after they got sight of the islands on the Malacca coast, persevering in their course through them with great danger, by reason of the narrow chanel, and the multiplicity of shoals on all sides. On the 29th, in the evening, the southernmost island of the Seven Brothers, on the coast of Sumatra, bore east-south-east, at the distance of six leagues. The same day the commodore passed the streights between Sumatra and Banca, which last is an island of considerable extent, under the latitude of three degrees south ; and so commodiously situated for trade, that the Dutch have often regretted ^g they had not fixed their head settlement there rather than at Batavia. Here they might have planted the whole island, and kept it in their own hands, which they cannot possibly think

Departs from Macao.

- a think of in the large island of Java. On the 2d of January they anchored off the high land of Bantam, at the distance of about forty miles from Batavia. Two days afterwards he anchored in fifty-five fathom water, on the coast of Princes Island, and the same evening five homeward-bound Dutch ships anchored by him. Here they perceived the shock of an earthquake, which lasted about a minute, while they were taking in wood and water. On the 18th foul and blowy weather came on, by which the mainsail of the Centurion was split and blown down from the yard; from thence to the 22d continued squally, extremely dark, cloudy, and rainy. The 24th the Centurion had her mainsail and foresail split. On the 5th of March the continent of Africa appeared, bearing from north-east to north-north-west. On the 10th, having little wind, and fair weather, they saw the headland of the Cape of Good Hope, distant about ten leagues. Next day the Centurion anchored in Table Bay, at the distance of a mile from shore, where the commodore found the Salisbury and Warwick English East India men, each of which saluted him with eleven guns. Here he determined to repair his rigging, wood and water, for which purpose he warped into the harbour. At night the Centurion's best cable broke, with the halser that was bent to the stream anchor, so that she rode all night by the sheet cable; but this loss was next morning repaired by the purchase of an anchor weighing 3850 pounds, and a cable nineteen inches round. After cleaning, scrubbing, wooding, watering, and repairing the rigging, the Centurion was ready to prosecute her voyage by the 1st of April. On the 3d he left the bay, and was saluted by the Dutch commodore with nine guns, which the Centurion returned by seven (A). After this, without any remarkable accident, the commodore arrived safe at St. Helen's, on the 14th of June, to the great joy of the nation in general, and of the crew in particular, who could not fail of being happy at the sight of their native shore, after an absence of four years, in which they experienced such vicissitudes of good and ill fortune, as are scarcely to be paralleled in history. Nor was the commodore past all dangers before he anchored at St. Helen's; for it must be remembered, that he came through the channel just upon the eve of a French war, when every thing was in confusion, and the whole maritime force of that nation at sea, and even cruising on the British coasts.
- MR. Anson immediately acquainted his grace the duke of Newcastle, his majesty's principal secretary of state, with his arrival, and of the most material transactions of his circuit round the globe. His letter, which was immediately published in the Gazette, diffused as hearty and general a satisfaction through the nation, as can well be imagined; and, farther to indulge the pleasure of the people, the treasure taken in the Acapulco ship was conveyed in thirty-two waggon, in the most public manner to the Tower of London, in the same order as the silver formerly taken by admiral Blake had been when he burnt the Spanish galleons. The commodore was surrounded by the populace on his landing, with every joyful mark of distinction; he was graciously received by the monarch, the dignity of whose crown he had supported with such perseverance in the East, and had soon the honour of being promoted to the flag, and afterwards to the most illustrious and respectable rank in the kingdom, that of a peer of Great Britain. Thus terminated this memorable expedition, to the immortal honour of commodore Anson, whose whole conduct distinguished him the experienced seaman, the accomplished officer, and the firm patriot; the protector of the British commerce, the assertor of her dignity, in the person of a brave, prudent, and uniformly consistent commander.
- ALTHOUGH, upon the whole, this expedition was not attended with all the success that might reasonably be expected; yet must all the blame be for ever removed from the commodore, and wholly attributed to the imprudent and vexatious delays which so long prevented his sailing. On his arrival in the Southern Ocean, the Spanish ports were wretchedly provided with arms, stores, and ammunition; and the garrisons fallen into so total a neglect of military discipline, that had Mr. Anson happily accomplished his passage round Cape Horn, he would, without all dispute, have been able to have dispossessed the Spaniards of their strongest holds both in Mexico and Peru. There were only two places on the whole southern coast, from which any resistance could be apprehended; these were the cities of Panama and Callao de Lima. As to the first, the fortifications were so ruinous, and the garrison in such want of powder, that it appeared by an intercepted letter of the governor's, how little hopes he had of defending it in case of an attack. Nor was the condition of Callao, the key of the whole kingdom of Peru, much bet-

Commodore
Anson arrives in England.

Reflections on
the voyage.

(A) As we have so frequently mentioned these salutes, it may not be improper that we describe in a few words the regulation of this ceremony. The commodore's instructions direct, that if merchant ships, whether foreigners, or belonging to his majesty's subjects, salute the admiral of a fleet, they shall be answered with six guns; when they salute any other flag ship, they shall be answered with four guns; and, if they salute men of war, they shall answer with two guns less. If several merchant ships salute in company, no return is to be made before they have all finished, and then by such a number of guns as shall be thought proper; but if the merchant ships should answer, no second return is to be made. In all salutes the guns of the upper deck are to be fired, and the lower tier to be used upon no occasion of compliment whatever. These were in particular the commodore's instructions, and are the general rules observed by the navy.

ter. Thus the scheme appears to have been wisely laid, and, as far as lay in the power of the a commodore, happily executed : that the ultimate intention was not answered, was intirely owing to the improper means used in manning the fleet, and the unsteadiness of the councils at home.
Nothing could be more favourable than the present conjuncture for striking such a blow as must have reduced Spain to the necessity of craving peace upon any terms. The Indians on almost every frontier were disaffected, and watched with impatience the happy moment that should deliver them from the proud usurpation of their masters, and enable them to take a signal revenge for the barbarities they and their ancestors had groaned under for more than two centuries. To this day the Indians traditionally preserve the remembrance of the cruelties committed in Mexico and Peru, by public feasts and annual solemnities. They still by those mourn- b ful ceremonies revive the memory of the tragical incidents that caused the massacre of their beloved Incas and Atapalipas, that proved the extinction of their monarchy, the destruction of their religion, the subversion of their liberties, and the slaughter of their progenitors. Such as have been present at those festivals always observed, that all representations and recitals of those horrid scenes were received with emotions so vehement, and a rage so enthusiastic, as evidently demonstrated how deep a sense they retained of those injuries, and how acceptable to them would be the means of revenge. They were now the more disposed to vent their resentment, as the Spaniards had, in some late disputes, imprudently boasted of the expected force from Old Spain, under Pizarro, who would now compleat the great work, begun by his ancestors, of subjugating them to the most abject slavery. The Pizarros being the first conquerors of those c coasts, the Indians held the name in the utmost detestation, and, as often as it was mentioned, poured out execrations against it, as if all their misfortunes had been perpetrated by that family. The menaces of the Spaniards now alarmed and persuaded them, that their utter extirpation was intended. Such was the spirit of disaffection that diffused itself among them, that the Spanish governors exerted all their endeavours, by acts of kindness, to reconcile the most dangerous tribes, and to prevent their taking up arms. The president of Chili, in particular, made ample concessions to the Arrancos and other Chilians, by which, and the considerable presents he made, he persuaded them into a prolongation of the truce between both nations. However, these negotiations were not concluded when Mr. Anson entered the South Seas ; and, if they had, it is probable that inveterate and deep resentments would have broke through those late and political obligations, had he been in a condition to have seconded any insurrection. d
The taking, and probably the investing, of Baldivia only, would have stirred up the Arran-cos, Pulches, and Penguinches ; in a word, all the nations for twenty-five or thirty leagues to the northward of this port. Hence we may fairly conclude what extraordinary benefits would have resulted to the public, had the season for the expedition been as well regulated as the project was laid, and would have been executed by an officer of Mr. Anson's acknowledged abilities. Spain must, in short, either have left Great Britain in possession of the treasures of Peru, or she must have stooped her haughty neck to be trod on by a maritime power which she affected to despise, and received her provinces back again as an equivalent for such restrictions to her future ambition, as Great Britain, in her moderation, should have dictated. e

It is worthy our observation, that this expedition, however unsuccessful in the main design, sufficiently obviates all objections to the possibility of attacking the Spaniards to advantage in the South Seas. It has been said, that the Spaniards are too wise to leave ports of such consequence neglected ; that they were all well fortified, garrisoned, and provided, and that every such enterprise must terminate in sacrificing the lives of such as are employed in the expedition. How just these suggestions were, may be gathered from the short view we have given above, by which it appears, that the Spaniards were actually as indolent, as unguarded and weak, as we could wish them ; and perhaps the fate of Mr. Anson's undertaking has made them more unguarded than ever. Should a future project of the same kind ever be formed, and the favourable conjuncture is perhaps at no great distance, either at the public or at a pri- f vate expence, there seems to be a moral certainty of its success. As to the difficulties encountered in this voyage, they are not to be deemed discouraging circumstances, since they must intirely be ascribed to misconduct. Several voyages have been happily performed through the Streights of Magellan and Le Maire into the South Seas before Mr. Anson's ; and since his time the journal of captain Leben, a Frenchman, is evidence sufficient that nothing hazardous or uncommonly arduous attends this navigation. The reasons which formerly urged this navigation, still, and will ever subsist in their full force, while Britain continues to regard her maritime power. From hence the Spaniards derive that wealth which makes, if not them, at least their natural allies, so formidable to Europe. Upon the whole, as our men have been destroyed, and our shipping worn out, in barren services, from which never a single advantage resulted to g the public, we cannot with reason complain of an expedition that has actually brought a large sum of money into the kingdom, and pointed out a method, by which, on future occasions,

a fions, we may draw much larger. Another squadron may more easily meet with the galleons ; and there wants only care, diligence, and experienced commanders, to reimburse the public for a great part of the expences of a Spanish war. But it would trespass upon our design of writing a history, to enter upon a long chain of political reasoning.

As an appendix to the preceding voyage, it may not be disagreeable to the reader that we give a short account of Pizarro's squadron, fitted out for no other purpose than to frustrate the designs of the British commodore. Whilst Mr. Anson had been combating all the rigours and severities of storms, want, and disease, from the island of St. Catherine's round Cape Horn, through the South Seas, to the west of Acapulco ; the Spanish squadron, in pursuing him, suffered a still more unfortunate, and, if possible, a more calamitous fate, than that of any British ship. Pizarro, on his arrival in the river of Plate on the 5th of January 1740, anchored in the bay of Maldonado, at the mouth of that river, and thence sent immediately to Buenos Ayres for a supply of provisions. During his stay here, he received advice, by the treachery of the Portuguese governor of St. Catherine's, of the arrival of Mr. Anson at that island on the 21st of December, and of his preparations to put to sea again with all possible expedition. Pizarro, notwithstanding his superior force, had his reasons, perhaps his instructions, for avoiding the British squadron, every-where short of the South Seas. However, he put to sea in a great hurry, without his supplies, on the 22d of January, in hopes of getting round Cape Horn before the enemy, leaving the Patache, a forty-gun ship, behind him, as unfit for service. But all his vigilance and haste proved ineffectual ; for the commodore got the start of him by four days from St. Catherine's ; yet were the squadrons in some part of the passage so near, that the Pearl was in sight of the Asia, one of Pizarro's squadron. The Spaniard, having run the length of Cape Horn towards the end of February, stood to the westward, in order to double the Cape ; but on the 28th at night, while they were shifting to the windward, three capital ships, the Guiposcoa, Hermiona, and Esperanza, were separated from the admiral. On the 7th of March, the day on which Mr. Anson passed the Streights of Le Maire, the whole Spanish squadron was driven to the eastward, and dispersed by a furious storm at north-west. They were afterwards, by their long detention in so turbulent a sea, reduced to unspeakable distress by fatigue and famine, which were attended by a deplorable mortality from disease, particularly the scurvy. When Pizarro left Spain, he was furnished with no more than four months short-provision. By the storm they encountered off Cape Horn, the continuance of the squadron at sea was prolonged above a month beyond their expectation, from which is inconceivable what difficulties they suffered, hunger and sickness daily sweeping off the ablest of their men. Their calamity was even so great, that a dead rat was sold on board for four dollars. This dreadful situation produced a conspiracy among the land-forces and marines in the Asia, they proposing to massacre the officers and crew, the only method they could devise to preserve themselves against the ravages of famine. By this means they hoped to appropriate to themselves all the provisions of the ship ; and looked upon such an action with the less horror, as it resulted from pure necessity, and the first law of nature, self-preservation ; but the conspirators were discovered, and their fatal project frustrated. After this, the squadron, which was intirely separated, sustained a variety of other misfortunes, each ship endeavouring, but ineffectually, to double the Cape. At last they were forced to abandon the attempt, and bear away for the river of Plate. Pizarro, in the Asia, arrived about the middle of May at Monte Vedio, after the loss of more than half his crew. The St. Estevan had lost 180 men when she anchored in the bay of Barragun. The Esperanza, a fifty-gun ship, had, out of 450, only 50 men alive ; while the Guiposcoa was driven ashore and sunk on the coast of Brasil, having, out of 700 men, lost above 300. The Hermiona foundered at sea ; and her whole crew, consisting of 550 men, perished all to a man. The regiment of troops distributed among the several ships, was reduced to 60 men ; so that the whole loss of the Spaniards exceeded 2000 men, and two capital ships. The Asia, Esperanza, and St. Estevan, being in great want of masts and other rigging when they arrived at Buenos Ayres, and the country unable to supply them, Pizarro obtained a remittance of an hundred thousand dollars from the governor, and a considerable quantity of pitch and cordage from the Portuguese at Rio de Janeiro ; but could procure neither masts nor yards. As soon as the ships were refitted, he was still intent upon pursuing the British commodore, whose sufferings, he doubted not, had been equal to his own. He had removed the masts of the Esperanza, and refitted the Estevan with the spare masts and yards on board ; so that still he had two ships of the line in tolerable condition. In the month of October he was preparing to put to sea with these two ships, and attempt a second time the passage of Cape Horn, when the Estevan, in falling down the river, ran upon a shoal, which disabled her, and obliged Pizarro to proceed alone on his voyage. Having the summer before him, and the favourable winds, he expected a fortunate and speedy passage ; but being off Cape Horn, a fine moderate gale astern, with a high and swelling sea, the ship, by some misconduct of the officer upon watch, rolled away her masts, and obliged the admiral to return a second time in great distress to the river of Plate. In this manner was this well appointed squadron, composed of the flower of the Spanish navy, defeated and destroyed by the inclemency of the seas, and from the same causes that had so lately proved fatal to commodore Anson. Thus was Pizarro forced to return with only one half-manned and crazy ship to Old Spain; while Mr. Anson, surmounting all difficulties, rode victorious in the South Seas, and reaping the just reward of his toil and bravery, proved, in the words of his excellent historian, “ that though prudence, intrepidity, and perseverance, united, are not exempted “ from the disappointments of adverse fortune, yet in a long series of transactions they usually “ rise superior to such obstructions, and, in the end, rarely fail of proving successful.”

B O O K XIX.

History of the Othmân Empire.

C H A P. I.

Origin of the Othmân Turks, and history, till their settling in Asia Minor, under the Seljûk Soltâns. Remarks on their historians; with the reigns of Soleyman Shâh and Ertogrul.

^a THE observation, that the greatest empires have sprung from the most inconsiderable people, whose origin is obscure, may be applied with as much justice to the Othmân, or Ozmân (A) Turks, as to any other nation whatsoever. There can be no doubt that they came originally from Turkestan, or some other part of Tartary: but it is not easy to fix the particular province of that vast region from whence they issued; or to determine the particular tribe from which they derive their descent. Origin of the Othmâns.

WE are told by a late writer, that it is agreed by all, that the Othmân Turks are descended from one of the most noble of the Ogûzian families ^a, who derive their pedigree from Ogûz Kân, one of the most ancient heroes of the Turkish nation; and hence they assume the name of Ogûzians. But, although the Turks and Mohammedan Tartars reckon Ogûz among the ancestors of the Turks in general, yet none of them speak of a particular tribe, or branch of the Turkish nation, under the name of Ogûzians (B), as appears from what hath been before related ^b: and if there had been any such, it does not appear how the Othmâns can be more intitled to that name than the Seljûk Turks, who derive themselves from Ogûz, as well as they. But, after all, the genealogy which is given of the race of Ogûz (if not the person of Ogûz himself) may well be suspected of being fictitious; since Saadi Effendi, one of the most esteemed historians among the Turks, speaks but dubiously of it, or as a thing not sufficiently vouched by those who exhibit it ^c. Their genealogy suspicious.

THE name of Turk being brought into great contempt in the East, by the Arabs and Persians, who have stigmatized it, as a word implying rudeness and barbarity, the Othmân Porte will not be called the Turkish Court: nor does it suffer that word to be used, but in reference to the language; as, Turkije vilurmisin? Do you understand Turkish? Othmânije vilurmisin, being improper: for Othmânije denotes politeness of manners; as, on the contrary, Turkije signifies rude and uncivilized. Hence the common saying, Turk muddeti um rinde; that is, A Turk through the whole course of his life: as much as to say, He will always be a clown, and never learn the politeness of the Othmâns ^d. Yet these Othmâns were, perhaps, the most rude and unpolite of all the three Turkish branches, till they conquered Constantinople. Nam. of Turk odious:

As they are ashamed of their name, and will not own it belongs to them, several stories are framed to inform us how it came to be given to them. First, prince Cantemir affirms (whether of his own head, or after some Turkish author, does not appear (C),) that the name of Turks was given to Soleyman (the grandfather of Othmân) and his followers, by the Persians. Rejected by them.

^a CANTEMIR, Hist. Othm. Emp. pref. p. 12.
p. 14. See also before, vol. ii. p. 116, & seqq.

^b See before, vol. ii. p. 123.
^d CANT. pref. p. 8.

^c CANT. ubi sup.

(A) Othmân is an Arabic word, of which Ozmân is the Persian pronunciation, followed by the Turks, who dwelt a long time in Persia. They are called Ali Othmân, or the Othmân People.

(B) Khalkokondylas relates, that in his time they talk'd of a tribe of Tartars called Ogûzians, from whence they derived themselves. But this only shews, that they talked then as they do now; having begun to contrive and write their history.

(C) He seldom cites his authors distinctly, or distinguishes his own opinion from theirs.

On what grounds.

(meaning the Seljuks of Rûm), upon a supposition, that they were part of the Jenghiz Khân a Scythians, as he calls the Mogols. For it must be observed, that this author supposes the name of Turks to have belonged to the nations, or tribes of people, whom Jenghiz Khân brought from Tartary, when he invaded the southern countries of Asia; and that, on their dispersing themselves through Persia and Asia Minor, the name of Turks first became known there.
Whereas the followers of that conqueror were universally known only by the name of Mogols, or Tatars; and that of Turks (with which the Persians had then been for many ages acquainted) was introduced into Asia Minor by the Seljuks, above 200 years before.

The reasons given,

SECONDLY, he suggests, that when, on Jenghiz Khân's invasion, the Persian governors shook off the Persian yoke, Aladin, Soltân of Ikonium (whom he makes one of them) forced many of the Scythians to submit to his obedience; and mixing them with the peasants, to till the lands, b called them by the common name of Turks. And hence, continues our author, it came to pass, that he who before was called governor of the Persians, or Soltân of Ikonium, was afterwards stiled Soltân of the Turks. Whether prince Cantemir framed this apology himself, or took it from some Turkish author, it is certain nothing can be more absurd or contrary to the truth of history. It is observable here, that by the Persians he means the Seljuks of Rûm, or Anatolia; in which, to serve his turn, he seems to follow the Greek writers; not considering, that they use the words Turks and Persians synonymously; and that they call them Persians only because they came from Persia, when they invaded the Roman dominions, as we have observed more than once in the preceding history: not that they believed them to be natural Persians; for they relate expressly, that Tangrolipix (as they call Togrol-bek) the first Seljukian Soltân, and c his followers, were Turks.

forced and unlikely.

His last plea is, That Othmân, on his being proclaimed Soltân, after Aladin's death, to banish from the people the ignominious and odious name of Turks, ordered it to be confined to the peasants (D), and the rest to be called Othmânli, or Othmâns. What! were the Persians to be called Othmâns? was the name of Seljuk to be buried in that of the son of Ertogrol? No, surely, not so long as any of the Seljukian princes, who after the death of the last Soltân had set up for themselves, remained in power: although our author, following the partial Turkish historians, will have it that they all submitted at once to Othmân.

Real Turks:

To return to the point: the truth is, that tho' the Othmâns, as well as Seljuks, when they grew powerful, assumed those appellations, either being too proud any longer to bear a name which d was fallen into contempt, or else to honour the founders of their respective empires; yet they were nevertheless Turks in reality: and, in saying they were Ogûzians, they confirm that opinion the more, since Ogûz was but a few descents from Turk. Nor can we see why they should be ashamed of the name; since Turk, whom they feign to be a son of Japhet, is acknow-leged as the common ancestor of all the tribes, or nations, inhabiting Tartary. Besides, as the Othmâns came originally from thence, they must needs be Turks by descent, let them call themselves by what name they will: and methinks they ought to prefer that name above any other, as it denotes their being descended immediately from Turk, their great ancestor; and that all other tribes of Tatars are sprung from theirs.

their original country very uncertain.

As to the particular part of Tartary where this supposed Ogûzian hord, or tribe, originally e inhabited, all the Turkish historians, we are told, agree, that it dwelt in the neighbourhood of the Caspian sea, and was especially of those Tatars whom they commonly call Konar Kocker Tatar Tayfeli; that is, staying and going; as much as to say, without fixed habitations. Prince Cantemir is inclined to believe, that these Ogûzians dwelt in the country between that sea and the lake called Karabogâz, at present inhabited by the Karakâlpaks, who lead a wandering life, and speak the Turkish language; although the Turks greatly differ from them in their manners and way of living. That the Turks should differ from them at present in those respects, is not to be wondered at: but it is probable, that, when they lived in these deserts, they had a great conformity in manners, either with the Karakâlpaks, or the Turkmâns, their neighbours (E); from whom the Othmân as well as the Seljuk Turks have been reproached with f being descended. But the affair of country or nation, about which so great a bustle is made, is a very idle ridiculous concern, since these qualifications can confer no honour on a people if they be wicked, nor reflect any dishonour on them in case they be virtuous.

Ancestors of Othmân

ALTHOUGH the Turkish historians run up the genealogy of the Othmân Turks as high as Ogûz and Japhet, five generations beyond him, yet it does not appear that the ancestors of

^c CANT. pref. p. 7.

^e See before, vol. ii. p. 155.

^f CANT. ibid. p. 12.

(D) What need had he to do what Aladin had done before? of Othmân, resided for a time near the Euphrates, in moveable habitations, like the inhabitants of Tar-

(E) The Turkish annals testify, that Ertogrol, father tary.

- a Othmân, who, as prince Cantemir confesses ^h, are but darkly set forth in the Turkish authors (F), can be traced with any certainty beyond the third degree, or that of his great-grandfather. These, according to the tradition in the time of Kbalkokondylas, were Erdogrul, Ogûzalp, and Duzalp: according to the Turkish annals, Saadi Effendi, and other eastern writers, their names were Erdogrul, Soleymân Shâh, and Kiya aleb, called by some Kiya Khân.

OF Kiya Khân, father of Soleymân Shâh, or indeed of any of the three ancestors of Othmân, very little is related by the Turkish historians; and even that little is liable to many objections.

SAADI EFFENDI, author of the annals so approved, as we are told, by the Othmâns, relates, after the best antient writers, that at the same time when the family of Seljuk removed from Persia;

- b Mawara'nabr (or the country beyond the river Amû) into Irân (or Persia at large, lying to the south of that river), with them also Kiya Khân, father of Soleymân Shâh, prince of the Ogûzians, departed with his tribe from Marû Shâh jân, and possessed himself of the city of Makhân (G) ⁱ: but that after Jenghiz Khân's irruption, Soleymân Shâh, son of Kiya, or, as some write it, Kiya aleb Khân, whose dominions reached to Ablâd (H), to avoid the fury of the Tatars, was forced to relinquish his possessions, and with his people to go in quest of new habitations towards the country of Rûm ^k (or Anatolia). A. D. 1214.

HESHRI, a much older historian than Saadi, says the Oguzians possessed the country of Ablâd 170 years before Soleymân; under whom, in 611, they made their first expedition towards the regions of Asia Minor. But the Tatars having left nothing undestroyed, Soleymân, with his followers, abandoning Rûm, removed back to Azerbejân (I), and there, for some time, led a country or unsettled life. At last, in the year 616, pressed for want of necessaries, he advanced a second time with 50,000 men towards Rûm, to recover his former possessions; but, in attempting to swim over the Euphrates on horseback, was drowned ^l. A. D. 1219.

- c The place where this accident happened, according to the Tajo'tatwarîk of Saado'ddîn, was over-against the castle of Khaybar, or Jabber, and he was interred in a place called at present Mazar dhi Turk ^m. The Tarîkh Othmâni relates that Soltân Aladîn, of Seljukian extraction, flying from Khorassân to the country of Tunnân (K), and seizing the city of Sevasta (or Siwas), assumed regal power: at the same time, Makhân being destroyed, Soleymân Shâh, giving way to the violence of the Tatars, repaired to Erzingân (L) (or Arzingân); from thence, penetrating into Romania (Rûm, or Rûmili), came to Amasia. Then, altering his course, he marches to Halep, and thence to the city of Jabber, on the Euphrates (M), where he encamped: and, in attempting to swim over the river on horseback, was drowned ⁿ. Soleymân Shâh drowned.

THIS retreat of Soleymân is by the historians marked to have happened after Jenghiz Khân had destroyed the city of Balkh, in Khorassân; and had slain, after expelling from his kingdom, Kurzem Shâh (N).

THIS

^h Hist. Othm. pref. p. 12.

pref. p. 12, & seq. D'HERBELOT, p. 822, art. Soleymân Schah.

pref. p. 13. Annal. Soltanor. p. 1.

ⁱ D'HERBELOT's Dict. Orient. p. 822. Soleymân Schah.

^l Ibid.

^m Ibid.

^k CANT.

ⁿ CANT.

(F) He even owns, that the learned Turks confess, that every thing in the Othmân history, before Soleymân, favours of fable.

(G) Makhân, or Mahân, is between Barwerd, or Ibûrd, and Duân, not far from the river Amû, and about 160 miles from the Caspian sea. Cantemir, from some Turkish author, chutes to give the place from whence he retreated the name of Nere, although he knows not where to put it. Not finding it in the maps of Christians, he supposes it to be either Herât, capital of Khorassân, or else Nurketzur, in Moxanderân (which he makes a part of Ghilân); but the first is not near the Caspian sea, as he says the Turks place Nere; and the latter is too much out of the way from Marû Shâh jân and Mahân. We rather judge, that he reads Nere by mistake for Neza, the r and z, in the Arabic characters, differing only by a point. This Neza, Nefa, or Nesay (as it is written in the translation of Atûl ghâzi Khân's History of the Turks), lies between Mahân and Marû Shâh jân, distant from each about 140 miles; and, for its delightful situation, is called Little Damascus.

(H) Ablât, or Kelât, in the Great Armenia, often mentioned before.

(I) Cantemir says Azerbejân is Shirwân, or Belâdo'l-jâh; whereas they are three different provinces of Persia; the first to the north of Azerbejân, or Adherbijân;

the last, called Kubestân by the Persians, is a part of Persian Irâk. The same author commits a farther mistake, in saying Azerbejân is a province bordering on Syria, whereas all Mesopotamia and Kûrdistân lie between. What is still worse, and argues a great deficiency in geography, he puts the river Nile for one of the boundaries of Europe. See his Othmân Hist. p. 4. and notes 8 & 9.

(K) Not Karamania, as Gaudier supposes; nor Ionia, as Cantemir will have it; but Greece, or the Greek empire in general.

(L) A city on the Euphrates, to the south-west of Azerûm. Cantemir wrongly supposes, that by Erzingân is meant Ezerbejân, or Adherbijân, the antient Media. Pref. to his Othm. Hist. p. 12.

(M) Below Bir, towards Rakka.

(N) Or Karazm Shâh. Cantemir discovers great want of reading on this occasion; he says, that Kurzem Shâh signifies the king of Caspia (a kingdom of his own making); for that Kurzem, with the Turks (1), signifies the Caspian sea; and from thence is applied to the countries bordering on that sea (2). Whereas the sea takes the name of Kurzem, or Karazm, from the country of Karazm, or Khorwarazm, situate on the east side thereof. The Shâh here mentioned is Mohammed Karazm Shâh, the last of that Turkish race spoken of before, (vol. ii. p. 291, &

(1) Pref. p. 12.

(2) Hist. Othman. p. 2.

A. D. 1219.

Objection first.

THIS history, as delivered by the Turkish historians, made use of by Cantemir, is liable to a several objections. First, what is asserted, that the dominions of Soleymân extended from Mabân, in Khorassân, to Ablâd, in Armenia, is contrary to the truth of history: for all Persia, and great part of Armenia, were at that time under the obedience of the Karazm Shâhs; and before them, were in the possession of the Seljukians of Irân. Nor is it likely, that Ablâd was at all in the hands of the Oguzians, much less for 170 years before Soleymân's retreat, if indeed he ever was possessed of it: for it is hardly possible, that two places at so vast a distance as Makhân and Ablâd, should be so long subject to petty princes, whose dominions were almost wholly confined to those two cities, and whose names were scarce known to the historians of those countries. Add to this, that his being forced to relinquish his possessions, with his followers, consisting of 50,000 men, to seek new habitations in Rûm, does not at all consist with his character of a prince possessed of large dominions; who, in that case, would have been able to have raised more numerous forces, and to have withstood the Mogols, instead of flying from them without fighting a stroke.

2d Objection.

Hejrah, 616.

SECONDLY, what is related of Soltân Aladîn (or Alao'ddîn) flying from Khorassân at the same time that Soleymân retreated from thence, and assuming royal power in Sevasta by right of conquest, is all a fiction: for Alao'ddîn came by succession to be Soltân of Koniyab, or Ikonium, on the death of his brother Azzo'ddîn, in 616; and, for any thing that appears, was never out of Anatolia before his accession to the throne. Indeed all that is related of this Soltân, and of what passed between him and the ancestors of Othmân, is merely fictitious, as will be shewn hereafter.

3d Objection.

Hejrah, 617.

A. D. 1220.

THIRDLY, what is said with regard to the time when Soleymân made his retreat from Makhân carries the marks of a bungling piece of forgery: for it is affirmed to have happened in 611 (O), and yet to have been after the death of Karazm Shâh, which was in 617, and of the destruction of Balkh, which came to pass the year following. Nay, Jenghiz Khân's forces did not pass the river Amû into Khorassân, the most northern province of Persia, till the year 617°, which was the year after Soleymân's death. So that, instead of being forced out of that country by the Mogols, or Tatars, he must have left it six years before there was any apprehension of their coming. This shews also the inconsistency of the reason assigned for his quitting the country of Anatolia, and returning to Azerbejân; namely, because the Tatars had left nothing undestroyed there; whereas they had not then entered upon their Persian expedition. Nor did they penetrate into Asia Minor during the reign of Alao'ddîn; which ended in 634: nor for several years after. If prince Cantemir had examined the Turkish historians critically in this part which relates to the origin of the Othmâns, it is presumed he would have followed them with more caution, and not exaggerated matters (P), after Saadi Effendi, and the other later writers, who had more the Othmân glory, than the truth of history, in view. But to return to the history itself.

Erdogrul's conquests.

SOLEYMAN left four sons, Sungurtekin, Jundogdi (Q), Erdogrul (or Ortogrol), Gâzi, and Dundar, or Dumdar. The two first, on their father's death, returned into Persia. Erdogrul and Dumdar, with their part of the forces, first pitched their tents in a place called Shîrmaluckbuler (R). Dumdar dying here a few days after, Erdogrul moved towards Asia Minor, subduing several provinces in his way (S); and, from his compelling those he defeated to embrace his religion (T), obtained the name of Zeletis, very famous in those parts. After this, that he might not seem tyrannically to covet the possessions of others, he sends his eldest son Saruyati (U), (afterwards celebrated by the epithet of Savuchi Beg) in an humble manner to Aladîn (X), Soltân of Ikonium; desiring an habitation somewhere in his kingdom for himself and his seq.): but, because the Turkish histories do not mention his name, our princely author did not know it: which shews his reading did not go much beyond the Turkish historians.

° See LA CROIX's Hist. of Jenghiz Can, p. 238 & 283, &c.

(O) According to Nisbrin, Saadi Effendi, and other Turkish historians.

(P) Cantemir speaks of the retreat of this obscure prince in these pompous words: Then it was that Soleymân Shâh, son of Kiya Khân, prince of the city of Nere, and of the Oguzian Tatars, lord also of the region of Marû Shâh jân; excelling all the princes of his nation in nobleness of birth, glory of ancestors, and his own virtues, in the year, &c. Oth. Hist. p. 2, & seqq.

(Q) These two are named in D'Herbelot Sarku Zengbi, and Ghundogdi. D'Herbelot, p. 822, art. Soliman Schah.

(R) Syrmalukbuler, p. 8. of the Oth. Hist. probably Chirmalik, in Diyârbekr, between Bir and Orfa.

(S) In the history, p. 8. it is said, that he reduced by arms, or policy, all the countries between Aleppo and Cæsarea (that is in Asia Minor), with their castles and towns; introducing every-where the Mohammedan religion, which he professed.

(T) As if the inhabitants of those parts had been infidels, and not Mohammedans.

(U) Elsewhere written Sarujât. Hist. Oth. p. 9.

(X) Cantemir, p. 8, note 6. says he is called the second by the Turkish historians, although they do not mention a first. Hence he supposes the first Aladîn is the Azatines of Nicephorus Gregoras, who fled to Michael Paleologus, in the year 661, or of Christ 1261. But that Azatines, or Azzo'ddîn, was the next successor except one to Aladîn I. as we have shewn before, (vol. ii. p. 230, & seqq.) And if Erdogrul repaired to Aladîn soon after Soleymân's death (as it should seem from the history he did), a his followers. Aladin, thinking it better to make this powerful, though new neighbour; his friend than his enemy, and above all things wanting a good general to lead his armies, readily grants his request: and, sending back Saru-yati, with ambassadors, to Erdogrul, promises, that, in case by his valour the remainder of the Tatars were driven out of his dominions, not only to place him at the head of his armies, but also to associate him in his empire. Erdogrul, upon this encouragement, repairing to Aladin's court, was assigned Karajedâghi, in the country of Ancyra, for the place of his abode.

A. D. 1236.
Repairs to Asia Minor.

ABOUT this very time, a numerous body of Tatars happening to invade the region of An-cyra, Aladin, who had been long infested by them, and often brought to the last extremity, led such forces against them as could be assembled in haste: but, being inferior to the enemy's, they were put into disorder on the first onset. Erdogrul, hearing of the battle, came up opportunely with 5000 men; who, seeing the Soltân's forces flying and dispersed, advise him to join the conquerors, and seize the spoils of the runaways: but he, scorning to draw his sword upon the prostrate, bravely attacks the Tatars, and puts them to flight. The Soltân, mindful of his promises, royally rewards Erdogrul, commits to his government the whole province of Ancyra, and makes him generalissimo of his armies (Y). After this, Erdogrul, joining his forces to the Soltân's, not only puts a stop to the incursions of the Tatars, but compels them to retire from the borders of the kingdom. He likewise subdued other countries from the Romans, and annexed them to Aladin's empire. In the year 680, according, says our author, to the accurate historian Saadi, he crowned his victories with the conquest of the famous city of Kutahi (Z) from the Greeks. At length, being worn out with wars and old age, he died in the same year, according to some historians, but, according to Nisbrîn, in 687 (A); and was buried at the castle of Suguchik (B), where his sepulchre is at this day religiously visited by Mohammedans ^P.

Expels the Mogols.

His death.
Hejrah, 680.
A. D. 1281.

ERDOGRUL left three sons; Othmân, Funduz, and Sarvîz. To Othmân (who, though the eldest, received in Aladin's family the diminutive appellation of Othmânbik, or Othmânjik (C), he left by will the inheritance which he had received from Aladin. The grateful Soltân not only confirmed his bequest, but made him chief of all the Tekaddum, governors or commanders; and sent him the Tab-lâlem, or military ensigns; that is, the drums, standards, and other ornaments of a general; with full power over his whole army. More than this, in all the cities and provinces which had been subdued by his father, or should be subdued by himself, he permitted him to coin money in his own name (D); and to have the Khotba (E); that is, to be mentioned in the public prayers.

Othmân exalted.

A. D. 1281.

OTHTMAN now seemed to want nothing of the royal dignity but the title of Soltân; which, however, he did not think safe to assume, during the life of Aladin (F): but, preserving the allegiance he had sworn to that prince, judged it better to fight in his defence. He first reduced the princes who had revolted from the empire: then turning his arms against the Greeks, in the year 687, took the town of Kulza, the first-fruits of his victories, and added it to Aladin's dominions. The same year, he took Kalanos, or Kallinikus, brother to the captain of Karasherî (G), or the black city; whom he caused to be flayed, and then ordered the whole army to piss on his grave: from whence the field, called before Tomalidz (H), still retains the name of It Ishni, or dogs piss. Othmân lost many men in this conflict, and among the rest his brother Funduz; who was buried in his father Erdogrul's sepulchre, near Suguchik. Immediately after this victory, he took also the city of Karakhisar (I), and annexed it to the Seljukian empire.

Conquests from the Greeks.

Hejrah, 687.
A. D. 1288.

P CANT. pref. p. 13. Hist. p. 9, 10.

did), this must have been the first Aladin, since he was proclaimed Soltân in the same year that Soleymân is said to have been drowned; and the Azzo'adin, before-mentioned, did not begin his reign till the year 642, or 1244 of Christ; which is 28 years later: but, indeed, the whole of Erdogrul's transactions with Aladin are manifestly fictitious, as not in any respect agreeable with what is related of that victorious Soltân, by historians of unquestionable authority.

(Y) Yet we do not find, that he performed the chief part of his engagement, which was to associate him in the empire; nor how Erdogrul resented such a disappointment.

(Z) Or Kutayeh, the antient Kotyæum and Kotiacum.

(A) The Turkish annals place his death in the same year.

(B) Or Soguta.

(C) This nickname, which signifies Little Othmân, is no great sign that he was in high esteem.

(D) And the title of Soltân, as will afterwards appear.

(E) Khotba signifies acclamation, or petition, in the public prayers, said (by the Khâtib, or deacon) for the health and sacred majesty of the emperor, and for victory over his enemies, particularly the Christians. CANT.

(F) Yet elsewhere he expressly affirms, that Aladin allowed him to use the title of Soltân. Pref. p. 13.

(G) Rather Karashahr.

(H) Or Tomalij; possibly from the hill of that name, which is the Tmolus in Phrygia.

(I) Written here Carachisar; but in the preface, p. 14, Carajehisar. From the context it seems to be no other than Karasherî before-mentioned.

A. D. 1289. ALADIN the second, or younger (K), being informed of Othmân's victories, invests him with the government of Eskishehr, or the old city (L). The next year, 688, Othmân expelled the Mogol Tatars, quite suppressed their incursions on all sides, and gained many signal victories. Defeats the Moguls, Hejrah, 688. At length having assembled inhabitants, and enlarged Karakbisar with buildings and walls, he made it the seat of his residence. Here our author observes, that the Seljukian historians (M) differ in their computation (N); for they put the victory over the Mogol Tatars in the year 698, that is 10 years later; and he believes this date truest (O), because Saadi, in the following actions of Othmân, uses that supputation.

On Aladin's retreat, In 698, Othmân takes the castle of Jarbissar by stratagem; after which he adds the towns of Bilejiki and Ayneghiol, with many other castles and their territories, to Aladin's dominions. Next year, a swarm of Gazanensian Tatars (P) invading his kingdom, the princes and great men revolt a second time. By this defection, the Soltân's affairs becoming desperate, he is forced to abandon his dominions, and privately fly to Mikhael Paleologus, the Greek emperor; who, instead of assisting, imprisoned him (Q).

Hejrah, 699. A. D. 1299. is proclaimed Soltân. THE governors, on his retreat, divide his dominions among themselves: but Othmân, far superior to the rest in power and wealth, prevailed with them all, partly by great presents, partly by a communication of power, and partly by threats (R), to acknowledge him for sovereign of the whole empire. Wherefore, by unanimous consent of the great men and the army, he is, in the beginning of the year 700, declared Soltân, and in the city of Karakbisar assumes the title of emperor of the Othmâns; into which name he changes that of Ogúzians, or Turks, as they were commonly called under both the Aladins. From hence, says prince Cantemir, some historians date the beginning of Othmân's reign; and he follows their authority against that of Saadi Effendi: although, according to him, this latter contends, not without strong reasons, that the first year of his reign commenced in 687; when, after the taking of Karakbisar (S), he, with Aladin's consent, had his name mentioned there in the public prayers, and coined money impressed with the title of Soltân.

Appoints governors. OTHMAN, being thus possessed of the empire, sets his sons over the provinces and cities to govern and protect them. The Sanjak of Karajedagh (T) was given to Orkbân; that of Eskishehr to Junduz aleb; that of Ayn Ongbi to Aygûd aleb; that of Jarbissar to Husan aleb; and that of Ayneghiol to Dorgûd aleb: but Alao'ddin, his youngest son, with the government of the city of Bilejik, or Bilijiki, was committed to the care of his mother and father-in-law Baliâd. The city of Kupribissar being also taken the same year, Othmân removes the imperial seat from Karakbisar to Jenghishehr; which he adorns with stately buildings, and strongly fortifies.

THIS is the account which prince Cantemir gives us, from the Turkish historians, of the origin and foundation of the Othmân empire: but it is no less liable to objections than what he

9 CANT. pref. p. 13. Hist. p. 10—15.

(K) This is the first time Aladin is distinguished by the quality of second, although Cantemir says the Turks mention not a first: neither does he before speak of a Seljukian empire; but instead of Seljukians, or Turks, affects to call the Soltâns of Rûm, and their subjects, Persians. He tells us, pref. p. 13. that the proper name of this Aladin was Key Khosrew; which was the name of the 11th and 13th Soltâns of Rûm; but if this is a different Aladin from him mentioned before, he is more likely to be Kaykobâd, the last of the Seljukian Soltâns, who began his reign in 687, or of Christ 1288: but then the first Aladin will have a monstrous long reign of 71 years; which besides is contrary to the Seljukian history, which places four Soltâns between the first Kaykobâd and the second.

(L) The Palopolis of the Greeks.

(M) Cantemir has spoken of Othmânic historians, but not of Seljukian writers before: and in all likelihood, according to his inaccurate and confused way, he in this place confounds one kind with the other. Had he consulted the Seljukian historians, he would probably have made the Othmân history tally better with the Seljukian, from which it widely differs.

(N) It must be understood from the Othmânic historians.

(O) Here then is a mistake of 10 years in the Othmânic computation; and if Saadi followed the chronology of the Seljukian historians in this and the succeeding actions of Othmân, why not in those preceding it? Were the Othmâns more exact in marking the date of facts in the beginning than in the progress of their affairs? From this circumstance we think he ought to have preferred the computation of Nisbrin, with regard to Erdogrul's death, in 687, to that of his accurate Saadi, in 680.

(P) By this very improper, if not absurd expression, is to be understood Tatars, or Mogols, sent by Gazan, or Kazân Khân, who reigned at that time in Persia.

(Q) This is a very great blunder of our author: for how could Aladin fly, in 1299, to Mikhael Paleologus, who died in 1283? He seems to have had Soltân Azzo'din in view; whom, as we have before remarked, he confounds with the first Aladin; or else confounds the second Aladin (who he says was Malek Shâh, or the Moloko of Gregoras, son of the first) with his father: for he adds, although he is said by Nicephorus Gregoras to be afterwards delivered out of prison by his subjects, yet it appears by the unanimous testimony of historians, that he died in the year of the Hejrah 703, of Christ 1303. There must be some farther mistake here; but we have not Gregoras to examine the matter by. He should also have told us what historians he means by the Greek or Turkish.

(R) So in the history; but in the preface, p. 13, he is said to have obliged (or forced) them to seek his protection and favour.

(S) The taking of this city is ascribed to Erdogrul by other Turkish historians, who differ greatly from those made use of by Cantemir. See Leunclav. Hist. Musul. l. ii. p. 102.

(T) A city afterwards very famous by the name of Soltân Ongbi.

a has delivered, from the same authority, concerning the origin of the Othmân family. 1. It is ^{A. D. 1299.} not at all probable, that Erdogrul, with but half his father's forces, could conquer all the country between Hâleb and Kayfariyah, or Cæsarea, in Cappadocia; one part having been in the hands of the successors of Salâh'eddîn, or Saladin, powerful princes; and the rest subject to Alao'ddîn Kaykobâd, the tenth and greatest of all the Seljukian Soltâns of Rûm. 2. There could be no room for making the vanquished embrace Mohammedism, since all the inhabitants of those countries, excepting a few, were Mohammedans for many ages before. 3. If Erdogrul had conquered so many countries as is pretended, how came he to be so much at a loss for want of a habitation, as to beg one from Alao'ddîn? Objection 1.

4. THE condition of the Soltân's granting his request could never be that of driving out the Tatars, since the Tatars did not enter into his dominions during his reign; and, if they had, it is highly improbable, that Erdogrul, with only 5000 men, should defeat those people, who had defeated the forces of Alao'ddîn, a very powerful prince. Objection 2.

5. IT is said in one place, that Othmân, by Alao'ddîn's consent, had the title of Soltân stamped on his coin; and, in another, that he was afraid to assume that title (U). This is a flat contradiction; nor is it scarce possible, that Alao'ddîn, even had he been so weak a prince as he is represented by the Turkish historians, should have granted Othmân leave to assume all the royal honours. Objection 3.

6. IT is not probable, that Othmân should add the conquests which he made from the Greeks to Alao'ddîn's dominions, if he had been allowed by agreement to keep them himself. Objection 4.

7. IT is impossible that Alao'ddîn should fly, in the year 1299, to Mikhael Paleologus, the Greek emperor, who died 16 years before: nor is it probable that he should reign from 1219 to 1299; as he must have done, in case the Turkish historians mention only one Alao'ddîn, whom they call the second. But the falsity of this is demonstrable from the oriental historians, who reckon six kings within that interval; four of whom are mentioned by the Greek writers. Objection 5.

8. IT is not probable, if the governors divided Alao'ddîn's empire among themselves upon his retreat, that they should immediately submit to Othmân, and acknowledge him for their Soltân. Besides, this is contradicted by the Greek historians, and even by the Turkish historians themselves; according to whom it appears, that those princes maintained their power, as sovereigns, or Soltâns, independently for a long time, till they were gradually subdued by the successors of Othmân. Objection 6.

9. SAADI contending so strenuously for commencing Othmân's reign ten years earlier than the other Turkish historians, and even during the reign of Alao'ddîn himself, shews how partial he was in favour of the Othmân glory: and Cantemir's rejecting his authority in this point, shews that he did not think him so infallible, but that he might in other cases have used him with more caution. Objection 7.

10. LASTLY, the distribution of his territories made among his sons by Othmân (which appear to be no more than the few cities he had conquered, at no great distance one from the other) is a sufficient proof that his dominions at that time were far from being large; much farther from comprising the whole Seljukian empire, or country of Rûm. Objection 8.

FROM the preceding remarks, we presume it is manifest, that the original of the Othmân Turks, and their power, is very obscure; and that their historians, especially Saadi Effendi, and other later ones, have rendered it still more doubtful, by the inconsistencies which the vain desire of aggrandising the founders of their empire has betrayed them into. On the contrary, the Turkish annals translated by Gaudier, which Cantemir treats as fabulous, and with so much contempt, are free from those stains which discredit the writings of that prince's favourite authors. Conclusion.

FOR although those annals recite the suspicious genealogy of Othmân, and suppose Soltân Alao'ddîn, as well as Soleymân Shâh, to be driven out of Persia by the Tatars; yet nothing occurs afterwards inconsistent with the Seljukian history, or the probability of facts.

THEY only relate in substance, that Soleymân Shâh, coming to Arzingân, made an inroad into Asia Minor as far as Amasia, and carried off much plunder: that then, turning off towards Halep, he was drowned at Jabber: that hereupon Ertokul (or Erdogrul) marching up the Euphrates to the Passonian (X) plains, there encamped with 400 portable houses after their manner: that he continued there for a time, during which interval he had many bickerings with the neighbouring people: that at length, being informed that Soltân Alao'ddîn had subdued several provinces in Asia Minor, and founded a great empire, he sent Sarigati, one of his three sons, the other two being Gundus and Ozmân, to intreat that he would grant him some place in his dominions, where he might dwell with his followers: that Alao'ddîn, readily con-

(U) Although he had a right to it, by what is said in a third place, that he should be associated in the empire, in case he drove out the Tatars, as it is pretended he did.

(X) Or the plain of Pasin Wâsi, 12 miles beyond Arserûm. Leuncl. Hist. Musul. Turc. l. ii. p. 97.

A. D. 1299.  sending to his petition, appointed them a country fit for their habitation, both in the summer and winter seasons : that a certain nation (Y) at the same juncture advanced against the Soltân ; and, while this prince marched with his forces to give them battle, Ertokul, with his sons Sarigati and Ozmân, made the best of their way towards Engûri (or Ancyra) : that Ertokul, settling thereabout with his people, never ceased harrassing the neighbouring Greeks with incursions (Z) : and that, having governed them for 52 years, he died in 687 : that, some territories being conquered, his son Ozmân founded a principality, or dominion, and divided part of it among the commanders who came thither with his father Ertokul : that afterward Ozmân, and his son Ur Khân, joining their forces, turned their arms against the Christians ; and laying all waste before them, took Isnik (or Nice ^r).

IN this account of the origin of the power of the Othmân, or Ozmân, Turks, you hear nothing of the Ogûzians reigning from Makhân to Akblât, in Armenia ; or of their holding this last city for 170 years before Soleymân Shâh : nothing of Erdogrul's conquering all the provinces between Halep and Cæsarea ; or of Alao'ddîn's being invaded by the Tatars, and their expulsion by Erdogrul with a handful of men : nothing of the same Alao'ddîn's living to the time of Othmân, much less to the year 1300 ; of his conferring the regal honours on Othmân ; or the governors unanimously proclaiming him Soltân on Alao'ddîn's retreat.

Authors most approved by the Turks.

To confirm the judgment which we have passed on the historians made use of by prince Cantemir, we shall produce the authority of count Marsigli ; who, during some years stay in Turkey, made it his business to enquire into the antient, as well as modern, state of the Othmân empire. This nobleman remarks the same difference we have done among the Turkish authors, relating to the origin of the Othmân family ; and declares, directly contrary to what prince Cantemir asserts, that those only are generally approved of which represent the facts agreeable to the Turkish annals of Gaudier. But, to give count Marsigli's own words, he observes, speaking of the origin of the Othmân empire, " That the most learned among the Turks acknowledge, that Erdogrul, whom some call Ordogrul, Orthogrul, and Urtukul, was the Morzar (A), leader, or chief, of the Tartarian Turkmâns : that his father Soleymân Shâh, governor of Mahâm, a city of Khorassân, being driven out by Singhiskam, fled with his Turkmâns into Armenia, called from them Turkomania : that joining himself to Aladîn, Soltân of Ikonium, he began to set up for a sovereign by the assistance of that prince's troops : that, Erdogrul dying in 687, Aladîn continued the same favours to his son Ozmân, or Othmân, honouring him with the drum, the standard, and the sabre ; which are the marks of sovereignty (B) : and permitting him to conquer Asia Minor from the Greeks."

THIS, count Marsigli affirms, is what is related in the Turkish histories most universally received : but, on the other side, those, who would flatter the Othmân line, say, " That Soleymân Shâh was descended from Singhiskam ; that his son Erdogrul was acknowledged as sovereign by Aladîn himself ; and, in short, that Ozmân obtained the kingdom of Ikonium by grant from Aladîn, during his life-time."

Turkish historians.

As the dominion of the Othmân Turks still subsists, they are more happy than the Seljukians, in having a great number of national, or domestic, writers extant in the world, to publish the actions of them and their monarchs from the foundation of the empire.

Saadi Effendi of Larissa.

THE chief Turkish authors, whom prince Cantemir made use of in framing his history of the Othmâns, seem to have been two ; both bearing the name of Saadi Effendi, but distinguished by other marks. The first is called Saadi Effendi, of Larissa, and stiled by Cantemir, the most learned Saadi, author of the elaborate Synopsis Historiarum. This, he tells us, was collected from the most celebrated historians, Mevlana Idris, Neshrin, Saadi, Tajo'taverikh, Pechovi, and Hezarfen (C). It was published in 1696, and dedicated to Soltân Mostafa ; who in that year began his reign ^r.

CANTEMIR's history seems to be a translation, or abridgment, of this author ; and yet he no-where expressly tells us so. It is true, he quotes others in his preface, notes, and history, preceding Othmân : but gives little or no account of them, or how far he has made use of them ; only says, in general, that he has collected his history from the best Turkish historians, and delivered matters in their own words ^f.

^r Annal. Soltanor. p. 2.
^u Ibid. Hist. Othm. p. 266.

^s Stato Militare dell' Imperio Ottomanno, p. 6.

^t CANT. pref. p. 7.

(Y) The later Turkish writers, in making this nation Tatars, have exposed their ignorance, and convicted themselves of forgery.

(Z) They were so far from defeating the Tatars, or going to assist their benefactor, that they provided for their own security by flight.

(A) Murza, or Murja.

(B) But not all the marks of sovereignty, being the honours belonging to generals.

(C) Husseyn Effendi Hezarfen, or Hazarfen, a modern Turk ; who has given an history of all the Turkish monarchies. It is an abstract of Al Jannâbi the Arabian's general history of Asia ; and was published in Turkish, in 1672. It has been translated by M. De la Croix senior, interpreter to Lewis XIV. of France. See De la Croix's Hist. of Jenghis Can, p. 427, and pref. to Hist. of Timour Bec, p. 22.

- a THE other Saadi is the same with the author of the Tajo'tavarikh mentioned above, among those from whom Saadi of Larissa compiled his Synopsis. His name, according to D'Herbelot, is Saado'ddîn Mohammed Ebn Hassan, the most famous and elegant of all the Turkish historians. He was preceptor to Soltân Morâd (or Amurath) III. son of Selîm, and advanced even to the dignity of Musti, or pope (D). He is commonly called Kbowajeh, or Kbeja Effendi, and has composed, in very elegant Turkish, the book, intituled, Tajo'tavarikh, or Al Tevarikh, as the Turks pronounce it; that is, the crown of histories; which is a history of the Othmân Soltâns from the commencement of their monarchy to Soleymân I. *. Prince Cantemir calls this work Saadi Tajo'tavarikh, and its compiler Saadi Effendi, the famous author of the Othmân annals, Tajo'tavarikh, so approved by the Othmâns; and gives him the character of one who was not more zealous for the Othmân glory, than historical truth †; which judgment, we apprehend from the remarks that have already been made on him, will not be thought strictly true.

A. D. 1299.
Saado'ddîn
Mohammed.

- b BEFORE prince Cantemir's history appeared, we had a Latin translation of a Turkish author, by John Gaudier, alias Spiegel, under the title of Annales Sultanorum Osmanidarum; which carries down the history from their original to the year 1550; and seems to give a plain and undisguised relation of facts, from the earliest historians. However, prince Cantemir endeavours to wound the credit of these annals through the sides of Gaudier; whom he charges with too boldly asserting for truth what he had taken from some Turkish chronicle concerning the Othmân race. He then produces passages out of it, wherein he alleges the names to be corrupted, and put out of their true order, as well as other matters to be reported falsely by Gaudier; which is very unfair, as he knew that person did no more than translate the work. And the matters, which he says are reported falsely, may be presumed to be those relating to the origin of the Othmâns, and their power; which the author has not set off with so much splendor as the Saadi Effendi's. To us, there seems to be nothing fabulous in it, but what concerns the genealogy of Othmân, and affects it in common with the other histories.

Turkish annals.

- c IN short, you meet in the annals with none of those glaring marks of forgery, which appear in the histories made use of by prince Cantemir. However, as the flaws to be found in the Othmân history chiefly affect this part of it, which the writers had most temptation to adulterate, we shall, for the future, follow them with less scruple; our design being, not to destroy the authority of the Turkish history in general, as delivered by their own authors, but only to separate the spurious part from the genuine; and point out the absurdities which their pride has introduced, through a vain imagination that it would diminish the lustre of a potent empire, should it be thought to have arisen from an inconsiderable beginning; and that the origin of its founders was obscure. This book was published by Leunclavius, with very learned and useful notes, geographical and historical, under the title of Pandects.

Judgment thereon.

- d PRINCE Cantemir's censure seems to be pointed at the same annals, when he says, "That the Tevarikhi Al Othmân (E) is one of the fabulous histories which were written very soon after the foundation of the Turkish empire: that some Christian authors seem to borrow their chronology of the Othmâns from those books; but that they are not approved of by the Turks, and are bitterly inveighed against in the Tajo'tavarikh." Because, we presume, they do not sufficiently exalt the Othmân glory, by exaggerating their rise with such shining, but false circumstances, as later historians have done: for the nearer the historians were to the times they wrote of, the more likely they are to relate the truth. As domestic authors are generally inclined to magnify the origin of their nation and monarchs, it is not probable that they would suppress those facts which redound most to the glory of both; and substitute others not so much to their advantage.

Censure of Cantemir.

- e BUT whatever ground prince Cantemir might have had to censure the Othmân annals, and other histories of the Turks, we cannot imagine what could induce him to fall foul on Abu'lfaraj (whom he misnames Abulfarago), or even to mention him. Speaking of Christian historians, who, in their accounts of the Turkish affairs, have loaded their works with fables, barbarisms, and anachronisms, he says, he has often wondered, that men of learning, and, in other respects, of great penetration, could be ever induced to credit the indigested and absurd narrations of Abu'lfarago; who, among the Turks, scarce merits the name of historian. Surely prince Cantemir must have been wholly a stranger to that author, or must mistake him for some other: for how little soever he may be intitled to the character of an historian (his history being no more than a collection of select facts reduced into chronological order), yet none before this princely censor ever accused his Compendium of Dynasties, as consisting of indigested and absurd narrations;

His unjust reflection on Abu'lfaraj.

* D'HERBEL. p. 728. Art. Saad eddin ben Hassan. Hist. Othm. pref. p. 9.

† CANT. pref. p. 6, 7, 12, 14.

‡ CANT.

(D) He died in Hejrah 1008, A. D. 1599.

(E) That is, The history, or annals, of the Othmân Sol- tâns. There are a great many under this title. See D'Herbelot, p. 860.

A. D. 1299.  nor is any work perhaps freer from fables, barbarisms, and anachronisms : except by fables are a meant the traditions of nations, and by barbarisms the oriental names of persons and places ; in which case prince Cantemir's own history is no less liable to objection than that of Abûl'faraj ; who was a person of eminent learning, and dignity in the Syriac church. And as for anachronisms, no author perhaps has given the dates of actions with greater care and exactness.

WHAT makes this censure of prince Cantemir the more unaccountable, and would induce one to imagine that he has mistaken this author for some other, is, that Abûl'faraj does not mention one word of the Othmân Turks throughout his annals ; and consequently is, with no manner of propriety, introduced by Cantemir, even supposing he was such an author as his censor represents him.

Condemns European authors in oriental history.

THE European authors indeed are justly censured by the prince, as being full of fables, barbarisms, and anachronisms, owing to their ignorance in the oriental languages and histories ; of which his quotations from Nicephorus Gregoras, and Lonicerus, concerning the successors of Jenghîz Khân^a, are flagrant proofs : but, on the other side, it may be as justly retorted, that he himself has committed mistakes in history, chronology, and geography ; which he could not have done, had he been only tolerably versed in the oriental authors. Some instances of this have been already produced ; to which we shall here add one or two more. The first concerns those same successors of Jenghîz Khân in Persia ; with regard to whom he says, It is agreed by all, who have left written histories of the eastern nations, that the Tartarian princes, successors of Jenghîz Khân, were in the year of the Hejrah 656, and of Christ 1258 (forty-four years before Othmân) subdued by Ebubekir, son of Saadi, king of Persia, and their provinces restored to the Persian monarchy, excepting those which were held by some of the Satrapæ (or governors) ; who in the expedition of the Tatars, took the opportunity to set up for themselves : among whom were Aladin, Soltân of Ikonium, and Soleymân, grandfather of Othmân. Hence, says he, it is evident, that the Tartarian kingdoms in Asia were overturned by the Persians long before the beginning of the Othmân empire^b.

PRINCE Cantemir asserts two points in this paragraph, which are the most contrary to fact that can be imagined. First, that the Tartarian kingdoms in Asia were overturned by the Persians under Ebubekir, in 1258. This is so far from being fact, that that monarchy was then at its greatest height under the famous Hûlâkû Khân, first of the race of Jenghîz Khân in Persia : and although, after the death of Abûsâid Behâder Khân, successor of Hûlâkû, in the year Hejrah, 736. 736, no sole monarch of the house of Jenghîz Khân succeeded him ; yet the Mogols, whose A. D. 1335. commanders divided the regal power among themselves in the several provinces, held the Persians in subjection till the reign of Timûr Bek^c, or Tamerlan. This is agreeable to the unanimous testimony of the oriental historians ; nor can any one of any authority, much less all, be produced to support prince Cantemir's assertion. And as to his Ebubekir (rather Abû Bekr) son of Saadi, he seems to be no less imaginary as to his existence than his conquests.

Second instance.

SECONDLY, in saying that Aladin, Soltân of Ikonium, and Soleymân, grandfather of Othmân, were among the governors who set up for themselves, he affirms two facts, one of them contrary to the authority of the best historians, the other, to what he elsewhere relates himself : for it appears from the foregoing history of the Seljûks, that Aladin was no governor, but an absolute prince ; and by his own account, Soleymân was sovereign prince of a territory, or territories, in Khorassân, a province of Persia^d. Nor does he, in the list which he afterwards gives of those governors, mention Soleymân^e : but, to make amends, he inserts among them Kburzem Shâb, king of Caspia, as he calls him ; and tells you, that Aladin, as the chief of them, alone enjoyed the title of Soltân. Now this Kburzem Shâb, whom he makes a petty governor, was no less a person than the Great Mohammed Karazm Shâb, lord of all the countries from Turkestân to the river Tigris. He likewise enjoyed the title of Soltân, as well as Aladin, or Alao'ddin, who, compared with him, was but a little prince.

His censure, and commendation.

FROM the foregoing instances, the reader may be apt to judge that prince Cantemir was but little acquainted with any part of the Mohammedan history, except that of the Othmân Turks : but to have written well on their affairs, he ought at least to have consulted the Seljûkian authors, in case any be remaining, as he seems to intimate, by what has been mentioned before ; if he has not committed some mistake on that occasion, which is not improbable.

IT is very usual with prince Cantemir to assert things without bringing his vouchers ; and to give his own opinion, or report of matters, for that of others. He is apt also to mix the different accounts of authors together, without distinguishing them ; which, with his own historical and geographical mistakes, makes a strange rhapsody of error and confusion throughout his preface, and in the beginning of his history : but he grows more correct, as he advances

^a CANT. pref. p. 9.

^d CANT. Hist. Othm. p. 3.

^b Ibid. p. 9.

^e See pref. p. 12.

^c See D'HIERBEL. p. 32. Art. Abûsâid ben Algiapû.

a from the early times of the Othmân monarchy ; and indeed is recommendable not only for A. D. 1335. having given us a Turkish history, taken immediately from the Turkish authors, but also for a great number of very useful notes wherewith he has improved it.

WITH regard to the Greek, commonly called the Byzantine historians, there are but three or four who treat of the affairs of the Othmâns, namely, Nicephorus Gregoras, the emperor John Kantakuzenus, Dukas, and Laonicus Khalkondylas, or Khalkokondilas. The first of these authors, as prince Cantemir observes, is rather a rhetorician than an historian, as indeed most of those writers are, who speak of foreign affairs only occasionally, and neglect the essentials of the history and chronology to attend to the polishing of their stile. Kantakuzenus does not say a great deal on the subject ; but Dukas treats copiously, and like an historian, of the Turkish wars, from the death of Orkhân, to the taking of Constantinople by Mohammed II. Cousin, who translated several of the Byzantine writers into French, says, his work is more extensive than that of Khalkondylas, because he goes farther back ; and that it is conducted with much more judgment.

HOWEVER that may be, the history of Dukas is not near so voluminous as that of Khalkondylas, who has professedly written a history of the Turks to the same period. But nothing can be more jejune or incorrect than his account of the origin of those people, and the first Othmân Soltâns. He quotes no authors for what passed before his own time ; and indeed seems to follow none. The small conformity there is between his account of affairs, and that given by Pakhmir, Kantakuzenus, and Dukas, shews that he was quite unacquainted with those authors ; and that he rather wrote what he remembered to have heard, than from books. This is confirmed by his seldom marking the dates of facts ; which, tho' equally essential to them, as the scene of action, are not so easily retained in memory.

FROM the taking of Constantinople, the history has been carried down to the present time by the Venetian, German, and other western authors. Among the rest, John Leunclavius, a German, hath, besides the annals before-mentioned, published The history of the Turks, taken from their own historians (F). These, at the same time they add many things not found in the annals, differ much from the annals ; and the historians made use of by prince Cantemir differs still more from them. Hence it appears, that the Turks have more than once brought their history under the hammer ; and that the first essays not pleasing their vanity, they have raised it a-new upon a plan more to their liking, but still more inconsistent with truth.

LEUNCLAVIUS has improved his history with indexes, in which are explained all the Turkish words that occur, with the situations of places, and the names they had before the Turks changed them ; a work which manifests the great learning, genius, and application, of its author : but the misfortune is, he has mixed what the Greeks and others have written, with the Turkish memoirs, and not always sufficiently distinguished the reports of one author from those of another. This fault, which has been the ruin of history in every country, ought to be carefully avoided ; for the early historians being compounded together in one age, and those recomposed with others in the next, falshood becomes blended with truth, in such a manner, that, for want of referring things to their proper authors, there is no separating the one from the other ; and thus the whole falls under the suspicion of fable and forgery with posterity.

AFTER all, Leunclavius hath transgressed in this respect, much less than the generality of history writers since his time ; whose works ought to be considered rather as the produce of their own invention, than histories framed from the memoirs of other men. At least, citing no vouchers for what they deliver, and being themselves many ages posterior to the facts they relate, their testimony can be of no manner of authority with persons of judgment ; who will always expect good evidence for the truth of what they read.

(F) Historiæ Musulmanæ Turcorum de monumentis ipsorum exscriptæ, lib. xviii. Francfort, 1591.

C H A P. II.

The reign of Othmân, or Ozmân,

First Khân or Soltân.

A. D. 1300.
Rise of Othmân.

WE find in the Greek writers an account of the rise of Othmân, more exact perhaps than that which we meet with in the Turkish; and at the same time not inconsistent with theirs. Laonicus Khalkondylas informs us, that the Ogúzians, after their coming into Asia Minor, settled in a little town or village, called Soguta (A), on the borders of Mysia, and not above 15 or 16 leagues distant from the Propontis. A river of the same name runs through the place, which was before named Itæa (B). It is well known that the Othmân monarchs have always held this town in great esteem, often visiting it, and bestowing more favours on the inhabitants than those of any other place.

Elected chief.

AFTER the Ogúzians had dwelt here for a long time, Othmân, by his courtesy and gifts, so gained on them, that they chose him for their chief. This done, he immediately armed them; and falling on all sides on the Greeks, with whom before they had frequent bickerings, defeated some, and drove others out of the country, which they took possession of. After this he gained frequent victories; which coming to the ears of Soltân Aladin, he made him his lieutenant-general: but Aladin dying soon after, great disputes arose among his great officers. At length they entered into a league to make conquests, with their joint forces, and then divide them amongst themselves. In these expeditions Othmân signalized his valour and conduct above all the rest. The commanders, who were seven in number, divided the territories they had conquered, by casting lots; which fell in the following manner: 1. All the inner parts of Phrygia, as far as Cilicia and Philadelpia, fell to the share of Karamân; 2. Sar Kân had the maritime provinces of Ionian, which extended to Smirna; 3. Kalamuz, and his son Karaz (C), possessed Lydia, to the frontiers of Mysia; 4. Bythinia, with all the countries towards mount Olympus, fell to Othmân and Tekies; 5. Paphlagonia, with other lands, extending to the Propontis, became the lot of the sons of Omur (D). As for Kermian, it is said he was not of the number; but that having at the beginning of these revolutions seized on Ikonium, he was afterwards driven out, and retired into Ionian, where he lived a private life^a.

THIS heptarchy or division among the Turkish chiefs, we shall see confirmed hereafter by Pakhamir and Dukas, and even by the circumstances of the Turkish history itself: from whence it appears, that although Othmân continued his conquests, and might have improved his share more than some of the other Turkish commanders, yet he was still upon the same footing with them; nor seems to have assumed any titles or authority more than the others had done: but as he laid the foundation of a great empire, which his successors completed, it is proper that his reign should commence from the time that he became an independent prince, after the extinction of the Seljukian monarchy, when the partition that was made by the Turkish commanders took place; which must have been in the year 1300, or not long after.

Othmân takes Bilejiki,
Hejrah, 698.
A. D. 1298.

AMONG the exploits already mentioned to have been performed by Othmân before the dissolution of the Seljukian monarchy, that of his taking the city of Bilejiki (E) deserves a more particular account. The Turkish historians write, that in the year 698, Mikbael Kossi, that is, Goat's beard, governor of Bilejiki, having invited Othmân to the marriage of his daughter, the other Greek governors (F) of the neighbouring places resolve to seize him. Being informed of their design, by his trusty friend Mikbael, he orders some hundreds of soldiers to conceal themselves near the place, and 40 well armed men, dressed like women, to enter the castle of Jarhissar, and in the night set fire to the houses about it: mean time he repairs with a small retinue to Khakirbunar, a place in the suburbs, where the marriage was to be celebrated. At the time appointed, the 40 disguised soldiers set fire to the town, then without garrison; which, as soon as Othmân perceived, he gives the signal to the soldiers in ambush, who, rushing on the guests buried in wine, slew them all, without distinction of sex, excepting Mikbael, and a

^a KHALKONDYLAS, l. i. c. 4.

(A) Rather Suguchik, or Sugutjik, as the Turks call it; that is, the village of willows.

(B) Itæa signifies also a place of willows; so that the Turkish name is only a translation of the Greek.

(C) By others Karasc.

(D) Or Amur, slain by Soltân Maffūd of Rûm. See before, vol. ii. p. 240.

(E) Or Bylejik, by others written Bilezug.

(F) The Turkish authors, to magnify the exploit, call them princes.

a few others ; among whom was the bride Holofira, of noble descent. This lady Othmán afterwards married to his son Or Khân ; by whom she had Soleyman and Murád. A. D. 1298.

THIS affair is represented somewhat differently by the Christian writers. According to them, Mikbael Koffi, governor of Hirmen Kata (G), invites his friend Othmán, with the Christian governors of the neighbouring castles, to his daughter's wedding. Othmán, by his noble presents on that occasion, raising both the envy and jealousy of these governors, they combine to destroy him. To effect this, the governor of Bilejiki, the most powerful of them, being to marry the captain of Jarbissar's daughter, invites Othmán to the nuptials ; and sends Koffi to conduct him thither. Koffi found Othmán very willing to go ; but unwilling that so brave a man should perish by treachery, discovers the plot to him. The Turk, resolving to be revenged, bids Koffi tell the governor, that he would certainly wait on him ; but being at war with a neighbouring prince, and fearing a surprize in his absence, desired the liberty of sending his mother-in-law and wife, with their attendants, and some of his best goods, to Bilejiki.

THIS being readily granted, Othmán disguised 40 young men like women, and stowing several others in packs like goods, comes to the place where the marriage was next day to be solemnized, being an open field, at some distance from the castle. As soon as the pretended ladies and goods were received into Bilejiki, the soldiers throwing off the mask, with some difficulty seize the fortress. When the governor was retired to his bed-chamber, Othmán, who concluded his stratagem had succeeded, takes horse, with his followers, and friend Koffi, and rides full-speed to Bilejiki. The governor, informed of his sudden departure, pursues, and overtakes him ; but his attendants being, for the most part, drunk, he is slain by Othmán in the conflict, and the rest put to flight. Having thus taken Bilejiki, Othmán next morning likewise surprised Jarbissar, where he took prisoner the captain, and his beautiful daughter the bride, who were preparing to go to the wedding ^b.

WE meet with little or no account in the Turkish history of the actions of Othmán for the first seventeen years of his reign ; which argues a great want of records during that time. To fill up this gap, we are only told, that after he had removed his residence to Jenghisaburi, as before mentioned, he spent some time in regulating his domestic affairs. We shall therefore, in some measure, supply the defect out of the Byzantine historians ; by shewing the miserable state to which the Greek affairs in Asia were reduced at the time that Othmán appeared there.

WE have related, towards the close of the Seljukian history, by what means the affairs of the east, which had been restored by Tarkoniates, came to be again ruined. Sometime after, six thousand Alans (H), who had served Nogais (I) the Tatar, came to offer their service to the emperor Andronicus ; who receiving them as succours sent from heaven, divided them into three parts : the greater number he sent before into the east, and reserved the most valiant for the young emperor Mikbael, who, eager to be in action, followed soon after, and encamped at Magnesia, near the desert. From thence he sent out parties, who scoured the enemy's country, and brought off much plunder ; while the Turks betook themselves to the hills and their strong holds : but afterwards assembling their forces, and descending into the plains, the emperor was prevailed on to retreat, by the chief officers of his army, who magnified the forces of the enemy.

THIS shameful retreat encouraged the Turks to make incursions as far as the field of Mene, and ruin the country on all sides, while the emperor was shut up in Magnesia. The Alans, after this, demanded leave to return ; and as the whole defence of the empire then depended on them, when the young emperor found that he could detain them no longer, he retired as secretly as he could from Magnesia, in a dark and stormy night. The Turks had so over-run the country to the south of Pergamus, that the inhabitants, abandoning their houses and effects, fled for safety, some into that city, others to Endromit (or Adromitium), and to the sea-coast near Lampsakus ; while many crossed the Hellepont into Europe ; so great was the general fear and distress.

THE east being thus inclosed, as it were, by the Turks, from one sea to the other, Othmán appeared the 27th day of July, at the head of a very numerous army, near Vaseum, a place not far from Nikomedia. After having pillaged the country about Nice, he crossed the moun-

^b CANT. Hist. Othm. p. 13.

(G) He was more likely governor of this castle than of Bilejiki ; since this latter was given to Baliad, as before related ; which could not well be, if Koffi, his friend, had been governor of it, as the translator of Cantemir well observes ; unless, indeed, he was promoted to a better government.

(H) There were at that time 8000 of that nation fit to bear arms.

(I) This Nogais was one of the Tatar commanders, who having subdued the country to the north of the Euxine sea, set up for himself, and extended his conquest along the north side of the Danube ; but in 1297 he was defeated, and killed by Tuktai, descended from the princes of the kingdom which Nogais had seized. Pakh. in Mich. & Andronic. l. ix. c. 26.

tains,

A.D. 1303. tains, to ravage the territories of the Alifons; and was joined by more forces from Paphlagonia, who seemed resolved to over-run at once all which remained to the Romans. All the troops which Muzalon had, both of Romans and Alans, to oppose such formidable enemies, did not amount to 2000 men: besides, a misunderstanding arising between the two parties, they made but small resistance. A good number was slain by the Turks, and the Romans fled shamefully to Nikomedia; while many Alans lost their lives to favour their escape. After this defeat, the people ran for shelter to that city; and the Turks ravaged the country every-where, without opposition, to the very walls of Prusa, Nice, and Endromit, where the emperor then was. In short, the whole east was ruined by the fury of their arms, excepting the strong holds and fortified places. There was only a small space of land towards the sea, about Akhirao, Cyzicus, Piga, and Lopadion, which was exempt from pillage.

WITH regard to the islands, after the pirates abandoned Tenedos, which had long been their place of rendezvous, the Turks seized it; and, with the vessels they built there, subdued the islands of the Archipelago, Samos, Karpathus, and even Rhodes, which they entirely laid waste.

The emperor's policy.

A.D. 1304.

THE emperor finding that he could not by force of arms repress the enemy, who made incursions as far as the Bosphorus, had recourse to other measures. Kuximpaxis (K), a Tatar, on the death of Nogais, to whom he was strictly attached, fled, with his wife and children, towards the east; but being driven by contrary winds towards Heraklea, implored the emperor's protection, was received, and changed the Mohammedan faith for the Christian. Andronicus, after this, having brought about a match between the daughter of his convert and Soliman Paxis, chief of the Turks, who were nearest the frontiers, gave the government of the country round Nikomedia to Kuximpaxis; in hopes Soliman would spare the Roman frontiers, out of respect to his father-in-law. But this piece of policy did not succeed to his expectation: for although Soliman forbore incursions, yet he could not restrain Amurat (L), another commander, from pillaging; the chiefs acting independently of each other. Besides, the moment one chief sat still, his soldiers lifted under another, who continued to ravage the country; so that Soliman's men committed the same hostilities as if their chief had been at their head (M).

Turkish princes.

IN short, there were then in arms, several parties under so many different commanders, as Atman (or Othman), Atin (or Aydin), Alifuras Mantakkia (N), Lamises, Sfondiles, Pagdin, and others, who, like a devouring fire, had ruined all the country (O). The emperor had no forces to oppose the enemy, and but one way left to raise any; and that was, by making use of the fund, out of which the pensions of the churches, monasteries, and his guards, were paid. The emperor Mikbael finding it not safe to remain at Pergamus, went with his troops to Cyzicus, whither the people, who could escape, retired with their effects; but fearing to be besieged, he soon after removed to Piga, a little city near the sea, where he fell into a dangerous sickness, caused by grief and vexation. A little before this, on the 8th of August, there happened an earthquake. It was scarce felt about Constantinople; but at Rhodes it was so violent, and did so much mischief, the like was never known. It was also very great at Alexandria, and the country round: it shook Koron, Methone, a part of the Morea, and the island of Kandia; in all which places much damage was done.

Violent earthquake.

The Catalans arrive.

IN September following, in the second indiction (P), Roger (Q) came, at the invitation of the emperor, with seven ships, and an army of his allies, both Catalans and Amogavares (R), to the number of 8000 men. This Roger had served in the wars between the kings of Sicily and Naples; which being at an end, he, to avoid falling into the hands of the pope, who had demanded him, had recourse to the emperor. Fernand Ximenez had arrived before, with his subjects armed, to serve for pay against the Turks. The emperor, charmed with so large a succour, conferred on Roger the title of Grand Duke, and gave him his niece in marriage: but his troops being transported to Cyzicus, committed all sorts of violences, plundered the towns, carried off the women, and treated the inhabitants as if they had been slaves. Fernand did what he could, by his remonstrances, to restrain their outrages; but finding it in vain, returned home with his troops: nor would the emperor Mikbael receive the Grand Duke, when he went to visit him at Piga.

• PAKH. I. x. c. 16, 17. 19, 20. 25, 26. 29, 30.

(K) Perhaps Kushim Pasbi, or Rasbi.

(L) Or Morad.

(M) The modern practice of one prince lending another forces against his ally is not unlike this.

(N) Called afterwards Karaman Mantakkia.

(O) The author says, beyond Bitynia, Myfia, Phrygia, and Lydia; but the Greeks seem then to have had nothing left them in Phrygia, and but very little in the other three provinces.

(P) Which answers to the year 1304.

(Q) Called by others Ronzorius, or Rouzerius.

(R) Pakhmir, I. xi. c. 21, supposes that they drew their origin from the Avars.

- a As the emperor had not yet forces sufficient to make head against the enemy, he had recourse A. D. 1304. to Kazan Khân (S) of the Tatars, who accepted his offer of an alliance, and promised to put a stop to their ravages. As soon as this news came to their ears, they slackened their incursions; and Alais began to think how he should preserve the rich booty which he had gathered in Myfia. There was at Sardes an exceeding strong fort, which formerly had served for a citadel: it was inaccessible on one side for rock, and on the other for precipices. Alais sent to acquaint those who held it, that in case they would give him one half, which was separated from the other by a strong wall, with only a gate of communication, he would suffer them to cultivate their lands in peace. This offer necessity induced them to accept of, against their inclinations; and indeed the fear of the Tatars was no sooner over, than Alais formed the design of making himself master of the whole citadel. This coming to the knowledge of the Romans, they resolved to prevent him; and sending for some troops, who were in the neighbourhood, came upon the Turks, when they were asleep, and put them all to the sword ^d.

- MEAN time, the miseries of the East increased daily: the enemy took Cele, Astrabilus, A. D. 1305. and Hiero, where they exercised the greatest cruelties. Nikomedia was extremely pressed with hunger and thirst; Belokome, Angelkome, Anagourde, Plataneum, and Melageum, were almost empty of people, Krullum and Katacium were in a worse state. The roads from Nice to Heraklea and Nemikome, before the most frequented of all, were then quite desert. There was only one small road opened from Cio thither, through the forest. Passengers used to cross the neck of land from Cio by night; and then embarking in the other bay, go by water to the only gate of Nice (T), which was open.

- THE emperor having sent some troops to Katacium, they were no sooner arrived, than 5000 Turks (under Othmân) appeared before the place. The soldiers, unable to oppose them, fled; and a multitude of women and children were taken prisoners under the walls of the fort. After this they destroyed the country. As Othmân was on his return, he learned that the inhabitants of Belokome (U) had joined the Roman troops in their retreat; so that the place was without defence. Hereupon he took it by force, slaying part of the people, and seized a prodigious quantity of riches.

- WHILE the Catalans exercised horrid cruelties at Cyzicus, Alisuras besieged the city of Philadelphia with an army of Karmanians, the most powerful people among the Turks (X), took all the neighbouring forts, and reduced the place to great straits. In March the army set forward from Cyzicus, consisting of 8000 men, 1000 Romans, 6000 Italians (Y), and 1000 Alans. Marulus commanded the Romans; but the Grand Duke Roger was generalissimo, with an absolute power. On his approach to Gherme, the Turks shamefully deserted their fort, leaving their baggage behind. From thence he passed by Kliara, and other places, to succour Philadelphia. On his way the inhabitants of Tripoli, which had been taken some time before by the Karmanians, sent to desire his assistance. He attacked the Turks at Aulak and defeated them; their general Alisuras, who was wounded, flying to Amur (Z) for safety: and thus the siege of Philadelphia was raised.

- ALTHOUGH Tripoli was formerly no more than in the rank of citadels, the emperor Dukas enlarged and fortified it, so as to serve as a bulwark to cover Philadelphia. It was reported that this last city never had been taken since the deluge; which tradition made the inhabitants so vain, that they despised the arms of the Turks. Tripoli, however, came to be besieged by them at length; and the inhabitants being reduced to famine, by succours not coming to their relief, prevailed on the Turks both to supply them with provisions, and suffer them to go out to buy necessaries. The Turks taking advantage of the liberty they had of going to Tripoli to sell their provisions, by means of some inhabitants whom they bribed, introduced sacks full of trumpets, drums, and other warlike music, instead of corn. At midnight the Turks, who came with the sacks, sounded the instruments; and while the people were confounded at the unexpected noise, the traitors opening the gates, let in Alisuras, whom it afterwards served for a place of retreat, from whence to make incursions with his Karmanians.

ROGER, after his victory, returned by the forts of Kula and Turnus to Philadelphia, where he raised immense sums by force. He exercised the like exactions at Pyrge and Ephesus, in the isle of Scio, Lemnos and Mitylene, torturing people to discover their hidden treasure, and ^d CANT. Hist. Othm. l. xi. c. 9—17.

(S) Our author writes Cazanes Cam.

(T) Hence it appears, that there is a river which communicates with the lake of Nice; on the east or north-east side whereof that city stands.

(U) This Belokome, or Bellikome (as Kantakuzenus writes it, lib. iv. cap. 17.) seems to be Biljiki; said to have been taken in Aladin's time.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(X) By this it appears, that Othmân was not yet become the most considerable in the heptarchy.

(Y) That is, Catalans and Amogawares.

(Z) Or Omer.

A. D. 1306. putting those to death who refused, not sparing the emperor's officers, and even governors of a places (A). A little before this, the inhabitants of Magnesia, having been ill used by him, on the arrival of Roman troops, killed some of his Italian garrison, and imprisoned the rest. On this advice, Roger hastened to besiege the place: but finding, after several fruitless attacks, that there was no likelihood of taking it, he offered to retire, provided they would deliver him his money and baggage which he had lodged there. This they rejected with scorn, and added sneers to their refusal ^c.

The Turks ravages. WHILE Roger lay with his forces before Magnesia, the Turks ravaged the Roman territories without controul: and though the emperor often sent orders to him to withdraw, he paid no regard to them: yet at last, wearied out with fatigue, the grand duke was obliged to raise the siege. In his way back to Mitylene he burdened the cities with great exactions; b and from thence passing with his troops to Lampsacus, he crossed over to Callipoli ^f.

Philadelphia besieged. WHILE those troops were committing great disorders in Europe, the east was neglected; and Philadelphia so closely besieged by the Turks (B), that the inhabitants were forced to feed on dead bodies for want of provisions. At the same time they attacked the island of Scio with 30 ships, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, excepting some who fled to a fort, and others who escaped in 40 vessels, only to be cast away near Skyra. Although the emperor conferred on Roger the dignity of Cæsar, in order to satisfy his ambition, if possible, and prevail on him to defend the east against the Turks, yet still he eluded the performance of his engagements by his usual artifices. He promised, on receiving that honour, with 11,000 crowns in gold, to pass over immediately into Asia with 3000 men, and dismiss the rest; but instead of disbanding any, he sent some over to Cyzicus, Piga, and Lupadion; and retained the Catalans, under pretence that they had not received their pay. c

Roger slain. AFTER this, wanting to know the strength of the emperor Mikhael's army, he went in March to Adrianople, with a guard of 150 men, under pretence of taking leave of that prince, whom he had never seen before he embarked. Mikhael, though surprised at his arrival, received him with many caresses; but two or three days after, as he was entering alone into the apartment of the empress, George, the chief of the Alans, whose son had been killed by the Catalans at Cyzicus, took that opportunity to revenge his death, and ran him through the body. Thus fell, says our author, this unjust and insolent, but fierce and intrepid baroarian. While the Asiatics, in revenge for his cruelties to their countrymen, were cutting his body in d pieces, his Italians, who were without, were seized and cast into prison ^e.

The Catalans revenge. THE Catalans, on the news of their chief's death, put the inhabitants of Callipoli, of which they had long been masters, to the sword, excepting some whom they reserved to exchange for those who were at Adrianople. The emperor, on this news, sent some troops to besiege the fort of Callipoli; but the Catalans were so far from apprehending any danger, that they passed over into Asia, and put to the sword all the grown-up people in Perinthus and the neighbouring country. Those who escaped fled to Constantinople, which was now, as it were, the only asylum left for the inhabitants of the provinces to retire to, from the general desolation caused by the Turks and other enemies of the Romans ^h.

The emperor Mikhael THE young emperor was the more intent on relieving Callipoli (C), which was besieged by the Amogavares, as he was informed they expected succours, and had invited over the Turks; and sent three commanders with troops sufficient to defeat them: but the enemy having drawn them into an ambuscade, by leaving droves of cattle without the town to allure them forward, they were defeated themselves, and many slain in the pursuit. Mikhael, to efface the shame of this defeat, left Adrianople with his army; and being arrived at a place called Imeri, ranged them in order of battle; the van consisted of the Alans and Turks, called Turkopoli; the main body of the Macedonians and troops of the east; the rear was composed of the Walakkians and volunteers. The Roman army consisted of five legions, and that of the enemy of four, whereof one was Turks (D).

^c PAKH. l. xi. c. 21—26. c. 14, & seqq.

^f PAKH. l. xii. c. 3.

^e Ibid. l. xii. c. 14. 22, & seqq.

^h PAKH.

(A) At Mitylene he condemned Makramus, governor of the fort of Afi (on the Meander) for having deserted that place, though no longer able to keep it. Afterwards his life was granted, on condition he paid 5000 crowns; but not being able to raise the whole, he ordered his head to be cut off. That instant the executioner seizing him by the hair, laid him all along; and fastened him to the block with such violence, that he put his neck out of joint; and then gave him the fatal stroke.

(B) Under Alisuras, we presume.

(C) To reconcile this with what is said a little above, it must be supposed that the fort of Callipoli was in the hands of the Catalans, but not the city.

(D) We have before this, several instances of the Turks passing into Europe: so that when authors tell us they first passed into Europe, under Or Khân, it must be understood of the Othmân Turks only.

a THE Alans and Turkopoli (E) began the battle ; but after the first attack on the Catalans, A. D. 1307, who stood like rocks, they turned their backs and fled ; which discouraging the rest, they began to retreat. The young emperor endeavouring, by his example, to make them stand their ground, was in the utmost hazard of being killed or taken ; for he stood firm in the midst of danger, and could hardly be brought off by the persuasions of those about him, shedding tears, and tearing his hair for vexation. The consequence of this defeat must have been very bad, if the enemy had not been hindered from pursuing the Romans, under the imagination that they wanted to draw them into an ambuscade. The Alans, to make the emperor amends for losing him the battle, began to scour the country, and pillage his subjects, as other strangers had done. ^{defeated by them.} A. D. 1308.

b ALTHOUGH the troops which guarded the strait of Avido hindered the Turks to approach it, yet they were as much masters of the other side : but Zakaria Manuel, by the reputation of the valour of the Italians who were under his command, kept them at a distance from Endromit and Phoea ^{Their allies killed.} ¹.

SOON after (F) the Turks differing with the Italians about the division of the plunder, part of them took ship, with a design to pass the strait of Callipoli ; but meeting with Andrew Muresk, who was pay-master of the navy, they were all cut to pieces, which made the rest continue with the Italians, and ravage Thrace.

c MEAN time the fort of Kubukleum, in Mysia, being hard pressed by the Turks (G), Makre-Amogavanus, governor of Lupadion, sent thither 60 Amogavares ; who having treated secretly with the enemy, as soon as they got into the place slew the remainder of the garrison, drove out the inhabitants, and delivered it up to the Turks ; after which they were conducted to Lampsakus, and from thence crossed the Hellepont into Europe. ^{res treachery,}

MURESK was made admiral for the exploit above-mentioned ; but having only two ships left of his fleet, was soon after met by the enemy, commanded by one Philip, whom but a little before he had fought, and taken ; but now fortune changing sides, Philip took him, after killing all his men ; and in return of generosity, ransomed him for 3000 crowns. ^{and success.}

THE Amogavares, grown more bold by this advantage, treated with the Turks commanded by Atin (H), and brought over 2000 into Europe, with some Romans, who had joined them in Asia : by this means grown formidable, they did a world of mischief in the open country.

d THE Turks having seized the fort of Examiles, the emperor sent Marulus with what little troops could be gathered, to prevent their farther progress : on his approach to Apros, Roca-fort, the Catalan, who was at the fort, sent to tell him he intended to go over to the emperor with 200 men ; and that in case they would give him 5000 crowns, he would kill all the Turks who were in Europe. Marulus desiring to know in what manner he could destroy such a prodigious multitude as there was of them, answered, that he would separate them into small bodies, and so destroy them one after the other ; and that, as an earnest of his performance, he had sent him the heads of several whom he had already killed. Marulus believed this an argument of the Catalan's sincerity, and would have been his dupe for the money, if a woman had not known one of the heads to have been that of her husband, slain in the last rencounter. ^{Catalan knew very.}

e THE emperor, to remedy the affairs of the east, sent over corn to the garrisons, and demanded of Karbaga (I), Khân of the Tatars, the same favour which he had desired of Kazân Khân, his predecessor. His ambassador brought word that the Khân (K) was very willing to grant his request ; that he had actually raised an army of 40,000 men ; and that his nephew was already advanced, at the head of 20,000, as far as Kogni, with orders to follow in all things the emperor's directions : but while he was busy in preparing presents, and instructing his ambassadors, news came of the taking of Ephesus, by Soltân Sayfan ; who having thrown off his allegiance to his uncle Karamân Mantakbia, was become very powerful. The inhabitants, to avoid the extremities of war, surrendered, upon articles, which were not well kept : for most of them were sent to the fort of Tyreum, for fear of insurrections ; and some were massacred. ^{Sayfan takes Ephesus.}

f IN the mean time a Turk, named Ishak Malek, sent privately to offer to join the emperor ; who, ready to catch at every appearance of advantage to his affairs, promised him the daughter ^{Ishak Malek's offer.}

¹ ПАКН. с. 29. 30. 32.

(E) The Turkopoli were Turks left in Thrace, by Soltân Arzoo'ddin, the twelfth Seljuk of Rûm, when he fled from Aynum ; and becoming Christians, were enrolled among the Greek soldiers.

(F) This was in the 23d year of the reign of Andronicus, and 12th of Mikhael's.

(G) Perhaps under Kalamius, or his son Karez, who had Lydia to his share.

(H) Or Aydin, who gained a sovereignty about Abidos, at the entrance of the straits of Callipoli.

(I) This was Mohammed, son of Argun, who succeeded his brother Kâzân, in 703 of the Hejra, of Christ 1103. He was surnamed Gayatho'ddin Khodâbendah. Abûlfedab writes Khorbenda ; of which Korbaga, and Korbagath, seem to be corruptions.

(K) In the original Cam, or Kam.

A. D. 1308. of another Malek (L) in marriage, with considerable presents on that occasion. Among the services which Malek proposed to do, one was, to engage the Turkopoli to quit the interest of the Catalans, provided their wives and children were restored them. This negotiation having been discovered, Rocafort accused Malek, and some of his associates, with treason. They said in their defence, that they had nothing in view but to serve the Turkopoli, by drawing their families out of the emperor's hands. However, Malek found means to cross over into Asia, while the Catalans scoured the sea in ships, and carried their ravages by land to the very gates of Constantinople ^k.

Genoese cowardice.

THE Genoese were at length prevailed on to attack Callipoli, and burned a market without the town: but some of the chief among them being slain, and Muresk, the Roman admiral, wounded; apprehending likewise, by the motions of the besieged, that they intended to make a sally, they were so astonished, that they hastened to their ships, and returned to their own country, without doing any thing more. This retreat encouraged the Catalans to such a degree, that they refused to make peace with the emperor, unless upon their own terms. They were farther animated by the arrival of 400 Turks from Asia, who took the fortress on mount Gana, and made incursions as far as Rodesto and Bizya, or Biza; wherefore the emperor, to prevent their advancing nearer Constantinople, ordered all the stock which was upon the ground to be burned, as far as Seliurea, and beyond it.

The Turks withdraw.

ISHAK MALEK, after this, sent to renew his proposal with the emperor Andronicus, demanding the daughter of Malek, who had been promised him. He likewise required that the emperor would confer on Malek, his uncle, and father of that princess (M), the dignity of Soltân. Andronicus, not thinking it proper to agree to this demand, only sent Malek with his daughter to Piga, and gave him the government of that city: in the mean time, ships were getting ready to carry into Asia the Turks whom Ishak Malek had engaged to draw off. As the Catalans and Turks before Rodesto were eager to take it, because it hindered their incursions into Thrace, the emperor sent two vessels to carry off the useless people; which the Turks, by pretending to fly, gave an opportunity of doing; and the besieged resuming courage, made the Catalans withdraw. However, it was taken soon after by Rocafort; and retaken by Dukas, the grand heteriarch.

Malek slain.

ISHAK MALEK, pursuant to his agreement, crossed the Hellepont with the most considerable among the Turks. As it was no difficult matter for him to persuade those people to separate from the Catalans, they boldly attacked the Italians who commanded them; and having slain them, ran to the shore, in order to get aboard the ships sent thither to carry them over into Asia. The news of this murder and their flight coming quickly to the ears of the Catalans, they pursued them immediately, and obliged them to submit, after killing above 200. The Turks, reduced in this manner, offered to serve them as before; but the Catalans refused to trust them, unless they delivered up Ishak Malek, his brother, and Takantziaris, commander of the Turkopoli, who they suspected as the authors of their revolt. When those three persons were put into their hands (N), they cut off the heads of the two brothers; and on stripping them, found under the arm of Ishak a letter of the emperor's, inviting the Turks to embrace his party.

The Turkopoli depart.

MATTERS being thus agreed, it was proposed to besiege Kbiorli; but the Turkopoli refused to march, till their chief was released. This done, they all seemed united in the same design; but soon separated again. The Catalans attacked the city, and were repulsed by the garrison. Takantziaris retired with the Turkopoli to the fort of Apros; and the Turks, who remained before Kbiorli, understanding that there were Catalan ships on the coast, had a mind to seize them, in order to pass over into Asia; but the men on board drove them off.

Othmân's advances.

WHILE the Catalans were continuing their ravages in Europe, Othmân made no less havock in Asia Minor; in resentment that Mary, the emperor's sister, and queen of the Muguls (O), had treated him with contempt, and threatened to complain of him to Karbaga (or Khorbanda). This Khân had detached 30,000 men from Persia; who being arrived on the eastern frontiers of the empire, Andronicus sent them rich presents. But their arrival, instead of abating Othmân's courage, the more inflamed it; for he took the fort of Trikokkia, and ravaged the country about Nice and Pithia, to the very sea ^l.

^k PAKH. l. xiii. c. 3, 9—15.

^l PAKH. l. xiii. c. 21—29.

(L) A son of Soltân Azzo'ddîn, and afterwards Soltân, the same with Masfûd. See before, vol. ii. p. 240. This happened in 1308.

(M) There must be some great mistake here; one Malek (which is only a title) being confounded with another. She was daughter of Malek Masur, or Masfûd, afterwards Soltân, who was slain, or died, in 1288.

(N) They seem by this to have been with the Turks; for they could not have been in their power if they had been over in Asia.

(O) So called, we presume, because she was to have been married to Hûlakû Khân. She seems to have resided at Nice. See Pakhmir, l. xiii. c. 25.

a FROM Dukas we learn the state of Asia Minor, in the 30th year of the reign of Andronicus Paleologus (P). The city of Ephesus, capital of Asia, with the province of Karia, were reduced under the power of Montakbia. Atin (by others called Aydin) had subdued Lydia, as far as Smyrna; Sarkhân conquered Manissa (or Magnesia), and the country round; as far as Pergamus, with all the province of Magedon; Karmion (by others named Karamân) seized Phrygia; Karase (or Karâz) subdued the Greater Phrygia, which extended from the city of Affo to the Hellepont; and Othmân reduced all Bithynia, with part of Paphlagonia.^m

Thus far the Greek historians; let us now return to the Turkish. Othmân having spent some time in regulating his domestic affairs, to prevent the soldiers from being corrupted with luxury and ease, he invests Iznikmid (Q) (or Nikomedie); but being repulsed, after a tedious leaguer, he raises the siege, and builds over-against it, on a high mountain, towards Jenghisabari, a strong castle (R); which he commits to the care of the famous Targan, and then retires into winter-quarters.

ABOUT this time the governors of the Greek provinces, among whom Ornûs (or Honorius), governor of Prusa, was the chief, alarmed at the progress of Othmân's arms, agreed to meet with their forces at Koyûn hissar, in order to march and surprise him: but Othmân, discovering their design by his scouts, on a sudden draws together his troops; and unexpectedly coming, routs them. The governor of the city of Kostel and many others were slain; Ornûs and the governor of Kutabi escape by flight. Othmân pursues; but unable to overtake them, besieges that city (lately recovered from the Turks by the Greeks) and takes it. Here he lost his grandson Dogris, who, with some soldiers, were drowned, by the breaking of a timber bridge, over which the army passed, under the walls of the town. The body being found, was buried in the suburbs of Koyûn hissar.

MOST of Bithynia being conquered, Othmân at length, in 717, besieged Prusa (S), the capital of Bithynia: but the city being so strongly fortified and garrisoned, that Othmân despaired of taking it, he builds over-against it two strong castles, to prevent any supplies getting in; and appoints his nephew Artimûr and the famous Balanjik governors, with orders not to molest the inhabitants; who by that means retired to those castles as sanctuaries, and submitted to Othmân.

It was Othmân's custom, after the conquest of a certain number of cities, to rest a while; and strengthen his new acquisitions. Having spent some years in this employment, his soldiers, impatient to be in action, petitioned to be led out to new conquests on the Greek empire. Othmân likes the proposal; but tells them, that by the Mohammedan law the enemies of God and truth, and as such to be chastised with fire and sword. Accordingly an edict is carried by his Chausb (T) to all the Christian governors (U) of Asia Minor; notifying, that they must either embrace Mohammedism, pay tribute, or be subdued by the sword. The first who submitted to this thundering edict, and turned Mohammedan, was Mikbael Kosa, lord of Bilejik (X); while those of the cities of Loblehiji, Lefka, and Chadarli, became tributary.

c ABOUT the same time the cities of Mortuni, Goynik, Tarakli, Engbijesi, Kaya hissar, Hejeji, Ak hissar, Kara chîn, Tekkurbanari, and some others, being weakened by the frequent incursions of Chausbi beg, formerly Ertogrul's servant, he at length takes them all, and annexes them to the Othmânîk dominions (Y). Whilst these conquests were going forward, a nation of Tatars, called Chaudar, coming from the kingdom of Kermian (Z), suddenly invade Othmân's territories, destroying all with fire and sword, to the walls of Karak hissar. Upon this news, Othmân, who then resided at Jenghisabari, assembling his forces, attacks the enemy near Oynash (a town then in ruins near Karak hissar) and routs them, killing great numbers.

^m DUKAS, c. 2.

(P) Called the elder; which answers to the year of Christ, 1313.

(Q) This and the following facts not being dated, nor mentioned in the foregoing Greek account of matters, we place them here, as posterior to the others in time.

(R) Meulana Idris makes this castle, called Targan, from its captain, to be built not by Othmân, but Or Khân.

(S) Now called Bursah, the antient seat of the kings of Bithynia.

(T) The Chausb, or Charush, are messengers of state.

(U) Princes in the original.

(X) Before Baliad is said to have been made governor of this city.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(Y) Some Christian writers ascribe many more victories to Othmân; as the taking of Nice, in Bithynia; Ancyra, in Phrygia; and other cities of Anatolia; also Neapolis, in Thrace. But since the Turkish annals ascribe those conquests to his successors, we ought to submit to their authority. Cant.

(Z) Kermian, in the margin, is said to be Phrygia: but perhaps we are to understand by it, the east part of that province, wherein Ikoniûm is situated; which, according to Khalkondylas, Kermian had seized, on the dissolution of the Seljukian monarchy. Yet afterwards we find Karaman at Kogni, and Kermian at Kotyæum, now Kutayeh.

A. D. 1327. numbers, and taking more prisoners; who, on their embracing the faith, were restored to a liberty, and settled in the jurisdiction of Karak bissar.

castles subdued.

OR KHAN, who excelled all the sons of Othmân in virtue and bravery, subdued the cities of Karachebesb, Alebsui, Pirgos, and Tekin bissari. After this, leaving the command of the army to Kognuzalbem, that general takes by storm the castles of Abari and Tuz bazâri; then lays waste the territory of Iznigmid, to the very walls of that city. The Greek emperor, being informed of this danger, sent some thousands of well-armed forces to the governor's relief; but Abdo'rabmân (A), another of Othmân's commanders, coming on them suddenly in the field of Yaylazova, defeated them, killing or taking almost all of them in the pursuit.

Prusa taken.

ALTHOUGH Othmân, exhausted with continual expeditions and old age, was seized with the gout; yet preserving the vigour of his mind, and desirous to pursue his good fortune, sent Or Khân, with numerous forces, to subdue Bitbunia, governed by Ornûs; and, if possible, to take Prusa, the metropolis. Ornûs, not strong enough to meet the enemy in the field, shut himself up in the city, which was very strong, and stored with eight years provisions; so that Or Khân, who set down before it, met with a gallant resistance. But after a long and obstinate siege, Mikhael Kosa, who was now Or Khân's chief counsellor, artfully persuaded Ornûs to surrender upon capitulation; the lives of the inhabitants being spared, on paying 30,000 gold crowns. Thus Prusa was delivered up (B) in the year 726, without the effusion of one drop of Turkish blood.

Othmân dies.
Hej. 726.

AT the same time Or Khân, receiving a message from his father to repair to him in haste, set out with a few attendants for Jengbissabri, where he found him almost expiring. Othmân having given him his blessing, and appointed him his successor, died in the month of Ramadân (C), in the sixty-ninth year of his age, after a reign of twenty-six years (D), three months, and ten daysⁿ.

ⁿ CANT. Hist. Othm. p. 15—19.

(A) Or as it is pronounced, Abdo'rrabmân.

(B) Kbulcondylas, and, after him, most Christian historians say, that Othmân took this city, and was buried there. Others relate, that the castle holding out after the town was surrendered, he ordered it to be reported that he was dead; and had desired to be buried in the Greek convent in the castle, attended by about 40 persons; in which case his zrriny was to retire. The credulous monks readily complied; and a coffin, full of arms, with Othmân himself in disguise, and 39 others, being admitted, they seized the gate, and letting in more troops, took the castle. This story is told by Paul Lucas, in his Travels.

(C) Which is the seventh month of the Mohammedan year.

(D) These make but 25 solar years, five months, and 17 days; yet Lonicerus, and other Christian writers, give him a reign of 28 years.

CHAP. III.

Reign of Or Khân.

2. Soltân,
Or Khân.

OR KHAN (A) was saluted emperor the 10th of the same month and year in which his father died, being then himself thirty-six years of age. There is a great disagreement not only between the Christian and Turkish historians, but also among the Christian historians themselves, both with regard to the circumstances of facts relating to the Othmân Soltâns (especially the first of them), and the time when they happened, of which we are going to produce some instances. The Turkish historian or historians, followed by prince Cantemir, mention nothing of the transactions of Or Khân's reign before the taking of Nikomedia, which they place in his second year; that is, in 1328. The Greek historians relate some matters of consequence which passed before that event, but differ much from the Turkish in point of time.

Emperor Andronicus

KANTAKUZENUS informs us, that the young emperor Andronicus having made peace with Tamer Khân, son of Giaxe, prince of Phrygia, who used to ravage the cities on the Hellepont; next year (B) resolved to attack the Turks, who inhabited Bitbunia under tents, in the middle of spring: but they hearing of his design, quickly retired into the mountains. Or Khân, their Soltân, understanding that the emperor advanced through Mesothynia, the avenues to which are of difficult access, raised what forces he could, and seized the hills. The Romans being come to Pelekana (C), Or Khân sent down part of his army to attack them. Being repulsed in several rencounters, the Soltân ordered his brother Parzale to fall on with all his troops, and descended himself to observe the battle: but they were defeated at the first charge;

attacks Or Khân:

(A) Or Ur Khân. Gregoras calls him Hyrkanus.

(B) This, according to the computation of the Greeks, was in 1327.

(C) A fort on the Sangaris.

a the Romans, with the emperor at their head, pursuing them to the foot of the hills, where Or Khân had stood. However, very few men fell in all these attacks; and the emperor, seeing the Turks had no mind to come to blows, returned. The Soltân, by the advice of Kaulauze and Kategbiale Pakuture, two of Othmân's old commanders, followed them as far as Philokrene, the Romans retreating in great disorder: but there uniting again, marched back to Skutarion in the face of the enemy ^a.

AFTER this the emperor, having visited Scio, went to Phoea, where Sârkân, Soltân of Ionis, ^{visited by Soltâns.} came and concluded a treaty with him (D). Aytin, Soltân of Karia, being sick, could not visit him, but sent several rich presents. At his return he defeated an army of Turks, coming in seventy ships, who had landed in Europe, and ravaged the country about Trajanople and Vera, killing a great number, and forcing the rest to reembark. Two years after he obliged others to return, who had crossed over in the same manner ^b.

AND now Or Khân besieged Nikomedia (E), a great and populous city on the gulf of Nikomedia Astakena: but while the emperor was at sea, hastening to its relief, the Soltân sent to tell him, ^{besieged} he was ready either to lay down his arms, or give him battle. This overture being improved into a peace, Or Khân sent the emperor horses, hounds, carpets, and furs; and Andronicus, in return, presented him with plate, cloth, silks, and a vest, which pleased the Soltân most of all. However, the same or next year the Turks came and blocked up the avenues to that city, which they found too strong to attack, and prevented the supply of provisions. This brought the emperor over again; but the enemy did not wait his coming ^c. It seems strange that Kantakuzenus, who speaks of these attempts of Or Khân against Nikomedia, and is so exact to mark all the little invasions and ravages of the Turks in Europe, should not mention the taking either of that city, or of Nicea, by the same prince, which happened not long ^{and taken.} after. According to the Turkish historians, that Soltân, in the second year of his reign (F), at once over-ran the whole province of Semendura, extending from the city Aytos (G) to Iznigmid, or Nikomedia, which he then lays siege to. On the approach of his army, Kalojanis, the governor, flies by night to the castle of Koyûnhissar. Or Khân, being informed hereof by some captives, sends part of his forces to attack it. The place being easily taken, and Kalojanis slain with an arrow, he ordered his head to be fixed on a pole, and shewn to the Nikomeditans; who, terrified at the sight, on obtaining liberty to retire with their effects to Constantinople, surrender the city.

In 728, Alibeg took by capitulation the city of Herkia (called afterwards Kara Musseké), ^{Alterations made} capital of the province of Semendura. Or Khân, having now subdued all the fortified places ^{Hej. 728.} of Bitbynia, excepting Iznik or Nicea, removes his seat from Jenghisbahri to Prusa: and, ^{A. D. 1328.} by his brother Alao'ddin's advice, abolishing the Seljukian money, coins other in his own name, called Nikra (H). He orders the inhabitants of cities to be distinguished from those of villages by different habits; and his soldiers, who before went clad like the Christians, to wear a different dress. He likewise established a militia of foot, and taught them to make engines for taking towns, which before they were entirely ignorant of. Lastly, he made his brother Alao'ddin general of his armies; and set him over the public affairs, with the title of Prime Wazir or Vizier.

NEXT year Or Khân first assigned the soldiers (who before were all volunteers) regular pay ^{in the army.} of a Nikra per diem, when upon duty; but when not, they were to live on their own possessions, free from all taxes. As this infantry, being taken from the dregs of the peasants, was given to mutiny, he abolishes it; and substitutes in the room another, composed of such Christian youths as could be procured, who were first instructed in the Mohammedan faith, and then inrolled. However, any Turkish peasants who, contented with subsisting themselves, were willing to be inrolled, were permitted to serve among the horse, under Sanjak Begs and Baluk Bashis, by the name of Musellem; that is, free.

THE number of Or Khân's forces being thus greatly increased, he the same year besieges Iznik, or Nicea, which, at two years end, being almost wholly destroyed by the war, famine, and ^{ceas taken.} pestilence, surrenders (I). The inhabitants having only desired leave to retire to Constantinople, the conqueror permits them also to carry what effects they could with them; which generosity

^a KANTAKUZENUS, lib. ii. c. 6, & seqq.

^b Ibid. c. 13. 21.

^c Ibid. c. 24. 26.

(D) This event is placed in the same year with the former.

(E) This action is referred to the year of Christ 1331.

(F) That is, in 1328: but this does by no means agree with the chronology of the Greeks.

(G) Or Aydos.

(H) In value about the fourth part of a drachm of silver, which is the eighth part of an ounce.

(I) The Greeks say, the emperor (Andronicus the younger) passed into Asia to succour Nicea: that Or Khân immediately hastened and gave him battle, near Philokrena, on the sea-coast: that the emperor, being wounded in the leg, and many of his troops killed, retired into the city; and that Or Khân, not having vessels to block up the port, returned to the siege of Nicea. Khalkond. lib. i. c. 6.

Hej. 730.
A. D. 1330.

so affected them, that they chose to stay and become tributary. Or Khân, in the year 730, enters the city; and when the Greek women, whose husbands had been killed in the war, bewailed themselves in his presence, he commands his courtiers and nobles to marry them. The fame of his clemency spreading through the country, not only the inhabitants, who had fled to avoid the siege, return; but those of other Greek cities and towns flock thither: so that in the space of one year, Iznîk seemed to rival Constantinople itself in the number of inhabitants.

Prusa adorned.
Hej. 734.
A. D. 1334.

IN 734, Or Khân takes by capitulation the castle of Kemlûk, fortified both by nature and art, after a whole year's siege. It had been often in vain attempted by Othmân. Two years after he adorns Prusa with a magnificent Mesku or mosque, hospital, and academy; which last was founded in a monastery, and became so famous for professors in the sciences, that many flocked thither out of Arabia and Persia (before looked on as the grand nurseries of learning), to pursue their studies under Othmânîck masters.

Some Seljûk
princes
Hej. 735.
A. D. 1335.

OR KHAN, grown powerful by his conquests from the Greeks, and for the present satisfied with what he had taken from them; next year forms a design to unite to his dominions the other Asiatic provinces, which were subject to some Musselmân princes, the remains of the Seljûkian empire (K). He begins with Kashîm Beg, a minor, son of Ajilân Beg; whom, under pretence of being his guardian, he places near his person, and then seizes his province. Turson Beg, another young prince, gives up the cities of Aydînjik (L), Minas, Balıkesra, Bergama (M), and Ermîd. Ulubâd (N), Kubleus, and Ebleus, Greek cities in the neighbourhood of the former, were taken by force of arms. Muchalch, to avoid the same extremity, delivers up his possessions (from him still called by the Turks, Muchalich), to be held of Or Khân in vassalage.

become tributary.

MEAN time Turson Beg having offered to surrender his whole principality to that prince, his brother Hajil Beg refused to give his consent, and took up arms; but being obliged to quit the field, fled to Bergama. Or Khân, interposing in the quarrel, orders them to meet under the walls of that city, and divide the possessions. They met; and Hejil Beg, under colour of embracing his brother, stabbed him, and then fled into the city, intending to stand out against Or Khân; but the inhabitants, both detesting the murder and fearing Othmân's power deliver up to him both the city and their prince; who died after two years imprisonment at Bûrsah. The prince of Ulubâd also, being falsely accused of a revolt, is put to death. Hereupon the whole province of Karafus submits to Or Khân: and, in the year 738, Anakhor and Emrûd, two maritime towns of the Greeks, hearing that he was preparing to attack them, surrendered to him; as did several others after their example.

Hej. 738.
A. D. 1338.

Amir ravages Thrace.
A. D. 1332.

THERE is hereabout a chasm in the Turkish history, of more than twenty years; which luckily the Greek writers furnish us with materials to fill up. Aytin (or Aydin), before-mentioned being dead, his son and successor Amîr, Soltân of Smyrna, Ephesus, and some other cities of Ionian (O), crossing the Egean sea with seventy-five vessels, landed at Samothrace, and then at Poros in Thrace. There the emperor Andronicus met them, but would not venture to fight, the Turks being ten times more numerous; and the enemy, not liking the ground where they were, chose, after a short parley, to retire to their ships.

He and Sarkhân

A. D. 1333.

assist the emperor.

AFTER this, Andronicus sent an embassy to Sarkhân, who commanded about Phoceæ (P), and made a treaty with him; by which the Soltân was obliged to aid him both by sea and land. The emperor in return was to set at liberty his son Soleyman, with the other Turkish youth, detained as hostages at Phoceæ. But the Genoese, having seized that place, refused to deliver them. While the emperor lay before it, he was visited by the three sons of Aytin, Soltân of Ionian (Q), whose names were Thesius, Amîr (who invaded Thrace), and Sulaymasas. The siege having lasted five months, news was brought that a Genoese fleet was coming from Mytilene, to relieve the place. Hereupon Sarkhân furnished the emperor with twenty-four ships, besides many troops both horse and foot. Amîr brought thither thirty vessels, at the request of John Kantakuzenus, the grand domestic, who had contracted an intimacy with him long before. But after all these preparations no enemy appeared.

^d CANT. Hist. Othm. p. 24—27.

^e KANTAK. lib. ii. c. 28—30.

(K) That is, those, or their descendants, who had divided with Othmân the country by lot.

(L) Hence, probably, Turson was the son of Aydin, or Atin, a Seljûk commander, often mentioned before.

(M) Or Pergamus.

(N) Lopadion.

(O) Dukas relates, that Amir having succeeded his father Atin (or Aytin) in the sovereignty of Smyrna and some places round it, subdued, with incredible bravery and application, several ports of Ionian, and a thick forest; which enabling him to build gallies, he ruined the cities and islands in those parts, Mitylene, Khios, Samos, Naxos, and several others. Dukas, cap. 7.

(P) Before he is called Soltân of Ionian, and a little below Soltân of Lydia.

(Q) Though we are told before that Aytin was dead, yet he is spoken of here as if he was then living. He was only Soltân of Karia. It is Amir who is called Soltân of Ionian; doubtless from the conquest which he made of part of it, according to Dukas, in the former note.

a TOWARDS the end of summer news came, that an army of Turkish infantry, belonging to Or Khân, were sailed aboard thirty vessels towards Constantinople. They landed in two bodies near Ennakofia. The grand domestic cut one all to pieces, and the emperor destroyed most of the other, there remaining only enough to fill one ship. Putting out of these eight men aboard a second, and ten more in a third, they returned home with a fair wind (R). After this, the Romans took eight vessels out of nine, full of Turks, some of the most wealthy in the nation; whose friends paid considerable sums for their ransom ¹.

News arriving, that Sarkhân Soltân, of Lydia, and Ghiaxe (prince of Phrygia) were ready to cross over into Thrace, to ravage the country; John Kantakuzenus, the grand domestic, first sent ambassadors to make peace with Or Khân, Soltân of Eastern Bithynia (S), and then prepared to go meet the enemy. At the same time that he arrived in the Kherfonesus, the Turkish infantry from Pergamus landed there, and were defeated without making resistance. Some time after they returned from Asia, to retrieve their honour; but received their disgrace by a second defeat; which obliged Ghiaxe to make peace.

MEAN time Sennakherim with the Roman gallies, surprising the Turks, routed them, and ravaged the province of Sarkhân, took a little sea-port town, and returned with many prisoners ².

OUR author Kantakuzenus, after he had assumed the title of emperor (in opposition to Paleologus), was reduced to such distress, that he was obliged to fly to the Král of Servia; while his wife Irene and children were besieged in Didymotikum, the only place of refuge left them. Amír, son of Aytin, hearing of this, with all haste gathered forces, and entered the mouth of the Hebrus with 380 vessels great and small, on board of which were 29,000 men. As soon as the Bulgarians, who had long besieged the town, received notice hereof by their spies, they fled with the greatest precipitation, to the astonishment of the besieged; who knew not the cause, till advice came from Amír of his arrival, to the empress Irene. That princess sent the nobles and the garrison to meet him. On hearing that the emperor was living, he shed tears of joy, and gave thanks to God, who, he said, had inspired him to come to the aid of his dear friend.

He then marched at the head of 2000 men on foot to Didymotikum; nor would ride himself, since, as he said, there were not horses enough for his soldiers. After he had staid there a while, he set out with 21,000 men to seek the emperor; but, pursuant to the request of a letter forged by the inhabitants of Phera, as coming from Kantakuzenus, desiring him to retire, he, not suspecting the falsity of it, returned to Asia with his troops ³. He had scarce laid up his ships in port, when a genuine letter came from Kantakuzenus, desiring his assistance. Amír hereupon fitted out 200 sail; and, though Apokaukus, chief minister to Paleologus, sent to divert his coming, by presents, he frankly told the ambassadors, that he was resolved to aid Kantakuzenus with all his power, and refused the gifts; saying, It would be base to receive presents as a friend, and presently after make war like an enemy.

ACCORDINGLY, setting sail from Smyrna, he came to Eubœa; where, understanding that Apokaukus was marched from Thesalonika to Berea; and judging the emperor, his friend, must be thereabouts, this generous Turk directed his course to the first place, in order to find him out. The emperor, being informed of his arrival, set forward from Berea. Upon his approach, Amír went to meet him, with his principal officers; and, when near alighting, fell prostrate to salute him, and marched a-foot, nor would remount but with much importunity. Afterwards they went to Morea, where Amír fell sick. On their return to Didymotikum, they met with and defeated the enemy under Franzes. In this rencounter, Amír, who, though not yet recovered, was among the foremost in the fight, received three thrusts with a pike, which his cuirass warded-off. He had mounted his horse without his armour; but, remembering the emperor's advice a few days before, alighted again to put it on, and thus escaped being slain.

f THE enemy strove in vain by large promises to detach Amír from the interest of Kantakuzenus: but what they could not do by the prince, they did by his mercenary officers; who, having been ten months from home, were the more easily induced, by hopes of rewards, to importune their chief to return. This, to his great regret, he was forced to do, after having sent an ambassador to advise the empress Ann to peace; but to no effect. At their audience,

¹ KANTAK. lib. ii. c. 34.

² Ibid. lib. iii. cap. 9, & seqq.

³ Ibid. c. 56, et seqq.

(R) Our author considers it as an astonishing order, or course of providence, which provided them a safe retreat after a shameful defeat. But his weakness to attribute inconsistencies to Providence, betrayed him into that profane expression.

(S) It appears by this, that Or Khân had been for many years at war with the Greeks; in which space he must have taken Nicea, Nikomedia, and the other cities mentioned b. the Turkish historians; though not a word is spoken of them by Kantakuzenus, ready enough to report the Greek disgraces in other respects.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

A. D. 1344. Apokaukus threw out several reproachful expressions against Amir: among the rest, that tho' a he was raised to the dignity of Soltân, yet he was so mean spirited, as to follow Kantakuzenus like a slave in a foreign country, and to stand as a guard at his tent-door. The ambassador, taking occasion from this insult offered to the Soltân his master, to set forth the bad qualities of his accusers, returned an answer which quite surpris'd them; and for its masterly strokes should have had a place here, if our intended brevity would admit of it.

endangers the state. A. D. 1345. Amir, at parting, promised Kantakuzenus to send him forces in fifteen days, to return himself as soon as possible, and stay with him till he had finished the war. Although his departure gave the emperor much uneasiness, it proved lucky for Amir himself. Twenty four gallies of Rhodes and other countries of the Latins landing at Smyrna, took a fort (T) in the port, and burnt some ships, notwithstanding all the care Amir took to prevent it: and had he b not arrived as he did, the city itself might possibly have fallen into their hands*.

Or Khân
sends aid. THE emperor Kantakuzenus, being informed that the empress Ann had sent to desire succours of Or Khân, sent also to that prince; intreating that he would grant him a supply, rather than the faction at Constantinople; which Or Khân agreed to. His territories being so very near, the emperor received succours from him as often as he would; for he commanded the maritime parts of Paphlagonia, and as far as Phrygia: but that proximity contributed not a little to ruin the lands belonging to the empire: for the Turks often crossed the sea unsent for, and attacked the cities which refused to submit to Kantakuzenus.

Amir's magnanimity: Amir, Soltân of Ionîa, was hindered by the burning of his ships, from succouring Kantakuzenus, as soon as he intended; nor was it easy for him to march by land, on account of a dispute c which he had with Sarkhân, Soltân of Lydia, about their limits: but, being impatient to perform his promise, he offered to give up the country in question for liberty of passage. Sarkhân not only readily agreed to Amir's proposal, but sent with him his son Soleymân, to serve the emperor. The Soltân then set forward at the head of 20,000 men; and crossing the Hellespont, joined Kantakuzenus at Didymotikum. From whence, marching to Peritheorion against Momitzilus, who had only 4000 men, a fierce battle was fought; but their general at length being killed, all the rest were either slain or taken.

assists in council; THE Král of Servia having raised the siege of Pherus on the first report of the march of the Turks to relieve it, it was agreed in a council of the principal officers, at which Amir and Soleymân assisted, to go and besiege Constantinople, on a supposition that they would find no d difficulty to take it in the confusion things were in by the death of Apokaukus, who was slain in a tumult at the public prison: but when they came there, they found that his executioners had been massacred by the mob, and that all things were again quiet.

returns to
Smyrna; IN their return to Macedonia, Soleymân was attacked at Apamea with a violent fever. Those who attended him, gave him cold remedies, which chilled the blood about his heart, and brought on deadly faintings. Amir, who discovered the cause of those dangerous symptoms, ordered him to take treacle and old wine, which brought back the fever: but the others applying their first medicines, froze his blood to such a degree, that he died immediately. Those who had the care of Soleymân accused Amir of being the cause of his death, and that he had given him poison in giving him wine (U). Amir, apprehending that Sarkhân might give e credit to those calumnies, and take up arms against him, resolved to return before the report should gain ground. And indeed he found it no easy matter to clear himself from the charge in the eyes of Sarkhân, although he was intirely innocent of the matter¹.

says a patriarch. A. D. 1346. SOME time after he arrived at Smyrna, twelve gallies put in there, commanded by one Martin, with a patriarch of Constantinople on board, sent by the pope. This presumptuous prelate would needs enter the cathedral of Smyrna, and ordered the army to follow him; contrary to the advice of all the sea officers, who represented the danger and rashness of such a proceeding. Accordingly, while he was celebrating mass, Amir came with his army, and slew him at the altar, with Martin and some others, whom he found in the church: for as soon as the Italians saw the Turks approach, they fled to the citadel. At the same time thirty-two f noble Genoese, having equipped some gallies at their expence, went and took Kbio.

* KANTAK. c. 63, 66, 68.

¹ Ibid. c. 81, 86, 89.

(T) Dukas says, they built a fort, named St. Peter's, to receive fugitives, which Amir on his return vigorously attacked; and, having passed the foss, ordered ladders to be fixed to the walls, which he mounted first himself: but that, being half-way up, he opened his casque a little, to see how many battlements there were upon the walls, and at the same time received an arrow between his eyes, which struck him dead. Dukas, cap. 7. But this cannot be fact; for it appears from Kantaku- zenus that Amir sent him several succours after that, and came himself twice in person. Whereas, according to Dukas, he never made but one expedition, or saw Kantakuzenus; for he connects the affair of the Italians at Smyrna and the Soltân's death with his first expedition to Didymotikum, when the emperor was absent.

(U) Because the Mohammedans are forbidden to drink wine.

- a THE same year Or Khân sent to the emperor Kantakuzenus, to demand one of his daughters in marriage; offering in that case to serve him against all his enemies, not as his friend and ally, but as his son and subject. After the ambassadors were returned, he consulted the principal officers of his army, who all advised him to embrace the proposal. He sent likewise to desire the advice of Amir; who made answer, “that the friendship and alliance of that prince (X) would be very useful to the empire: that altho’ he had no occasion for his succours against the domestic enemy, which was already almost quite humbled, yet they would be of service against the foreign enemies, who had done him many injuries; that he was assured Or Khân had not a more sincere and strong desire than himself to serve the emperor; but was sensible he had a better opportunity of doing it, because his territories lay opposite to Thrace.”
- b He added, that the emperor ought not to make any difficulty in contracting this alliance, since many of his predecessors had not disdained, for the advantage of their affairs, to give their daughters to Scythians and other strangers (Y). ”

A. D. 1346.
The emperor's daughter

- THE emperor admired the modesty of Amir, in acknowledging that the succours of Or Khân granted in would be more advantageous to him than his own: and following his advice, sent an embassy marriage to that prince, to let him know, that he would grant his request; and to desire him to send troops to conduct his daughter to him. Or Khân forthwith dispatched thirty ships, with a great number of cavalry, and the chief men of his nation. Hereupon Kantakuzenus, repairing to Or Khân, ing with his army to Selivrea, ordered a throne to be erected without the town, and a tent near it, where the empress passed with her daughters. Next day Theodora, the bride, mounted the throne, to be viewed by the people, according to a custom observed by the emperors when they married their daughters to foreign princes. The empress with the rest remained in the tent, and the emperor appeared alone on horseback. The silk curtains, adorned with gold, which shut up the throne, being drawn, the princess appeared sitting, surrounded with torches, held by eunuchs, on their knees. This ceremony was accompanied by music, and verses made by the best poets in praise of the bride. After this, the emperor having feasted his army, and the most considerable persons among the Turks, for several days, sent her to her husband, who received her with transports of joy. The emperor her father takes care to inform us, that although she married a Barbarian, she lost nothing of the splendor of her birth; and, instead of being converted herself, converted several to her own religion, by the strength of her reasons.

- THE empress Ann, finding that she had nothing to expect on the side of Or Khân, sent to Amir's Sarkhân, Soltân (Z) of Lydia, who readily assisted her with troops. Amir, vexed to see forces passion to march against the emperor his friend, and resolving to serve him the best he could, got 2000 of his own troops to join Sarkhân's, as is usual in the Turkish expeditions; but gave their commanders private orders to go over to Kantakuzenus, in case Sarkhân's soldiers could not be gained to his interest. These latter stood wavering till they saw the emperor ready to give serve his them battle, and then sent to offer him their service; but desired first, that they might go to friend. Constantinople, and receive the money which the empress Ann had promised their master. They did so; and, at their return, the emperor having no farther occasion for them, dismissed them;
- e but as they could not leave the country without committing ravages, according to custom, they made an incursion into Bulgaria, and then laden with spoils returned home^k.

- Soon after, peace being made between the two parties, and Kantakuzenus acknowledged Or Khân emperor jointly with John Paleologus, then but fifteen years of age, Or Khân with all his visits Kanta- family came to Skutarion (A), to felicitate him on that occasion. The emperor crossed over kuzenus; to meet him there, where they feasted for several days, and took the diversion of hunting. A. D. 1350. The emperor and Or Khân sat at the same table, and the four sons which the Soltân had by his former wives at another. The principal Romans and Turks sat on carpets. When these diversions were over, Or Khân remained aboard his ships; and Theodora, with her four brothers-in-law, went with the emperor her father to Constantinople; where having staid three
- f days, they returned to Bithynia.

Soon after this, the Král of Servia having invaded the empire, Kantakuzenus sent to desire sends him aid. succours of Or Khân, his son-in-law; who immediately sent him 10,000 men, commanded by his four sons and by Soleyman. The emperor joined with them his son Mathew, with a small body of Romans, and forbade them to commit any disorder in the territories of the empire:

^k KANTAK. lib. iii. c. 95, & seq.

(X) It is, of that barbarian, in the original; which shews the excessive vanity of the Greeks, when an emperor himself could not forbear giving that name of reproach to the very prince with whom he was going to make an affinity, by the marriage of his daughter.

(Y) And even to Turks, of which the reader will find instances in the history of the Seljukians.

(Z) He is called governor here; so little exactness is there among the Greek writers.

(A) Commonly called Skutari, on the Bosphorus, opposite to Constantinople.

A. D. 1350. but when they were come to Mygdonia, and understood that the circumjacent country belonged to the Král, they fell to ravaging it, in spite of all their commanders could do. They slew a great number of the inhabitants, and took a great number prisoners; after which they returned home by way of the Hellepont, loaden with booty: and this was all the service the emperor had from them.

Invading
Turks slain.
A. D. 1352. SOME time after 2000 Turks having passed the Hellepont, and plundered Thrace, were met, returning with their booty, by the emperor, who cut to pieces most of one party, with their leader Kaba Mahemet; the rest, commanded by Maratuman, surrendered, and were sent home. These were Turks, who, having served in the late wars between the two emperors, were acquainted with the country. At the same time Mathew, the emperor's eldest son, who was governor of the cities of Khalcidica in Macedonia, defeated another troop of Turks, who had landed in that part of the country, not one escaping either the sword or captivity.

Or Khân
assists him,
A. D. 1353. THE SALONICA being besieged by the Král of Servia, Kantakuzenus sent for succour to Or Khân, who sent him 20,000 men, under his son Soleymân: but, being come as far as Anaktropolis in Thrace, he received a letter from his father to return as secretly as possible; because he stood in need of his troops, to defend himself against the most powerful princes his neighbours, who had attacked him. For all Or Khân was in such haste, Soleymân staid to plunder Bulgaria before he went¹.

and his enemies
A. D. 1354. IN the war begun between the Venetians and Genoese, about a difference which happened in the Tanais between a Tartar and a Venetian, the emperor declared war against the Genoese, then inhabiting Galata, a suburb of Constantinople; and Or Khân assisted the Genoese, not only on account of the money he was to have, but also because he was offended that the Venetians should come into his neighbourhood with a numerous fleet, without paying him the least compliment. Accordingly he sent an army of both horse and foot, who encamped on the continent opposite to Constantinople, and were of great service to the Genoese.

Sends more aid,
A. D. 1355. IN the war which broke out soon after, between the two emperors Kantakuzenus and his son-in-law Paleologus, Or Khân sent some troops to his assistance; with which he went and relieved Andrianople, where the young emperor had besieged his son Mathew. Paleologus having obtained forces from the Servians and Bulgarians, Kantakuzenus applied again to his son-in-law Or Khân, who sent 10,000 horse, under the command of his eldest son Soleymân; who, crossing the Hellepont, encamped next day on the Hebrus, where the Servians and Bulgarians lay, without either party knowing they were so near each other. The day after, in their march they met the enemy, who were quickly defeated, and all slain or taken, except their commander and a few followers. The Turks halted to Adrianople to salute Kantakuzenus. While they were in that neighbourhood, Paleologus sent a letter, with presents, to draw Soleymân over to his interest. Soleymân received the ambassadors civilly, and refused their master's presents; but promised not to act against him. Nevertheless he sent the letter to Kantakuzenus, as it were to let him see the incivility of the writer, who had not given him the title of emperor: after which he returned to Asia with his troops^m.

Places in Thrace THE Turks, in their late expeditions to serve Kantakuzenus, having seized on several places in Thrace, and among the rest the fort of Zimpe, that emperor was exceedingly offended; and, not having forces sufficient to drive them out, wrote to Or Khân, his son in-law, desiring him to surrender them, and not disturb their friendship by detaining them. However, Soleymân refusing to deliver Zimpe without a consideration, Kantakuzenus sent him 10,000 crowns in gold. At this time an earthquake overturned almost all the maritime cities of Thrace, the walls as well as houses, and especially Kallipolis, the most famous city of that country, then in the hands of the Turks; who, on this occasion, made captives great numbers of those Romans who had escaped the explosion.

seized by the
Turks; SOLEYMAN, who was then at Pega, a city beyond the Hellepont, being informed of the havock which that accident had made, forgot the treaty which he had so lately made with Kantakuzenus; and, crossing into Thrace, repaired the cities, and peopled them with new inhabitants. He took particular care to rebuild Kallipolis, filling it with his principal subjects. After which he made incursions into Bulgaria, ravaged the country, and carried off the inhabitants. The emperor had no other remedy left, but to intreat Or Khân to order his son to give up the towns which he had seized, without any colour, during the peace; representing it as the highest injustice in him, to keep the fort of Zimpe after receiving the price of it. Soleymân alleged, that he had not taken them by force of arms; but found them deserted, and therefore resolved to keep them. Or Khân, though an accomplice in the affair, yet willing to preserve the favour of the emperor, his father-in-law, desired a little time to dispose his son to a compliance. In short, upon an offer of 40,000 crowns, Soleymân consented to restore them.

demanded of Soleymân.

¹ KANTAK. lib. iv. c. 4, 10, 16.

^m Ibid. c. 26, 31, & seqq.

a Kantakuzenus, on this occasion, crossed the sea to Nikomedia, to confer with Or Khân; but, A. D. 1355.
the latter being out of order, could not then settle matters.

Soon after, Soleymân marched at the head of a powerful army against the Galates of eastern Scythia (B); and took, during the summer, two of their most famous cities, Ancyra and Kratea.
At his return, in autumn, he sent, jointly with his father, an embassy to acquaint Kantakuzenus, that he was ready to restore the cities of Thrace, whenever he was pleased to receive them. Accordingly a day was appointed for that purpose; but it does not appear, that the places were restored, although it is said the peace was concluded.

PRESENTLY after this, a peace taking place between the two emperors, Kantakuzenus and Paleologus, the former renounced the world, and went into a monastery; after having conditioned with Paleologus, that his son Mathew should enjoy that part of the empire which had been assigned him, with the title of emperor: but the two young emperors did not long continue in amity^a.

IN the mean time, a pirate-ship of Old Phocea, where Kalothetes commanded, sailing into the gulf of Astakena (C), to carry-off people, happened to take Khalil, the son of Or Khân; whom they brought back to Phocea. Or Khân, not being able to attack the place by sea, for want of ships, nor by land, for want of troops sufficient to open a way thither through the country, applied to Paleologus; who promised to procure the release of Khalil, provided he forbore any longer to assist Mathew with forces.

OR KHAN consenting, Paleologus sends immediately to Kalothetes, thinking that he would give-up Khalil at the first demand: but, finding that he could prevail neither by promises nor threats, was forced to buy his deliverance at the rate of 100,000 crowns of gold, with the dignity of Panhypersebastes into the bargain.

MATHEW, being informed, that the governor of Pherus was disposed to deliver up to him that important place, with the widow of the Krâl of Servia, lately dead, and the treasure she had in possession, promised to be there a month after. Mean time he sends for a reinforcement to his brother-in-law Or Khân (D); who being then at Avido (or Abidos), let him have 5000 Turks (E): but these being bent more on plundering than fighting, behaved in so disorderly and cowardly a manner, that they not only ruined the design for which he had demanded them, but, flying first from a party of their own troops whom they took for Servians, and afterwards from the Servians themselves, Mathew, who was thus deserted by them, was taken prisoner near Philippi; and, to obtain his liberty, was obliged to lay aside the title of emperor^o.

HAVING thus, from the Greek historians, supplied the vacancy found in the Turkish history, down to the year 1355, we shall return to the Turkish writers; by whom we are told, that Or Khân's ambition encreasing with his successes, he sends his son Soleymân (F) to attempt a passage into Europe; joining with him his three most famous captains, Ache Beg, Gâzi Fazil, and Ornus Beg. Other writers name them Gâzi Faril, Yakûbje Beg, and Mikhal Beg (G). Soleymân, taking with him eighty select men, under pretence of hunting, enters the country of Aydinjik, and surveys the coast: but, as the Greek emperor had made it death for any person to pass either into or out of Asia, even in a boat, he, by the help of two rafts, laid upon bladders tied together by the necks, crossed over with his company to the castle of Hamni, in Europe (H). On their landing, they seized a peasant; who, by a passage under ground, brought them into the town by night (I). Soleymân, treating the inhabitants gently, prevailed on

^a KANTAK. c. 38, & seqq.

^o Ibid. lib. iv. c. 44, & seqq.

(B) This can only be understood of the people of Galatia (subject then to the Tatars), to which Ancyra and Kratea belonged: for at that time the territories of the Othmân Turks did not extend far eastward in Asia Minor. But the Turkish historians do not speak of these conquests.

(C) At the end of which Nikomedia, now Ismid, stands.

(D) It is remarkable, that Kantakuzenus seems to affect mentioning the relationship between him and Or Khân, as often as he speaks of him: yet never gives him the title of Soltân, that we remember, since the marriage of his daughter.

(E) It seems a great argument of Or Khân's friendship for his wife's family to assist Mathew, after he had promised Paleologus not to assist him. He also forbore attacking the Roman empire in Europe, while his father-in-law and brother-in-law were upon the throne; presently after their abdication, he began to invade Thrace.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(F) This seems to be the Trojan leader of Gregoras, l. xiv. c. 11.

(G) He was, according to the Turkish historians, descended from the emperors of Trapezond; and so beloved by Or Khân, that he would do nothing without his advice. There is a very beautiful bridge at Adrianople over the river A-za, called Mikhal Ogli Kuprissi, that is, the bridge of Mikhael's son; who built it. Cant.

(H) This expedition is dated, according to Cantemir, in the year 738; but that must be a mistake for 758; as the Turkish annals of Gaudier, and those employed by Leunclavius in his Historia Musulmanorum, put it; otherwise there will be 22 years between Soleymân's passing into Europe and his taking Gallipoli; which yet from the history itself appear to have happened in the same year.

(I) This romantic passage of the straits seems to be a fiction to magnify the courage and address of Soleymân; nor was it the first time by many, that the Othmân Turks passed into Europe, as their historians pretend:

A. D. 1355. on them to conduct the ships, which lay in the harbours of Balayr and Akchilimân, into Asia; a from whence, in a few hours, they carried back 3000 Turks, with whom next day he surprised the castle of Hyasobonia; which he committed to the care of Ache Beg: from whom that territory bears the name of Acheovasi.

takes Galibolij;

KALLAKONIAS, governor of Galibolij, or Kallipolis, assembling what forces he could in haste, set forward to attack Soleymân; but being inferior to the enemy, both in number and courage, they were obliged, after a long dispute, to retreat into the city, which they bravely defended for a long time: till being weakened by frequent assaults, and destitute of provisions, they at length, in the year 760, delivered up, by capitulation, Kallipolis, with the whole province of Kbayreboli, or Kharipolis (K). When the emperor heard of the taking of that city, which was esteemed not only the key of Constantinople, but the bulwark of Europe, he is reported to have said, that the Turks had only taken a hog-stye (L) and a pottle of wine.

Hej. 760.

A. D. 1359.

killed by a fall.

NEXT year, Soltân Or Khân sends a second army into Europe, under the conduct of his second son Morâd; who, while Soleymân subdues Malgara and Ibsalam, takes the castle of Epibatos, about 10 hours (M) from Constantinople. He then lays siege to Chorlu (N), a strong city between that capital and Adrianople; before which he was several times repulsed, and lost a great number of men: but, being overpowered with numbers, the inhabitants were at length all slain, and the town quite demolished. The people of Pirgos, between Chorlu and Adrianople, frightened with this severity, abandoned the place to Morâd; who presently returns to Asia, leaving Soleymân. Not long after, as this prince was exercising his troops, by darting their spears, and shooting their arrows, his unruly horse ran away with him; and, breaking his leg against a tree, he fell to the ground with such violence, that he instantly died (O).

Death of Or Khân:

THE death of his beloved son struck Or Khân to the heart; yet, still intent on conquests, he sends Ache Beg, with an army, to besiege Dydimothykon. This general, approaching the city before he was expected, accidentally seizes the governor, who was taking a walk. The governor, who was of the imperial race, to gain his liberty, surrenders the city; which, however, Or Khân restored, to oblige the Grecian prince (P), his friend: but the illness, contracted by the death of his son, increasing, he died himself two months after; having lived 70 years, and reigned 35, according to Saadi's computation. He was buried in the monastery (Q) of Prusa, or Bursab, and left the kingdom to his son Morâd.

his character.

THE Turks greatly extol this Soltân's clemency, valour, and justice, as well as his liberality to the poor. They say, he daily conversed with the learned, and would undertake nothing of moment without their advice: that he was the first of their monarchs, who founded Mesku's (R), Jami (S), Madraseh (T), or schools, and Imarets (U), or hospitals: that he had a red face, blue eyes, yellowish hair, and was of a middle stature, though corpulent, appears from his picture (X) in the farây, or seraglio P.

P CANT. Hist. Othm. p. 28, & seqq.

many large bodies of them, some under the command of Soleymân himself, having been over several years before. Dukas says, chap. 2. that they first passed in the first year of John Paleologus; which was in 1341.

(K) It seems to be Kbristopolis, not Yanboli, as Johan. Duns. would have it: for Yanboli is in Thrace, about 70 miles from Philippopolis, under Mount Hemus, and situate on the river Tunje. Cant.

(L) This was not spoken of Gallipoli, but in allusion to Koyridokastron, or hogs-castle, called by the Turks, Hamni, as above. Leunclavius writes Zemenik, or Zembenik; the same, we presume, that Kantakuzenus names Zimpa.

(M) The Turks reckon commonly by hours, not miles, or leagues.

(N) Chorlu, Chiurli, or Tzurli, as it is written by authors of different nations, is the antient Tyrullum, or Turullum, miscalled by some Tyrrillos, Izbrallon, Iziralla, and Tirallum.

(O) According to Khalkokondylas, he fell sick and died. But Dukas relates, that, as he ravaged the Kberfonesus, the Despot, Mathew Kantakuzenus, came up with him near Hexamilion, and slew him, with a great number of his men. Dukas, cap. 10. But this cannot be the case: for Soleymân was alive in 1355, when Kantakuzenus went into a monastery; and Dukas places Soleyman's death before that event. Besides, it appears that Or Khân was in friendship afterwards with Mathew, who received succours from him; which could not well be supposed, in case he had killed Soleymân, whose death did not happen till the year 1359.

(P) This was John Kantakuzenus. Cant.

(Q) It is now turned into a Jâmi, or temple, though still retaining the name Manastir.

(R) So the Turks call their common temples, or churches, after the Persians; which word Europeans have corrupted into mosk. The Arabs name a temple Masjed.

(S) Jami is a temple privileged for the devotions of Friday (which is the Mohammedan sabbath, called Juma Namâzi), which it is not lawful to perform in the lesser mosks. Those built by the Soltân are called Selatin, or royal. Cant.

(T) Madraseh, or Medreseh, are academies, or great schools; which, if not in the court of the Jami, are always very near it. The common schools are called Mekteb. The persons let over these academies are called Muderis; that is, school-masters; who have salaries proportioned to the revenue of the Jami. Hence it is, that some have 300 aspers a day, while others have but 70. Out of these schools are taken the judges of the principal cities and towns, called Mola; who is a sort of archbishop, or metropolitan. Cant.

(U) Imaret is a house near the Jami, for the relief of the poor and reception of travellers, like an inn. Cant.

(X) Prince Cantemir has embellished his history with the pictures of all the Soltâns, copied from those in the seraglio, by Leuni Cbelebi, the Soltân's painter.

C H A P. IV.

The Reign of Morâd Khân I.

^a MORAD, or Amurat, as our historians name him, ascended the throne in the 41st year of his age, and assumed the title of Khoda Vendikar (Y), or God's Labourer, to shew his religious disposition. In the first year of his reign, he took the strong city of Angûri, or Ancyra, with several castles in those parts. Quickly after he sent his prime Wazîr, Atabekî Shabân La'la (Z) a brave and wise general, with some light troops, to cross the Streights of Kallipolis, and besiege Adrianople, while he followed with a more powerful army: but, hearing on the way that his Wazîr had taken the city (A) at the first assault, he returns to Prusa, and orders him to march into the bowels of Thrace, appointing Haji Ornîs Beg to be Begler Beg (B) of Rûm eli (C), or his European conquests. The Wazîr executed his orders so speedily, that Felibe (D), Eski, Zaghena, and other neighbouring places, fell into his hands. A. D. 1359.
3 Soltân Morad I.
Adrianople taken.

^b NEXT year Morâd built a spacious Jami at Adrianople still called Morâdiyyeh, or Morâd's temple, on this occasion. One time going before the Mufti, who then discharged the office of judge, to give in his evidence, he was rejected, as not worthy of credit. The Soltân wondering at this strange proceeding, and asking the reason, the Mufti answered, "that he reckoned his testimony true and unexceptionable, as being imperial; but of no validity in judicial matters, because he never joined in common prayers with the rest of the Musul-mâns (E)." Morâd, upon this, reformed his conduct, and built the Jami, as an atonement for his former misconduct. Hej. 762:
A. D. 1361.

^c IN 763, Ornîs, Cegler Beg, of Rûm eli, takes Ipsala and Malgara, ravages the country, and carries off an infinite number of captives. From hence, Kara Halil Pascha, the prime Wazîr, takes occasion to say merrily, "that although all spoils were said to belong to the emperor, yet, if the number of captives were ever so great, they were all engrossed by private persons; so that none fell to his majesty's share: he therefore thought it but reason, that some of the Soltân's Agavat (F) should be appointed at the Streights of Kallipolis to seize every fifth captive; of whom the most personable and robust might serve at court, and in the army." Morâd liking the proposal, an edict was published for that purpose; and, a great number of captives being brought together, the Soltân sends his new army to Haji Bektâsh (G), a religious Turk, famous for his miracles and prophecies, desiring him to give them a banner, pray for their success, and appoint them a name. The Sheykh (H) putting the sleeve of his gown on one of their heads, said, Let them be called Yenghicheri (I): Let their countenance be ever Hej. 763:
A. D. 1362.
Order of Janizaries instituted.

(Y) Or addicted to divine things. It is a Persian word.

(Z) Lala signifies tutor, or foster father. It belongs to those who are preceptors and governors to the young princes, and was first given to this Wazîr. The Soltâns since then, both in speaking and writing, are accustomed to give it to all other Wazîrs, as Lalam Ali Pâshâ, and Mi Lala Ali Pascha. The Agâfi, or general of the Janizaries, and Bostanji Bâshâ, have the same title. The first, because it is his business to guard the sons of the Soltâns from being killed by fathers or brothers: the second, because he has the care of the Soltân's palace, especially in his absence; being the Greek Curopalatis. Cant.

(A) Khalkokondylas says, it was taken by Soleymân; whom he makes to succeed Or Khân.

(B) Beglerbeg signifies prince of princes. A title belonging to all Wazîrs of three horse-tails; but especially three; viz. those of Rûm eli, Anadoli, and Shâm, or Syria. Cant.

(C) By Rûm eli, the Turks understand all the countries of the Romans, or Europe in general, as well as that part of it under them in particular. Cant. The term may be extended to that part of their empire in Asia, which was formerly under the Roman or Greek emperors.

(D) Or Philippi.

(E) It is a corruption of Mosliman, Misleman, or Musliman: as is also Musurman, from whence Bursur-an.

(F) Agavat, vulgarly Agalar, is the plural of Aga; which signifies lord or master, and is applied to any person out of respect; but principally to the officers of the court, or Porte; and some of the army, as the Janizar Agâfi, Spahilar Agâfi, and Silabrad Agâfi; that is, the generals of the Janizaries, Spahis, and Infantry.

(G) He was founder of the order of Darwishes, or Dervises, a kind of Turkish monks, called from him Bektâshi. His tomb is held in great veneration at a village called Beshiktâsh, on the Bosphorus, not far from Galata, one of the suburbs of Constantinople. Cant.

(H) Sheykh, corruptly written Shek, &c. signifies prelate, and is like an abbot. The title is given to the superiors of the great Jami, and of the Darwishes. Hence the Mufti also is called Sheykh Al Islâm; that is, prelate of the saved, and high priest. Cant.

(I) Compounded of Enghi, new, and Cheri. soldiers. By us called Janizaries. Their usual number is 40,000; and they have precedence of all the other soldiery. Cant.

bright

A. D. 1362. bright, their hand victorious, and their sword keen : let their spear always bang over the heads of their enemy; and where-ever they go, may they return with a white face (K). From this time, those soldiers retained that name, and covering for the head (L).

Farther acquisitions. Hej. 766. A. D. 1365. By means of this new infantry, in 765, Batha, in Asia, and, in Europe, Zagara and Gumürjina, are reduced. Next year, Andronicus Paleologus (M), the Greek emperor, desires Morâd's aid against the king of Bulgaria. The Soltân, pursuant to his request, sends an army into Europe, under Lala Shabân; who, coming upon the enemy unexpectedly, in a place called Zermen, easily put them to flight. The same year, he orders to be built at Prusa, in the street Kapluje, a large Jami, or temple; a Madraseh, or college; and an Imaret, or hospital.

MORAD, to divide, and gain over to his interest, the other princes (N) of Asia Minor, in 783 marries his son Bay yezîd (or Bajezet) to a daughter of Ghermian Oglî (O); with whom he receives as a portion Kutabia, Egrigoz, and Taufshanlik. By his address, Hamid Oglî (P) offered to hold in fee of the Othmân empire the cities of Elvadz, Enishahr, Arsherib, Karagais, and Seydishabri; which example others followed.

Mohammedan miracle. Hej. 784. A. D. 1382. THE affairs of Asia being thus settled, next year Morâd passes the Streights of Kallipolis with a great army, and besieges the strong castle of Bolina: but, meeting with great opposition, is said to have implored the assistance of heaven, and that the same night part of the wall falling down (Q), the Othmâns entered by the breach, and put all the garrison to the sword. A great number of red hats (R) being found in the magazine, Morâd distributed them among his soldiers, and ordered others of the same colour to be made for the rest of his army. The same year, Iskanderia, Darme, and the strong town of Kavalla, with almost all Arnaud (or Albania) were subdued: as in the year 788, were the towns of Zikne, Karaferia, and Monastir.

Morâd invades Servia: Hej. 791. A. D. 1389. THE neighbouring states being alarmed at the great increase of the Othmân power under this Soltân, a league was formed against it by the Walakhians, Hungarians, Dalmatians, and Triballians (S), with those of Arnaud not yet subdued, under the conduct of Lazarus, prince of Servia. Morâd, having prepared to meet this storm, attacks the Christian army in the plain of Kassova, in Servia; where a fierce and doubtful battle is fought: but at length the confederates are put to flight, Lazarus himself is taken, his nobles are slain, and the run-aways long pursued by light-horse. The Soltân, walking over the field of battle and viewing the dead, told the Wazîr, he thought it strange, that among the enemy's slain he saw none but beardless youths. The Wazîr made an answer proper to flatter his prince. The latter, continuing his discourse, said, it is still more strange how I should be deceived by a vision last night in my sleep: for methought I saw myself slain by the hand of an enemy. At that instant, a Christian soldier, who concealed himself among the dead (T), perceiving it to be the Soltân by his talk, animated by thoughts of revenging his country, suddenly starts up, and plunges a dagger in his belly. The Triballian is instantly cut in pieces; and Morâd dying within two hours, his body is carried by the Wazîr and Basbas to the royal tent, and embalmed. After this, the great men assembling about the choice of a new emperor, Ilderîm Bay yezîd, his eldest son, is declared Soltân.

his character: THE Turks greatly extol Morâd, as a mirror of justice, a prince of invincible fortitude of mind, very regular in his devotions, and a lover of no conversation so much as of the learned.

(K) That is, with praise, or honour; as black face is a term of disgrace. Cant.

(L) Which is a white cap, or covering, called Kiche, in form of a sleeve; in which only they differ in dress from the rest of the infantry.

(M) Andronicus for a while usurped the throne from his father John.

(N) Called petty princes in Cantemir's authors.

(O) Prince of Phrygia Major, one of the Persian governors, who revolted at the time of Jenghiz Khân's expedition. Cantemir. He was rather the son or grandson of Ghermian, or Karmian, who resided at Kutabia (the Kotyæum of the Greeks); which it is strange he should give way to so formidable a neighbour as the Othman Soltân was become.

(P) He was one also of the Persian governors (so he calls the Seljukian Turks), who gave his name to the province called in the maps Hamida, as is customary with the Turks. Cant. Hamid Oglî was the son or descendant of Hamid, as the name imports.

(Q) The Mohammedans, as well as Christians, believe that God espouses their cause, and works miracles for the destruction of their enemies.

(R) Ikuf seems to have been formerly a covering for the head; but is at present disused by the Turks, who use neither helmet nor breast-plate, nor any other armour; in a belief, that if a man was made of adamant he could not escape the fate which is decreed for him. Cant.

(S) The people of Bulgaria and Servia.

(T) Most Christian writers say, this was a servant of Lazarus, Despot of Servia, and call him Milash Kobilowitz. Khalkokondylas makes him a Triballian. Orbinus Raguzcus pretends, that Morâd was slain in his own tent by Lazarus, which is highly improbable. Cantemir. What Dukas relates is more likely: that a young Servian, when the attack began, ran from the Christian army to the Turks; and that, being seized, said he came to discover to their Soltân a sure way of coming-off victorious in the war: that Amurat having made a sign with his hand for the soldier to advance, he approached; and, having plunged his sword into the Soltân's breast, was immediately cut in pieces. Dukas, c. 3.

a He is also praised for his remarkable abstinence; so that he was never seen clothed in any thing but Sof (U). He lived 71 years, and reigned 30^a. A. D. 1389.

We find but little relating to this Soltân in the Greek writers, and that delivered without order. The first enterprize of Morâd, or Amurat, according to Khalkokondylas, was against the Triballians; in which he defeated Sufman, Despot of Servia, and took the very opulent city of Pherres. The same authors say, that Amurat began this war for love of Sufman's beautiful daughter; whom by that means he hoped to have obtained. After this, he obliged Drages, son of Zarkbus, lord of Mafia, and Bogdân, or Pogdin, who commanded the Triballians, country about Mount Rhodope, to become tributary, and to attend him in his wars. He subdued other princes, who were Triballians, Kroats, or Albanians.

b A REBELLION rising in Asia, he passed over, and quelled it. Upon this, he received advice, that his eldest son Sauz (X) had joined in a conspiracy with Andronikus, eldest son of John Paleologus, to dethrone their fathers, and make perpetual peace. Morâd hastens back to Europe, and complains to the emperor, that Andronikus had corrupted his son. Then marching with his forces to Apikridium, the place where the princes were encamped, not far from Constantinople, he went to listen at their tent; and having heard their discourse, called to the officers, who were about them, by their names, and by an artful speech, drew part of them over. The rest fled with the princes to Didymoticum, where Amurat followed; and, seizing Sauz, had his eyes put out. Andronikus was served in the same manner by his father; who durst not refuse to do what Amurat required. Boiling hot vinegar was made use of on that occasion.

AFTER this, Manuel, the emperor's second son, who had the government of Theffalonika, formed a design to seize the city of Pherres; which Amurat hearing of, sent Kharatin Basba (Y) to take his city, and bring him bound to him. Manuel, unable to resist, fled: but his father not daring to receive him, he took a resolution to go and ask pardon of the Soltân himself; who, pleased with his behaviour, received him with embraces, and sent him back loaded with presents to Constantinople.

JOHN PALEOLOGUS, to put a stop to the growing power of the Turks, passed into Italy, and applied to the Venetians for aid; but met with nothing but fair words. Having borrowed a large sum there, he visited, to as little purpose, the other Italian princes, and then went to France; whose king (Z), by reason of the intestine broils, was in no condition to assist him. At his return to Venice, he was arrested for the money he had taken-up when there before. Hereupon, he sent to his son Andronikus, whom he had left regent, to raise the sum out of the revenues of the clergy, and by other means. Andronikus, not caring to part with his authority, sent word, that the people were averse to the proposal: but Manuel, raising all the money he possibly could, in haste set sail for Italy, with design to remain in his father's stead, in case that sum was not sufficient. This got him his father's love and his brother's hatred.

PRESENTLY after, Amurat, having discovered that Manuel was forming designs against him, Kharatin deprived him of his city and government: and as the emperor had forbidden him to retire within his territories, he fled to Lesbos; whence being ordered to depart, he passed by sea to Troas, and thence by post to Prusa.

THE Soltân delayed no longer to march against the Triballians, and their prince Eleazer (or Amurat's Lazarus), who was joined by the Hungarians. He gave one of his daughters to Sufman (A), lord of the Odrysians, or Moldavians. The other to Bulkus, son of Brankas, son of Plandikas, who held Kastoria, and that part of Macedonia called Okbrida, formerly belonging to Nikolas, son of Zuppan. Thus strengthened, he thought himself sure of victory. He had also, after the death of Ungleses and Kbrates, conquered Pistrinum and Nistra; and extended his borders as far as the river Save. He was encamped in the plain of Kosoba; where Amurat attacked him, and gained the victory, but lost his life.

f His death is variously reported. The Turks say, that as he followed Eleazer, who fled, a Triballian foot-soldier met and ran him through with a pike. The Greeks pretend, that before the battle, one Milo, having proposed to Eleazer to kill Amurat, rode up armed to the first ranks of the Turks, just going to give the charge; and desiring to speak with the Soltân, who was in the midst of his Janizaries, ran him through the body, and was then cut in pieces.

^a CANT. Hist. Othm. p. 36—45.

^r KHALKONDYLAS, l. i. c. 8—13.

(U) Sof, or Sîf, is a fine cloth made of wool, as fine and light as may be. It is chiefly worn by ecclesiastics, who are forbidden by their law the use of silk. The person who wears a garment of Sof, is called Sofi. Contemir. And hence Shâh Ismael, of Persia, was called Sofi Ismael, his father having been a religious person.

(X) Dukas calls him Kuntuz.

(Y) Or Hayraddin.

(Z) At the end of the chapter, the author says, these affairs happened before Andronikus and Sauz rebelled, as in fact they did. For want of chronology, the events are ranged out of order, and sometimes twice repeated.

(A) The same mentioned before perhaps.

A. D. 2389.

Andronicus
blinded :

A. D. 1387.

dethrones his father ;

restores him.

Amurat slain
by a Servian.

A. D. 1389.

THE account which Dukas gives of these affairs, is as follows : When Or Khân died, John Paleologus (B), (who, after his return from Italy, had obliged Kantakuzenus to retire into a monastery), was 25 years of age. He had three sons, Andronikus, Manuel, and Theodorus. Andronikus surpassed all those of his time for stature, strength, and majesty of person. Amurat had the same number, Yakub, Kuntuz, and Bajazet. Andronikus and Kuntuz, who were of the same age, one day conspired against their fathers ; which coming to the knowledge of Amurat, he ordered his son's eyes to be put out, and threatened to declare war against Paleologus, if he did not do the same by his. The emperor, through fear, or some other weakness, did more than was required of him : for he caused the eyes, not only of Andronikus, but of his infant son, to be put out ; and then imprisoned him, with his wife, in the tower of Anema. From thence they escaped two years after by means of the Genoese of Galata ; who, glad of the occasion, assisted him with forces against his father. After a few days, Andronikus was admitted on certain conditions into the city : but, being entered, he, contrary to his oath, confined his father and brothers in the same prison.

Two years after, they having in their turn made their escape to Skutari, Andronikus, unwilling to involve the sinking state in a civil war, resigned the throne to his father, and obtained his pardon. He still saw with one eye, and his son with both. The emperor gave to Andronikus, Selivrea, Dancion, Heraklea, Rodesto, and Panide ; in the first of which he resided. Then he ordered Manuel to be crowned and proclaimed emperor.

To return to Amurat. This prince having reduced most of the cities of Thrace, besieged Adrianople ; which he took with all Thessaly, except Thessalonika. When he had conquered almost all the Roman dominions, he turned his arms against the Servians, ruined many of their towns, and carried off a multitude of prisoners. Hereupon Lazarus, son of Stephen, their Král, raising all his forces, fought a battle ; in which great numbers fell on both sides. During the engagement, a young Servian ran towards the Turkish army ; and, being seized, pretended he came to put the Soltân in a way how to gain the victory. Amurat making a sign with his hand to advance, he drew near ; and, plunging his dagger in that prince's breast, was immediately cut in pieces. The Turks, though astonished at the accident, yet did not lose their discretion. They erected his tent in the middle of the army, put him in it, and renewed the fight with extreme fury. The Servians, who knew nothing of what had happened, soon gave way ; and the Král being taken, with the chief men of the nation, were carried to the tent, and sacrificed at the feet of the expiring Amurat. All this was done without either of the two wings of their army knowing any thing of the matter. The right was commanded by Yakúb the elder, and the left by Bajazet the younger brother.

WE have chosen to give separate extracts from these two authors, that our readers may the better judge of their completeness or deficiency, as well as of their agreement or disagreement with themselves and the Turkish historians ; and from thence form a judgment of them in general.

* Dukas, c. 3, & 12.

(B) Kantakuzenus speaks of this emperor when fifteen, as a youth of great hopes, fine parts, and courage ; yet Gregoras, Dukas, and Khalkondylas, represent him as extremely debauched. Dukas imputes his going to Italy to the mild reproof given him by his colleague on that occasion. After two years rambling there and in Germany, he returned (with the money gathered to recover the throne) to Tenedos. There meeting with Ga- teluzzio, a noble Genoese, who had two galleys, they sailed to Constantinople. The wind blowing hard, and the *Genoese*s pretending to be in great distress, the soldiers in garrison, with design to assist them, opened a door, through which 500 of Paleologus's men entering, let in 2000 more who were at hand, and thus took the city ; which Kantakuzenus forthwith resigned.

C H A P. V.

The Reign of Ilderîm Bâ-yezîd (A).

YAKUB CHELEBI (B), the younger brother of Bâ-yezîd, not being pleased with his advancement to the throne, attempts to raise a sedition ; but the thing being seasonably discovered, he is, by the command of the Soltân, and consent of the chief men, strangled with a bow-string (C). Lazarus also, prince of Servia, being considered as the occasion of Morád's

(A) Or Yilderîm Bâ-yezîd, vulgarly called Abu Yazid, as Dr. Pocock writes. Sup. to Abulfaraj, p. 45. Arabshâh, in his history of Timûr, uses Abû Yezîd for Bâ-yezîd ; which is by Europeans vulgarly spelt Bajazet.

(B) Chelebi, signifying nobly descended [or a gentleman], was formerly the title of the Soltân's sons before they came to the empire : but this, not seeming lofty enough, was changed to that of Effendi, from the Greek 'Αυθέντης. Cant.

(C) This death is the most honourable among the Turks, and only indulged to the great ; but beheading is infamous. Cant. Dukas says, that Bajazet, whom he makes the younger brother, seizing the throne, ordered Yakúb's eyes to be put out.

death,

a death, was, by Bâ-yezîd's order, brought before him, and beheaded. After this, dismissing the army, he sends his father's body to be buried at Prusa, or Bûrsab, in the royal Jâmi; and, following himself, erects to his memory a most elegant marble Kubbeh (D), or monument. A. D. 1390.

THE next year, pursuing his father's conquests, he took, in Europe, Karatova and Isseib; and, in Asia, added Aydin, Sari Khân, Kars (E), and Montesha (F), to his dominions (G). After this, a dispute arising between him and his father-in-law Gherman Ogli (H), he vanquishes him; and, banishing him to Ipsala, seizes his kingdom (I). The prince of Karamania (who had married the Soltân's sister) would have shared the same fate, had he not resolved on the war against Moldavia; intending to revenge in person the defeat which his army, under Surasfer Soleyman Basbâ, received two years before at Hierasus. With this view, hastening back to Europe, he lays a bridge over the Danube, ravages all Moldavia, and encamps at Razboe, a village on the river Siretus. Soon after Istefan (K) (or Stephen), prince of that country, arriving with his army, fought a fierce battle, but was overthrown. On this, he fled to Nemz, where with a strong garrison he had left his mother; who, from the walls, denies him entrance, and bids him return, and retrieve his honour: saying, "She would rather see him perish by the hand of an enemy, than branded with the infamy of being saved by a woman." Istefan, stung with his mother's reproaches, departed from the city; and, by a trumpet, whom he met, gathered 12,000 Moldavians, who had escaped the sword. With these, falling on the enemy, dispersed over the field, and intent on spoil, he put them to flight. Then, at Vasblui, twenty miles from Jassi, capital of Moldavia, he routed the Turkish army (L), took the royal tents, and obliged the Soltân, who was before the terror of the world, to fly, with a few attendants, to Adrianople. Seljuk prince reduced. Defeats the Moldavians.

MEAN while, Karamân Ogli hearing of this great overthrow, and believing he had now a fair opportunity of crushing his power, besieges Kutabia, and ravages the Othmân dominions in Asia. Bâ-yezîd, more enraged at this than discouraged, with his usual speed (M) raises an army in Europe, and, before his arrival in Asia was suspected, meets the enemy divided into many parties, and defeats them at the first onset. Karamân Ogli (N) flying with his sons to Akjami, is taken by the pursuers; and, being brought before the Soltân, is, by his orders, beheaded, and his two sons condemned to perpetual imprisonment at Prusa. Thus all Karamania fell under the victor's power. Karamân Ogli slain.

d IN Europe, he takes Nigheboli, Silistra, and Uruschik, towns on the Danube; and next year, in Asia, reduces Amasia, Tokâd, Niksar, Samsun, and Janik (O); which had been subject to the Soltân Burban Elledin (P). Farther conquests.

AFTER

(D) It is a monument with a tower, placed over the graves of Wazirs and other great men.

(E) The same with Karaz, or Karasia.

(F) These countries bear the names of their first princes, who were Seljuks, as before-mentioned.

(G) Dukas relates, c. 4. that Bâ-yezîd first reduced the Servians, and then Karmian, prince of Kotiakum (or Kotiaion); next he made himself master of Ionia, and Yisse, son of Atin (or Ayân), and banished him to Nicea, where he died. He then seized Karia and Lycia, whose governor, Eli, fled to the Persians. In his way from Sardes to Manissa (or Magnesia), near mount Sypzulus, Kheder, son of Sarkan, prince of Lydia and Æolia, came to submit to him. Bâ-yezîd, after giving him his daughter in marriage, sent him to Prusa, and soon after dispatched him by poison. This done, he marched to Philadelpia, which had hitherto singly stood out; but wanting provisions was forced to capitulate. Returning to Europe, he rebuilt the fort of Kallipolis, which the Turks and Catalans had demolished; built a port for the galleys, and a tower for security of the port.

(H) Rather Gherman, or Kermian Ogli, that is, the son, or descendant of Kermian.

(I) Dukas says, c. 4. that after taking him, with Kotiakum, the capital of Phrygia, he sent him to Prusa; but that, instead of going, he fled into Persia.

(K) He was the greatest hero of his age, made great conquests from the Hungarians and Poles, subdued Walakkia, as far as Bukurest, the capital; Basharabia, now Bujak; the city of Kili, at the mouth of the Danube, and Ak Kermân, the Alba Græca, or Oxia, of the antients. He reigned 47 years. His son, Bogdân, made Moldavia tributary to the Turks, who now call the inhabitants, from him, Bogdâni, whom before they named Ak Istak (or vulgarly Ak Vlakb), that is, the White Wa- lakkians, as they still call the Walakkians Kara Istak, or Black Walakkians. Cant.

(L) In this second battle he made a memorable slaughter; which seven vast piles of Turkish bodies, erected after the battle, witnessed, by the confession of Hazarfen himself, the faithful Turkish historian. Cant.

(M) The Turkish historians, to extol this Soltân's expedition in assembling troops, marching and attacking his enemies, represent the natural speed of the Tatars, when compared with his, as the creeping of a snail. He appeared in Asia, when thought to be in Europe and the country; his coming preventing report; whence they called him Ilderim, or lightning. He acquainted no person with his designs, and executed all matters of difficulty himself. Cant.

(N) Cantemir says, pref. p. 10, that the Karamânian princes are falsely reckoned Oguzians, the founder being one of the Persian governors who revolted on Jenghiz Khân's invasion. Not considering, or knowing, that those he calls Persians were Seljukians, and that the Seljukians derived their pedigree from Oguz; and in all probability the Othmans did it in imitation of them.

(O) He should have added Siwâs, or Sebaste, which fell into his possession, either this time or very soon after; for according to the Turkish annals of Gaudier, Bâ-yezîd marching to that city, in 797, an. 1394, the Kâdi Burhân surrendered it to him, and he left his son Soleyman governor of it.

(P) He seems to have been one of the Persian governors before-mentioned; his principality was part of Armenia Major. Cant. According to Arab Shâh's Hist. Tim. l. iv, his name was Kadi Burhanoddin Abul Abbâs Ahmed. He was lord of Kayfariyah, Tukat, and Siwâs, in Asia Minor; his father was chancellor to Soltân Artatas, lord of Kayfariyah, and certain countries of Karamân. Artates

A. D. 1391. AFTER this, he returned to Europe. But had no sooner passed the Streights of Gallipolis, a than he was informed, that Kutrum (Q) Bâ-yezîd, prince of Kastamoni, taking advantage of his absence, laid waste his provinces in Asia Minor. The Soltân, leaving Europe to his generals, with the greater part of his army repasses the streights: but before he came, Kutrum was dead, and his son Isfindar Beg (R) sent ambassadors to beg pardon for his father's offence, and promised submission. Bâ-yezîd hereupon receives him into favour; and, placing garrisons in the cities of Kastamoni, Tarakli Borli, and Othmânjik (S), hailes back to Europe, and in the same campaign takes Selanîk, or Thessalonika.

Christian princes defeated. A. D. 1394. THIS expedition over, he returns to Prusa; where news is presently brought, that Sigismond, king of Hungary, in conjunction with other Christian princes, having raised an army of 100,000 men, had entered the borders of the Turkish empire, and laid siege to Nikopolis. Bâ-yezîd in haste assembles his forces, not exceeding 60,000 men; and, passing into Europe, attacks the confederates with such fury, that they were defeated at the first charge with great slaughter. All Sigismond's partners in this expedition were taken or slain; himself only escaping first to Constantinople (T), and thence by water into his own territories. There were found in his camp many warlike engines, and a large treasure; with which the Soltân built both at Adrianople and at Prusa a noble Jami, with a Madreseh and a Darush-shifa (U), or hospital for the sick.

Guzelhissar built. Hejrah, 797. BA-YEZID, having now nothing to fear from the western princes, turns all his forces against Thrace; where he takes a castle situate on the Euxine sea, about 60 miles from Constantinople; and, to deprive the Europeans of the means to pass into Asia, builds a new city in a place called Bogâz Kesen. This he very strongly fortifies, and names Guzelhissar (X), or the beautiful castle. The same year he encamps with a great army under the walls of Constantinople, without opposition: but, when preparations were made for an assault, the prime Wazîr dissuaded him from the siege; representing the danger of a revolt in the new conquered cities, not yet settled, and of alarming the Christian princes into a confederacy. On these considerations, although he did not despair of taking the city, yet he advises that the siege should be deferred, lest by grasping too much, all should be lost; and that ambassadors should be sent to the Istambol Tekkuri (Y), upon a presumption, that, as he could have no hopes of saving the city, he would gladly submit to any terms that were imposed on him.

Emperor becomes tributary. Kâdi at Constantinople. HEREUPON Bâ-yezîd sends his ambassadors to Paleologus (Z) with a letter, requiring him to deliver up the city to him; telling him he had subdued the rest of his dominions, and that beyond the walls he had nothing left: but the ambassadors had orders, in case they found the Greeks averse to surrender the city, to conclude a peace on their paying a yearly tribute. This contrivance had the effect; and a truce is made for ten years, on condition that Paleologus pays annually 10,000 Filuri Altun (A); that the Othmâns be allowed to build a Jami (B) and Mekieme (C) in Constantinople; also to appoint a Kâdi, or judge, who was to decide between Mohammedans: but when the dispute was between a Christian and a Mohammedan, then Artates dying, he was made one of the regents during the minority of his son; who dying, he seized the Soltânat. He was learned, courageous, and a friend to Bâ-yezîd; having put to death Timûr's ambassadors, who had summoned him to submit. But before Timûr invaded Bâ-yezîd, the Kadi was slain by Othmân, the Turkmân. Sharîfo'ddin Ali, in his Persian history of Timûr, l. v. c. 13. says, he was put to death by Timûr: but we prefer Arab Shâh's account, who gives the particulars of his death; and, being a mortal enemy to Timûr, would gladly have had that prince's death to lay to his charge.

(Q) His name intimates his being lame in his feet or joints, or weakened by some nervous or paralytic disorder. He was perhaps one of the Persian governors also. Cant. Very probably; for, on the fall of the Seljukian monarchy, the whole dominion came to be divided into lesser states, especially when the Tatars were withdrawn; whereof the Greek and Turkish historians only mention those which lay most westward.

(R) Or Isfindar Beg.

(S) A city, according to Busbekius, in Bithynia, beyond Mount Olympus, founded by Othmân, and therefore famous. Nor is there any other city in the whole Turkish empire besides this, which bears its founder's name, though many were built by order of the Soltâns. Cant. But there is another Othmânjik on the river Kezil Ernak, between Tofia and Amasia, not far from the Black Sea; if Busbekius has not mistaken the situation of the place.

(T) This is the common opinion of the Christian writers.

(U) That is, the gate of health, from dâr, a gate, and shifa, a remedy.

(X) At present called Bogâzghiehid, or the passage of the streights, between the Propontis and the Imid Daglâri, that is mountains of Nicca; from whence Constantinople is supplied with materials for building and shipping. Cant.

(Y) Istambol seems to be a corruption of Constantinople; for the more learned Turks, and the emperor in his mandates, write Constantaniyeh. Tekkur (or Teggur) signifies governor: but they sometimes call the emperor Kayser, or Cæsar. It is their insulence to call him only governor of Constantinople, though at that time he had nothing left without the walls of the city.

(Z) This was Manuel, who began his reign in 1384.

(A) It is a peculiar appellation of the Turkish rufps, or the Venetian golden crown, in value 300 aspers. Cant.

(B) The Jami of Darwd Pashâ was built on this occasion. Cant.

(C) This is the hall of judgment, where causes were heard and determined. There are more than 20 Mekieme in Constantinople; the chief is that of Mehemet Pashâ. Cant.

a the patriarch was to determine it. The same regulation was to take place also at Adri- A. D. 1394.
anople^a.

THIS is the account given by the Turkish historians relating to the Greek affairs. Let us The isles ra- now see what the Greeks themselves say upon the subject. According to Dukas (D), after Bâ- vaged.
yezîd had made himself master of Bitbynia, Phrygia, Bulgaria, and Karia (E), he sent to require the emperor John Paleologus to pay tribute, and order his son Manuel with 100 men to follow him in his war against the Turks of Pamphilia. John, who had no expectation of succours from any state whatever, was obliged to comply. After this the Soltân prohibited the exportation of corn, which was annually made from Asia to the isles of Lesbos, Kbio, Lemnos, and Rhodes. Having also fitted out a fleet, he sent 60 great vessels to Kbio, burned the city, b and towns about it, ravaged the isles of the Archipelago, Euboë, and part of Attika. The emperor, still more alarmed at these proceedings, resolved to fortify the city on the south side along the shore, and built two towers on the side of the Golden Gate with the stones of a church which he had pulled down for that purpose.

BUT, as soon as the war in Pamphilia was finished, Bâ-yezîd having sent to tell him, that, if Manuel, emperor was forced to do what was required; and soon after died, as much of grief for the bad state of his affairs, as of his distemper. Manuel, being informed of his father's death, escaped from Prusa, and got to Constantinople. When this news came to the ears of Bâ-yezîd, who had a design to slay him, he sent to make several unjust demands; and, among the rest, to have c a K'idi established in that city, to decide the differences between the Musulmans settled there on account of trade; adding this threat, If you will not obey my commands, shut yourself up within the walls of your city; for I am in possession of all without.

THE tyrant, after this, passing from Bitbynia into Thrace, ruined all the villages between Thessalonika Panida and Constantinople, carrying off all the inhabitants. Next, he took Thessalonika, and taken.
all the neighbouring places. He sent Abramsus into the Morea, to ravage Akhaia and Lacede- mon; while Tarkhân was detached towards the Euxine sea, to put every thing on that side to fire and sword. He likewise shut up all the avenues to Constantinople, that the inhabitants might neither go in or out, nor be supplied with provisions; which soon produced such a scarcity, that they were forced to pull down the houses for wood to make fires.

d THE emperor hereupon wrote to the pope, the king of France, and Krâl of Hungary, to let Christian them know the extremity he was reduced to; and the danger which the city was in of falling princes join; into the hands of the enemies of the cross, unless immediately assisted. The princes of the west, touched with Manuel's letter, armed in his defence; and, in the beginning of spring, the duke of Burgundy, besides several English, French, and Italians, met in Hungary; where being joined by Sigismund, Krâl of that country, and king of the Romans, they passed the Danube at Nikopolis. Bâ-yezîd, having drawn all the forces of his empire together, not omitting those which guarded Constantinople, marched along by Philipopolis, and the mountains near the marshes; where he waited for them.

NEXT day the Christians appeared; and, having made the Tortoise, broke the main body but are defeat-
e of the enemy, and penetrated to their rear. When the Flemmings saw that the Turks (who ed. fought with slings or bows) began to fly, they pursued them in disorder, and made a great slaughter. Then the guards of the palace (F), gathered out of several Christian nations, issued forth of their ambuscade; and, falling impetuously, with a great cry upon the French and Hungarians, inclosed them; and, having cut them in pieces, put the rest to flight. The Flemmings, seeing their friends defeated, fled themselves, and were pursued to the Danube; where such as escaped the sword were drowned. Several lords of great quality were taken; among the rest the duke of Burgundy, count of Flanders; whom Bâ-yezîd sent to Prusa, and afterwards released for a great ransom.

THE Soltân, elated with this success, sent to summon the emperor to surrender Constantino- Manuel re- f ple; who did not vouchsafe to send him an answer. Hereupon Bâ-yezîd, affecting to support signs to his ne- the right which John, the son of Andronikus (G), had to the empire, told him, that, in case he phew John.
would yield the throne to the lawful heir, he would lay down his arms, and maintain peace A. D. 1393.

^a CANTEMIR'S Othm. Hist. p. 47, & seqq.

(D) What Khalkondylas has written with regard to Bâ-yezîd and his wars looks more like a romance than a history; being made up chiefly of framed speeches, letters, and answers, to supply the want of good materials; very few facts being mentioned by him, nor are those related with any accuracy or order.

(E) Of which Melassus was the capital. Dukas, cap. 17.

(F) This is to be understood of the Janizaries, who guarded the palace; which our author calls the Porte.

(G) A son of John Paleologus, and brother of Manuel, who had Seliwrea, the only place which his son John had left at his father's death.

A. D. 1394. with the city. Manuel, being a very wise prince, and fearing the people, who began to divide in parties on this occasion, might be constrained by the scarcity, which increased every day, to renounce their religion, and give up their country, sent to his nephew John, who was then in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, with 10,000 Turks; offering to yield the city to him, provided he would only let him take the galleys, which were then in the port, and retire with them whither he pleased. This being agreed on, Manuel put John in possession of the palace; and, going on board with his wife and children, departed.

MANUEL arriving in the Morea, left his wife and two young children, John and Theodorus, at Modon. Then, sending back the galleys, went on board a large ship for Venice. From thence, passing through Italy, he went to France and Germany. The princes received him every-where with great honour, and made him rich presents. He afterwards returned to Venice, and from thence to Modon; where he abode, expecting to see the ruin of the empire.

BA-YEZID imagined that John would have surrendered Constantinople to him, as had been agreed on, in consideration of the Morea, and a treaty of peace. But John found means to compound the matter by delivering up Selivrea, and admitting a judge into the city, to which his empire was confined.

Timûr's invasion.
A. D. 1397.

WHILE Bâ-yezîd proposed, after so many conquests, to take a little rest, news came that Timûr Bek, or Tamerlan (H), was advancing to invade his dominions. Some authors pretend, that Paleologus had in his distress written to this Tatar prince; promising for his assistance to hold his empire of him; but that he refused to accept thereof, though at the same time he engaged to succour him; and this is thought to be one reason of Timûr's expedition^b. But Dukas, the Greek historian, who has written best on these affairs, far from assigning any such reason for it, writes, that Timûr made this war in behalf of the Mohammedan princes, whom Bâ-yezîd had stripped of their dominions; and that he commended the Soltân for spoiling the Christians, at the same time he condemned him for invading the Musulmans^c; which we find is nearly the truth of the case, as delivered by the oriental historians.

The occasion of it.
Hejrah, 800.

ACCORDING to the Turkish writers, Abmed Halamîr (I), Khân of Baghdâd, having, in the year 800, revolted from the Soltân of Egypt to Bâ-yezîd, this latter, by his means, wrests from the Egyptians Ilbistân, Malatia, Diyurgbe (K), and Nebbi. In his return, he enters the province of Arzingân (L), subject to Tabrin Beg; and, defeating the governors thereof, imposes on him a heavy tribute. Shortly after, suspecting his fidelity, he carries his wife and two sons in hostage to Prusa. Some historians of less authority say, that the motive of this action was his being enamoured with the lady, whom he forced from her husband. Tabrin Beg (M), not brooking the injury, puts himself under Timûr's protection, and excites him to make war on Bâ-yezîd.

Bâ-yezîd defeated.
Hejrah, 804.
A. D. 1401.

ACCORDINGLY, in 804, that conqueror moves against him; and, being met by Ilderîm near Prusa, a fierce battle is fought, in which there fell on both sides more than 340,000 men. At length the Turks are defeated; Mustâfa, Bâ-yezîd's eldest son, is slain, fighting gallantly; and the Soltân himself, being taken prisoner, is shut up in an iron cage, where he ends his days. Timûr hereupon enters Prusa, and forces the rest of the Asiatic countries to submit to his yoke^d.

^b CANTEMIR'S Othm. Hist. p. 53.

^c DUKAS, c. 15.

^d CANT. ubi sup. p. 54, & seqq.

(H) As the Europeans call him. It is a corruption of Timûr leng (or Timûr lenk) which, in Persian, signifies one lame in his thigh. Cant. Timûr lenk signifies lame Timûr, a nickname given him by the Persians and Turks. Timûr, which was his proper name, signifies iron. His empire began in Mawara'nâhr, or Great Bukhâria, the capital whereof was Samarkând; which he usurped from the successors of Jagatay, or Zagatay Khân, son of Jenghîz Khân, and whose limits he extended over Tartary, part of India, Persia, and the countries westward as far as the Archipelago. See his history, vol. ii. p. 498.

(I) Halamîr imports, in the Arabic, present, or perpetual lord. He was one of those princes who sat up for themselves in Persia, after the death of Abusâid Khân, from whom he descended. He was the son of Sheykh Avis, or Wêis; who became Soltân of Baghdâd by usurpation, and fled to Malek Al Nasser, son of Barkok, Mamlûk Soltân of Egypt, on the approach of Timûr; after whose death he was released, and returned to Baghdâd, the seat of his kingdom. See D'Herb. p. 149. art. Avis Abmed ben Avis. Sharîfo'ddin's Hist. Timûr, l. iii. c. 50. & seqq. Also before, vol. ii. p. 494.

(K) Rather Diwrigbi.

(L) Prince Cantemir propagating an error before taken notice of, reads Azerbijân, which is the antient Media Atropatia; whereas Arzingân is a city on the Euphrates, towards Arzerûm.

(M) He is called Taberten in Sharîfo'ddin's History of Timûr, who, in 1387, sent to Arzenjân (or Arzengân) of which he was prince, to summon him to become tributary; which he did. Thereupon Timûr sent him the patents of investiture. Hist. Timûr, l. ii. c. 58, 59. About the year 1400, Bâ-yezîd sent to order Taberten to repair to his court, and remit him the tributes of Arzenjân, Arzerum, and their dependencies. Taberten gave notice to Timûr of this summons; which, according to Sharîfo'ddin, was the chief cause of the war. Ibid. l. v. c. 13, & seq.

- a THE foregoing account of this war is so very short and inaccurate (for neither the time nor the place of the battle, nor the treatment Bâ-yezîd met with, are truly related), that one would imagine the Turks have no good memoirs among them concerning it. The place of battle indeed seems to have been inserted by prince Cantemir by conjecture; for, in a note, after telling us that most Christian writers (N) say the battle was fought on the banks of the Euphrates, he alleges, that, as all the Turkish historians affirm, that Timûr, immediately after the battle, entered Prusa, it is a clear proof that it was fought on the plains of that city. But this is contradicted by the oriental (O) as well as Greek historians; and even by the Turkish author of the annals of Gaudier ^c (which he so much runs down); who all agree to make the field of battle, the plain of Enguri, or Ancyra.
- b HOWEVER that be, we presume it will not be unacceptable to our readers to add a relation of that memorable event, extracted from an oriental author, who has written the life of Timûr's Timûr Bek (P) with great minuteness, judgment, and accuracy.
- THE occasion of the war between Timûr and Bâ-yezîd, according to Sharîfo'ddîn ali Yezdi, was this. Bâ-yezîd having, after the death of the Kadi Burbano'ddîn, made himself master of Siwâs (or Sebasté) and Malatîyah, sent in very haughty terms to summon Taberten (Q), prince of Arzenjin, to come to his court, and remit the tributes of that city, Arzerûm, and their dependencies, to his treasury. Taberten immediately sent advice of this to Timûr (R); who was surprised at the boldness of the Othmân, knowing that Taberten was under his protection; and sent him a very mortifying letter (S), in which he calls him a pismire, a little prince; and (what doubtless gave most offence of all) a Turkmân. Bâ-yezîd answered the ambassadors, that he wanted to be at war with their master; and that if Timûr did not come to seek him, he would go seek Timûr into the very heart of Persia. At the return of the ambassadors, Timûr, who was then in Georgia, set forward towards Asia Minor, which he entered the first of Mobarram, 803; and, marching to Siwâs (or Sebasté), sent in pursuit of Mehemed Chelebi, surnamed Kerîshchi; whose troops, being overtaken, were cut in pieces. He then besieged the city, the walls of which were so ruined by battering and sapping in eighteen days, that the inhabitants, driving out Mostafa the governor, implored the mercy of Timûr, who granted it to the Musulmans, but made slaves of the Christians. He ordered also 4000 Armenian cavalry of the garrison to be thrown into pits, dug for the purpose, and covered with earth; razing at the same time the walls (T) of Siwâs.
- Timûr, after this (loth perhaps to crush Bâ-yezîd, for the reason hereafter given), instead of penetrating farther into Rûm, turned off towards Syria; which he conquered from the Soltân of Egypt, in revenge for giving refuge to Soltân Ahmed Jelayr (U), and Kara Yusuf, the Turkmân (X); after which he went and subdued Baghdâd. While Timûr was thus employed, Bâ-yezîd, at the instigation of those two princes to revenge the ruin of Siwâs, went and took Arzenjân, after routing Taberten, and sent that prince's wife and children prisoners to Brusa, or Prusa. Timûr, on this news, detached a large body of troops, under the command of his son, the Mirza Shâh Rukb, to attack Bâ-yezîd. But this Soltân having sent ambassadors to Timûr, with a letter full of submission, and prevailed on Taberten himself, on promise of releasing his family, to intercede for him in person, the Tatar monarch was appeased. However, he told the ambassador that he expected two things of his master, if he intended to remove the cause of quarrel between them; one was, to deliver to him the fortrefs of Kemak (Y), which he said belonged to the countries under his obedience; the other was, either to

^c GAUDIER annal. p. 23.

^f SHARIFO'D. Hist. Tim. l. v. c. 13, & seqq.

(N) He must have consulted very bad writers then; for the best say, it was fought near Ancyra, or Enguri.

(O) As Arab Shâh and Sharîfo'ddîn. See also D'Herb. art. Timûr.

(P) Two authors, who have written the history of Timûr, or Tamerlan, have come to our hands. The first, Ahmed ebn Arab Shâh, who published it in Arabic. He was a famous doctor of the Mohammedan law, a native of Damaskus; and died, Hejrah 854, an. 1450. It is translated into French by M. Vatier. The other is Mulla Sharîfo'ddîn Ali, a native of Yezd, in Proper Persia. He wrote in Persian, and published his work at Shirâz, capital of the same country, by order of Ibrâhîm Soltân, grandson of Timûr, in the year 1424; that is, 19 years after that conqueror's death. It was translated into French by M. Petit de la Croix junior, interpreter to Lewis XIV. of France; and from thence into English; and published in 1723, in two volumes, octavo.

(Q) The same Tebrîn Beg, in the Turkish history. The difference is doubtless owing to some mistake in pointing the characters.

(R) According to the annals of the Othmân Soltâns, translated by Gaudier, Germian, Duzinon Beg, prince of Aydin and Mentakbia, joined with Tebrîn Beg in sending an embassy to Timûr. Annal. Turc. p. 22.

(S) It was directed to the Pâdisbâh, or emperor, of Rûm, Bâ-yezîd, the thunderer.

(T) Dukas gives nearly the same account; only he says, the walls, being undermined quite round, fell down at once, when the props or shorings came to be burned; and that the principal inhabitants were thus buried alive, tied neck and heels. Dukas, c. 15. Timûr conferred the government of the city on Kara Ozmân, son of the Kâdi Burbano'ddîn, before-mentioned. Hist. Timûr, l. v. c. 64. in a note.

(U) The same with Ahmed Halamîr.

(X) He was the first of the dynasty of the Kara Kyonlu, or black sheep.

(Y) Kamab, or Kamakh, a very strong castle, situated on a high rock, on the west side of the Euphrates, 21 miles south of Arzenjân.

A. D. 1402. put Kara Yusuf to death, to send that robber and murderer of merchants, the worst of villains, a in chains to him, or at least to expel him out of his dominions. He promised, in case of his compliance, not only to make peace with him, but also to send him powerful succours against the infidels whom he was at war with; on account of which wars, he said, it was that he had forborne so long to invade his territories.

Bâ-yezîd's ob- TIMUR, having treated the Othmân ambassadors with great honour, sent one of his own in sinacy. their company, with a letter to Bâ-yezîd; and afterwards another.

Hejrah, 804. WHEN two months beyond the time agreed on for their return were passed, he grew impatient, and marched towards Anatolia. Being arrived at the castle of Kemak, he besieged it; and, having taken it, gave the government of it to prince Taberten.

FROM thence he marched to Siwâs, where one of his ambassadors met him with fresh ambaf- b fadors from Bâ-yezîd, and an answer to his letter, conceived in very haughty terms, which provoked Timûr. However, at dismissing those officers, he told them, that, considering their master employed his whole strength against the infidels, he was sorry to be constrained to invade his dominions; and that he was still willing to live at peace with him, provided he only restored the officers belonging to prince Taberten; and sent him one of his sons, who should be treated with as much regard as his own.

Comes to An- TIMUR, having reviewed his troops in the plain of Siwâs, was informed that Bâ-yezîd was gori. arrived at Tokat; but because the road thither was full of forests, he took that of Kaysariyah, from whence he marched towards Ankora (Y), which he vigorously attacked. There advice being brought that Bâ-yezîd was advanced within four leagues, to relieve the place, he raised c the siege; and halting after a short march, caused his camp to be inclosed by a trench fortified with bucklers and palisades. He had the river which waters the city behind him (Z); and as the Othmâns had no water, but that of a little spring at the foot of a hill, near the passage of their army, he sent to destroy it.

Order of Ti- TIMUR having spent the night in prayer to God for victory, in the morning ranged his mûr's army (A) in order of battle. The three bodies into which it was divided were commanded by the Mirzas, his sons and grandchildren (B), assisted by his most experienced captains, who acted as lieutenants-general under them. The Mirzas Shâb Rukh and Kalîl Soltân were at the head of the left wing; the van whereof was led by the Mirza Soltân Housseyn. The right wing was under the command of the Mirza Mirân Shâb; and its van of the Mirza Abubekr. d The main body consisted of a vast number of the greatest lords of Asia. Forty colonels were at the head of their regiments on the right, and as many on the left. The Mirza Mehemed Soltân was general of the whole body; and before him was carried the great staff, on whose top was a red horse-tail, and on that a half-moon (C). He had for his lieutenants-general the Mirzas Pîr Mehemed, Omar Shейkh, Eskânder, and other princes, his brothers (D). Timûr himself commanded the body of reserve, composed of forty complete companies. He ordered several ranks of elephants, with splendid trappings and towers on their backs filled with archers, to be posted at the head of the whole army, as well to intimidate the enemy, as to serve for trophies of his Indian victories.

and Bâ-ye- BÂ-YEZID also took care to draw up his army in order. The right wing was commanded by e zîd's wings. Pasir Laus, an European (E), his wife's brother, with 20,000 cavalry of Europe, all armed in steel from head to foot; so that nothing could be seen but their eyes. Their armour was fastened below the foot by a padlock, which was to be opened before their cuirass or helmet could be taken off. The left was conducted by Musulmân (F) Chelebi, son of Bâ-yezîd, and composed of the troops of Anatolia. The main body was commanded by Bâ-yezîd himself, having for his lieutenants-general his three sons, Musa, Aysa (G), and Mostafa. Mehemed Chelebi, surnamed Kirishchi, the most skilful of his five sons, was at the head of the rear, and had for his lieutenants six Pâshâs, with a great number of other brave officers.

f SHARIF O'D. Hist. Tim. l. v. c. 34—46.

(Y) Anguri, or Enguri, the ancient Ancyra (rather Ankûra). The Greek historians also make this the place of battle.

(Z) Dukas tells us, that Bâ-yezîd had encamped in a plain, by a river, while Timûr's army was posted on a dry spot of ground; but that the Soltân leaving his commodious station to take the diversion of hunting with his troops, Timûr went and took possession of it. Mean time the heat being so extreme, that 5000 Turks died with thirst, he was obliged to give the Tatars battle the next day. Duk. c. 15.

(A) Khalkondylas makes the army of Timûr 800,000, and of Bâ-yezîd only 120,000: but Schilperger, who was in the battle, says the first had 1,600,000, and the latter 400,000. Khalk. l. iii. c. 10.

(B) Dukas says, c. 15. That he gave the right wing to his son, the left to his grandson, and commanded the rear himself.

(C) The ensigns of the Othmâns themselves.

(D) Timûr had four sons, and 32 grandsons living, when he died, all denoted by the title of Mirza.

(E) This was Stephen, son of Lazarus, Bâ-yezîd's brother-in-law, according to Dukas.

(F) Cant. mir supposes him to be the same with Soleyman. Leunclavius Pandect. N^o. 59, endeavours to prove it.

(G) By others written Iffa.

a ABOUT ten in the morning (H) the Tatar infantry, with their bucklers before them, posted themselves on the neighbouring hills; and while the Othmâns advanced in good order, and full of spirits, the drum was beaten for the battle to begin, and the great cry, Sûrûn, made (I) at the sound of the huge trumpet Kerrenay. In this interval Timûr got off his horse to go to prayers; then remounting, gave orders for attacking the enemy. A. D. 1402.
The battle begins.

THE Mirza Abûbekr, at the head of the van-guard of the right wing, began the battle by a discharge of arrows on the Turk's left wing, commanded by Musulman Chelebi. Bâ-yezîd's eldest son (K) who performed noble actions; but not being able to withstand the strength and intrepidity of the Tatar troops, was forced to fly. The Mirza Soltân Housseyn, who commanded the van of Timûr's left wing, fell on the enemy's right, and made a cruel slaughter: but Timûr perceiving that he had advanced too far, sent the Mirza Mehemed Soltân, at the head of all the Rebâids (or forlorn hope), to support him.

THESE rushing full speed into the Othmân army, broke the ranks, and put them into great disorder. The Europeans, on the other hand, gave marks of prodigious valour, each party repulsing its adversary by turns: but at length the Tatars gained the advantage, by the death of Pir Lous (L), and the slaughter of the infantry of the Turk's right wing. The Mirzas Mehemed Soltân, chased the Othmân infantry from the hills where they were posted. Timûr perceiving the enemy began to give way, ordered the Mirzas and Amîrs (M) to fall upon them with the whole army. These generals accordingly advanced, sword in hand, and having made a terrible slaughter of part of them, the rest fled.

WHILE the Mirza Mehemed Soltân routed the right wing, six companies of his soldiers ascended a hill (N), which properly was their post. Bâ-yezîd observing their small number, attacked them at the head of his main body; and having driven them from thence, drew up his own men there. The six companies having joined the Mirza, rallied; and being reinforced with several regiments, returned, with design to attack Bâ-yezîd's main body. The Othmân emperor having from the hill carefully examined the disposition of his army, and perceiving the disorder, or rather defeat, of his two wings (O), whose soldiers fled to join him, he was seized with fear. Mean while Timûr having advanced with the Mirza Shâh Rukh, entered into the midst of the enemy. The Mirzas and Amîrs of the right and left wings hastened thither likewise; and being come up, all the troops falling upon Bâ-yezîd, surrounded him, with his army, like beasts inclosed in the circle of a chace (P). Are quite overthrown.

THE Soltân, notwithstanding the miserable state to which he was reduced, maintained his ground all day, like a brave hero, and skilful warrior; and when night came on, he descended from the hill, and fled (Q): but being vigorously pursued, he was at last overtaken and seized by Soltân Mahmûd Khân (R); and, at sun-set, presented by the Great Amîrs to Timûr; who, moved to see so great a prince in that condition, ordered him to be unbound, and brought before him with respect (S). He went to receive him at the door of his tent with great ceremony; Bâ-yezîd flies, and is taken.

(H) This battle was fought on Friday the 19th of Zilkadeh (or Dhuikadeh); which answers to the 11th of July, N. S. The year of the Hejrah 804, answers to the Mogol year of the horse; which is the 7th of their cycle of 12 years.

(I) Dukas says they began the fight with profound silence.

(K) The Turkish historians make Muslafa the eldest, according to Cantemir.

(L) Dukas relates, that Stephen, son of Lazarus, Bâ-yezîd's son-in-law, enraged at the treachery of the deserters, at the head of 5000 Servians, rushed first on the enemy, who opened their ranks to let them pass, and then discharged their arrows, which did them no harm, their armour being proof. Thus they were treated on a second attack; whence Stephen perceiving no good could be done against them, whispered Bâ-yezîd to retire. Finding the Soltân deaf to his advice, he set Musulmân, that prince's eldest son, in the middle of his troops; and breaking through the thick ranks of the Scythians, with his sword opened himself a passage to go to Prusa.

(M) These were the great commanders who served as lieutenants-general under the Mirzas, or princes, sons of Timûr.

(N) Dukas also takes notice of this: he says, that Bâ-yezîd ascended a hill with 10,000 Janizaries, the rest of his army, who fled, being slain: that the Scythians, seeing the Soltân taken as in a net, agreed to send the soldiers home naked, according to an ancient custom among the Romans, Persians, Servians, and Scythians, not to kill their enemies, on account of religion, nor keep them prisoners, but only to strip them, and send them back: but the Janizaries falling on them like lions, and being not above one to ten, were all cut in pieces. Then the enemy calling to Bâ-yezîd to dismount, and come and speak to Tamerlan, who called for him, he alighted; and being set on a little horse for that purpose, was carried to the victor's tent.

(O) Dukas, c. 15, imputes the overthrow of Bâ-yezîd to the desertion of some of the conquered princes. He says, that one of the chief commanders, who had formerly served Atin, hearing that he was in Tamerlan's army, went over to it with 500 horse; whose example was followed by the troops of Sarkhân, Mantakbia, and Karmian, moved thereto by the voice and gesture of their princes: after which the Tatars surrounded the Turks.

(P) Alluding to the Tatar way of hunting.

(Q) The weather was so hot, that most of the soldiers died for thirst, they having no water in the place where they went to rest themselves. Dukas says, 500 Turks died of thirst.

(R) The Great Khân of Jakatay, now called Great Bukharia, who had the title of Khân, while Timûr possessed all the power.

(S) Dukas says, that Tamerlan kept him a long time standing at his tent door, while he played at chess with his son Siacruc (Shâh Rukh), the soldiers shouting for joy; and saying, Here is Bâ-yezîd, general of the Turks, reduced

A.D. 1402.

mony ; and making him sit down by him, in mild terms accused him with being the cause of his own misfortune, by refusing to comply with his reasonable demands. Bâ-yezîd having confessed the charge, and asked pardon, the conqueror gave him a splendid vest, promised to use neither him nor his friends ill ; and treated him as a great emperor. The captive Soltân perceiving Timûr's generosity, besought him to order search to be made for his sons Musa and Mostafa (I), who were with him in the battle. Search was accordingly made, but only Musa found (U). This prince, Timûr, after presenting him a vest, sent to his father ; for whom he ordered a royal pavilion (X) to be erected near his own ^a.

Anatolia laid waste.

AFTER this victory, Yakûb, governor of Sirwâs, delivered the city and castle to Timûr, who then sent out several detachments to scour the country on every side, and ravage all Anatolia ; where the Tatars found such store of wealth, that every man became rich with his share of the plunder. b

Timûr's generosity.

THE Mirza Mehemed Soltân was sent to Prusa, to seize the treasure of Bâ-yezîd ; but Musulmân Chelebi had got thither before him, and carried them off. However, he seized the Soltân's wife and two daughters, who had hidden themselves at Yenishahr (Y) ; with the daughters of Soltân Ahmed Jelayr, king of Baghdâd, whom Bâ-yezîd had demanded in marriage for his son Mostafa : but Kara Yusuf had fled before the battle into Arabia.

PRUSA was burned, Nicea pillaged, and the country ravaged as far as the Thracian Bosphorus, over which Musulmân Chelebi fled ; leaving his wife and effects a prey to his pursuers. Timûr was then at Kyutakiehb (Z), a delightful city, two days journey from Prusa, where he staid a month ; during that time he sent Bâ-yezîd his wife Destina (A), daughter of Laus before-mentioned, with his daughter, and all his domestics : but was desirous that that prince's, who till then had been tolerated in the Christian religion, even in the saray, or seraglio, should embrace Mohammedism. On the other hand, Amîr Mehemed, son of Karamân, who for twelve years had been kept in chains by Bâ-yezîd, being brought to court, Timûr honoured him with a vest and belt, and gave him the government of the whole province of Karamânia, with Koniyab, Laranda, Ak Saray, Anzarya, Alaya, and their dependencies ^b.

TIMUR, marching from Kyutakiehb to Tangûrlîk, made feasts and balls, to which Bâ-yezîd was invited for his entertainment. Timûr did every thing to please him, and even bestowed on him the kingdom of Anatolia, which he possessed before, by placing the crown on his head, and granting him the patents usual on those occasions. d

Greek emperor submits.

TIMUR from hence sent ambassadors to Constantinople, to summon the Tekkûr, or Greek emperor, to pay the tribute and customs ; also two messengers to Musulmân Chelebi, Bâ-yezîd's son, who resided at Guzelbissar, built by his father, opposite to Constantinople, to tell him that he must either repair to court, or send Timûr some money ; and that otherwise he would cross the streights in quest of him. Some time after the ambassadors returned, with two from the Greek Tekkûr, to notify their master's submission. The messengers likewise arrived with Sheykh Ramadân, prime minister to Bâ-yezîd, and Grand Kâdi of the empire, who brought a letter from Musulmân Chelebi, signifying his obligations for the favours shewn his father, and his readiness to wait on Timûr, if it was his pleasure.

Christian Smyrna ruined.

AFTER this, Timûr understanding that there were on the sea-coast two strong fortresses, e named Ezmîr (or Smyrna) one inhabited by *Musulmân*s, the other by Christians ; he, out of zeal to religion, went and besieged the latter (B), which he took in 14 days, not without great opposition : for it was built so strongly with freestone and mortar, that Soltân Morâd had several times attempted it, and Bâ-yezîd besieged it seven years in vain. To attack the place on the side of the sea, as well as land, they built, in the midst of the water, great scaffolds, near reduced under your power, and loaded with chains. At last, Tamerlan breaking off the game, and looking at his prisoner, said, Is this he who ordered us to separate our wives from our wives, if we did not make war upon him ? Bâ-yezîd answered, he was the person ; but that the victor ought not to insult the vanquished. The conqueror then made him sit opposite to him, and comforted him ; promising not to put him to death, or treat him with the same cruelty as he had done others.

^a SHARIFO'D. l. v. c. 47—49.^b Ibid. l. v. c. 50—52. DUKAS, c. 16, & seq.

(T) According to Dukas, Bâ-yezîd had with him in the battle four sons, Musulmân, Esses (or Iffa), Mahomet, and Moses, or Musa, besides Mostafa and Orkhân, who were left at home, being children. Dukas, c. 17. Musulmân seems to be Soleyman.

(U) Nor did he ever afterwards appear ; which procured him the epithet of Nabedid, or the lost. Some Christian authors call him Erdogul. Cant.

(X) Dukas relates, that his son Mahomet attempted to deliver him by a passage made under-ground to the tent ; which was discovered by the guards, who observed the earth to move. But neither he nor Kbalkondylas mention any thing of the iron cage, which appears to be a Turkish fiction, to dishonour Timûr, by dishonouring their emperor. However, some of those who relate that fact, whether true or spurious, own it was done, upon Bâ-yezîd's telling Timûr, that he would have served him in the same manner, had he fallen into his hands. See Annal. Soltan. Othm. p. 25.

(Y) A city four leagues from Prusa.

(Z) Dukas calls it Koituyon.

(A) European romancers call her Roxana ; and pretend Timûr kept her for his own use.

(B) Dukas calls it a little city, which the knights of Rhodes had fortified in the time of Amir, and says, the inhabitants thought it impregnable because Bâ-yezîd had been obliged to turn the siege into a blockade.

- a one another, each supported by three feet. From thence, to the two sides of the castle, they made an even way, which they secured on each side; so that the Musulmâns, armed with their bucklers, fought on those scaffolds, and made their attacks as securely as on land: besides, the passage to the sea being by this means shut up (C), there was no possibility of bringing any succour to the place. Mean time, they at once battered and undermined the walls and towers: when the sapping was finished, they set fire to the props, and, of a sudden, the bastions and curtains fell down. The Musulmans then entering the town, put the inhabitants to the sword, after they had made a most brave defence; never ceasing to throw pots of naphta and wild-fire, arrows and stones, on the besiegers: a few escaped, by swimming to the ships (D). Their houses were all demolished. Those of Foja, or Phocæa, avoided the same misfortune, by submitting to pay tribute (E). At the same time Shaykh Ramadân having come a second time from Musulmân Chelebi, with rich presents and humble submissions; Timûr confirmed him in the principality of Ifra Yaka (F), by patents sealed with his red hand, and sent him a vest woven with gold, a crown, and a belt. An ambassador from Issa Chelebi (G), another of Bâ-yezîd's sons, was soon after received with honour.

TIMUR, before he left Ezmîr, furnished the inhabitants of the Mohammedan fortrefs with arms, and ordered them to build a strong citadel near the place where the Christian town stood, in order to hinder the Europeans from ever settling there any more. Being come to Soltân Hissar, he gave the cities of Kyutabiyeh, Tangûzlik, and Kara Shahr, with the province of Ghermianeyli, to Takûb Chelebi, to whom they belonged by right of succession. Then he went and took the town of Egridur (H), situate on the lake Falak Abâd (I), in the county of Hâmid Eyli. Afterwards he marched on to Ak Shahr. At this place Bâ-yezîd, who had fallen ill at Egridur, died of an apoplexy the 14th of Shaaban 805; which misfortune Timûr bewailed with tears; having resolved, after the conquest of Anatolia, to restore him. He gave largesses to Bâ-yezîd's officers; and dismissed Musa Chelebi, with a royal vest, a belt, a sword, and a quiver inlaid with precious stones, a load of gold, and 30 horses; telling him, that his father's corpse should be conveyed to Prusa (K), with pomp becoming the greatest king, to be interred in the mausoleum built there by himself.

TIMUR, in leaving Anatolia, the conquest of which he atchieved in one year, carried with him the Kara Tatars, settled about Kaysariyâb and Amasia, in order to re-people some lands in Tartary.

BA-YEZID reigned 14 years three months, and lived 58. He was famous for his firmness of mind, and quickness of action; subject to anger, but soon softened into clemency: so great a lover of architecture, that temples, academies, and hospitals, were erected by him every year. He was the first of the Othmân race who waged naval wars; having built about 300 long vessels for that purpose.

CONCERNING his sons, under the corrupted names of Erdogrul, Issa, Kalepin, Cyricelebis, and Cibelin, many things are related by the Christian writers (L), which appear to be fictitious, both from the course of the history, and testimony of the Turkish authors. These latter unanimously ascribe to Bâ-yezîd four sons, Mostafa, who fell in the battle, Soleymân, Musa, and Mohammed. Altho' the three last swayed the Turkish sceptre, yet Mohammed only is reckoned

^c SHARIFO'D. I. V. C. 53—63.

(C) Dukas says, Tamerlan shut up the port, by ordering every part of his army to throw every man a stone into the mouth of it: that this was effectually done in an hour or two; and that if the besieged had not gotten out their ships to sea before hand, they would all have been destroyed.

(D) The knights of Rhodes fled first into the castle, and then into the gallies, which were near it. The Christians, who had taken refuge in the place, followed into the sea, with their wives and children; some laid hold of the rudders, others of the oars, praying and crying to be taken on board: but the compassionate knights thrust them off with forks, leaving them half dead, and put to sea. Being seized by the Scythians, to the number of 1000, Tamerlan ordered their heads to be cut off, and a tower to be built with them and stones mixed. Dukas, c. 17.

(E) Of these two Phocæas, the old and new, the latter belonging to the Genoefes, the first to the prince of Lesbos they sent early to Tamerlan, who received their presents, and made peace with them. After that, having sent his grandson to observe the strength of those places, the prince of Lesbos went in a galley to receive him; entertained him magnificently; and, having shewn him all sorts of diversions, sent him back with very rich presents. Dukas, c. 17.

(F) That is, Turkey in Europe.

(G) He is mentioned by Dukas in a former note.

(H) Or Igridi.

(I) This lake is five leagues long and four broad, with two isles in it, called Gbulistân and Nasibîn.

(K) Dukas says, that Bâ-yezîd died in Phrygia Salutaris, called by the Turks Karâfâr: that it was reported he poisoned himself, to avoid being led in triumph: that, when near his death, he sent to desire of Tamerlan, that his body might be buried in the tomb which he had built at Prusa; which request was granted.

(L) Khaikondylas mentions Orthobules, who, he says, was taken in Sebastæ, or Sivvâs, and put to death by Timûr's order. Issa is mentioned by Dukas, and is the Josua of the former. The third and fifth seem to be corruptions of Chelebi, the title formerly of the Othmân princes; and Cyricelebis is, doubtless, Kirîschî Chelebi, the surname of Muhamet. George Phranza, l. i. c. 82. calls him Cyritzis.

among

A. D. 1403. among the Othmân emperors : because he enjoyed the whole empire, which neither of the other two did ; one governing in Europe, while the other reigned in Asia^d.

^d CANT. Othm. Hist. p. 56, & seq.

Interregnum under Soleyman Chelcibi (A).

Soleyman
Chelcibi.

SOLEYMAN, second son of Bâ-yezîd, having escaped out of the battle with his father's prime Wazîr, Ali Bâshâ, fled first to Nicea, from whence, shortly after, he repaired to Adrianople, where he was saluted emperor by the remains of the European army^a.

THE Greek writer Dukas relates this matter after another manner, and with circumstances which make his account credible. According to him, Musulmân (who is the Soleyman of the Turkish historians) passing over from Asia to Constantinople, implores the protection of the emperor Manuel (who, on the defeat of Bâ-yezîd, resumed the sovereign power (B), with the consent of the great officers) : and desiring only the government of Thrace, with some other provinces, agreed to give up Thessalonika ; the cities along the Strymon, as far as Zetunion, together with the Morea ; the places from Panida to the sacred entrance, and the forts on the Euxine sea, as far as Varna. After matters were concluded, the emperor sent him to Adrianople, and dispatched proper persons to receive the above-mentioned cities in his name, and drive out the Turks. Thus far Dukas^b.

Disobliges Ti-
mur.

TIMUR, on his arrival at Prusa, sends ambassadors to that prince, with a letter, importing, " That he was sorry for his father's unexpected death ; and that, provided Bâ-yezîd's family would only acknowledge his clemency, he would, instead of an enemy, be a friend, nay, a father, to them." Soleyman, instead of complying with the conqueror's proposal, treated his ambassadors injuriously ; and returned him a proud answer (C). Hereupon Timûr sent for his brother Musa Chelcibi, and conferred the empire on him ; saying, Receive thy father's inheritance, for it is not kingdoms, but a kingly mind, I seek^c.

State of Anatolia.

HERE we shall break off the thread of the Othmân history again, as delivered by the Turkish historians, to connect with it that of the Greeks : which yet we shall do, without confounding one with the other, and in such a manner, that the reader may peruse the account on each side, without interruption. According to Dukas, after the Scythian (or Tatar) invasion, while Thrace enjoyed a profound peace, the provinces of Asia were in great confusion, as well as afflicted with the plague and famine. Karmian, surnamed Alisâr, by consent of Tamerlan, took possession of the countries which belonged to his ancestors. Sarkhân re-entered Lydia ; Or Khân, and the two sons of Atin (or Aydin), Amîr and Isa, had Ionia ; while Eli, son of Mantakbia, enjoyed Karia and Lycia.

Mohammed
defeats Isa.

MOHAMMED, son of Bâ-yezîd, remained at Ancyra, with Musa, his youngest brother, in a private condition, without any sovereign power ; nor was Mostafa in a better state. However, Mohammed sent Temirta, who had been one of his father's generals, to attack Isa, whom he took and slew ; which raised both the reputation and power of his master in Galatia.

Exploits of Chuneid beg.

MEAN time one Cineis (D), whose father, Kara Su Bâshâ, having been for a long time governor of Smyrna, was highly esteemed by the people of Ionia, made war against the two sons of Atin (or Aydin), who possessed Ephesus, which he took in a few days ; and then sends to tell Musulmân, it was for him he had conquered the principality of Atin. At the same time he demanded succours to make head against his enemies ; which being sent him from Kallipolis, the sons of Atin were quite driven out of the country.

His father
taken.

In the spring, two years after the Scythian invasion, Amîr, whose brother was dead, retired to the court of Mantakbia Elie Beg, prince of Karia, his uncle ; who, at his request, marched with him, at the head of 6000 men, towards Ephesus, where Kara Su commanded with 3000 men, and made a stout defence. But the enemy having fired the city, the inhabitants surrendered it ; and Kara Su Bâshâ retired into the citadel, where he held out till autumn, expecting relief from his son Cineis, who was at Smyrna. He then yielded the place to the conqueror, who carried him into his dominions ; and imprisoned him, with others, in the fort of Mamala.

^a CANT. Othm. Hist. p. 58, & seq.

^b DUKAS, c. 18.

^c CANT. p. 59.

(A) This Soleyman Chelcibi is the same whom others call Musulmân Chelcibi, and some, Calepin, which is a corruption of Chelcibi.

(B) Banishing John to Lesbos.

(C) The tenor of these letters is not given by the Turkish writers ; but they own Timûr was justly offended with them.

(D) This is the same with Tzuncit, or Tzuneites beg, in Leunclavius ; which may be read Chuneid, whereof Cineis is a corruption.

- a ALTHOUGH Cineis could not succour his father by land, he did by sea: for arriving at the fort in a galley, he gave notice to the prisoners; who, making their guards drunk, let themselves down by ropes in the night, and escaped to Smyrna. Towards winter, Cineis marched to attack Ephesus; which, on Amir's retiring into the citadel, he plundered, and committed unheard of cruelties. At length, on promise of his daughter in marriage, Amir came forth, and embraced Cineis; who proclaimed him lieutenant-general of the country of Atin (or Aydin), and shook off Musfulmân's yoke. Soleymân Chelebi.
Set at liberty.
Agrees with Amir.
- CINEIS afterwards, accompanied by Amir, visited his territories, and drew over to his interest the cities situated on the Menander, with those of Philadelphia, Sardes, and Nymphaea, as far as the river Hermon; making his relations and friends governors. In short, while he was at Ephesus with his future son-in-law, it was reported of a sudden that the duke (E) was dead; and next morning his corpse was carried to Fort Pirgion, near Mount Tmolus, there to be buried in the sepulchre of his ancestors. Seizes Aydin.
- b THEN Cineis, taking on him the government as an inheritance, set up for a sovereign prince in Asia: but Musfulmân not being able to bear this, resolved to humble him; and crossing over to Prusa, was received with great joy. While he was raising forces for that purpose, in the beginning of spring, Cineis hastes first to Karamân, at Kogni (or Ikonium), and then to Karmian, at Kotiayon (or Kotiaum); whom, after putting them in mind of what they had suffered from Bâ-yezîd, he advised not to wait till the serpent he had left behind swallowed them all up, but to crush him before he grew any bigger. Excites the Seljuk princes against Mu-
fulmân.
- c INDUCED by these reasons, they accompanied him to Ephesus, with their forces. Karamân brought 30,000 men, Karmian 10,000, and Cineis had 5,000. Mean time, Musfulmân, with 25,000 troops, marched by Lopadion, and the field of Monomene, to Smyrna. Being somewhat disturbed at the junction of those two princes, he proceeded to Mesaulion, near Ephesus, where he intrenched himself, for fear of the enemy; and kept in the midst of his camp. The two armies were but six leagues asunder, yet durst not venture to approach nearer one another.
- d DURING this suspension, Cineis was informed by an intimate friend, that Karamân and Karmian intended to seize him that night, and make their peace with Musfulmân, by delivering him up. Cineis, on this advice, orders candles to be lighted in his tent, and rides post-haste to the citadel, of which his brother Bâ-yezîd was governor; and exhorts him to defend the place till next day: then in the night repairs to the camp of Musfulmân, with a cord about his neck, and confessing his guilt, submits to his mercy. Musfulmân forgives, and presents him with a rich vest; then marches towards Ephesus. The two princes having been to look for Cineis at midnight, in his tent, and not finding him, were in fear of being surprised. The army, in confusion, began to pack up their baggage; and, at sun-rise, while they forded the Menander on one side, Musfulmân crossed it with his army over a bridge near Mount Galefus, and entered Ephesus. Cineis would have had him pursue the enemy; but not caring to trust him, would not follow his advice. In short, he encamped thereabout, and stayed four months, wholly plunged in debauchery and pleasures, to which he was strangely addicted.
- e LET us now return to the Turkish historians. Soleymân, upon the news that Timûr had advanced his brother Musa to the throne (F) passes into Asia with the European forces, and marches directly to Prusa (G). From thence Musa, being much inferior in strength (as the Asiatic troops could not be so soon recruited) fled to Karamân Oglî (H): but not thinking himself safe there, resolved to retire to Isfendar Beg (I); from which he was diverted by the ambassadors of that prince, who apprehended Soleymân's resentment. Nor did he judge amiss, for Soleymân presently advanced towards Isfendar Beg's dominions: but being made sensible that his brother was not there, he returns to Prusa; where, despising Musa's attempts, he Flies to Mu-
fulmân.
Defeats Musa.

^d DUKAS, c. 18.

(E) That is, Amir.

(F) Dukas mentions nothing of Timûr's setting up Musa; but says, he fled from Ancyra, where he dwelt, with Mahomet, to Spintiar (that is Isfandiar) a Turkman, who possessed Sinope, and that Spintiar permitted him to cross the Euxine sea, to go into Walakhia; where he gathered forces. The rest of his relation agrees very well with the Turkish account, except in a few passages inserted in the notes.

(G) This we conceive was at the same time, when, as hath been before related, he was on his expedition against Cineis; against whom he marched, finding Musa fled from Prusa.

(H) The Turkish writers make the Karamânian kingdom more ancient than the Othmân; and even coeval with that of Ikonium, under Aladdin. Hence Cantemir censures the Greek writers, who refer the division of the Persian provinces to the time of Othmân: but he runs upon a false scheme for want of being acquainted with Seljukian history; from whence it appears, that the division happened at the time of Othmân's appearance, or not long before. The same author says, Karamânia contains the greater part of the Old Kappadocia and Galatia: he might have added part of Phrygia and Cilicia; which last alone is considered by most Christian authors as the kingdom of Karamân.

(I) Or Isfandiar Beg. He was son of Kutrum Bâ-yezîd, prince of Kastamona, before mentioned. Phranza writes, Sfentiar.

Soleymân
Chelebi.

gives himself wholly up to gluttony and drunkenness (K). His brother Mohammed, prince of Amasia, having sent ambassadors to salute him emperor, and offer presents, he speaks very sharply to them, and dismisses them without any answer; which imprudent conduct alienated Mohammed's affection from him, and proved extremely prejudicial to his affairs.

His luxury.

MEAN while, Musa Chelebi, who, after Isfandiar Beg's repulse, crossed into Europe in a little boat, which he found near Nicea, wandered through several countries, and at last stopped in Walakbia: there assembling a great number of soldiers who were in his interest; and being assisted by Walakbian troops, he re-enters the Turkish empire, and becomes master of

Hejrah, 809.
A. D. 1406.

Adrianople. This news awaking Soleymân from his dream of luxury (L), he, in 809, assembles the Asiatic army, and passes into Europe. But Musa, either through natural timorousness, or distrust of his strength, not daring to stand a battle, returns to Walakbia: while Soleymân, ascribing his successes wholly to his own bravery and prudence, returns to his former vices (M). Military discipline is neglected; honours are conferred on wine-sellers and pimps; in a word, the court has the appearance of a brothel-house rather than a school of virtue.

He is killed.

MUSA CHELEBI, thinking he might turn his brother's luxury to his advantage, applies secretly, by letters, to the generals and great men (N); who, offended with Soleymân's excesses, are easily persuaded to revolt. In effect, Musa re-assembling an army, by long marches arrives at Adrianople, before his brother knew any thing of the matter; who being wholly unprepared to oppose him, left the city, in order to fly to Constantinople: but loitering by the way, to get drunk at every house, he is taken in a bath at a certain village, and slain by one of the soldiers of Musa; who ordered the body to be buried in the sepulchre of his grandfather Morâd, called Kholavendikar.

On what occasion.

DUKAS relates the death of Musulmân, or Soleymân, in a different manner. According to him, that prince departing from Adrianople to go to Constantinople, with only a few horse, they deserted him on the road to join Musa's party; so that entering alone into a small town, whose inhabitants, from the richness of his habit, judged him to be a prince, five young men ran to meet him with their bows. At this being surprised, he shot two of them dead: hereupon, the other three making a stand, to revenge the loss of their brothers, shot at him all together; and having brought him off his horse, cut off his head.

MUSA, who was received with acclamations at Adrianople, bewailed his brother's death, and had his body pompously buried at Prusa. He likewise caused the three young men, who had killed him, to be apprehended; and having assembled the inhabitants of the place, commanded them to be bound, and burnt in their respective houses, with their wives and children.

His Character.

SOLEYMAN ruled affairs seven years and 10 months. He was a young man, far exceeding the rest of his brothers both in good and bad qualities; a valiant and most fortunate general; a prince of great clemency and generosity (O); but ruined by his luxury.

* CANT. ubi supr. p. 60—63.

† DUKAS, c. 19.

‡ CANT. ubi supr. p. 63.

(K) All the Turkish emperors were perfectly sober men, and religious observers of their law, excepting this Soleymân Soltân Selim, called Mest, or drunkard; and Morâd, who took Baghdâd. They reckon only two others, who have been remarkably addicted to vice, Mossâfa I. who, unfit to govern, was twice deposed; and Îbrahim, boundless in his lust, and for that reason strangled. CANT. p. 61, note 9; and p. 63, note 14.

(L) Dukas uses nearly the same expression.

(M) Dukas takes notice of the luxury of Musulmân, or Soleymân; and says, he would sit whole days at the table.

(N) Dukas says the same.

(O) Dukas says he gained the affections of the people of every town he came to, if he stayed there ever so short a time, by the wealth he distributed among the poor and indigent; raising many from beggary into a condition of living comfortably.

Interregnum under Musa Chelebi.

Musa Che-
lebi.

WHILE Musa reaped the reward of his labours at Adrianople, by being saluted emperor by the European army, Mohammed, lord of Amasia, raising what forces he was able, in order to revenge the murder of Soleymân, who was his brother by the same venter, goes and seizes Prusa; where he is created emperor by his army. But thinking it prudent to settle the affairs of Asia before he published his resolution to depose Musa, he marches against the plundering Tatars (not yet quite expelled), and other bands of robbers, who, since Timûr's invasion, infested Anatolia; these he extirpates in the first year of his reign, in which he surprises, takes, and beheads Karadewlet Shâb, the only surviving leader of those Tatars; who, in his absence, was destroying the country about Amasia: so that in a short time peace is restored to the land, which gained him much reputation.

* CANT. ubi supr. p. 64, 65, 78.

- a MUSA CHELEBI, alarmed at Mohammed's successes, to divert him from any attempts against the western part of the empire, offers to resign to him all the east; and, to shew that his proposal was sincere, in 814 turns his arms against the Christians. Fortune proving favourable to him, he that year took the towns of Paraverd and Matruna, in the Morea. Elated with this success, he, the next year, attempts greater things; and, assembling a stronger army, attacks the Hungarians, under their king Sigismond (A), near the city of Samandria, not far from the Danube, and defeats them with such a slaughter, that scarce a man is left to carry back the news. It is said, that nothing incumbered the enemy so much as the immense quantity of riches they brought with them; so that the Janizaries measured the gold and silver, which was found in their tents, in bowls and hats. The rest of the spoil supplied the charge of building a large temple called Jami Alik, or the old Jami, which is inscribed with Musa's name.

Musa Chelebi.
Defeats the Hungarians;
Hej 814.
A. D. 1411.

- b BUT this great honour gained to the Turkish arms could not secure Musa Chelebi, otherwise a prince of an excellent disposition, great justice, and moderation, from the frowns of fortune: for, about this time, Korshâb Muluk (B), and the famous general Ornûs Beg (C), without any provocation, revolt to Mohammed; signifying to him by letters, that the Othmân empire, weakened by two civil dissensions, would not bear to be governed by two heads; and that the whole army, observing Musa's timorous nature, were of opinion the empire should be conferred on him alone. They therefore desired him to hasten over, promising to put the whole into his possession.

betrayed by his officers;

- c MOHAMMED CHELEBI, at the receipt of these letters, prepares to cross into Europe. On the other hand, Musa assembles his army, in order to secure the Streights of Kallipolis before his brother's arrival: but, finding his generals only made a shew of fighting, he, in the very heat of the battle, withdraws out of the field, and escapes into Laz Vilayeti (or Servia); while Mohammed, prevented by the season from proceeding any farther, returns with his army, to winter at Prusa. Musa Chelebi, assisted by his old friend the prince of Servia (D) with warlike stores and forces, returns the same winter into his empire, and becomes master of Adrianople, which was destitute of a garrison. There he finds Korshâb and Ornûs Beg, whom Mohammed left designedly in Europe; and either because he saw that they could not effect their intentions, or led to it by his merciful temper, he both pardons and receives them into favour.

defeated by Mohammed;

- d BUT the event shewed, that however good it may be in a prince to pardon, he ought never to trust a traitor. For these ungrateful generals invite Mohammed a second time to seize the empire; who, coming from Nicea with a greater army, passes the Bosphorus by the permission of the Iytambol Kayseri (or Greek emperor) under the walls of Constantinople. The same day he enters (E) the city, and is honourably received by the emperor, who makes him rich presents. On the third day he sets out for Adrianople, and in the second day's march is met by Korshâb Muluk and Ornûs Beg: who, having withdrawn from thence in the night, fell prostrate at his feet; and kissing, according to custom, the ground, salute him emperor in the name of the European army.

ruined by mercy;

- e MUSA CHELEBI, deserted by his people, with a few attendants, resolved to retire to his old sanctuary Servia: but, being scarce out of the suburbs, he is surprised by Mohammed, who had advanced before with a select band of soldiers. Despair rendering him valiant, he draws up his men, and fights with great bravery: but being overpowered by numbers, at last betakes himself to flight, yet is soon overtaken by a horseman, and brought to his brother, who instantly puts him to death; after he had administered the Turkish affairs in Europe three years and six months (F). This event happened in the year of the Hejrab 816. Mohammed, to reward the soldier, made him one of his counsellors, and at last advanced him to the prime wazîrship. He afterwards became a famous general.

taken, and slain.

Hej. 816.
A. D. 1413.

^b CANT. ubi sup. p. 65—68.

(A) Most of the Christian writers ascribe this expedition to Cyric lebi, whom Cantemir takes to be Soleyman, and places it in the year 1409.

(B) Muluk, Mulk, or Molk, is the proper name; Korshâb signifies the One-eyed king.

(C) Others read Ewrenus for Ornus; that is, Honorius, who seems to have been a convert from the Greeks.

(D) The Turkish writers seldom give the names of Christian princes, only mention their titles and dominions: as Majar Kirâli, king of Hungary; Nmche Kirâli, king of Germany; Rûm Tekkuri, emperor (or governor) of the Romans, &c. But it appears from the Christian historians, that this was George, Despot of Servia, whose daughter Morâd II. married, and after deprived her two brothers of their sight. Cant.

(E) Prince Cantemir says, that the passage of Mohammed through Constantinople, and the honours paid him there, are not mentioned by any Greek or Latin writer, except Phranza: but we shall see hereafter that Dukas mentions them; and ascribes his last expedition wholly to the invitation of the emperor Manuel.

(F) The Christian writers differ much from the Turkish in the years assigned to the reign of these three sons of Eâ-yezîd. They give to Soleyman six years; to Or Khân, Musa (his pretended uncle), and Mohammed, fourteen years; whereas the Turks, assigning to the last eight years and ten months, allow to the three twenty years two months: so that the interregnum lasted eleven years and four months. Cant.

Musa Che-
lebi.

Designs against Greece;

Subdues Servia;

Besieges Constantinople.

Mahomet sent for.

Musa defeated, and slain.

Remark.

THE story of Musa is told by Dukas so differently in almost every circumstance, that we shall give it from that author separately, not fearing to disgust the reader by repetitions. This prince, after the death of Musulmân (or Soleymân), having assembled all the great men of Thrace, Macedonia, and other provinces, told them, that none but the emperor and the Greeks had brought the Scythians, Persians, and other foreign nations down upon them: that it was not just that Constantinople should extend its empire so wide, and possess so great a number of cities, especially Theffalonika, which had cost his father Bâ-yezid so much trouble to subdue: that therefore he was resolved, if possible, to take the mother of cities, and change the temples of idols into temples of God and their prophet.

His resolution being applauded by the assembly, he marched and subdued Servîa, which Stephen, son of Lazarus, had abandoned at the news of his approach. There he ravaged the country, carried off the handsomest young men, and put the rest to the sword, feasting his great officers over the dead bodies of Christians.

SOON after his return he sent to besiege Theffalonika; and, having taken every thing which is beyond the Strymon, except Seturion, marched towards Constantinople. As he found the towns through which he passed empty of people, whom Manuel had brought into the city, he reduced them to ashes. The besieged were so fortunate in their sallies, that they killed three Turks for every friend they lost: but as Musa could better spare ten soldiers than the emperor one, and, finding he carried on the attack with great vigour, Manuel sent to Mahomet his brother, who was at Prusa, to come to his assistance, and try to obtain the Othmân empire at the same time. Mahomet being arrived with his troops at Skutari, the emperor went with his galleys and brought him over to Constantinople, where he was received with great magnificence. Mahomet having been defeated in two sallies, he intreated Manuel to let him lead his troops towards Adrianople; from which course he proposed more advantage to both their affairs than by continuing in the city. The emperor, embracing him, gave his consent; and next day Mahomet set out, sending one half of his forces towards the Euxine sea, and directing his march with the other half to Adrianople.

As soon as Musa was informed of his departure, he pursued the troops which went towards the Euxine sea, and came up with them; but, being defeated, his soldiers lifted under Mahomet's ensigns. Musa fled, and fell in a marsh, where he killed an officer of the enemy, who pursued him. One of the officer's servants, willing to revenge his master's death, ran at the prince, and, having cut-off one of his arms, went and informed the emperor of what had happened. Musa had lost so great a quantity of blood from the wound, that when they came to look for him, they found him fallen-off his horse and dead. The body was carried to Mahomet, who having wept over it, according to custom, sent it to be buried at Prusa; after which he returned to Adrianople, where he received the homage of the great men.

WE must leave the reader to judge at his leisure, which history deserves belief most, with regard to the affair in question, the Turkish or the Greek; and shall only observe, that as Dukas seems to deserve full credit, especially with regard to the manner of Mohammed's obtaining the crown by means of the emperor Manuel's invitation, as well as of Musa's death (that author having been upon the spot when those affairs happened): his account as to Mohammed appears confirmed by the considerable cessions made by that Soltân to the emperor, and the regard he paid him during his reign.

* DUKAS, c. 19.

CHAP. VI.

The Reign of Mohammed I.

A. D. 1413.

5 Soltân, Mohammed I.
Hejran 816.

MOHAMMED, immediately after the death of his brother Musa, is proclaimed at Adrianople emperor of the Ali Othmân dominions (A), in the 39th year of his age. But he is scarce warm in the throne before he is threatened to be pulled off it: for Karamân Oglî (B) thinking this a proper juncture, when the Othmâns were embroiled in civil wars, to crush their power, assembles his forces; and, laying waste all Bitbunya, encamps under

(A) That is, the dominions of the sons or posterity of Othmân: Ali Othmân denoting not only the imperial race descended from Othmân, but also the whole Turkish nation in general. Hence Tevayfi Ali Othmân; that is, the Ali Othmân kords, or tribes. The emperors are stiled Ali Othmân Padishâb; that is, the emperors of the sons of Othmân. For this reason, prince Cantemir intituled his, The Ali Othmân History. Cantemir, p. 2. Note †.

(B) That is, the son or descendant of Karamân: which vague expression is made use of, instead of the name of the prince, through the whole race: so that there is no distinguishing one from another; but the history seems to be speaking always of the same prince.

A

^a under the walls of Prusa, burns the suburbs, and closely besieges the city one-and-thirty days. Mohammed on this news crosses the Streights of Kallipolis with his army, and strengthens his forces with those of Sab Beg and Ghermian Oglî: but Karamân, being informed of his coming, instantly withdraws from before Prusa, puts on the Nekkerchief (C), and entering the emperor's camp, confesses his fault on his knees, and asks pardon; which is granted him on certain conditions.

^b NEXT year Mohammed erects at Prusa a large Jâmi Imaret, and Madresch, with a spacious Khân, or exchange, for the use of merchants. But whilst he thought to take some repose, Karamân, hearing that his forces were dismissed, breaks the treaty without cause, and invades his dominions. The emperor, full of indignation, marches against him with chosen troops, and puts him to flight, though he fought bravely. Both the aggressing prince and his son were taken prisoners, and brought before Mohammed; who, reproaching him for his breach of faith, said, It was thy part to commit the treachery, and it is mine to act agreeably to my dignity: for it is inconsistent with the imperial honour to return like for like to wicked and profligate men. This spoken, the emperor dismissed him, and restores him his provinces; only placing garrisons in Sivrihissar, Nukteydak, Enishâbri, Sedi Shâbri, Numâd, and Ayn.

^c KARAMAN being thus humbled, Mohammed thinks it proper to chastise Isfander Beg, prince of Kastamoni, who was his confederate in the expedition. Accordingly, marching against him, he takes the principal towns of that country and Janik. Next year he reduces other places, as Buri, Jigba, Tosia, Bakirkuresi, with Changbîri, where Isfandiar resided, and distributes that prince's great treasures among the soldiers (D). At the same time he builds a stately palace (E) at Amasia ^d.

DUKAS places this transaction somewhat later in time. According to that historian, the emperor Manuel, presently after Mohammed's elevation to the empire, sent some of his chief officers to put him in mind of the promises he had made him while at Constantinople. The new Soltân faithfully discharged his engagements, restoring the forts about the Euxine sea and the Propontis, with those of Thessaly. And at dismissing the ambassadors, loaded with presents, said, Tell the emperor my father, that having been established by his succours and the grace of God in the throne of my ancestors, I shall for the time to come be as obedient to his will as a son ought to be to the will of his father; nor will ever fail to acknowledge his favours. ^{performs his treaty.}

^d Whatever he orders me to do, I shall execute with pleasure and dispatch. He gave likewise a kind reception to the ambassadors of Servia, Walakbia, Bulgaria, of duke Joannina, the Despot of Lacedemon, and the prince of Akkaia; did them the honour to make them eat at his table, drank to their health; and at their audience of leave said, Tell your masters that I offer them peace; that I accept of that which they offer me, and that I hope the God of peace will punish those who violate it.

AFTERWARDS Manuel, sailing to the Morea, reduced to his obedience the prince of Akkaia and the Navarrois. Then leaving his son the Despot (F) behind, in his return conferred, at Kallipoli, with Soltân Mahomet, who went aboard his galley, and dined with him. ^{Morea reduced.}

^e IT is here Dukas tells us, that Mahomet, having settled the affairs of Europe, passed into Asia, and rebuilt the edifices which had been burned at Prusa by Karamân; who had plundered that city, and burnt the body of Bâ-yezîd, in revenge for having put his father to death at Kogni. But this invasion, he says, happened while the Soltân was at war with Musa; which is consistent enough with the Turkish account; and he places the chastisement of it some years (G) after. ^{Prusa rebuilt.}

MOHAMMED after this marches against Cineis; who, a little before the Soltân had declared himself against his brother Musa, fled from Thrace (H); and, passing into Asia, raised an army of Smyrnians and Thyreans (I), with which he took Ephesus; and, putting Musulmân's governor to death, resumed the power of a sovereign prince. The refusal of Cineis to surrender the places which he had seized, was the occasion of this expedition of the Soltân; ^{Chuneid takes Ephesus.}

^d CANT. ubi supr. p. 72.

A most barbarous practice; as if, instead of giving our kings since the conquest their proper names, we should call them all by one general appellation, the sons of William.

(C) A Turkish phrase, signifying surrender, or a petition for grace and favour, called Aman. Hence the saying, he put on the Nekkerchief; that is, he declared himself his subject for the future. CANT.

(D) It is common to promise the soldiers all the goods of the enemy, unless the city is taken by surrender; the walls only, and government of it, being reserved to the emperor. CANT. The marginal note of prince Cantemir's history says Isfandiar was taken and slain.

(E) For a place of retirement and diversion; this city having been an appendage for younger children.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(F) This was Theodore, who, as well as his elder brother Jçôn, had been proclaimed emperor; and was made Despot of Lacedemon in the Morea.

(G) In or after the year 1419, and the expedition against Cineis. He says, that Mahomet, to revenge the ashes of his ancestors, went and took Kogni (or Ikonium), burning several towns and villages in his way: but that, afterwards, he pardoned Karamân, who had fled, and restored him his province, on promise of fidelity to the Othmân family. Dukas, c. 22.

(H) Musulmân, or Soleyman, had made him governor of Bulgaria.

(I) Thyra, or Tyrea, a city near Smyrna. Dukas 19. It is still in being.

A a a

who,

A. D. 1419. who, having taken from him the city Cima, the fort of Archangel, called by the Turks Kag-biasfik, situate in the field of Menomena, with the city of Nymphæum, at length sat down before Smyrna, where Cineis had left his mother, his children, and Bâ-yezîd his brother, being retired himself to Ephesus. On the first news of the Soltân's arrival, the governors of the neighbouring islands, who hated Cineis, ran to receive him. The princes of Phoceæ, Karmiân prince of the Higher Phrygia, Mentakbia prince of Karia, the prince of Lesbos, the prince of Khio, the great master of Rhodes, and others, came to wait on him, and were received as kindly as if they had been his brethren. The city having been surrendered to him on the 10th day of the siege, in which he was assisted by those princes, he demolished the fortifications, and beat down the walls in several places; but suffered the inhabitants to continue there.

The citadel demolished.

He likewise, during the night, ordered the citadel to be ruined; which, having been destroyed by Timûr, the grand master of Rhodes had half rebuilt, in spite of Cineis. He was excited to this by the Mohammedans in those parts, who complained that it served to encourage the Ionian slaves to run away from their masters. The great master, who was very angry at this proceeding, threatened to make reprisals on his coasts, unless he suffered him to rebuild that fort. Mohammed answered with great moderation; and, after shewing the necessity there was of destroying that fort, as it was a continual cause of quarrels between the knights of Rhodes and the Turks, gave him leave to build another fort on the borders of Karia and Lycea (K). He heard no less favourably the demands of the princes of Khio, Lesbos, and the Phoceans, sending them all away well satisfied. He likewise pardoned Cineis; who came and took the oath of fidelity to him. Then giving the government of that province to the son of Alexander Susman, whom he had brought over to his religion, he returned into Europe.

Chuncid Beg submits.

Turkish fleet destroyed by the Venetians.

WHEN Mohammed came to Kallipoli, he sent a fleet against the duke of Naxos and other islands in the Archipelago, because he had not been to salute him, either at Smyrna, or since his return. The fleet, consisting of thirty gallies, both of two and three banks of oars, commanded by Ghiali Beg, landed at the isles of Andros, Paros, and Milos, where they did great mischief. The Venetians in the spring came to assist the duke, who was in their interest, with ten gallies, seven of which passed up the Streights of Hellespont as far as Lampsakus, in order to meet the Turks; who, coming out of the harbour of Kallipolis, the Venetians began the attack on the admiral-galley, and slew all the men with the admiral himself: they served the rest of the vessels in the same manner, in sight of the wives and children of the Turks, who stood on shore. In the evening they sounded a retreat, and carried back to Tenedos twenty-seven gallies of the enemy; where they put to death all the Turks, and such Christians as were in their pay.

NEXT spring the Venetian fleet came to attack a tower of Lampsakus, built by Musu'mân: but, being hindered to land by Khamfas, brother of the grand wazîr Bâ-yezîd, who commanded a body of 10,000 men, they went to Constantinople, after having beat down half of the tower from their ships.

Pretended prophet taken and slain.

ABOUT the same one Preklighia Mostafa, a Turkish peasant, signalized himself by preaching up a voluntary poverty, and the having every thing in common, except women. He wore only a single coat, and went with his head and feet bare. He appeared near the mountain Stilairum, at the mouth of the Ionian gulf, opposite the isle of Khio. His disciples pretended to be very fond of Christians, and even to believe the same faith. Two of them were sent by him to an old Greek monk in Kandia; who, after that, cried up Preklighia, pretending he was in the same monastery with himself at Samos, and that he crossed the sea (I) every day to converse with him. Susman's son, who had the government of Ionian, marching against Preklighia, was defeated by the inhabitants of the mountain, who gathered to the number of six thousand. They in like manner put to flight Hali Beg, governor of Lydia, and killed a great number of his men.

On this news Soltân Mohammed sent his son Amurat (or Morâd), only twelve years old, accompanied by his grand wazîr Bâ-yezîd; who, forcing the passes of the mountains with their troops, put all the inhabitants to the sword, till they came to the place which was guarded by men with one coat, where they met with stout resistance: but, after losing a great many men, the false monk and his disciples were obliged to surrender. They were all put to death, not one of them recanting. The impostor himself, after enduring various torments, was nailed to a cross, and carried through the streets of Ephesus. They believed he would come

(K) Accordingly we are told afterwards, that the grand master of Rhodes, having carried materials by sea into Karia, went and built the fort St. Peter on a mountain there. Mentakbia Eiebeg advanced, with design to hinder the work; but returned without doing any thing. The grand master left several knights of his order to guard it, and receive the Turkish slaves who escaped thither; who are called the freed of St. Peter to this day. Dukas, c. 22. This by the Greek chronology seems to be referred to the year 1419.

(I) It is to be understood, that he crossed the sea on foot, as he sent the Greek monk word he would do.

a again; and Dukas, our author, met with a monk who affirmed that he was not dead. Bâ-yezîd A. D. 1419. led his army back through Asia and Lydia, where he slew all the Turkish monks he met with, who made profession of voluntary poverty.

AT his return to Adrianople, Mohammed gave his son Morâd, though so young, the govern- Morâd at As- ment of Amasia, under the direction of an able counsellor, named Georgei Beg. This govern- masia.
ment bordered on the Persian Turks, who were neighbours to the Zazians and Persians, and lived under the command of Karayuluk, son-in-law of Alexis, emperor of Trebizond ^a.

LET us now in our turn have recourse to the Turkish historians. Mohammed, having weak- Walakhians ened his enemies in Asia, repairs to Adrianople, and from thence marches against the Walak- bridged.
bians, whom he routs: then, ravaging the country, takes Severîn (K), with the castles Sakche Hej. 820.
and Kala (L), situate beyond the Danube. He likewise fortifies Gbirghiow with new works, A. D. 1418.]
and a garrison; so that the Walakhians could no more pass that river. Being thus pent up, and despairing to preserve their liberty, they submit to pay an annual tribute; the sons of the prince and of three great men being given as hostages. But the fruits of all his victories had Mostafa, an like to have been wrested from him by an impostor, the domestic of a petty prince, called impostor; Peder Ulledin and Semadin Ogli (M). This man pretending to be Mostafa, Bâ-yezîd's eldest son, who fell in the battle with Timûr, and, being assisted by his master, gathered a numerous band of followers, with whom he destroyed Zagara (N) and the neighbouring countries.
Next spring he besieged Nicea; which alarming the court, Mohammed crosses over into Asia with his forces. The counterfeit Mostafa raises the siege, and boldly marches with his fol-c lowers against the emperor: but at the first charge is put to flight, and being taken with his lord, they are both hanged ^e.

THIS interesting affair is very differently related by Dukas; and, from the circumstances, appears in Wa- we should think with more truth. This historian informs us, that in spring Mohammed passed Walakhia.
with a great army into Asia (O); and being informed, at his return to Adrianople, that Mos- A. D. 1419.]
tafa, the youngest of Bâ-yezîd's sons was in Walakhia, he sent two trusty persons to take off the head of Cineis, whom he had made governor of Nikopolis, on the Danube, in order to defend the frontiers on that side. But that crafty traitor had fled before hand to Mostafa, and taken the oath of fidelity to him. These two having crossed the Danube, and entered Thessaly with a considerable force of Turks and Walakhians, Mohammed marched in quest of d them: and, having routed their army, pursued them to the gates of Thessalonika, where they were very kindly received by Demetricus Laskaris. Leontarius and Mohammed next day sent to demand them, threatening otherwise to besiege the city; yet he refused to comply; without acquainting the emperor with the affair.

THE Soltân thought that no more than reasonable, and at the same time wrote to the Manuel pro- emperor, desiring that what had happened might not disturb the good understanding which tests him.
was between them. Manuel, after shewing that he could not without dishonour deliver up a refugee, promised to detain Mostafa and Cineis prisoners so long as Mohammed lived; who, on the emperor's demand, allowed 300,000 aspers a year for their maintenance, and gave him liberty to dispose of them after his own death, as he, the emperor should think fit, or his e successors should deserve. This agreement was reduced to writing, and confirmed by the emperor's oath. Mostafa and Cineis were hereupon sent up to Constantinople, where they were confined; but, for fear they should escape, were some time after, for more security, transmitted to Lemnos. The same author also places the invasion of Walakhia after the rebellion of Mostafa, as a punishment for encouraging his designs: but only says, the army sent A. D. 1420.]
by Mohammed ravaged that country with fire and sword, without mentioning its submission to become tributary.

AT this time a native of Philadelphia, a cunning knave, who, during the Scythian invasion, Treacherous informed against the rich Christians (many of whom were tortured and put to death, for not interpreter.
paying the sums demanded) put himself into the service of an officer of the court; and, for f want of an interpreter, was employed soon after in that capacity. By this means this person, who was called the Theologian, contracted an intimacy with Bâ-yezîd (P), Mohammed's prime Wazîr,

^a DUKAS, c. 20, & seqq.

^e CANT. ubi sup. p. 74, & seqq.

(K) A tower, now decayed, where is still seen, at the bottom of the Danube, the foundations of a stone bridge, of admirable workmanship, said to be built by Trajan when he marched against the Scythians. Cant.—This author promises to enlarge on it in his description of Moldavia; which his translator informs us was printing in Holland in 1744.

(L) No city of this name is now to be met with; but as it is placed between Sakche and Gbirghiow, it seems to be either the town of Taia or castle of Tulche. Cant.

(M) As being the son of Semadin. Cantemir supposes him to be one of the Persian governors who revolted in the time of Jenghiz Khân.

(N) There is a Zagra in Europe also, near Philippolis, called Eski Zagara, or Old Zagara. Cant.

(O) This was in his expedition against Karamân, as mentioned in a former note.

(P) This Bâ-yezîd, according to Dukas, was an Albanian slave, who had followed Mohammed in all his misfortunes. He suffered incredible fatigues to serve him; when,

A. D. 1421. Wazîr, to whom he betrayed the secrets of the Romans; whereby he arrived to such a degree of honour that he became the emperor's chief interpreter, and often dined with Bâ-yezîd, and Mohammed himself: yet although he was suspected by the Romans, the emperor never had the least distrust of him. But the sudden death of Mohammed ruined all his evil designs ^f.

Mohammed dies. Hej 824. WE must return once more to the Turkish historians, to finish the reign of Mohammed. According to them, the rebellion being quelled, that prince, in 824, takes Eski Gbeliboli, or Old Kallipolis (Q), Tarkli (R), and Hergbe: but at his return from this expedition he is seized with a flux, of which he died (S). Morâd, his eldest son, whom he had appointed by will for his successor, being then at war with part of the army in Rum-ili (or Thrace), the prime wazîr Ibrahim (T) conceals the emperor's death for one-and-forty days, in such a manner that not one of the lords of the court had the least intimation of it, whilst himself directed affairs as if by his order. At Morâd's return he delivers up to him the army and kingdom. This Ibrahim is called by the Turks their Ulysses, and had the title of Khân (U) given him by the new emperor for this piece of service ^g.

His sons. ACCORDING to Dukas, when Mohammed was near his end, he sent for his wazîr Bâ-yezîd, and conjured him to set his son Morâd on the throne. The two youngest, one eight, the other but seven years old, he assigned to the care of the emperor Manuel, for fear Morâd should strangle them; as he afterwards did. The Soltân thought by this means he had secured the throne to his eldest son, and the lives of the younger; while the emperor conceived great hopes of keeping Amurat within bounds, by threatening him with his hostages, or making them his friends in case they succeeded to the Othmân empire; but the event shewed that both were mistaken in their conjectures ^h.

Reign and character. MOHAMMED lived forty-seven years, and reigned eight years ten months. A Soltân famed for justice and clemency. He is extolled not only for restoring the Othmân empire from the low condition it was reduced to by the invasion of Timûr, and more destructive quarrel of his brothers (X); but also for leaving it enlarged to his successors ⁱ.

DUKAS observes, that all his predecessors had died violent deaths; and imputes his easy departure as a reward for his keeping his engagements with the Greeks, and treating with so much gentleness other Christian nations; having been at peace with all except the Venetians ^k.

^f DUKAS, c. 21, 22. p. 77.

^g CANT. ubi supr. p. 76.

^h DUKAS, c. 22.

ⁱ CANT. ubi supr.

^k DUKAS, c. 22.

when, after the death of his father, he was briskly pursued by the forces of Tamerlan in the mountains of Galatia, near Ancyra. His feet being so swelled with walking that he could no longer go, Bâ-yezîd carried him on his shoulders for several days, till he got into his father's dominions. He almost famished himself to supply Mohammed, and went in the habit of a monk through the towns and villages, begging bread for him to eat.

(Q) The antient Kallipolis seems to have been a fortress placed at the Hellepont; but is now either destroyed, or lost under another name. Cant.

(R) Or Tarakli, as elsewhere written.

(S) According to Dukas, he was taken with an apoplexy as he was hunting, and died of a second fit the next day.

(T) Dukas makes two Wazîrs, this Ibrahim and Bâ-yezîd, above mentioned, whom he represents as the prime Wazîr. The same author says, that Mahomet's body was concealed for forty days, from all but the two Wazîrs and two physicians, who made a shew of visiting him every day, and used many arts to amuse the great officers of the court with an account of the state of his health.

(U) Prince Cantemir, in a note, gives a large account of the family of this Ibrahim Khân, and the great privileges which they enjoy. Among which are those of making use only of concubines instead of wives; of being visited twice a year by the Soltân; and of the Soltân's rising a little from his seat when they enter.

(X) Both Christian and Turkish historians agree, that after the defeat of Bâ-yezîd the Othmân affairs were reduced to so low an ebb, that had the Christian princes united, they might at least have driven the Turks out of Europe. Cant.

C H A P. VII.

The Reign of Morâd II.

A. D. 1422. 6 Soltân, Morâd II. Hej. 825. MORAD was but eighteen years of age in 825, when his father died, and he ascended the throne. Soon after an obscure person (different from the other impostor) (A) assumed the name of Mostafa, son of Bâ-yezîd. This man, who first appeared about Saloniki (or Thessalonika), soon gained so much credit by his name, that he persuaded not only the common people, but the European soldiers, with many officers, that he was the very person ^d

(A) Prince Cantemir affirms this without any proof; and supposes the Greeks favoured the imposture, in order to avert the last danger, as he phrases it. But it appears from the Greek account, that he was the same person who opposed Mohammed; who, in the treaty made between him and the emperor, seems to consider him as his real brother. Nay, Cantemir himself confesses in his history, p. 83, note (11), that the Turks allow a person he pretended to be. After he had allured to his interest all Rumelia, and assembled a considerable army, he, with the connivance of the Greek emperor (B), passed into Asia, in order to seize Prusa, the seat of the Othmân empire. A. D. 1422.

MORAD sends the prime Wazîr Bâ-yezîd into Asia, with chosen troops, to stifle the flame in its birth: but, being met by Mostafa, he is killed, and his forces routed. The Soltân upon this repairs to Seyd Bekbar, a holy man, who, in the opinion of Turks, could obtain of God whatever he prayed for; and desires his mediation for a blessing on his arms. The saint having gained his point by the intercession of Mohammed the prophet (C), girds the Soltân with a sword, and sends him forth with a go on and prosper, most august emperor, for victory attends you. Morâd, on this encouragement, leads his army against the counterfeit Mostafa; who undauntedly waited his coming near Ulubâd (D), the bridge of which he ordered to be broken down. The Soltân encamps on the other side of the river, in expectation of the promised assistance from heaven, and perhaps to extinguish by delay the first heat of sedition. However that be, on the seventh day of this suspension of hostilities, the impostor was seized with a violent bleeding of the nose, which held him three days. His soldiers, considering this accident as sent from God to blast his designs, desert him in the night. This obliges him to follow: but, not being able, by reason of his great weakness, caused by loss of blood, to fly fast enough, he was over-taken, extremely ill, in the town of Kara Agaj, by Morâd; by whose command he was instantly beheaded¹. Another Mostafa rises: is put to death.

THE history of Mostafa, and the occasion of his appearance, may be better understood, we conceive, from the Greek than the Turkish historians; who seem to have concealed some facts, and altered others, to serve their partial views. According to Dukas, Mohammed being interred at Prusa, and Amurat proclaimed, their next care was to secure peace in the east, by a treaty with Karamân, and then settle matters with the emperor. But Manuel prevented them, by sending ambassadors to compliment Morâd, and demand his two brothers, of whom he was left guardian by Mohammed's will. They had orders also to let him know, that if he refused, they had another successor to establish in his place, who would soon be master of Macedonia and Thrace, as well as of Asia and the east, in a little time after. The emperor communicated this design to Mostafa himself. The emperor disobliged:

BA-YEZID answered, in the name of the young Soltân, that they were very desirous to preserve peace with the emperor; but could not consent to deliver the children, as it was contrary both to reason and the laws of their prophet, to suffer the sons of Musulmâns to be educated by Kaburs (E). The emperor, piqued with this answer, resolved to act pursuant to the conditions on which, as hath been already mentioned, he received Mostafa. Accordingly he sent Demetrius Laskaris Leontarius with six galleys to Lemnos, to bring up that prince and Cineis, and then with the troops which were in the galleys to make him governor of Thrace. sets up Mostafa, on certain conditions.

ON this occasion Mostafa swore never to act contrary to the emperor's will, to obey him as a father, and give his son in pledge of his performance. He promised likewise to deliver Kallipolis in the Kbersonesus, the countries adjoining to the Euxine sea as far as Walakkia, and certain places of Thessaly as far as Erissus and mount Athos; which, however, it was no easy matter for him to give, because he was first to take them from the enemy. The conditions being agreed to, they sailed for Kallipolis; which city, upon a speech made by Mostafa, mixed with promises and threats, surrendered. Then, leaving Cineis to attack the citadel, he marched to Hexamilion, where he was saluted sovereign by all the country.

¹ CANT. p. 78—81.

allow that the counterfeit Mostafa so exactly resembled the true, that they who had before been about the latter as his guards, affirmed that he was the same. Neither was the emperor under the necessity which Cantemir supposes to set up a pretender; since the empire was much enlarged, and himself raised in credit, since the death of Bâ-yezîd; in whose time his dominions were confined to the walls of Constantinople. Besides, it would have been both base and impolitic in him to have espoused the part of one he knew to be an impostor against his benefactor Mohammed.

(B) Cantemir says, he should have taken this for a calumny of the Turks, for a pretence to make war against the Grecians, did not Phranza, lib. i. c. 39 and 40, tell us, that Mostafa was brought by John Paleologus out of Peloponnesus (or the Morea) to Kallipolis, and set over the western parts of the (Turkish) empire, tho' earnestly desired by Morâd not to lend him any assistance. Cant. Dukas writes to the same effect.

(C) The history relates, that Seyd Bekbar being, by way of extasy, snatched up the following night into heaven, sees the pure and immaculate spirit of Mohammed; and, thrice kissing the dust of his feet, beseeches him as often to obtain victory for Morâd. To this petition Mohammed at length answers, for my sake the divine majesty has heard Morâd's prayers; and therefore tell him, God will be with him, and give him victory. This idle passage, which would dishonour the text, may deserve a place in our notes, to shew to what silly extravagances the great as well as small are carried by the frenzy of superstition. Prince Cantemir observes on this occasion, that the Turks, though they hold the dead give no assistance to the living (from whence, say he, the heretics of our age have sucked their poison), yet believe, that Mohammed's soul, by a peculiar privilege, hears and conveys the prayers of men to the throne of God.

(D) Or Loupadion, about 30 miles from Prusa to the south-west.

(E) A corruption of Gaurs; that is, infidels; for so they call Christians, in the same manner as Christians call them.

A. D. :422.

Moſtafa defeats and kills Bâ-yezîd.

WHEN news of this was brought to Prusa, the great men about Amurat advised him to a send Bâ-yezîd, whom they hated for his pride as well as good fortune, against Moſtafa. The Wazîr, having poſted to Adrianople, raiſed an army of 30,000 men; and had not marched far from the city, when he was informed by his ſouts, that Moſtafa, who advanced at the head of very numerous forces by the way of Kariopolis, a very populous city lately built by the Turks, was near at hand. The armies being in ſight, Bâ-yezîd made a ſpeech againſt Moſtafa; telling them, that he heard the Grand Signor ſay that he was not the real ſon of Iltrim (F) Bâ-yezîd; but an impoſtor. Moſtafa, on the other hand, leaving the command of the army to Cineis one of the moſt brave and able commanders of his time, retired to an eminence, and from thence harangued the enemy; telling them, among other things, that it would be eaſy to make-appear he was the ſon of Ilderîm, and was ready to decide the diſpute with his b nephew Amurat by ſingle combat. He afterwards exhorted them, with promiſes of great rewards, to join his intereſts.

THIS ſpeech had ſuch an effect, that the generals (G) who commanded the two wings of the enemy's army, went over to him. Bâ-yezîd, finding things take ſo ſtrange a turn, thought it his ſafeſt way to ſubmit too; and, a lighting from his horſe, with his brother Kamzas, went and threw himſelf at the feet of Moſtafa. But Cineis, who owed him a grudge, ordered him to be carried out of the camp, and beheaded; ſaying at the time of execution, wicked as you are, you cauſe men to be deprived of thoſe parts which make them men: for he had formerly ordered Adulas, Cineis's ſon-in-law, to be caſtrated (H): however he ſpared Kamzas on account of his youth, and made him his ſlave, little thinking that he would prove his ruin. Moſtafa c on this ſucceſs marched to Adrianople, where he was joyfully received; and the gariſon of the fortrefs of Kallipolis, deſpairing to defend themſelves, gave it up by capitulation.

DEMETRIUS LEONTARIUS, who expected to be put immediately in poſſeſſion of the place, according to agreement, was landing the arms and ammunition out of the galley to carry them into the citadel, when Cineis arrived unexpectedly; and, ſeeing the Turks uneaſy at ſo ſudden an alteration, told Demetrius very roundly, “ that he was not to imagine that they had fought “ and run ſo many dangers for his ſake; or expect that they would give up the citadels and “ towns: that he ought to be content with ſome preſents for his ſervices; and be well ſatisfied “ that they ſuffered him to return to Conſtantinople, conſidering the ill treatment they had “ received at Lemnos, and the outrages committed by the monks of a Pammakarifte mona- d “ ſtery.”

By Chuncid's advice breaks his promiſe with the emperor; who drops him.

DEMETRIUS, no leſs irritated than ſurprized at this diſcourſe of Cineis, who had no buſineſs, he ſaid, to take upon him to talk in ſuch a ſtrain of matters which did not belong to him, went immediately on board his gallies, and waited for the answer of Moſtafa. This latter ſoon after came on board, and made an apology for not delivering up Kallipolis; alleging, that it was better to break his oath than injure religion, by putting the pious and faithful into the hands of the wicked and infidels; or ſubjecting a people, who ſerve the Deity, under the dominion of others, who are perfect ſtrangers to the God of heaven and earth. He added, that, ſhould he commit ſuch a horrid impiety, the Muſulmâns would not ſuffer him to reign over them.

DEMETRIUS heard this diſcourſe in the ſame poſture as a lion, whoſe prey has eſcaped out e of his paws, holding down his head, and for rage beating the earth with his tail *. By way of answer he reproached the Othmân family with breach of faith. He ſaid, “ Or Khân kept “ neither his treaties nor oaths: that Iltrim Bâ-yezîd imitated his perfidy, and was puniſhed for
“ it, as well as Muſulmân and Muſa, his (Moſtafa's) two brothers: that none but his brother “ Mahomet had obſerved his intreaties, and found an eaſy death: that he could not long “ eſcape divine vengeance, if he did not alter his conduct.” Then he put him in mind of his obligations to the emperor; telling him, “ that he would have been ſtrangled, if Manuel “ had delivered him up to his brother Mahomet: that the Romans had, for his ſake, borne
“ the reproach of doing what was unjuſt and criminal; but that, however, they had aſſiſted “ him, and even raiſed him to the throne.” Demetrius after this ſet ſail for Conſtantinople ¹. f

THE emperor Manuel, grieved as well as enraged at this diſappointment, at length ſent to Morâd; offering to re-eſtabliſh his intereſt, provided he would perform his father's will, and

* DUKAS, c. 24.

¹ Ibid. c. 23, & ſeq.(F) A corruption of Ilderîm; which ſignifies lightening or thunder.(G) In the original, Soltâns is put inſtead of generals, by a cuſtom among the Greeks, of confounding diſtinc-tions of dignity.(H) When Mohammed was preparing to go and attack Smyrna, about 1415, Bâ-yezîd, who was his Wazîr, wrote to tell Cineis, that in caſe he would let him have his daughter in marriage, he ſhould enjoy Ionia in peace.Cineis, to ſhew that he rejected this propoſal with the greater contempt, gave his daughter in marriage to Adulas his ſlave, firſt making him free. At the ſame time uttering reproachful expreſſions againſt Bâ-yezîd; which he bade the meſſenger tell him. The Wazîr having ſoon after taking Nymphæum, of which Adulas was governor, in revenge to Cineis, had him caſtrated.
Dukas, c. 21.

a give him his two young brothers in hostage. Mean time Mostafa, having put things in order at Kallipolis, returns to Adrianople: where finding in his brother's palace inestimable treasures, as well as beautiful women, he gave himself up to pleasure; while Amurat, who was not yet turned of twenty, committed the same kinds of excesses at Prusa. However, he did not so wholly abandon himself to voluptuousness, as to neglect the means of recovering what was lost. He had still a great number of able counsellors about him; who, being informed of Mostafa's indolence, and in what manner he had served Leontarias, they advised him to send Abraham (rather Ibrahim), son of Ali, a wise and virtuous man, who succeeded Bâ-yezîd as prime Wazîr, ambassador to Constantinople. Being admitted to audience, after mentioning the assistance which he had given Mohammed against Musa, he desired that the emperor would afford Amurat the same succour; promising, in recompence, to deliver whatever he should demand, excepting Kallipolis and his two brothers. But, as the emperor would not agree to those exceptions, the ambassador staid a long time at Constantinople without doing any thing.

MEAN time Cineis, being informed of the preparations made by Amurat, and that he had Mostafa not only sent an embassy to the emperor, but had obtained a promise from John Adorno, grows indolent; governor of New Focea, to assist him with ships to carry over his forces into Europe; he went and reproached Mostafa with neglecting his affairs, advised him to prevent the enemy, and pass the straits with pretty numerous forces. As soon as Amurat knew that Mostafa had taken the field, he marched to Lopadion with a small army. Besides other good officers, c he had with him Hamza Beg, brother of Cineis, who had followed him from his youth. As they arrived first at the bridge, they broke it down; so that Mostafa, not being able to cross the marsh, encamped on the side of it. By this means Amurat gained time to assemble his forces, while Mostafa could neither pass the morass, which was deep, nor march round it, on account of the length of the way and interposition of mountains.

THE two armies being situated in such a manner, as not to be able to offend each other, d deserted by some of Amurat's officers told Hamza, that in case his brother Cineis could be prevailed on to Cineis; quit Mostafa's interest, they would procure the province of Atin (or Aydin) for him and his descendants, only swearing fealty to Amurat. Next night Hamza sent one of his servants, who, by swimming over the marsh, got to the tent of Cineis, and proposed an interview from d his brother. They met at the place appointed. Cineis was not well pleased that they should offer him for his friendship nothing but what was his own before: however, he told his brother, that since he had taken the trouble to come to talk to him about the affair, he would for the future serve Amurat faithfully, and fulfil his promise the next night. Adding, that if it had not been for his coming, he intended to have gone into Ionia, and perhaps have come to blows with Atin's grandson.

THE night following, Cineis having ordered his candles to be lighted up in his tent, departed secretly with seventy chosen persons, and made such haste, that he arrived at Smyrna in the who takes close of the next day; where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants. Mostafa, Atin's grandson, being informed of this, marched from Ephesus, with design to give him battle: e but Cineis, having gathered an army of about 2,000 Turks, his antient friends in that neighbourhood, met the enemy at Mausalion, and defeated them, killing Mostafa himself with a blow of his iron mace. Hereupon his troops submitted, and conducted the victor in triumph to Ephesus; where he ordered the corpse of the dead prince to be buried in the tower with those of his ancestors^m.

As soon as the flight of Cineis was known in the camp of the other Mostafa, the army, Mostafa flies; concluding he was gone over to Amurat, began to retreat in great confusion; while the enemy cried out to them, Dur, dur Katlan; that is, Stop, and don't fly: for as the bridge was broken, they could not come near them. However, Amurat having repaired it the same day with long beams of timber, got over and pursued the enemy, many of whom joined him; while f Mostafa, posting to Lampsakus, crossed over to Kallipolis with only four servants, and there gathered what soldiers he could. Mean time, Amurath dispatched a courier to Focea to inform Adorno of what had happened, and order him to repair to the straits with all his ships; which being ready, were at Lampsakus as soon as the Soltân. This prince with his troops immediately went on board, to the great chagrin of Mostafa: who, seeing seven great ships with a number of barks advancing towards his coast, sent to offer Adorno 50,000 crowns not to land Amurat in Europe; which he refused. In spite of opposition he put on shore 500 Franks at Kallipolis; who advancing a mile from the coast, gave opportunity to Amurat to land with the rest of the troops; which, falling on the enemy, soon routed them, with great slaughter. Mostafa retired to Adrianople; and carrying off the treasure, fled into Walakhia.

^m DUKAS, c. 25.

A. D. 1422.

but is taken,
and slain.

AMURAT having staid three days at Kallipolis, halted to Adrianople, at the head of a numerous army. There he feasted Adorno and his 2000 Italians; remitted him the arrears due for alom (F); gave him the fort of Peritheorion in the west; and the commerce of Foceæ for life. He likewise gave them all presents; and with the greatest testimonies of gratitude sent them home. At the same time, to pursue his blow, he sent several bold young men after Mostafa; who, coming up with him at the Danube, brought him back to the city. Amurat ordered him to be hanged in the public market-place, to confirm by the ignomy of his punishment the common opinion of people, that he was no other than an impostor, set up by the emperor Manuel; although in reality he was the son of Bâ-yezîd."

Hint to historians.

FROM this and many other instances of the great disagreement there is between the Turkish and Greek writers, the reader may perceive the absolute necessity which an author is often under of varying his method of compiling history: for such incompatible accounts of affairs will not admit of being blended together. On the other hand, to give the history only from one side; or sometimes from one, sometimes from the other, at the compiler's pleasure, would be attended with partiality and imperfection, as we find too often the case to be. The only way therefore to avoid those blemishes, is to give, as we have done, their accounts separately, where they happen to differ so irreconcilably: being sure that every judicious reader will rather pardon a little prolixity, than a conciseness which renders the history defective or obscure. Let us now return to the Turkish authors.

Karamân
Ogli chastised.

THE rebellion thus quashed, the Soltân resolves to chastise Karamân Oglî, named Mehemed Beg; who, on the Wazîr Bâ yezîd's defeat before-mentioned, thinking the Othmân affairs in a desperate state, resolved to seize part at least of Morâd's dominions. With this view he attacked Andalia, in hopes it would quickly surrender for want of relief: but being killed from the walls by a cannon ball, the Karamânians choose another general of the same name, and hastily raise the siege. Gamze Beg, governor of the city, seeing the enemy retiring in disorder, sallies out to pursue them. In taking the enemy's camp he finds Othmân Beg, sovereign of Tekke (G), who was come to Karamân's assistance, just dead of an acute distemper (H); but not suffering him to breathe his last, cuts off his head, and then subdues his territories.

Mostafa's
rebellion.

MORAD at his return to Adrianople intends to settle the state of the empire; but is prevented by the rebellion of his younger brother Mostafa Chelebi (I): who, allured by the deceitful counsels of the Greeks, rebels in Asia, seizes Nicea, but weakly garrisoned; and, being supplied with all necessaries by his abettors, strongly fortifies it. Mostafa (who besides the Greek soldiers had only a few plunderers), not daring to meet his brother in the field, shuts himself up in that city: but, being vigorously besieged by Morâd, on the 25th day it was taken, with his brother; whom he ordered to be strangled in his presence^o.

Constantinople besieged.

THE occasion of this rebellion is set forth by Dukas; who, introductory to it, relates a very material piece of history, omitted likewise by the Turkish writers. Morâd, says that author, having ascended the throne in the beginning of winter, made great preparations the spring following to besiege Constantinople. Hereupon, John Paleologus, to whom for a long time Manuel, on account of his great age, had left the management of his affairs, sent ambassadors to try to make up the breach between the two courts, laying the fault on the late Wazîr Bâ-yezîd, who had refused to put the two young princes into the emperor's hands, pursuant to their father's will; and treated his ambassadors very unworthily. But Morâd, without hearing or even seeing those ambassadors, kept them till all things were ready for the siege, and then dismissed them; saying, Assure your master that I will be with him presently. In short, not many days after he invested Constantinople with 200,000 men. The inhabitants suspecting that Korax the theologian, before-mentioned, had contrived some plot against the city, to be revenged for not being sent with the ambassadors to the Turkish court, with which he kept a close correspondence; the emperor Manuel, to remove those suspicions, and appease the tumult, sent Korax to Morâd, to dispose him to peace.

Korax suspected.

SOME say he was able to obtain no terms in the emperor's favour: others pretend that he promised to deliver up the city, on condition to have the government of it; and that one of his intimate friends heard the proposal. In effect, after he had given account of his embassy, the person who had discovered the treason declared it, and produced his witnesses. Hereupon a the emperor commanded both parties to be confined till next day; and, at the request of the Kandiots, who were his guards, delivered Korax to be examined by them, and condemned, if culpable. After having forced a confession by torture, they carried him before the palace-gate, and plucked out his eyes, with unheard-of inhumanity. He died three days after in prison. His rich moveables were pillaged by the populace, and his house burned. Morâd was greatly concerned at the death of Korax; and being informed, that Mikbael Pilla, a native of Ephesus, of noble descent, but of very profligate morals, was the only occasion of it, the Turks seized him; and, after tormenting him without pity, would have burned him, if he had not prevented punishment by turning Mohammedan. is cruelly butchered.

^a DUKAS, c. 27.^o CANT. Othmân Hist. p. 82, & seq.(F) This alom is got in a mountain to the east of New Focea; of which Dukas gives a large account, cap. 23.(G) A country not far from Kutabiyah. So called perhaps from some Tekke (or monastery). Othmân Beg seems to be one of the Pe-ri-ian (or Seljuk) governors so often mentioned. Cant.(H) The Turks will have this to be a miracle, in confirmation of Shaykh Bekhar's prediction. So strangely are men prepossessed with any prevailing superstition. Cant.(I) The same whom Phranza calls Muslaphopolus; and who, he says, came into Constantinople after the siege was raised by Morâd. Cant.

ALTHOUGH Manuel was almost reduced to death by extreme weakness, yet he studied how to embarrass Amurat. This Soltân having put to death one of his two brothers, Eliâz, cup-bearer to his father, fled with the other named Mostafa, into Paphlagonia. The old emperor being informed of this, sent to Eliâz to bring the young king to Prusa, and remitted him money to raise troops. While Amurat amused himself with preparing machines, and making slight skirmishes before Constantinople, a courier brings him news, that Mostafa was acknowledged Soltân by the inhabitants of Prusa, and that Eliâz had carried him to Nicea: hereupon he broke up the siege, after three months leaguer, and returned to Adrianople. At which time, Manuel, a very mild and wise prince, died, and left the empire to his son John; who, though the last of the Roman emperors in order of time, was one of the first on account of his merit. rebellion:

c AMURAT staid but three days at Adrianople; when, taking with him a small number of horse and foot, he passed over secretly into Asia; and being come near to Nicea, gave notice to his friends in that city, who, having raised a tumult in his favour, opened the gates, and received him in with his followers. There seizing his brother Mostafa, no more than six years old, he had him strangled, and his guards slain. He ordered the body, after he had viewed it, to be carried to Prusa; there to be buried. Thus far Dukas ^{p.} taken and strangled.

IN 827, Morâd marries the daughter of Laz Ogli (I), the Helena of the Servians, and of Isfandiar Beg her time. Next year, he marches against Isfandiar Beg, prince of Sinab (K) (or Sinope); who, fearing the Othmân power, resolves to attempt to weaken it. As he could not do it by force, he tries policy. To amuse Morâd, he makes peace with him, and gives his son Kasim Beg in hostage: but as soon as the Soltân had disbanded his army, he rushes out with forces he had long been preparing, and destroys the neighbouring cities of Tarakli and Burni. Morâd instantly assembles his troops; and passing into Asia, is met at Bolova by the nobles of Sinab; who, disclaiming the rashness of their prince, intreat him to depose Isfandiar Beg, and make his hostage-son their governor. Isfandiar Beg, alarmed at this unexpected proceeding, repairs forthwith to the Soltân, begs pardon, and offers his second son in hostage, with his only daughter, of incomparable beauty, in marriage (L); and thus appeases the storm. defeated:

MORAD, in his return from this expedition, takes Izmîr (or Smyrna), and the adjacent countries of Montesba, Aydin (M), and Sarikbân (N), with all the territories belonging to Hamid Ogli ^{q.} taken:

c To this time must be referred Morad's expedition against Chuneid Beg, or Cineis, though Chuneid Beg not mentioned by Saadi Effendi. The Soltân, says Dukas, on his return to Adrianople, studied how to reduce Cineis; to whom he dispatched an order, requiring him to send him his son immediately according to agreement, in case he desired to preserve his friendship; for that he was going to pass the Danube; letting him know, if he disobeyed, that he would treat him as it should please God. Cineis only returned this short answer, Do what pleases yourself; the success depends on God. summoned:

WHEN the Soltân had assembled all his forces, he placed at the head of them one Halil (or Khalil), a Roman by birth, who had espoused the sister of the Wâzir Bâ-yezîd, slain by Cineis. This last, hearing that Halil was on his march to Philadelphia, advanced to meet him as far as Thiatyra. His youngest son, named Kûrt, or The Wolf, began the battle by attacking the main body of the Soltân's army; which opening to let them pass, received no damage. Halil, presuming that the young unexperienced commander would return the same way, ordered his soldiers to hide their white turbâns. Mean time, Cineis stood ready to attack the front of Halil's army, while his son Kûrt charged it in the rear. As this last returned with a slow pace, slaying all in his way, he heard the sound of trumpets, and saw upon a hill, troops, with he is defeated:

^p DUKAS, c. 28.

^q CANT. ubi sup. p. 87.

(I) The son or descendant of Lazarus, Despot of Servia.

(K) It is in the oriental Siphab: which prince Cantemir, in a note, says, is a country of Asia Minor; but we find no such there. It is written Sinope afterwards.

(L) He did not marry her till four years after: and of her was born, Hej. 838, A. D. 1438, the Great Mohammed, conqueror of Constantinople, and scourge of Christendom. Cant. p. 85.

(M) A town of the province of Montesba. Cant.

(N) Or Citron-Linn, a town of the same country, and the country itself. Cant.

A. D. 1424.

flies to Karamân:

ensigns resembling his father's, who he concluded had routed the enemy; but finding, when a he drew near, that they were Halil's troops, he fled; and being hotly pursued, was taken.

As soon as this was known to Cineis, he retired with his army towards the mountains of Smyrna, and arrived at length at Hypsela, a small city on the Ionian Sea, over-against Samos, where he had ships and military stores ready to serve him in case of need. Halil sent Kürt to Morâd, who imprisoned him and his uncle Hamza; and making Halil governor of the province he had reduced, sent Kamza, his brother-in-law, the brother of Bâ-yezîd, the late Wazîr, to command the army in his room, with orders to pursue Cineis. Mean time, Cineis went to Amorium, with a view to persuade Karamân, Soltân of Kogni (or Ikonium) to join him against Morâd; but as that prince could not trust him since his desertion to Musulmân, the other could not prevail. However, he obtained of him a large sum of money, and 500 b men.

returns to Hypsela:

WITH this recruit, Cineis returned to Hypsela, and held out bravely against the enemy, who were 25,000 men. Their general Kamza, finding that he made no progress against a fort, which stood on a hill, desired Morâd to send him some Genoese vessels to attack the place by sea, toward which it lay open. Adorno being dead, one Palavicini undertook the affair; and appearing before the place with three ships, struck the inhabitants with terror: so that Cineis finding the day after that his soldiers began to mutiny, sent to offer to surrender the place to Halil, who commanded in Kamza's absence, on condition that he should save his life, and either carry or send him to Morâd. These terms being sworn to, Cineis and his brother Bâ-yezîd waited on Halil; who received them civilly, and gave them a tent to repose in. But c Kamza returning to the camp in the evening, and being informed by Halil of what had happened, sent four executioners, who knocked Cineis in the head while he was asleep, and cut off the head of his brother; not sparing a little child of his. As soon as those heads arrived at Adrianople, Amurat sent to inflict the same punishment on Kürt and his uncle Hamza; which put an end to the family of Cineis.

yields, and is slain.

Hejrah, 830.
A. D. 1426.
Venetians
attacked.

LET us now return to the Turkish historians. The east being thus quieted, in 830 he turns his arms against the Venetians, lays waste the island of Janta (or Zante), takes the castle called Ghiogherjinlik, or Pidgeon-house; and returns to Adrianople with great spoils. The same year, near Ergbene (O), he orders to be built, at a vast expence, a bridge of cut-stone, with 72 d arches; and on the west side a Jami, Bath, Imaret, and Khân.

Ghermian
Ogli surrenders.
A. D. 1427.

IN the year 831, Ghermian Oglî repairs to Morâd's court, and voluntarily delivers to him the keys of all his towns: in return, the Soltân, after an honourable reception given him, loaded him with royal presents, and makes him perpetual Sanjâk of Ipsalam.

AFTER this, in order to subdue what yet remained in Greece, under the dominion of the emperor of Constantinople, he assembles both his Asiatic and European forces; with which, meeting no opposition, he takes Selanik (or Thessalonika), Atineb (Athens), and Kartineb. All Greece being thus subdued, he, with a great number of captives and cattle, returns to Ederneb (or Adrianople).

Greece subdued.

HERE again the Greek historian must be called in to supply the deficiency, if not to rectify the mistakes of the Turkish. At the time that Amurat sent an army against Cineis, he dispatched ambassadors into Walakbia and Servia, to notify his advancement, and concluded a peace with the Waywodes of those countries: but conceived an irreconcilable hatred against the emperor John. Not being able to take Constantinople, he turned his arms against the Morea, and the maritime places about the mouth of the Strymon. He sent also a numerous army to invest Thessalonika, and ruin the neighbouring parts about that city and Setunion. However, at length, the emperor obtained a peace by giving up to him the cities and towns on the Euxine sea; likewise the forts which he had not been able to take by force, as Mesembria, Derkos, Setunion, and some others on the Strymon: besides which, he was to pay him 300,000 e aspers yearly.

Emperor pays tribute.

THE Soltân, being now freed from enemies, passed over to Prusa, and from thence marched f to Ephesus; where he received ambassadors from all parts. The Venetians were the only Christian nation who sent none. The reason was this: during the time that the Despot Andronikus, third son of the emperor Manuel, commanded at Thessalonika, after Mostafa left Lemnos, and before Amurat besieged Constantinople, Thessalonika was so straitly besieged by the governors of the neighbouring Turkish provinces, that the inhabitants, reduced to the last extremity, without hopes of relief, against the will of the Despot, sent to the Venetians, and delivered a up the city to them. The Turks, vexed to see the prey thus snatched out of their hands, A. D. 1427. redoubled their attacks; and the scarcity beginning to be very great in the city, the Venetians ^{the Venetians} fearing that the inhabitants, pressed with hunger, would drive them out again and receive the Turks, sent off the principal citizens to different parts of their dominions, under pretence that there were not provisions in the place sufficient for their subsistence; and put several to death in their passage, as if guilty of treason.

* DUKAS, c. 28.

* CANT. p. 84.

(O) A marshy place, half way between Constantaniyeh and Ederne. Cant. Or Edrene; that is Constantinople and Adrianople.

WHEN Morâd returned to Adrianople, the Venetians sent to demand peace of him: but he Saloniki sent word, that he would grant them none, unless they would abandon Theffalonika. Soon ^{taken} after, he dispatched Kamza, with the troops of the east, to besiege that city; and followed himself, to be present at the general assault. The garrison being in no proportion to the com- A. D. 1429. pass of the walls, and the besiegers at least a hundred to one, they scaled them without much opposition; and opening the gates, let in the whole army: who plundered the town, enslaved the inhabitants, and committed all sorts of violences. The Venetians fearing to lose Eubea also, on Amurat's return to his capital, made it their business to conclude a peace with him.

At this time, Dragul, a natural son of Miltza, late Waywode of Walakhia, entering that ^{Dragul fixes} country with some young men, natives thereof, whom he picked up at Constantinople, where ^{Walakhia:} he served the emperor as a soldier, in a little time grew very formidable by the numbers which joined him; and marching against Dam, nephew of Miltza, the then Waywode defeated him, and having cut off his head, usurped the state, Amurat, who had made peace with Dam, on his paying a small tribute, incensed at this proceeding, proclaimed a brother of the deceased for his successor, and sent him into Walakhia with a considerable force: but Dragul raising a great army, defeated and killed him also. Thus far Dukas ¹.

IN 838, Karamân Oglî Ibrahim Beg (P) rebels in Asia; where Morâd, crossing over with ^{Hejrah, 838.} his forces, takes Akshabri and Koniyab, each at the first attack. Ibrahim Beg, finding himself ^{A. D. 1434.} too weak to resist the imperial army, by the intercession of Menla Gamzeh (Q), at that time ^{Karaman} the most celebrated saint among the Turks, is pardoned and restored to his former state ^{rebels:}.

DUKAS, who ascribes this mediation to Karamân's wife, who was Amurat's sister, relates the cause of the war, and its consequences, in the following manner.

AMURAT, hearing that Karamân had an excellent Arabian horse in his stables, sent to him ^{war with} for it; not believing that he would refuse the person, who often used to ravage his territories, ^{Karaman:} and threaten farther acts of hostility: but Karamân, far from complying, asked the envoy, on shewing him the horse, if his master could mount him? The envoy not being able to answer the question, Karamân said, Tell your master that horse is so mettlesome he will never be able to mount him, for that is as much as I can do myself; and for the same reason I will not send it him. Amurat, enraged at this answer, immediately raised an army; and, passing over into Asia, entered Karamân's dominions, where he took Aksiari and Pegsiari (R), two small cities; the last but two days journey from Kogni (or Koniyab). Karamân, having no forces to resist the invader, sent the chief men of his court with the horse, and a great sum of money; offering also to relinquish the cities which he had taken ².

THE affairs of Asia being settled, in 839, a new enemy arises in Europe. Mora Krâli, ^{defeats Mora} brother of the Greek emperor (S), as he was besieging Ghiogherjinlik, before-mentioned, Kassim ^{Krâli,} Basba, Beglerbeg of Rum-eli, with a select band of men, unexpectedly attacks, and puts him ^{A. D. 1435.} to flight; slaying or taking most of his soldiers, with the spoils of their camp.

MEAN while a fierce war breaks out with the king of Hungary, whose forces prevailed ^{and the Hun-} oftener than the Turkish. At last, Mikhal ali Beg, the brave Othmân general, unexpectedly ^{garians:} invading the country, over-ran the richer provinces, carried away the inhabitants, and returned with great booty ([†]). The Hungarians taking Ali Beg's departure for a flight, rush again into the Turkish dominions, destroying all with fire and sword. Morâd, to check their boldness, after passing the Danube near Widdin, and laying waste the country, attempts to take Belgrade ^{attacks} (T), the great bulwark of Hungary; but the brave defence of the garrison, and the approach ^{Belgrade:}

¹ Cap. 28, & seq.

² CANT. p. 85.

³ DUCAS, c. 29.

(P) The same prince of Karamânia who surrendered his country to Soltân Morâd, and married his eldest sister. But how he came to fly out of Rûm-eli (or Thrace) into Asia, is not known. Cant. From this note Ghermian Oglî ought to be inserted in the text, instead of Karamân Oglî. But as to either of their being in Europe, we heard nothing before.

(Q) Or Mola Gamzeh, whose cell in Karamânia is religiously visited to this day. Cant.

(R) Akshabri and Begshabri.

(S) He seems to have been the Despot Demetrius; who about that time, according to Phranza, governed the greater part of the Morea. He is called the emperor's brother from the affinity he had with him. Cant. His affinity was that of brother to John Paleologus; who then reigned.

(†) The Christian annals ascribe glorious victories in those days to John Huniades, general of the Hungarians; but mention nothing of Mikhal Oglî's irruption into Hungary, and the calamities which attended it. Cant.

(T) Alba Graca, formerly Taurunum. From the places taken by Morâd in his return, it may be doubted, whether the Turkish losses in this siege were so great as the Christians represent them. Cant.

A. D. 1435. of winter, forced him to raise the siege, when he seemed be very near taking the city. However, in his way back, he subdues Sofia (U), with some other towns of Bulgaria.

MORAD was the more concerned at his disappointment before Belgrade, as he judged it owing, not so much to the valour of the besieged, as to the treachery of Valak Oglî (X); who was nearly allied to him by blood, and shared his friendship. On examination, it appeared, that he had not only discovered the Othmân councils to the king of Hungary, but also done his utmost to prevent the taking of Belgrade. The Soltân, therefore, to punish his perfidy, first commands the eyes of his two hostage-sons to be put out: then, marching with an army into Servia, takes the city of Semendra, on the Danube, seizes the territory of Zerîn Oglî (Y), and subjects the whole country to his dominion. Valak Oglî, escaping by flight, excites the king of Hungary (Z) against the Turks, and breaks off a treaty of peace; whereby he became the occasion of the following slaughters, and that king's death. This is the Turkish account of that expedition: let us now hear the Greek report.

Peace with
Servia:

AMURAT being informed, that Stephen, Despot of Servia, the son of Lazarus, and brother-in-law of Bâ-yezîd, was dead, sent ambassadors to his successor George, son of Vulk (A), to demand Servia; because Stephen had left no children, excepting a nephew of his sister Mary. George, to avoid a war, gave the Soltân his sister in marriage, with part of Servia, and a prodigious sum of money; and in return obtained leave to build a fort upon the Danube (called Sendrew).

enters Hungary.

A. D. 1429.

A. D. 1436.

WHILE Amurat was at Prusa on his expedition against Karamân, Dragul, Waywode of Walakbia, waited on him, and offered to give him a passage into Hungary as often as he would; also to conduct him to the borders of Germany and Russia. The Soltân, pleased with those tenders of service, caressed him extremely, made him sit at table with him, and gave presents not only to him but all his attendants; who were no fewer than 300. Towards the end of spring, Amurat having passed the Danube at Nikopolis, was gladly received by Dragul; who, in four days, conducted him to the frontiers of Hungary, which was all a desert, the inhabitants having, on his approach, abandoned the towns and villages. Being arrived near Zipene, a famous city, they durst not attempt it. The inhabitants, far from being afraid, set open their gates, and sallied out upon them. When they came to the Danube, they repassed it, and Amurat returned to Adrianople.

Invades
Servia:

SOON after, he sent to demand of George, Despot of Servia, the fort of Sendrew, which he had built. This he did by the advice of his Wazîr Fadulak; for he was very sincere and not given to malice. The Despot remonstrating, that he had a right to it by the faith of treaties, the Soltân besieged it; and, in three months, took it on capitulation. The eldest son of the Despot, who was in the place, was afterwards, with his brother, then at court, sent to Amastris, and had their eyes put out by the Wazîr's advice. The same summer he took Novopride, and returned to Adrianople: there Dragul coming to pay his respects to the Soltân, was sent in irons to the tower of Kalliopolis, under pretence, that he designed to have betrayed him in Hungary. Some time after, on giving his two sons in hostage, and taking a new oath of fidelity, he was discharged.

besieges
Belgrade.

THE beginning of next spring, Amurat, raising a numerous army, marched to besiege Belgrade; which George, Despot of Servia, having been apprehensive of, had given to the Hungarians, who were more powerful than he (B), and better able to defend it. The Soltân made great efforts against the city: but after six months siege, both by land and water, instead of gaining any advantage, lost abundance of his soldiers, not only by the plague, but by engines cast in the form of tubes; which, by means of a dust, composed of nitre, sulphur, and charcoal, shot out balls of lead, five or ten together, each as big as a walnut (C).

THE

† CANT. p. 85, & seqq.

(U) The capital of Bulgaria, and the residence of the Beglerbeg of Rûm-eli. It is a city without walls. Cant.

(X) This seems to be George, Despot of Servia; who, according to the Christian writers, gave his daughter in marriage to Morâd for the confirmation of the peace: and whose sons, after the rupture between their father and the Soltân, were deprived of their sight. The Christian authors are more accurate in giving the names of princes than the Turks. Cant.

(Y) The country along the river Savve, from its conflux with the Danube, to Peterwaradin, is so called by the Turks. Cant.

(Z) Ladislaus, king of Hungary and Poland, chiefly known by the slaughter at Varna. Cant.

(A) Hence called by the Turkish writers Valak Oglî, or the son of Valak; that is, Vulk.

(B) He had retired into Hungary during the siege of Sendrew; and garrisoned the cities which he had in that country with Hungarians.

(C) The reader must see, that guns and powder are here to be understood. As this is the first time the Greeks seem to have heard of either, the account which Dukas gives of the powder and ball, with their effects, may not be unacceptable. That author says, this composition smelt like bitumen and sparks of fire: that it was very apt to take fire; and that the fire, being restrained as it were by the balls, pushed the first ball, that the second, and so on successively to the last; which commonly flew a mile, and made its way through a man

^a THE emperor John this year failed to Italy, with the patriarch Joseph, and the other prelates, ^{A. D. 1433.} to assist at the council of Florence, in order to unite the Greek and Latin churches. The pope was at the whole expence of the voyage, and the decree of the union was signed: but the ^{Emperor in} Greeks, at their return, recanted, although some of the archbishops would not put pen to paper till the money promised them was paid down. Reports having been spread in the emperor's absence, that he was gone to stir up the Christian princes against the Turks, he, at his return, sent ambassadors to Amurat, to assure him of the contrary, and that he intended inviolably to preserve peace with him.

^b MEAN time the Despot George, perceiving that the enemy advanced daily into his dominions, applied for succour to the queen of Hungary; who governed during the minority of her son. The queen, considering that if the Turks were suffered to subdue Servia, they would invade her dominions next, ordered her general, John Huniades, to assist him. As the Despot had a great treasure, they soon raised 25,000 men, both horse and foot; and, crossing the Danube, advanced to Sofia; which they burned, with the towns and villages in the neighbourhood, casting the spoil into the river. Amurat, who had not time to assemble the troops of the east, set forward with those of the west. Both armies approached a town midway between Sofia and Philippopolis, called by the Bulgarians, Islatu, that is, gold, through very difficult roads.

^c THE Turks perceiving the Hungarian camp, durst not descend into the plain. Hereupon Servia the enemy, encouraged by their fear, ascended the mountain through clouds of arrows; but both parties, finding the situation incommodious for fighting, retired to their former posts. Then Amurat, reflecting that the Hungarians, who had never before passed the Danube, had passed it this time to assist the Despot of Servia, restored all the places he had taken from him, and even the fort of Sendrew: he likewise sent him his two sons, who had been deprived of their sight. He did the same by Drâgul's sons; and concluded a peace with the queen of Hungary and king of Poland, as guardians of the young king: whereby it was stipulated, that the Hungarians should not cross the Danube to make war against the Turks, nor the Turks pass it to make war on the Hungarians.

^d IT is observable, that our Turkish historians do not mention any thing of this restitution of Servia, made by Amurat, though confirmed by the other Christian writers; who likewise inform us, that he gave up his claim to Moldavia, and that part of Bulgaria which had been conquered from him. In like manner, they omit the recovery of Transylvania by John Huniades, and several other victories obtained against them by him, or but slightly touch on them. This shews them to be partial to their nation, and that neither a complete nor accurate history of their affairs is to be had solely from their writers; to whom we shall, in their turn, have recourse.

^e IN 845, Karamân Oglî Ibrahim Beg, the inveterate enemy of the Othmân empire, breaking the late faith confirmed by oath, miserably lays waste the Asian provinces, then destitute of defence (D). Morâd on this advice, flies over to Asia; and, having assembled an army at Prusa, sends before some chosen troops. These being met by Karamân's wife, the Soltân's eldest sister, she bids them halt till she spoke to her brother; who, by her eloquence and tears, was prevailed on to be reconciled with him: she engaging, that her husband should bind himself by oath never to act in the least against the Othmân empire, nor suffer his subjects on any account to enter it.

THE Othmân dominions being now in profound peace, and a treaty concluded with the Hungarians, Morâd, tired with reigning, in 847, voluntarily resigns the empire to his son Mohammed, and retires to Magnesia (E), with design to lead a private life. Karamân Oglî, who but the year before had obtained his pardon, thinking this a proper time to destroy the Othmân empire, which he had so long meditated, writes to the king of Hungary to take advantage of the present juncture, assuring him, that, if they attacked the Othmân dominions, both in

^z DUKAS, c. 29—32.

mian or horse, though covered with iron: that its force did not cease after passing through the body of a man; on the contrary, another behind him might be wounded by it: that when the ball is made of iron, and has been under the hammer, in hitting any thing, it takes a long figure, and penetrates like a stream of fire.

(D) Dukas informs us, that Karamân, during the Hungarian war, recovered the places Amurat had taken from him: that Amurat plundered Kogni, and carried away a prodigious quantity of gold and silver; that he created the city of Laranda with the utmost cruelty, and ravaged all the country of Karamân without sparing the Turks themselves.

(E) No Christian writer, whom I have seen, mentions this first abdication of Morâd. Cant. It is mentioned by Dukas, who observes, that he was scarce returned to Adrianople from the Karamânian war, when news brought, that his son Aladin, governor of Amasia, who had been at the plundering of Kogni, was dead; a handsome valiant prince, of 18 years; and that soon after, he, in an assembly of the great men, resigned the throne to his son Mohammed, and retired to Prusa.

A. D. 1443. Europe and Asia at the same time, they should quickly root out the whole Othmân race, and restore the injured and dispossessed princes to their former happiness. a resumes the Scepter :

battle of Varna :

THE king of Hungary had lately, with his hand on the gospel, sworn by the immortal body of Christ to observe the conditions of the peace : but, by the instigation of the pope, who absolved him from his oath, he assembles an army ; and, being joined by the Chechi (or Bohemian), Pole, Latin, and Bulgarian, Valak Oglî's auxiliaries, he leads them into the Musulmân dominions. The Turks, frightened at so great armies of warlike nations, with Mohammed's consent, send ambassadors to beseech Morâd to resume the reins of government, and defend the state in this critical juncture : Morâd, loth to leave the sweets of retirement, refused at first : but, on a second application, at length consents ; and, with the utmost speed, passes through Kallipolis (F) into Europe. The third day after his arrival at Adrianople, taking on him the office of general, he leads out his army ; and, by long marches, proceeds towards Varna, where the Hungarian king was incamped. For greater expedition, he marches before with the horse ; and, in three days coming in sight of the enemy, falls on them (G) : but not with the success he expected ; for the right wing being unable, for want of infantry, to stand the first shock, was put into disorder, and pursued above a mile. The young king of Hungary, who now thought the victory his own, in the heat of the battle challenges Morâd to single combat. The Soltân, accidentally meeting him, pierced his horse with a Jerîd (H). Hereupon, the king falling to the ground, the Janizaries, who were now arrived, instantly cut off his head ; and shewing it to the enemy on the point of a spear, cried out, Behold the head of your king. At the same time, the scattered horse rallying, they renew the fight, and defeat the Christians at the first charge (I). b overthrown.

Christians
Hej. 850.
A. D. 1446.

THEY made indeed some stands afterwards ; but night coming on, and wanting a leader (K), they are entirely routed, excepting some few who escaped in the dark, all the rest are slain, or taken prisoners (L), while Morâd leads back his army not much lessened, and laden with spoil ; after which he retires again to a private life at Magnesia. But, in 850, on account of a sedition of the Janizaries, who, for little or no cause, robbed or murdered all persons they met, without distinction of age or sex, he was prevailed on a second time to mount the throne (M) ; and sends Mohammed, who was too young to curb the mutineers, to Magnesia.

Expels Scânder Beg.
Hej. 851.
A. D. 1447.

THE sedition being presently appeased, he next year turns his arms against the rebellious Kastriot, Iskânder Beg (N), drives him out of his kingdom, lays waste all Greece and Arnaud (O) ; and in the Morea, takes by storm Balibadri and Akchebissar (P). In requital for Iskânder Beg's breach of faith, and causeless desertion of the Mohammedan religion, he converts all the churches of Arnaud into Jâmis, or mosks, and orders all the Epirots to be circumcised, or put to d

(F) Dukas says, that 125 gallies appearing before Kallipolis, to hinder his passage there, he crossed over near the sacred mouth (of the Bosphorus), altho' others were stationed for the same purpose on that side. According to other writers, these were the gallies of the Venetians and Pope ; who, by cardinal Julian, absolved Ladislaus from his oath, and precipitated the war to the king's destruction and his own ; for he was killed among the rest.

(G) Christian writers fix this battle to the 10th of November, 1444.

(H) A sort of light missive javelin, or dart ; with which they hit the mark with an exactness scarce to be matched by the most skilful gunners. Cant.

(I) The Turks have a tradition, as well as the Christians, that in the very engagement Morâd ordered the writing which he received from the king of Hungary, in confirmation of the peace, to be carried on the point of a spear through the ranks ; crying out, Let the Gaur (or infidels) come on against their God and sacrament ; and, if their belief of those things be certain, let them, O just God, declare themselves their own avengers, and punishers of their ignominy.

(K) Ladislaus being slain, Huniades, knowing all was thereby lost, retired hastily, but in good order, towards the Danube ; which having passed, his followers all dispersed. By this means he fell into the hands of Drakula, (or Dragul), lord of Moldavia, his mortal enemy ; who would have slain him immediately, had not he been prevented by the offer of a great sum for his prisoner's ransom, and an embassy from the Hungarians, threatening war if he did not deliver their general. On this, Drakula made great apologies for his treatment, and conducted him to the frontiers of Hun- gary : but some time after, Huniades, in the expedition he made to put Danus, prince of Walakhia, in possession of Moldavia, in his turn took Drakula, with his son, and put them both to death. Kbalk. l. vii. c. 3 & 8.

(L) Dukas, agreeable to other Christian writers, tells us, that of the princes and generals scarce Huniades himself escaped. The same author relates this battle (in which he says, the Turks made a terrible slaughter, and gained a remarkable victory) much after the same manner as in the text. He says, the fight was very furious from day-break till nine o'clock, in which time the Christians slew a great number of Turks ; and that at 10 o'clock, Ladislaus, surrounded by 500 men, would needs fall upon the enemy, in spite of all that Huniades could do to hinder him ; but that, as he advanced, his horse, receiving a wound, threw him, &c.

(M) Christian writers say, Morâd, after the battle of Varna, retired to a monastic life at Prusa ; but impute his quitting it again to the successes of Huniades in Hungary, and rebellion of Skânder Beg. Cant. Dukas says, all this was done by the means of Halil.

(N) That is, lord Alexander, the name given George Kastriot, youngest son of John, prince of Epirus ; who, being delivered in hostage to Morâd, was by him bred in the Mohammedan religion, and much beloved : but while the Soltân was engaged in the Hungarian wars, he withdrew into Epirus ; where, according to the Christian historians, he performed wonders against the Turks. He died at Lissa, in the Venetian dominions, in January, 1467, being 63 years of age. Cant.

(O) By Arnaud are signified Albania and Macedonia. Cant.

(P) The city Alba. Cant. Akchebissar signifies the white, or rather whitish city.

death ;

- a death; whereby the whole country, in a short time, changed her faith^a. To this place may ^{A. D. 1447.} be referred what the Christian historians relate concerning the war in the Morea, and the exploits of Skânder Beg. With regard to the war in the Morea, according to Dukas, although that author puts it later in time (Q), the reason of Amurat's march to that country was to recover the places taken by Constantine, Despot of Lacedemon (R); who, while he was at war with the Hungarians, had reduced Thebes and the neighbouring towns. On the Despot's refusing those places, the Soltân sat down before Hexamilion (S); which Constantine had repaired four years before, and behind which he then was with 60,000 men. But he was betrayed by the Albanians, whose treason however he escaped, as well as his son Thomas, Despot of Akbaia. Amurat having ruined Hexamilion, and laid waste the country as far as Patrus and Klarenka;
- b carried off with him 60,000 prisoners^b.

Khalkondylas is more particular in his account of this expedition. According to him, Constantine, having invaded the Turkish territories, took the city of Pindus, with the country of Beotia, and part of Akbaia; penetrating as far as Attika. Morâd, informed hereof by Neri, prince of Athens and Thurakân, governor of Thessaly, marched with all his forces to Pherres. On this news, Constantine assembled all the people of the Morea to defend the wall (or Hexamilion); which presently was ranged from one end to the other by the Turkish army. The duke, unable to oppose so great a force, sent to make proposals of peace: but, instead of moderating matters, demanded the rest of the Morea, with other lands adjoining to it; which Amurat had conquered in war.

- c THE Soltân returned no answer to so wild a demand; but sent the ambassador (who was our author's father), bound hands and feet to Pherres. Although it was then the depth of winter, he went with 6000 horse to view the wall, and see where he might best make his approaches, and plant his batteries. After this, his army lodged themselves on the side of the fosse; and the cannonading began fiercely on both sides. On the 7th day, the Turks gave a general assault, and became masters of the wall, with very little opposition from the Greeks, effeminated by luxury and corruption. While Thurakân was sent to ravage the heart of the country, Amurat took and sacked the city of Sicyon. Then marching to Patras, a rich city of Akbaia, found it deserted, excepting the castle, which made a brave defence; and before it was taken, peace was concluded with the Greeks, whereby the Morea first became tributary^c.
- d As to Skânder Beg, although the Turkish historians scarce take notice of him, the Christian writers, who call him prince of Epirus, have ascribed to him exploits equal to those of the greatest heroes of antiquity: but as most of them have apparently exaggerated matters, we chose to follow Khalkondylas, who is more moderate in his account of him. Morâd, says this author, the spring after his expedition into the Morea, marched against Skender, or Skânder Beg, son of Ivan (T). This lord having been, it is said, abused by the Soltân, at whose court he was educated, without changing his religion, retired into Epirus; where having married the princess Donik, daughter of Arienetes, he openly revolted. Amurat, on this news, marched with all his forces, and ravaged the country; while Skânder Beg, after sending his family and the useless people into the Venetian territories, retired with the rest into the passes of the mountains, towards the sea coast, watching the motions of the enemy; who at length besieged Sfetigrade, and took it by assault, killing all the men, and plundering the goods (U). Getia, which they attacked next, terrified by that sad example, surrendered on composition. The Soltân then sat down before Kroja (X), the capital of Albania (Y), and exceeding strong, as well by situation as art. His artillery having made a great breach in the wall, the Fanzaries gave continual assaults: but, being repulsed with considerable slaughter, and winter drawing on, Amurat, after a pretty long siege, wherein he lost a great number of men, thought proper to leave the place for that time.

^a CANT. Othm. Hist. p. 88—92.

^b DUKAS, c. 32.

^c KHALK. Hist. Constant. l. vii. c. 4.

(Q) Viz: After the defeat of Huniades, mentioned in the following paragraph.

(R) Khalkondylas calls him duke of Peloponnesus; which country is now called the Morea.

(S) Hexamilion was a wall six miles long, built across the Isthmus of Korinth, to secure the Morea against invasions. There was a town also of the same name just within it. Hexamilion signifies six miles.

(T) That is John, whom other writers surname Kastriot, and call king or prince of Epirus. They say, that he delivered up his four sons as hostages to obtain peace of Amurat, who circumcised them; and on their father's death, poisoned the three elder, and seized Epirus.

(U) The western writers put this siege in May, 1449; and say, that it was surrendered in September following by capitulation, after Amurat had lost 30,000 men before it; and that a dog being thrown into the well by a traitor, the garrison would not drink of the water; which obliged the brave governor Perlot to surrender.

(X) Other writers say, that Skânder Beg, after the battle of Iflata against Huniades, flying with the Bajba's secretary, at length seized him, and made him write a letter in the Soltân's name to the governor of Kroja; ordering him to deliver up the city to Skânder Beg; who killed the secretary, and by means of the letters got possession of that city.

(Y) Others say of Epirus, but not so properly; for Albania comprehending Epirus, with part of Illyria. Kroja, now in ruins, stood in the latter country, near the gulph of Drin, between Durazzo and Alesio.

A. D. 1447.

his brave actions in Albania.

THE Soltān, having remained in rest a whole year, at Adrianople, set forward a second time, with a more numerous army than before, against Skānder Beg; who was a man of great courage, and indefatigable in giving Amurat vexation. In his way to Kreja, he sent to the Venetians to deliver up Skānder Beg, who, with the Albanians, retired to the mountains near that city, in order to assist him on occasion. The cannon having made a large breach in the wall, a party was sent to divert Skānder Beg, while the Turks gave an assault. Hereupon a terrible fight began in the mountains, where that prince performed actions beyond belief, overthrowing all before him. On the other hand, the Janizaries were so roughly handled at the breach, that Amurat thought fit to change the siege into a blockade: but at the same time, news arriving from George, Despot of Servia, that John Huniades was ready to pass the Danube with a numerous army, he immediately drew off (Z), in order to go meet the Hungarians ^d.

Emperor John
dies.

A. D. 1448.

MEAN time, the emperor John Paleologus being afflicted with the gout, the loss of his consort, and the troubles which distracted the church since his voyage to Italy, fell into a disorder which carried him off in a few days. He was the last emperor of the Romans. Notice was immediately given of his death to Constantine (A); who, presently after his arrival at Constantinople, sent ambassadors to Amurat, who settled all differences which subsisted between the two courts ^c. Khalkondylas adds, that his brother Demetrius aimed to supplant him, and would have ascended the throne, had he not been hindered by his mother, and the great men, of whom Kantakuzenus and Notaras (B) were the chief. The arrival of prince Thomas, the youngest of the brothers, was also a check upon him; so that as soon as Constantine entered the city, all was pacified. Demetrius and Thomas had the Morea divided between them ^f.

Hungarians invade the Othman dominions.

THE Hungarians (C), to revenge the death of their late king, in conjunction with the prince of Moldavia, (lately revolted) and others, having entered the Othmān dominions, Morād flies in haste to Sofia; and from thence marches against the enemy: but, before the armies came in sight, the Beigler, certain Musulmans, in their way to join him, meet the Walakhians separated from the rest, and easily rout them (D). The Soltān, leading on his forces to Kossova (E), immediately begins the battle; but not with the success he expected, the enemy's armour being proof against the sword. Morād seeing this, draws back his troops, and orders them to strike at their heads with pole-axes and clubs. The Christians surrounded, and unable to resist the fury of the Turks, retreat slowly under the shelter of their carriages; and valiantly fight in that manner, with various fortune, till sun-set. At last the king, perceiving his men discouraged and settled, assembles the bravest of his horse; and, exhorting the rest to renew the fight, pretends easily to gain the victory, by falling on the enemy's rear. But more solicitous for his own than his people's safety, instead of attacking the Musulmans, he betakes himself to flight; leaving the soldiers, now despairing of success, to shift for themselves (F). The Turks pursue them with eagerness, kill great numbers, and take 2000 prisoners. All the German, Bohemian, and Polish generals, fell in the battle; except the king himself ^g.

Their force.

ACCORDING to Khalkondylas, the Hungarian forces consisted of 40,000 foot, 7000 horse, and about 2000 war chariots filled with musketeers: but these being judged by George, Despot of the Triballians (or Servia), not sufficient to cope with the Turks, who, by the troops which joined them in their march, were become 150,000 strong; he thought it safest to sit still: which disappointment greatly incensed Huniades ^h.

^d KHALK, ubi supr. c. 5 & 7. ^e DUKAS, c. 33.
Othm. Hist. p. 95. ^b KHALK, l. vii. c. 7.

^f KHALK, ubi supr. l. vii. c. 11.

^g CANT.

(Z) The western writers mention only one siege of Kreja; and say, that Skānder Beg twice broke into Amurat's camp, and made a great slaughter: that the Soltān having been repulsed in four attacks, failing also to corrupt Uranokontes, the governor, as well as to oblige Skānder Beg to pay 10,000 ducats tribute, he fell sick, and after making a speech to his son Mohammed, died under the walls of that city. But the circumstances of Amurat's dying at this siege, and Mohammed's being in the camp at the same time, are evidently false; which brings a suspicion on the rest of the history, many of whose facts are in themselves sufficiently improbable.

(A) Surnamed Drakoses, the brother of John.

(B) He was grand duke.

(C) The Turkish historians say, this army was commanded by the king of Hungary: but as king Ladislaws, surnamed Posthumus, was then detained by Frederic duke of Austria, and disowned by the Hungarians, prince Cantemir supposes, that by the king, Huniades is to be understood; agreeably to the Christian writers.

(D) Khalkondylas says, the Walakhians were 8000 in number, under their prince Danus, who commanded the left wing of the Christians; and that, in the heat of the battle, going over to the Turks, on promise of pardon, the Soltān, either suspecting they had some ill design, or in detestation of their treachery, ordered 20,000 horse to surround and cut them in pieces, with their arms in their hands.

(E) A place near Nigromonte, famous for another battle, in which Morād was victorious and slain. This second battle is described in the Walakhian annals to be so fierce and bloody as to exceed all before, or which are likely to be after it. Cant.

(F) Dukas speaks as if Huniades did not fight at all. Considering, says this author, the multitude of the enemy's troops, and the fear which had possessed his own, he made a shew before day of preparing for battle, and at the same time fled. Dukas, c. 32. The more western historians say, the battle lasted three days, and that four times more Turks were killed than Christians.

Battle of Kosova.

Huniades taken by the Despot of Servia.

He Mohammed
 He married.

W- Morâd dies :

le, his character.

Refs

lin, and sons.

^k DUKAS, c. 33.

prophet of God. These are properly called Amirs or lords; denoting their descent from Fatima, a sister of Mohammed. They were formerly destined, like the Levites, to the worship of God. They are now dispersed through the empire, and distinguished by the green turbân. It is observed, that the Amirs are men of the greatest wisdom and learning till forty; but after that become either downright fools, or at least discover signs of stupidity. Hence the Turks, when they see any stupid person, say Amir Soydeur; as much as to say, he is of the race of the Amirs; although they consider that failing as a divine impulse, to manifest their birth and sanctity. Cant.

They were formerly destined, like the Levites, to the worship of God. They are now dispersed through the empire, and distinguished by the green turbân. It is observed, that the Amirs are men of the greatest wisdom and learning till forty; but after that become either downright fools, or at least discover signs of stupidity. Hence the Turks, when they see any stupid person, say Amîr Soydeur; as much as to say, he is of the race of the Amirs; although they consider that failing as a divine impulse, to manifest their birth and sanctity. Cant.

empire, and distinguished by the green turbân. It is observed, that the Amirs are men of the greatest wisdom and learning till forty; but after that become either downright fools, or at least discover signs of stupidity. Hence the Turks, when they see any stupid person, say Amîr Soydeur; as much as to say, he is of the race of the Amirs; although they consider that failing as a divine impulse, to manifest their birth and sanctity. Cant.

downright fools, or at least discover signs of stupidity. Hence the Turks, when they see any stupid person, say Amîr Soydeur; as much as to say, he is of the race of the Amirs; although they consider that failing as a divine impulse, to manifest their birth and sanctity. Cant.

Amir Soydeur ; as much as to say, he is of the race of the Amirs ; although they consider that failing as a divine impulse, to manifest their birth and sanctity. Cant.

C H A P. VIII.

The Reign of Mohammed II. surnamed Fatîh (A).

S E C T. I.

To the taking of Constantinople.

A. D. 1451.

7 Soltân Mohammed II.

MORAD being dead, Mohammed II. now in the 21st year of his age, is crowned a second time, three days after his father's decease^a. On his arrival near Adrianople, he was met by all the persons of any distinction a mile from that city; there dismounting, they walked on foot; the Soltân and his attendants marching in the middle. When they had advanced half-way they stopped, closing their lips to preserve the greater silence; then set up a loud cry mixed with tears. On this, Mohammed and his train alighted; and, after the example of the rest, filled the air with groans and sighs. The grandees saluted him by kissing his hand; then mounted on horseback; and having conducted him to the gate of his palace, retired to their houses.

strangles his
brother:

THE first act of Mohammed, after he ascended the throne, was to send Halim, head of the Janizaries, and son of Eurenesis (B), to strangle his brother (C), an infant but eight months old; whom his father had by the daughter of Spintiar (Isfandiar), prince of Sinope. Next day he ordered Halim to be put to death, and obliged that lady to marry Ishak (D), her father's slave, to whom she had an aversion^b.

Peace with Christians:

AFTER this, at the instance of George, Despot of Servia, he renewed the peace with him, and sent him back his daughter, who had been married to Amurat; assigning her lands on the frontiers of that country for her maintenance. Constantine, and the rest who held the first rank at Constantinople, sent also to renew the peace with him; which was done in the most solemn manner. He also granted, at their request, a pension of 300,000 aspers yearly for Or Khân's subsistence, in the necessity the empire then laboured under^c.

defeats Kara-mân-Ogli:

MOHAMMED having made peace also with the other Christian powers, turned his arms against Karamân; who, on the news of Amurat's death, entered the Othmân dominions, and took three forts, with a great extent of land, which Amurat had deprived him of. Mohammed marched to Kotiayon, and thence into Phrygia Salutaris, by the Turks called Karasaris, which is contiguous to the territories of Karamân; who, on the first news of his approach, sent to beg peace, offering to surrender the places (E) which he had newly recovered. Mohammed's design was not to have returned till he had entirely subdued that prince to his obedience; but the imprudent conduct of the Romans made him spare Karamân for the present, in order to subdue them^d.

affairs of the Morea:

ALTHOUGH the two princes, between whom the Morea was divided, had taken a solemn oath never to violate the agreement; yet Thomas soon after took up arms to drive Demetrius out of his possessions. Demetrius hereupon returned to Asan, his wife's brother; by whose means he obtained succours from Amurat, and compelled Thomas to submit the matters in dispute to the emperor's arbitration. But that prince refusing to deliver to his brother the territories that fell to his share, Mohammed ordered Thurakân, his governor in the Morea, to assist Demetrius, and demolish the wall which shut up that country. Hereupon Thomas gave him the city of Kalamata, in lieu of the territory of the Skortians, which he detained^e.

Isthmian wall
razed:^a CANT. p. 95.^b DUKAS, c. 33.^c Ibid. KHALK. l. vii. c. 11.^d DUKAS, c. 34.

KHALK. l. vii. c. 11. CANT. p. 96.

^e KHALK. l. vii. c. 11.

(A) Fatîh, in Arabic, signifies the opener, or vanquisher; a title given him on account of his taking Constantinople. The Christian historians call him Mohammed the Great, and the first emperor of the Turks.

(B) The same with Ornûs Beg.(C) Khalkondylas says, he was choaked by pouring water down his throat. L. vii. c. 11.

(D) Khalkondylas says, he did it for her security, and that he made Ishak governor of Asia. L. vii. c. 11.—
Ishak, or isaac, is pronounced Ishak.

(E) According to Khalkondylas, Karamân gave up Kandlora; and Mohammed, at his return, suppressed his train of falconers, hunters, and other useless employments.

^a NEXT year, he orders cannon to be founded (F); and having assembled an army out of all his provinces, besieges Constantinople. The Greek emperor, terrified at the danger, begs peace on whatever conditions the Soltân would impose. Mohammed tells his ambassadors, "that he pities the emperor's case; and cannot in conscience deny peace to the humble: but lest he should be blamed by his people for being at so great expence and trouble to assemble forces, without any advantage to the Othman affairs; he desires Cæsar to give him a spot of land on the European side of the Bogaz (or Bosphorus) no bigger than an ox-hide (G); and that he would immediately raise the siege." The Greeks readily consenting, Mohammed sends away his army.

Hej. 856.
A. D. 1452.
Founds cannon.

^b THEN having pitched on a rocky place (H) before the ambassadors, he orders an ox-hide to be cut into small thongs; and with them inclosing a piece of ground, 500 paces in circumference, seizes it for his use, the Greeks not daring to gainsay it. Here he builds, in forty days, a castle, fortified with five high towers, representing the letters of his name (I); and immediately after runs up another (K) to answer it on the Asiatic side. These castles he provides with artillery and a good garrison: then orders the governors not to let the vessels pass, which daily supplied Constantinople with provisions from the Euxine sea. After this he returns, under the appearance of peace, to Adrianople; and three days after his entrance, lays the foundations of that stately palace, called, Jebân Numâ (L).

Builds Rûm eli Hissâr:

^c IN the third year of his reign, and of the Hejrab 857, Mohammed discovers the designs which he had hitherto concealed: for, raising as great an army as he was able, he goes and besieges Constantinople.

Hej. 857.
A. D. 1453.

As the Turkish account of the destruction of the Roman empire is very defective, and we ought not to omit any material circumstance relating to that grand event, we shall supply it from the Creek cotemporary writers. These mention but one siege of Constantinople undertaken by Mohammed; the causes of which seem to be impartially set forth by Dukas, as follows.

^d THEY who had the principal share in the government at Constantinople, were so indiscrete as to send ambassadors to notify to Mohammed, that Constantine had been proclaimed emperor, although he had not been crowned. They complained also, that Or Khân's pension was not duly paid, and urged to have it doubled; alleging that the prince wanted money for presents to the great lords, who paid their court to him; and that the emperor was not able to supply him. In case this demand was not granted, they desired that they might be allowed to set him at liberty.

Roman artificers treated with scorn.

^e HALI BASHA, to whom this discourse was directed, though of a mild temper, and a friend to the Romans, because they often made him presents (M); yet, on hearing the ambassadors talk at this rate, he made answer: "I have been so long acquainted, you silly Romans, with your artifices and tricks, that you ought to give them over.—The treaty which we made with you, is scarce dry, and yet you have followed us into Anatolia; thinking to frighten us with chimeras of your own framing.—If you can do any thing against us, do it. Proclaim Or Khân prince of Thrace, and make the Hungarians pass the Danube in your favour.—But take it for granted after all, that instead of recovering the countries which you have lost, you will lose those which you now possess.—"

HALI having reported these matters to Mohammed, he flew into a great passion. If I stay Mohammed in Anatolia, said he, the Romans will stir up all the Christian nations against me, succour Karamân, and subdue the west. On this consideration, he treated the ambassadors of that prince with mildness, and granted them peace. With regard to the emperor's ambassadors disseminating his resentment, he promised to give them a favourable answer at his return to Adrianople; but as soon as he arrived there, he ordered Or Khân's pension to be stopped; and towards winter,

Karamân incensed;
builds a fort,
A. D. 1452.

^f CANT. p. 97, & seq.

(F) Kbalkondylas says, he ordered artillery to be cast, and a great number of galleys and other vessels to be built in several ports, during the winter. L. viii. c. 1.

castle is called Rûm eli Hissâr: that is, the European castle. Cant. Literally, the castle of the country of the Romans.

(G) Mohammed seems to have imitated Eliza (or Dido) queen of Karthage: for Lonicerus, as well as the Turks, allow him to have delighted in reading the actions of the ancient Greek and Roman kings. Cant. Not Mohammed, but the Turkish historian, we presume, thought of this contrivance; for the Greeks could hardly have been such fools, as to have been tricked by an old well-known artifice.

(K) Called Anadoli Hissâr, or, the eastern castle, built where the little river Ghiok Su, or blue water, falls into the Bosphorus. Cant. But the Christian writers say, this was built by his predecessor.

(L) About six miles from Constantinople, on the Bosphorus. Cant.

(I) The letters in Mohammed are only four; but the middle m must be doubled, which makes five. The

(L) That is, the watch tower of the world: because from the women's apartment, built to a great height, there is a prospect into all parts. Cant.

(M) The author adds, and that whoever gave him money might say the most shocking things to him. So hurtful to the honour and interest of his country is a corrupt or covetous minister.

had

A. D. 1453. had notice given through his dominions for 1000 workmen to be ready in the spring, with the proper instruments and materials, to build a fort near the Sacred Mouth (N) above Constantinople. This project filled the Christians every-where with grief, as it convinced them, that the downfall of the city was at hand; and a prodigious number of workmen being assembled at the time appointed, the emperor sent ambassadors to Adrianople, not to demand an augmentation, nor even a continuation of the pension, but to intreat Mohammed not to build the fort; and on that condition to pay tribute, if he required it. He remonstrated, that he had indeed, at the intreaty of his grandfather Mohammed, granted him liberty to build a fort on the Asiatic shore, because it had been of a long time in possession of his ancestors; but that the design of building this new fort opposite to the other, could be no other than to deprive Constantinople of its trade, and supply of provisions from the Euxine Sea.

to curb the city.

Begins hostilities:

MOHAMMED, after asking the ambassadors what right they had to hinder him from building a fort on his own ground, shewed, from the emperor's joining continually with the enemies of the Othmans, during his father's reign, how little reason he had to expect any favour from him; and concluded, threatening, that whoever came to trouble him again upon the same subject, should be flay'd alive. This answer threw the inhabitants of Constantinople into the utmost fear and anguish. Soon after, the Turks began to build the fort below Sofstenion, of old called Pheneum, in a triangular form, and called it Baseska; that is, Head-chopper (O). The emperor, finding he could not hinder the execution of this design, sent guards to hinder the Turks from making incursions, and pillaging the lands in time of harvest: but Mohammed, instead of granting his request, gave leave to those who carried materials to the fort, to feed their cattle on the Roman pastures. The people of the tower of Epibata going to hinder some Turks from destroying their corn, a quarrel ensued, wherein several on both sides were killed. Mohammed being informed hereof, ordered a party to go and put the inhabitants of Epibata to the sword: the Turks accordingly fell upon them as they were cutting down their corn, and slew forty.

Declares war.

ON this news, the emperor ordered the city gates to be shut, and the Turks who were in it to be arrested; but three days after set them at liberty; and at the same time sent ambassadors to tell the Soltân, "that since he was resolved on war, and neither his own oaths nor the emperor's submissions could prevent it, he might take his course: that if God, in whom he trusted, intended to deliver the city into his hands, no human power could hinder it:" he advised him, however, "to reflect on their treaties and his own oaths;" adding, "that, for his part, he would shut up the city, and defend the inhabitants to the utmost of his power." Mohammed, far from seeking excuses to justify his conduct, declared war against Constantine.

Prodigious cannon.

MEAN time, the fort being finished in four months, and second year of his reign, the walls were furnished with cannon, some carrying 600 pounders (P); and a garrison of 400 men placed under command of Ferûz Aga, who had orders to demand tribute of all vessels which passed, and fire on such as refused to pay it. After this, Mohammed, who had overlooked the work, returned with all his court to Adrianople.

WHILE he was building the fort, a famous engineer (Q) went and offered him his service. He came from Hungary to Constantinople; but the pension assigned him by the emperor's council was so small and so ill paid, that he could not subsist on it. This obliged him to retire to the Soltân, who gave him considerable revenues. This person cast him a very large cannon, which carried a huge stone-ball (R) a mile; and whose sound was heard above ten: the ball, when it fell, made a hole in the ground six feet deep.

Emperor's preparations.

THE emperor, foreseeing what would happen, had six months before reinforced the garrison, drawn many people of the country into the city, and laid up great store of corn. He had likewise sent to Rome to demand succours of the pope, and complete the union of the two churches; but as it was easy to see, that neither the emperor nor the clergy were sincere, so the pope afforded them no assistance; and their dissimulation served him afterwards with an excuse for abandoning them to the mercy of the Turks.

(N) The mouth of the Bosphorus in the Propontis, at Constantinople.

(O) Khalkondylas, in saying it is called Læmokopia, which signifies throat or gullet-cutter, seems to give the translation of the word Bâsh-eska (Bash is the head). He says, it stood in that part properly called the Bosphorus, being the narrowest part of the streight. There was a great tower at each angle, 30 feet high, and the wall 22 thick. L. viii. c. 1.

(P) According to Khalkondylas (who in the account of this siege agrees for the general with Dukas) the cannon he employed in the siege were so large, that each required 70 yoke of oxen and 2000 men to draw it: yet says, they carried a ball of but 100 pound weight. (L. viii. c. 1, 2.); which seems most reasonable.

(Q) Khalkondylas calls him Urban, and says he was a native of Walakhia.

(R) Khalkondylas says, they were black stones, extremely hard, which were brought from the Euxine or Black Sea.

a In spring, Mahomet ordered his great cannon to be carried from Adrianople to Constanti- A. D. 1453:
nople, by Karafia Beg (S); who had before reduced several places on the Euxine Sea, as Mesembra, Akbeloum, and Bison. Mean time, the distractions in the church continued (T); ^{the siege} as if the city had not been threatened with a siege, which began the sixth of April; the Turkish ^{begun.} army incamping from the Wood Gate to the Golden Gate, towards the south, and the church of St. Kosma. They also covered the whole space, which had been planted with vines ^s.

KHALKONDYLAS observes more particularly, that the Soltân's camp extended from one sea to the other: that the forces of Asia were on the right-hand towards the Golden Gate; ^{The city's} those of Europe on the west, stretching to the Wood Gate; and that in the middle, between both, was Mohammed himself, with his Janizaries and other troops about him, while his ^{pre-figh.}
 b Wazîr, Zogan, was posted above Galata (U). The walls toward the port were not very good: but to the land there was a double wall, with double ramparts. The first was low and weak, but defended by a great fosse, 200 feet wide, lined on both sides with stone: the inner wall was very high, and admirably well built ^b.

THE emperor did all in his power for the defence of Constantinople. All the Venetian ships, ^{Justiniani} which came from the Tanais and Trebizond, were detained. The Genoese, though they had ^{made general} promised the Soltân not to assist the Romans, yet, under-hand, sent a large vessel, with 500 men, to reinforce the garrison. John Justiniani, surnamed The Long, came from Genoa with two ships and several brave young men. As John had excellent skill in drawing up an army, and giving battle, the emperor made him chief commander, and assigned for his post that c part of the walls which was nearest the palace; because the enemy had planted most of the engines on that side. He promised likewise to give him the sovereignty of the isle of Lemnos, in case he obliged the Turks to raise the siege. Such magnificent rewards made the Latins behave like heroes. Some of them had fire-arms, so had the Turks, which shot five or ten balls; and, after piercing the armour, killed two or three men, one behind the other. Mohammed caused new levies to be made; which brought such prodigious numbers together, that many reckoned they amounted to 400,000 (X). At the same time his galleys, ships, and barks, to the number of 300, came to anchor near the city.

THE port was secured with a chain, stretched across from the Fair Gate to Galata, which ^{Port and} kept the vessels of the city in safety. Besides which, there was a fleet of five ships, one ^{ships.}
 d belonging to the emperor, the other four to the Genoese; which fetched provisions from the Morea and Kbio. As they returned in March, Mohammed ordered his fleet either to take or hinder them to enter the port of Keras (Y): but the ships forced their way by help of the wind, and were let in by lowering the chain. The Soltân, finding that there were in the harbour eight great ships, twenty small ones, with several galleys, belonging to the emperor and the Venetians, besides a great number of barks, he despaired of making himself master of them; but at the same time formed a most bold and noble design. He ordered a road ^{Galleys drawn} to be made through the bushes and shrubs behind Galata, from the place facing the east, under ^{over land.} Diplacionion, to the other side of the gulph of Keras, opposite St. Kosma's church; and fourscore galleys to be drawn over the hilly ground, from the Sacred Mouth into that harbour
 e (Z). Every galley had a pilot at her prow, and another at her poop, with the rudder in hand, one moved the sails, while a fourth beat the drum, and sang a sailor's song. And the whole fleet passed along, as if it had been carried by a stream of water (A): sailing, as it were, over land ⁱ.

^s DUKAS, c. 34, 37.

^b KHAL. l. viii. c. 2.

ⁱ DUKAS, c. 38.

(S) Byglerebeg of Europe. Khal. l. viii. c. 1.

(T) The clergy were divided; some for the union, others against it: at the head of whom was Gennadius, a monk. The great duke, who was of his party, declared, that he would rather see the turban of Mohammed in the church, than the pope's cap. He was certainly in the right.

(U) To explain this better, it may be observed, that Constantinople is in form of an equilateral triangle; each side three miles long. One side is washed by the Propontis to the south; another by the gulph of Keras (which is the port or harbour) to the north; the third side, towards the land, extending north and south from one sea to the other, is defended by a wall: along which the Turkish army was encamped. The Golden Gate seems to have been at the south end; and the Wood Gate at the north end, of this wall. Galata and Peru lie to the north of the gulph of Keras.

(X) Kbalkondylas adds, that they had double the number of horses and beasts of carriage. L. viii. c. 2.

(Y) To the south of Galata.

(Z) Kbalkondylas says, they towed the ships towards the place where Zogan was encamped; from whence they drew them by main force over a little hill, and then launched them in the water on the other side; under cover of some cannon, and a great number of small shot, which kept off the Greeks from obstructing their design. And the Christian vessels in port, after losing two of their number in an attack, durst attempt no more to destroy them for fear of the Turks artillery; by favour of which they cast anchor under the walls of the city, and made a wooden bridge. Khal. L. viii. c. 3. This bridge is described hereafter.

(A) Our author prefers the exploit of this young Alexander, as he calls him, to Xerxes building a bridge over the sea.

A. D. 1453.

WITH regard to this surprizing exploit, prince Cantemir only observes, that, besides other engines b. fore unheard of, the Turks made use of one worthy of admiration ; for by it, from the north side, some vessels were brought over hills and declivities, into the inner haven (A) ; which occasioned the taking of the city, by introducing the sea forces by the gate Finar (B), looking to the lower haven ^k. To return to Dukas.

breach made in the walls with huge cannon.

MEAN time they brought the monstrous cannon, before-mentioned, opposite to Saint Roman Gate. The gunner had two balls of stone, one very large, the other smaller ; and shot the latter first, to see if he took right aim. It was usual for cannon, after firing, to fly like glass, unless covered immediately with thick woollen cloth ; and even then it would not stand above the third discharge, occasioned by the cold air entering the pores of the metal : but this engineer preserved his gun from bursting, by pouring oil into it when hot after firing. As he b was going to make a second shot, the ambassador of John Huniades, the Hungarian general, who was present, laughed ; and told him if he had a mind to beat down the wall soon, he should change his battery, and shoot five or six fathom from the place where he then stood ; that the third shot should be directed from another place, which, with the two former, made a sort of triangle (C) ; and that having so done, he would see the triangle presently fall to the ground (D) ; which accordingly came to pass ^l.

KHALKONDYLAS relates, that the noise of those great cannon was frightful, and the shock so great, that the ground trembled for more than two leagues round ; that although the balls reached the second wall, as being much higher than the first, yet the damage they did gave no discouragement to the Greeks ; because those unweildy cannon not being easily managed, could c not be fired above seven or eight times a day, and only once towards morning, as a warning-piece to begin the military operations. Besides the great cannon, there were many others of a lesser size, planted along the counterscarp, with which they battered the parapet of the rampart. The Greeks also had artillery, carrying from 60 to 80 pounders ; one of which was planted against the largest of the Turkish guns ; but when discharged, they so shook the wall and rampart, that they did more harm than good ; besides, the largest piece burst after a few firings.

Mines and countermines.

ALTHOUGH the damage done by the Turkish cannon was at first so small, yet the Greeks, through inexperience, and want of sufficient numbers to attend at many places at the same time, were not able to repair the breaches ; while the Janizaries, under cover of their gabions d and mantles, gained the ditch ; then raising a breast-wall with loop-holes along the counterscarp, shot so incessantly against the battlement, that none durst appear.

THE Soltân ordered mines also to be carried under the ditch and walls, a great way into the city ; building wooden towers, where soldiers were posted to secure the workmen, at the places where they broke ground ; but the Greeks, by countermining, rendered those works of no effect. The Turks had yet another tower higher than the former ; on the top of which there were a great number of ladders and portable bridges, to throw upon the ramparts.

Genoese kindness.

THE Genoese of Galata shewed on this occasion much affection for the Romans. In the day they supplied the Turks with provisions, and oil for their cannon ; and at night stole into the city, and fought next day against them. The day following they went to the camp, and those e who were in the camp returned to Constantinople. The Venetians ventured their lives no less freely for the Romans. John Justiniani omitted nothing to defend the place ; and the grand duke, followed by 500 men, went round the city every day, to see that a good guard was kept, and to encourage the soldiers.

^k CANT. p. 98.^l DUKAS, c. 38.

(A) Which extends as far as the palace of Blakbernae. The vessels were carried over land several Italian miles from the village Besbiktash (where they were built) to Galata, and launched into that part of the haven called Kasim Pascha. Cant.

(B) Vulgarly Finer. Near it the more noble and wealthy Greeks have their residence. Cant.

(C) It seems from this account, that the wall was battered in three places successively by removing the same piece of cannon : but Khalcondylas says the out-wall was battered by three cannon ; one planted opposite to the palace royal, the second at St. Roman Gate, where the Soltân was posted, and the third between both : that the two first, which carried balls of 100 pound weight, were shot slanting ; but the middle gun, which carried a ball one third larger than the others, shot directly forward, and brought down the space of a curtain, which the other two had loosened.

(D) The king of Hungary having been declared emperor this year, took the administration of affairs into his own hands, from Huniades ; who therefore not being able any longer to keep the truce made with Mohammed for three years, sent to take up the written agreement, which he had given the Soltân, and return him his ; leaving him at liberty to deal with the king of Hungary as he thought fit. This was the subject of his embassy. It was reported, that Huniades being told by some old man, that the Christians would never be happy till Constantinople was taken by the infidels, longed to have the prediction accomplished : and Dukas was informed, that this was the reason why the engineer had such instructions given him by the ambassador, as no Christian ought to have given. Khalcond. Much the same method of shooting down walls is mentioned to have been used at the siege of Kroja in Albania, in the year 1479.

a By the continual battering of the cannon, the tower near St. Roman Gate, and the walls on A. D. 1453. both sides, were demolished in such a manner, that the besiegers and the besieged could see each other (E).

THE emperor despairing to defend the city, after so large a breach had been made in the Place Royal, strongest part of the wall, sent to propose paying whatever tribute the Soltân should think fit, if he would but retire. Mohammed answered, "That there was no possibility of retiring now; that he must either take the city, or the city him; but at the same time he offered, if the emperor would surrender it, to give him the Morea, and his brother other provinces; threatening, in case he took it by assault, to put him and all the great men to death, make slaves of the inhabitants, and give their effects to his soldiers." Constantine thought it better to wait the event, than submit to such conditions.

b JUSTINIANI, at this juncture, resolved to burn the Turkish fleet, and prepared a galley for Fire-ship, that purpose, on which he put on board the most valiant Italians, with the necessary engines and artificial fire: but the Genoese of Galata having discovered his design, gave notice to the Turks; who being upon their guard, when the Latins approached at midnight, let fly their cannon, which sunk the galley, with 150 brave soldiers on board; and thus destroyed all their hopes.

MOHAMMED caused a wooden bridge to be made from the shore of Galata to Cinegion (F), Wooden bridge consisting of 1000 casks, tied two and two together, and bound on each side with ropes, which afforded breadth enough for five men to march abreast. There were at each end of the casks pieces of wood, on which the floor was nailed.

c WHEN all things were made ready for storming the city (G), Mohammed sent to offer the emperor and the great men liberty to go out with their effects; promising that the people should suffer no injury: but let him know at the same time, that if he rejected those conditions, he and his officers must expect to be put to the sword, and the inhabitants made captives. The emperor answered, by the advice of his council, "That he would gladly live in peace with him: that Mohammed's ancestors honoured his ancestors as their fathers, and Constantinople as their country; where they found an asylum in all their disgraces; and that none of them, who had dared to attack it, enjoyed a long life. He advises the Soltân therefore, to be content with what he had already unjustly taken from his family, and the imposition of as heavy a tribute as he should think fit: but with regard to surrendering the city, tells him, that it neither depended on him nor the inhabitants; the common resolution being to lay down their lives in its defence."

d THE Soltân, despairing of taking the place by composition, caused the day for the attack to be published through his camp (H); declaring that he would content himself with the walls and the houses, and give up to the soldiers the people and their effects (I); which news was received with joyful shouts. In the evening he ordered fires to be made throughout the camp. This was a spectacle quite new; and it struck one with surprize to see an infinite number of lights spread over the land and over the sea, over the ships and over the houses, over Constantinople and over Galata; which shone with greater blaze than the sun. The surface of the water glittered as if it had been covered with looking-glasses. The Romans seeing all the camp on fire, ran to the walls, from whence they heard those exulting shouts, which struck them almost dead with fear, as being the forerunners of a general assault.

e THE emperor John laboured extremely hard all the night, to fill up the breaches with fascines, and get a ditch dug within. Mohammed began the attack on Sunday the 27th of May (K), which was the feast of All Saints. He gave the Romans no rest all the night. At nine o'clock, dividing his army in two parts, he drew it up from the palace of the Golden Gate. He ranged his 80 barks from the Wood Gate to the square, and disposed the other vessels which were at Diplacionion, in a circle from the Fair Gate (beyond the fortress of St. Demetrius) and the little gate near Our Lady's Monastery, named Hodegetria, beyond the port as far as Vlaunka. These ships contained scaling-ladders and other engines.

III KHALKOND. l. viii. c. 2, & seq.

(E) During 40 days the besieged had not one hour's rest, being day and night employed in repairing the breaches, countermining, or fighting. Mean time four of the best towers were demolished, and the walls almost every-where much shattered and torn to pieces. Kbalkond l. viii. c. 3.

(F) They made this bridge in that part of the land called the Karamânians, which crossed from one end to the other, and made a communication with the walls and Zogan's forces. Lib. viii. c. 3.

(G) A little before the assault, two ships making to the harbour, the Turkish fleet was ordered to surround them; but they broke through them, and entered the port, while the Soltân called to his men, and rode into the sea to animate them. Pentogli, the admiral, was wounded in the eye, and severely reproached for his conduct by Mohammed. Kbalkond. l. viii. c. 4.

(H) Which, according to custom, was to be three days after the illuminations. Kbalk. l. viii. c. 4.

(I) He likewise promised a rich lordship to him who should first mount the breach. The priests also went through the camp, encouraging the soldiers. Kbalkond. ibid.

(K) On Tuesday the 27th of May, 1453.

AT

A. D. 1453.

Order of it

Besieged, how posted.

Gallant defence.

The Turks enter by a sally port.

Emperor slain.

Strange cruelty.

AT sun-set the trumpet sounded, and the Soltân fought on horseback at the breach, surrounded by 10,000 slaves, supported by more than 100,000 cavalry on each side and behind him. In the low ground from the port to the Golden Gate there were upwards of 10,000 infantry; and above 50,000 from the place where the Soltân was to the high ground where the palace stood: there were besides an infinite number of soldiers in the vessels, and on the wooden bridge. The besieged were distributed round the walls in this manner; the emperor and Justiniani were posted at the breach, with 3,000 Latins (L); the great duke was in the palace, with 500 men. There were likewise upwards of 500 men, armed with spears and darts, to defend the walls and the fortifications towards the sea, from the Golden to the Fair Gate. They watched all the night. The Turks brought an infinite number of ladders to fix to the walls; while the Soltân, with a rod of iron in his hand, drove them forward, sometimes using caresses, sometimes threats.

THE besieged behaved valiantly. The emperor and Justiniani fought at the head of their men; but in the evening that incomparable captain, that undaunted hero, received a ball in the back of his hand, which pierced his gauntlet, though of as good a temper as the arms of Achilles. Not able to bear the pain, he desired the emperor to maintain his ground, while he retired on board a ship, to have his wound dressed (M). Mean time the Turks, covered with their bucklers, approached the walls, and used all their efforts to apply the ladders; but were hindered by the prodigious quantity of stones which the besieged threw down upon them.

WHILE the emperor thus guarded the breach, the Turks perceiving a door of the palace open, by which the Romans made their sallies with security, it being under-ground, 50 of Mohammed's slaves rushed in; and mounting the walls, cut those who defended them in pieces: after which the enemy found no difficulty to get up. As soon as those who fought under the emperor, and knew nothing of this misfortune, as being at a great distance from that place, perceived themselves to be shot at from the top of the walls, and that it was done by the enemy, they fled in confusion into the city (N): but the gate of Kartias being very narrow, many were crushed to death. The Turks seeing the Romans flee, pursued them with a great shout, and slew all who came in their way (O). It was then that the emperor, in despair, standing in the breach, with his sword and buckler in his hand, uttered these rueful words; Is there no Christian left alive, to strike of my head? He had scarce done speaking, when he received a stroke in the face from a Turk, and then another from a second, which killed him, although neither of them knew that he was the emperor.

THE Turks entered the city an hour after midnight, with the loss of no more than three men: although between the palace and the gate of Kartias, they slew 2000 Romans, some flying, some defending themselves. They did this, imagining there were 50,000 men in arms: for had they known there were no more than 8000, they would not have slain one; not for pity, but out of covetousness, for they would have sold them like sheep, as they afterwards told the author (P).

SOME Romans, at day-break, ran to their houses, to take care of their wives and children: but although they were covered with blood, those whom they met in the streets they passed through would not believe that the Turks had broken in. At length the news being confirmed by other wounded people, who arrived thick one after another, the women and religious fled in crowds to the great church, called Sancta Sophia; in the belief that a ridiculous prediction (Q), which

(L) The brave Justiniani was posted at the breach to receive the enemy with 300 Italians; and behind him was the emperor, with his troops drawn up to support the other. Kbalkond. l. viii. c. 6.

(M) Justiniani being wounded in the hand, retired to get it dressed; and the Genoës imagining that he would abandon them, quitted their post likewise. The emperor seeing this, ran and asked Justiniani, Whither he was going? His answer was only, There, where God hath opened a passage to the Turks. Let us go on then, my brave men (cried the emperor to those about him), and fulfil our duty against these accursed and detestable dogs. But the Turks rushing forward in troops, Kantakuzenus was forthwith slain, and the emperor wounded in the shoulder. Kbalk. l. viii. c. 6.

(N) To explain this, it must be understood, that the defence hitherto was made at the breach in the outer wall; and their retreat was through the inner wall into the city.

(O) The Turks, who entered in troops, wounded the emperor in the shoulder, and drove him, with his people, to the second inclosure; where the rest of the Greeks defended themselves from the walls with darts, arrows, and great stones, against the enemy, who approached it. But when they saw that the Genoës, who were their chief hopes, had fled, and that the emperor was forced to give way, having an infinite number of Turks at his back, they lost all heart, and fled in such disorder towards the Roman Gate, that they stopped it up. By their thus deserting the second wall (in which there were several breaches) the Janizaries entered the city. At this news, those at the other end of the wall fled towards the port, in such crowds, to get on board the Venetian and Genoëse ships, that most of them were drowned; and the vessels so overloaded with them, that some of them sunk. Kbalk. l. viii. c. 6.

(P) Who, on this occasion, observes, that the Turks would set at liberty the murderers of their fathers for money.

(Q) Kbalkondylas relates this affair after a different manner; he says, that they who kept the gates, trusting to this old ridiculous prophecy, shut them; so that the people, not being able to get out of the city, fled to Sanctia Sophia, where presently the Turks came, and slew a vast number of them in the very middle of the church. Of the rest who fled here and there, some stood their ground, a which passed among them, concerning the destruction of the Turks, would now be accomplished. A. D. 1453.

THE prediction was, that the Turks should one day take Constantinople, and slay the people as far as the pillar of Constantine : but that then an angel, descending from heaven with a sword, should give that weapon, with the empire, to a poor man, whom he should find on the pillar ; saying to him, Take this sword, and revenge the people of the Lord : that the Turks would, at the same instant, take to their heels ; and the Romans pursue them, slaying them continually ; nor ever cease till they had driven them out of the west, and also the east, as far as Menadenere, a place on the borders of Persia. This monstrous absurdity was believed on no better ground than that they had formerly heard certain deceivers relate as much. False prediction on the ruin of many.

b THE Greeks who had gotten into the great church were flattering themselves with an assurance of being out of all danger ; when the Turks arriving thither, broke open the doors ; and finding the place filled from top to bottom with people, carried them away tied together. A great multitude, who were so silly as to go in procession to the tomb of St. Theodosius the martyr, the day of his festival, as if every thing was quiet, fell into the hands of the Turks, and were led captive like the rest. The fleet which was in the port hindered the Turks to apply ladders, and mount the wall on that side ; till such time as they who had entered the city in the morning were arrived thither, and had driven the Romans off the wall. This the enemy in the ships perceiving, they soon mounted (R) ; and the gates being now all broken open, the Turks rushed in impetuously on all sides. The city taken.

c WHEN the great duke saw them approach the royal gate which he guarded, he retired towards his palace, with a small number of men : but in the way to the tower, where his wife and children were, he was seized, and a guard put upon him and them ⁿ.

JUSTINIANI, after getting his wound dressed, was returning to the port (S), when news being brought him of the emperor's death, and the loss of the city, he put to sea again. The shores were crowded with people of all sorts, who beat their breasts, and called to the sailors to take them in ; but if they had been ever so willing, it was not in their power ; nor could they possibly have escaped themselves, if the enemy's fleet had not been busy in plundering. Galata surrenders.

d The Genoese at Galata ran with their wives and children to their ships, leaving all their effects behind them : but the Wazîr Zogan running to the shore, and promising them security for their persons and goods, the greater part returned with their magistrate, and presented the Soltân with the keys of their city. Only five great vessels set sail, the rest were abandoned by the sailors. The Venetian (T) gallies and merchant ships retired in the same manner ^o.

ALL that we have hitherto related happened between the 1st and 8th hours of the day ; at which time the Soltân entered the city with his Wazîrs and great officers, surrounded by a great body of Janizaries. The Soltân enters.

e When he came to the great church, he was astonished to see the condition it was in. Perceiving a Turk pulling up the marble pavement, out of zeal for religion, as he alleged, Mohammed drew his sword, and wounded him ; saying, Be content with the plunder, the buildings belong to me. Then ordering one of the priests to ascend the pulpit, he heard prayers. On leaving the church, he sent for the grand duke ; and bid him see the consequence of not delivering up the city. The grand duke replied, That it neither was in his nor the emperor's power to surrender it : much less ought they to have done it, when the Soltân's own officers advised them to hold out ; for that they said they could not take the city. This answer increased the jealousy which Mohammed had conceived against Hali Baskâ (U). The Soltân asked him next, if the emperor was escaped on board the fleet. The grand duke said, He knew not what was become of him, being posted at a different gate. At the same time two ⁿ DUKAS, c. 39.

^o Idem, ibid. KHALK. l. viii. c. 7.

ground, choosing rather to die fighting, than to be made slaves : among these were Theophilus Paleologus, with his father and sons. Khalk. l. viii. c. 6.

(R) The Turkish historians represent the matter quite contrary : they say, that the sea forces having taken great part of the city, compelled the rest to surrender ; and that otherwise the efforts of the army by land must have been vain, despair having rendered the Greeks valiant. Cant. p. 98.

(S) Some Christian authors represent him in this affair as leaving his post through cowardice, and say, that he died soon afterwards of grief. Nor is what Khalkondylas speaks of his behaviour in a former note much in his favour. Possibly, Dukas, being employed by the prince of Lesbos, a Genoese, might have added this circumstance, to save his credit ; or possibly the others may have injured him, from an invidious report.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(T) Those in the Turkish fleet quitting their ships, to ransack the town after the rest had plundered it, the Venetians gallies being destitute of men (whom the Greeks had taken out to defend their walls) ran a-drift along the Hellepont : so that three days after they ran ashore at the island Egina, and first brought the news of the loss of Constantinople ; which spread such a general terror both by sea and land, that the Greeks left their dwellings, and fled here and there. The lords of Peloponnesus, frightened like the rest, retired to their ships, to save themselves ; which gave the Albanians, who inhabited the country, opportunity to throw off their obedience, Khalk. l. viii. c. 6.

(U) He soon after put him to death, and seized his treasure. Khalkondylas names him Kathites, son of Priam. Khalk. l. viii. c. 8.

G g g

young

A. D. 1453

Emperor's
head exposed.Or Khân slain.Grand duke carried.City surrendered.yet entered by force.Emperor's bravery.

young soldiers stepping forward, one said he had killed the emperor; the other that he had given him the first wound (X). Being sent to find his body, and bring the head, they did so; and it was acknowledged by the grand duke. After this it was nailed to the top of the pillar of the Augusteon, where it remained till the evening; then, the skin being flayed off, it was stuffed with straw, and carried as a trophy to the princes of the Arabs, Persians, and Turks of different nations.

OTHERS say that the duke hid himself with Or Khân, and other persons of condition, in a tower, which they at length yielded. Being sent on board a ship, a Roman, to obtain his liberty, discovered them both to the pilot; who immediately cut off the head of Or Khân, cloathed in a monk's habit, and carried it, with the grand duke (Y) to Mohammed, who comforted him. The Soltân having sent to seek for his wife and children in the camp, and in the fleet, gave to each 1000 aspers; and in sending them home to their own house, told the duke that he would give him the government of the city, and confer on him greater honours than he possessed under the emperor. Having gotten from him the names of the principal officers and other persons of the court, he sent to search for them, and paid 1000 aspers for each (Z).

THIS is the account which the Greek historians have left us concerning the taking of Constantinople; let us now see what the Turks themselves say.

THE Christians being at length reduced to a few defenders, and tired with continual fatigues; seeing also their walls full of breaches, their batteries destroyed, in a word, the city blocked up both by sea and land, without any hopes of relief, the emperor sends ambassadors to surrender it to Mohammed, on his own terms. The Soltân receiving them civilly, promises to grant the inhabitants their lives and effects, with liberty to remove whither they pleased; and then dismisses them: but having something farther to say, orders them to be called back. The centinels from the ramparts suspecting, from the haste which the messengers made after the ambassadors, that the Turks had a design to enter with them, and seize the city, fired on them, to hinder their nearer approach. The Othmâns surprised, and perceiving some of their companions grievously wounded, sounded a retreat, and reported what had happened to the Soltân; who, imagining that the Greeks had repented of their agreement, and fired on his people out of revenge, orders his army to attack and destroy that perfidious enemy. On the other hand, the Greek emperor being told by the centinels, that the Turks had attempted to take the city by fraud, and were now approaching the walls, commands his subjects to exert their utmost in its defence. Upon this a fierce and bloody conflict ensues: but whilst the Greeks valiantly fight on the land side, those who defended the walls towards the haven, being beaten from their posts by the enemy's darts, give the Turkish forces an opportunity to enter the town on that side.

IN this assault the emperor Constantine himself fell, whilst bravely acting the part sometimes of a general, sometimes of a soldier, and in the greatest dangers, animating his men with his presence. His headless body was found lying on that of an ensign-bearer; from whence the place takes its present name of Sanjak dar Yokushi (A); that is, ascents, or hills, with ensigns on them.

WHEN these things were known to those who bravely repelled the attacks of the Turkish land-forces, they forthwith erected a white flag on the walls; and cried aloud from the ramparts, "Why do you, without the fear of God, for no fault of ours, break your promise?" "The agreement for the surrender of the city is now made, and ordered by both emperors to be ratified. Desist therefore from fighting, nor assault those who have engaged to be your future subjects." Mohammed hearing these words, and ignorant perhaps of what happened in the haven, commands the battle to cease, promising to stand to the former conditions, and so receives that part of the city by surrender.

P DUKAS, c. 40.

(X) It is said before, that neither of them knew he was the emperor: and Khalkondylas relates, that not one of the Janizaries could say for certain any thing concerning the emperor's death; only it was supposed, that he was slain near one of the gates, having reigned three years and as many months. Lib. viii. c. 6.

(Y) Khalkondylas relates that Notaras (so he names the grand duke) and Or Khân, grandson of Musulmân, retired to a tower to consult what to do: that Or Khân, putting on a monk's habit, would needs jump off the tower, but was killed by the fall: that Notaras made a shew of defending himself, but at length surrendered; and for that time escaped, with his sons. Lib. viii. c. 6.

(Z) Several Venetian men of quality, who arrived at Constantinople a little before the siege, fell into the hands of the Turks; but the Soltân set them all at liberty, excepting the Baylo of Venice, who was put to death in his presence. Khalk. l. iii. c. 6.

(A) 'Tis a high mount, on whose top is erected a temple, not far from the cathedral church of the Virgin Mary; the only ancient church which the Turks have left the Christians. Cant.

NEXT

a NEXT day the Soltân, entering by the gate called Top Kapu, makes the following declaration to the Greeks. “ I promised you in our agreement, that if you chose to continue here, the churches and monasteries should remain untouched, and your religion suffer no damage : but since I have acquired half the city by force of arms (B), and half by surrender, I think it just, and accordingly order, That the religious houses and churches, which stand in the part I have conquered, be converted into Jâmis, and the rest left intire to the Christians.” Pursuant to this determination, all the churches from Ak Seray (C) to Sancta Sophia, were converted into Jâmis ; but from Suli Monastir (D) to Ederne Kapu, all remained to the Greeks (E). After this, the land and sea forces being assembled in the market-place, called Ak Seray, Mohammed marched in a triumphal procession to Sancta Sophia. Then having ordered the Ezan to be sung (F), he went to the imperial palace ; and as he entered, being addicted to poetry, is reported to have spoken an extempore distich, in the Persian language, the sense of which is this ; “ The spider has woven her web in the imperial palace ; the owl has sung her watch song on the towers of Afrasiab (G) ;” in allusion to the downfall of the Grecian emperors. Constantinople was taken on the 20th of Jemazio’l Ewel (H), in the year 857, and 51st day of the siege ; the negligence or treachery of the Wazîr (I) preventing its being taken sooner². We will now return to Dukas.

b THE day after the city was taken, the Soltân entered it a second time, and went to see the grand duke, who came out to meet him. As the duchess was sick, he went to her bed-side, and calling her mother, bid her good-morrow, and not afflict herself ; promising to give her more than she had lost. After this he walked about the city, which was quite empty, both men and beasts having been carried off.

c THE 28th of May he again went over a great part of the city, and made a feast about the palace. When he had drank pretty hard, he ordered his chief eunuch to demand of the grand duke the youngest of his sons, who was 14 years of age, and extremely handsome. The duke suspecting the Soltân’s design, turned pale, and told the eunuch he might take him, but refused to deliver him (K). Hereupon Mohammed, in a rage, sent back the eunuch for the young lord, and an executioner with him, to bring the duke and his two other sons, and cut their heads off at the palace gate (L). He likewise commanded all the great men and officers to be

A. D. 1453.
Half the city yielded on terms.

Grand duke and others put to death.

² CANT. Othm. Hist. p. 100, & seqq.

(B) Almost all the Christian historians, both Greek and Latin, make the whole acquired by arms ; but all the Turkish writers agree that one half was surrendered on terms : nor is it likely that persons so apt to magnify their own affairs, and diminish those of others, would assert a fact which lessens the glory of this conquest, if it was not true. Cant.

(C) Ak Seray, or Saray, that is, White Palace, is a street which looks to the Propontis, where now are seen the beautiful chambers of the Janizaries, called Tenghi Odalar, or, The New Mansions. No women, even those of the Janizaries themselves, are permitted to pass thro’ this street ; for whatever injuries they receive here go unpunished. Cant.

(D) Or, The Watry Monastery, so called from the springs which flowed from its foundations. It was a church of the Armenians, who took up all that quarter of the city, but is now a Jâmi. Cant.

(E) But were taken away by Selim I. with liberty to build churches of wood in their room. Cant. note 17.

(F) A hymn, containing the Mohammedan profession of faith, sung by the Muczin, or chanter, on the highest tower, or minaret, of the Jâmi, to call the people to prayers. It is used also after victories, like the Te Deum among Christians. Cant.

(G) A palace of the king of Persia, celebrated in the Turkish fables ; and at present the palace of the Greek emperors is become the residence of owls and bats. Cant.

(H) Jomado’l Awwal ; that is, the former Jomada, being the 5th month of the Mohammedan year.

(I) Who was said to be corrupted by the Christians. He seems to be Halil Pascha, whom Pbranza names as chief of the council ; and says, he advised Mohammed to desist from this war, both before and during the siege, when things succeeded not to his expectation : but that his opinion being rejected, he betrayed the resolutions of the Othman council to the Greek emperor ; for which treason he was, a few days after the taking of the city, put to death. Prince Cantemir, who mentions this, tells us, that we are not to expect such discoveries from the graver Turkish historians, who never clearly express the treachery of their own ministers, but to save the honour of that eminent post, and avoid paying so much regard to the memory of traitors. But this last is a very lame apology ; for, surely, recording their treason must redound to their disgrace, not honour. However that be, this is a confession, that his graver sort of historians are not the most impartial.

(K) Khalkondylas relates, that all the Greeks who escaped the slaughter were released from slavery, and settled at Pera, especially the persons of any quality : for Notaras (or the grand duke) himself, with his wife and children, were bought by Mohammed, and permitted to retire whither they pleased. But relying on the succours expected from Italy, he would needs remain at Constantinople, where several others gathered, who could not forbear entering into certain intrigues ; which being present’y discovered, so incensed the Soltân, that he put them all to death. Our author adds, that it was thought this misfortune was occasioned by the imprudent expressions Notaras used when the Soltân sent for his youngest son ; saying, that since he had set them at liberty, he had no right to their persons ; and that the demand was unjust, dishonest, and even outrageous. Others say, that all this was brought about by a lady, the daughter of a foreigner, who hated the Greeks, and with whom the Soltân was greatly enamoured. Khalk. l. viii. c. 7.

(L) Both Dukas and Khalkondylas say the great duke behaved at his death with great magnanimity. The latter relates, that he desired his sons might be executed first, lest otherwise they should be reserved for an unnatural use ; and that although the young creatures lamented, and intreated him rather to give them up, and all his effects which he had saved in Italy, than suffer them to be slain before his eyes, he would not bend. Khalk. l. viii. c. 7. We cannot but think that obstinacy criminal which occasioned the death of so many people.

A. D. 1453. executed, whom he had redeemed from the soldiers; choosing out of their wives and children, a for his own use, those who were most handsome, and best shaped.

Plunder wasted.

THE third day after the taking of Constantinople the ships set sail for their respective countries, loaden with rich plunder and captives. The camp was no less crouded than the ships. There one might see persons of all degrees and conditions; bishops (L) in their pontifical habits, nuns in their religious dress, tied as slaves. The holy vestments were used as housings for horses and dogs. Some were seen serving up fruit in the sacred vessels, and others drinking out of chalices. They carried away in carts an infinite number of books, which they dispersed over both the west and east. They sold the most valuable authors for a trifle (M), threw away an incredible number of the gospels, after stripping off the ornaments; and burnt all the images to dress their (N) victuals. The same day, according to the Turkish historians, the place where Abu Ayub Ansâri was buried, being revealed to Shaykh Ak Shamsi' ddîn, he carries the Soltân into the suburb, called from that general Ayub (O); and the ground being dug, a great stone is found, with an inscription on it. Hereupon Mohammed orders a turbeh, Jâmi, and school, to be erected over the tomb.

Abu Ayub's tomb.

Galata dismantled.

Constantinople repaired.

THE fifth day after, the Soltân entered Galata, and ordered an account to be taken of the number of inhabitants. He likewise commanded the houses of those who had fled to Genoa to be opened, and an inventory to be taken of the goods in each; giving notice, that if the proprietors returned in three months, they should be restored; if not, that they should be confiscated. At the same time he ordered the walls of Galata to be demolished, and those of Constantinople to be repaired. He also chose 5000 families out of his dominions, and enjoined them, under pain of death, to settle by the end of September in that city; the government of which he gave to one of his slaves, named Soleymân (P). He left all the churches desart, except the great one (or Santa Sophia), which he converted into a mosk. After this, on the 18th of June, he returned in triumph to Adrianople, with a prodigious quantity of plunder, and an innumerable multitude of slaves. In the way died the wife of the grand duke. He found, at his arrival, a great number of Christian princes, who came from far and near to felicitate him on his success. He ascended his throne; and while they all stood before him, imposed on each such tribute and homage as he thought fit.

* DUKAS, c. 40 & 42.
viii. c. 7 & 8.

° CANT. ubi sup. p. 104 & 106.

† DUKAS, c. 42. KHALK. l.

(L) Cardinal Isidore, bishop of Russia, the pope's legate, was taken and carried to Pera, where he was sold, but found means to escape on board a ship. Khalk.

(M) The Turks were so ignorant, that if they met with gold or silver they threw it away, to go in quest of brass or tin; and sold the richest precious stones for a very low price, or exchanged them for things of small value. Khalk l. viii. c. 6.

(N) They served them right.

(O) Abu Ayub was in the army, sent by Soleymân Ebn

Abdo'lmâlek, fourteenth Ommiyan Khalifah, to besiege Constantinople, in the year 96 of the Hejrah, of Christ 715, where he was killed. Prince Cantemir says the suburbs is situate at the head of the inner haven, where the river Kiaghâz Khanab discharges itself; and that near this place stood formerly the monastery of the Blakherne, dedicated to the virgin Mary, famous for miracles.

(P) About the same time the adjacent cities, particularly Seliwri and Burgâz, voluntarily surrendered to the Soltân. Cant.

S E C T. II.

To the conquest of the Morea.

A. D. 1454.
Servia invaded,
An. 1454.

NEXT spring, resolving to join Servia to his dominions, he sent to demand the surrender of that country of John the Despot; under pretence that the right of inheritance being in Stephen, son of Lazarus, it therefore belonged to him. His envoy not returning at the time appointed, he set forward with a formidable force; and, having passed Philipopolis, came to Sophia. There, leaving his army and Wazîrs, he entered Servia, at the head of 20,000 foot (Q): but found none to oppose him, the Despot, with the chief men of his court, having retired to Hungary; promising the people to return with a powerful army. When he came to the fort of Sendrew, he did his utmost to take it, as it would have given him an easy passage over the Danube into Hungary; however, he failed in the attempt. He had no better success against another fort, but took a city lower down, on composition; yet carried the inhabitants into slavery.

* DUKAS, c. 42.

(Q) This war is not mentioned by prince Cantemir's historians.

THIS

a THIS city seems to be the same which Khalkondylas calls Novo Barda, situated, he says, in A. D. 1455. the Turkish borders, near the river Morana, which falls into the Danube. Mohammed besieged ^{Made tribute} and battered it so furiously with mortars (a kind of artillery, said to be invented by him) that the inhabitants, seeing almost all their houses beaten down, surrendered at discretion. Part of them he carried into slavery, and the rest he left in the city, to follow their trades; being skilful in working metals, which the neighbouring mines afforded. George the prince (or Despot) of the Triballians, on the approach of the Turks, had fled to Huniades for succour; and at the same time bought a peace with the Soltân, paying 40,000 dukats annual tribute: but soon after died. As Eleazer, his youngest son, was to succeed him, Stephen and George, whose eyes had been put out, found means to seize the treasure, and then fled to the Turkish court, where they were assigned lands to live on *. The Soltân, at his return to Adrianople, repopled the towns and villages about Constantinople with 4000 men and women, who fell to his share; and going to that city, ordered a palace to be built (R) eight stadia in compass; the top of which was covered with lead taken from the monasteries.

THE second year after the conquest of Constantinople, the knights of Rhodes repaired thither with presents, soliciting a treaty of amity and commerce: but because, in obedience to the pope's order, they would not pay tribute, Mohammed declared war against them; and, in spring, fitted out a fleet of 180 sail; among which were twenty-five with three banks of oars, fifty with two banks, and the rest only one bank of oars. They set sail in June under admiral Hamza, who had been cup-bearer to Amurat, and came to Lesbos. The prince sent our author Dukas on board, to compliment and make him a rich present. Two days after he sailed for Khio; and tho' he treated the inhabitants of that isle with the same civility, yet they did him no honours. Upon this some Turks landed, and spoiled the vineyards about the city; but it was too strong for them to attempt: besides, there were more than twenty armed Genoese ships in the port. Thence Hamza sailed to Rhodes: but, having observed at a distance the bigness of the city, and number of ships in the harbour, he judged the island to be twice stronger than that of Khio, and so departed for Ko. The knights of Rhodes had left the town, and retired to another called Rakheas, which was fortified; but after twenty days siege it was forced to surrender. Returning to Khio, a dispute happened with the islanders, wherein several Turks were killed, and one of the ships overset, with all the men on board. The Soltân at this news banished Hamza to the government of Attalia, and declared war against Khio.

ACCORDINGLY ten gallies with three banks of oars, and ten with two, set sail under the command of Genuza, a handsome young man, whom he made also governor of Kallipolis. With this force he took New Phoea; and while the author was at court soliciting the affairs of the prince of Lesbos, the Soltân sent and took Old Phoea. He also reduced Aynum (S); whose prince then resided at Samothrace (T). Mean time the inhabitants of Khio made their peace, by paying 30,000 crowns for the galley which was lost, and 10,000 yearly tribute.

THE people of Lemnos, being disaffected with their prince, sent to desire Mohammed to appoint another. Accordingly he sent Ismael Eunuch, the successor of Genuza, with two gallies to settle Hamza there: which was done, although the prince of Lesbos (to whom it belonged) did all he could to bring the rebels to reason. This incensed Mohammed against him.

HOWEVER, the Soltân in July turned his arms against Belgrade; and had such success at first, Belgrade be- that he beat down part of the wall, and stopped the passage of the river with sixty vessels (U). Some of his soldiers also got into the place and carried off plunder: but John Huniades, happening to arrive the same day (W), charged them roughly; slew many, and drove out the rest. Then, making a furious sally, took the enemy's cannon, slew a great number of them, wounded the Soltân in the thigh (X), and burnt his ships (Y); whereupon he broke up the

* KHALK. l. viii. c. 12.

Y DUKAS, c. 42—45.

(R) Called Eski Saray, or, The old palace, in the heart of Constantinople. 'Tis a vast building, surrounded with high walls, about an Italian mile square. Here usually reside the mistresses of the deceased Soltân, and the Soltânas who have had children; likewise the old maids, who have survived their charms, are maintained out of the Soltân's clemency. Cant.(S) Written also Oenum and Ænus.(T) An island in the Archipelago, now called Samma-drakhi.(U) The more western writers say, he had an army of 150,000 men, and 200 ships and gallies, which were sent up the Danube from Widin. Knowles ap. Ricaut in Mahomet II.(W) According to Khalkondylas, the king of Hungary was incamped on the other side of the Danube with a great army; and, having sent for ships from Buda, attacked and destroyed the Turkish fleet. Thus Huniades with succours got into the town. The fine conduct of this general, and great bravery of the Soltân, are very well related by that author, lib. viii. c. 13.(X) Others say, under the left pap; and that he was carried as dead into his tent. Ricaut, ubi sup.(Y) Others say, he took twenty ships and ran the rest aground, which Mohammed ordered to be burnt, to prevent their being taken. Ricaut, ubi sup.

A. D. 1457. ^a siege =. Khalkondylas says, Huniades himself was so grievously wounded, that he died a few days after (Z); but that some reported he died of the plague, which then raged in the Christian camp ^a. To this place must be referred the war which Mohammed, according to the Turkish historians, had with the king of Hungary; whose forces he defeated. They add, that in the battle the king received a wound, of which he was said to have died not long after (A): and that then the Soltân laid siege to Belgrade; which the approach of winter and loss of men obliged him to raise after a long attempt ^b. Khalkondylas says, he was at the same time at war with the Illyrians, and the emperor of Trebizond; sending his galleys under the command of Khetir, governor of Amasia, to scour the coast of Kolkhis ^c.

The siege raised with loss.

Lesbos attacked.

NEXT year pope Kalixtus sent eleven galleys, under the conduct of the patriarch of Aquileja, to succour Rhodes, Khio, Lesbos, Lemnos, Imbros, Samothrace, Tassa, and other isles, in the neighbourhood of the Turks: where, being joined by the Catalan ships and corsairs, they made up forty sail; which rendezvoused at Rhodes. The Soltân, attributing all these movements to the prince of Lesbos (B), declared war; and sent Ismael with a fleet in August against Mezimne: but, after attempting to make a breach as well as to undermine and scale the walls, he was forced to return, with great loss of men.

Uzun Hassan's embassy. A. D. 1458.

IN 1458, there arrived ambassadors from the Komâns, and from Uzun Hassan (C), who commanded in Armenia, bordering on the Kolkhians. The latter came to demand a small pension (D), which Mohammed's grandfather had granted to the grandfather of Uzun Hassan, and had been due threescore years. It consisted of 1000 housings for horses, 1000 carpets, and 1000 turbans. The Soltân's answer was, that they might return, and assure their master, that next year he would go himself and carry him what he owed. Towards winter he began to build at one of the ends of Constantinople, near the Golden-gate, a citadel; which the emperor John Paleologus was hindered from building by Bâ-yezîd ^d.

The Morea invaded.

LET us now return to the affairs of Greece; which, though but slightly touched by the Turkish historians, are pretty largely set forth by the Grecian, especially Khalkondylas. After Mohammed had built the castle on the Bosphorus, he sent Thurakan into the Morea (E), to make war on the emperor's brothers (Thomas and Demetrius): but, after taking Neopolikhne, he was obliged to retire, and his son Abmed was seized by an ambuscade ^e. The taking of Constantinople struck such a terror throughout Greece, that the lords of the Morea prepared to retire to Italy, accompanied by all the persons of distinction throughout Greece: but Mohammed diverted them by a sudden agreement. This resolution to leave the Morea brought upon them great calamities: for the Albanians, seeing them in a hurry to get away, seized the country; but instead of setting up a governor of their own, as they were advised by one Peter the lame, they chose a prince out of the Greeks, who still remained among them. This was Manuel Kantakuzenus. After which they fell upon the other Greeks (subject to the two Despots), plundering their goods, and carrying off their cattle: for the Albanians in the Morea were shepherds, who lived in the fields without any fixed habitations. These people drawing together took, by force, the cities and fortresses from the Greek inhabitants, whom they pillaged; and, considering them as no better than slaves, sent to the Porte, offering to put the towns and forces of the Morea into the Soltân's hands, provided he would leave them in possession of the open country.

Albanians seize it.

Submit to their princes.

THIS surrender being secretly encouraged by Centerion Zakhârias (brother to the wife of one of the late emperor's brothers), and one Lukanus; prince Thomas (the Despot) had them seized and imprisoned (F) in the castle of Klunetia. But, on a promise of Centerion's daughter in marriage, with other advantages, the governor was prevailed on to let them escape. They

^a DUKAS, c. 45. KHALK. lib. viii. c. 13.

^a KHALK. ib. c. 14.

^b CANT. p. 107.

^c KHALK. lib. viii. c. 13 & 14.

^d DUKAS, c. 45.

^e KHALK. l. viii. c. 1.

(Z) His death is placed by the western historians on 10th Sept. 1456. Karaz, or Karatza Bosha, the best foldier Mohammed had, was killed in this battle by a cannon ball.

(A) This, according to the Turkish historians, fell in the year 860 of the Hejrab, and consequently, in 1456 of Christ; and Christian writers place it in August the same year. So that it is more likely Huniades is here to be understood (the Turks having mistaken him for the king of Hungary, as hath been observed in a former note) than Ladislaus Posthumus, son of Albert, emperor of Germany, as prince Cantemir concludes, p. 107; and the rather as he places his death according to the Christian writers in Nov. 1458.

(B) His name was Dominic. He succeeded his father Dorini Gattianazio, who died in 1456. The author Dukas was an officer of his court, and carried the tribute twice or thrice to Mohammed: yet he no-where describes the person of the Soltân.

(C) Dukas writes Osun Asan.

(D) Others say, it was to apprise Mohammed of his claim to the empire of Trebizond, after the death of David, in right of his wife; threatening war in case he opposed him. Ricaut.

(E) This author always uses the name of Peloponnesus, but we chose the other, as being more commonly used by authors.

(F) The author observes, that Centerion was seized; because when Morâd, father of Mohammed, came to break down the wall of the Morea, he fled into Akkona, and excited the princes and lords thereabout to revolt to the Turks.

a first attacked Klina, and then Patras, a city of Akbaia, where resided Thomas, the youngest of the two Greek lords (G) (to whom the Albanians were subject); but were repulsed at both places. For all this the Morea would have been in danger of falling into the hands of the Albanians, had not the Soltân, at the intreaty of Asan, sent an army under Turakan; which having defeated their forces, and taken 2000 prisoners, with three or four of their towns, they submitted to their princes, on condition that they should keep the places which they had seized, and not be obliged to restore the plunder they had taken.

TURAKAN at parting recommended unity to the two brothers, as the best means to keep their subjects in obedience: but his back was scarce turned before they fell at variance, and to supplanting each other. This gave occasion to Lukanus to excite the Albanians and inhabitants of the Morea to revolt. They had recourse thereupon to Asan (H), as the person of greatest power and authority; for he had the government of Korinth, and the greater part of the Morea: but he refusing to give them any countenance, they refused to pay the yearly tribute of 12,000 gold Statara (I), or any of the usual taxes, unless the lands were equally divided among them. And thus the Greeks, by their dissensions and party quarrels, by degrees dwindled to nothing ^f.

In the year 1458, Mohammed sent to order the Despots of the Morea either to pay the three years arrears of 10,000 ducats tribute, or quit the country. In spring following he marched to attack the Morea, and reduced Korinth, without using force. At the first news of his approach, Thomas, one of the Despots, retired to Italy with his wife and children; and Demetrius, the other, submitted of his own accord to the Soltân; who carried him away, with many considerable persons of Lacedemon, Akbaia, and other provinces; where he placed governors. He brought 2000 families from the Morea, which he settled at Constantinople; and 2000 young men, whom he enrolled among his troops ^g.

To this place must be referred what prince Cantemir relates from Saadi Effendi, and other Turkish historians: that, in 861 (K), Mohammed subdued the rest of the Morea; and, next spring, routed the Greeks, who were attempting to recover what they had lost, and repair Altimil (L), whose walls he demolished; and, to prevent their making further disturbances, placed strong garrisons in Ak Kerneb and Beldez; after which he laid waste the island Korfes ^h (or Korfû).

d KHALKONDYLAS is more particular with regard to the affairs of the Morea at this time. According to that author, Mohammed having sent his officers into the Morea, to receive the tribute due to him, they found the Greeks in such feuds among themselves, that they forbore pressing either them or the Albanians on that head: while the Soltân, in consideration of the discord that reigned between the Despots, remitted one third of the tribute, recommending to them only not to violate the peace which they had sworn to keep. But, finding that they paid no regard to his instances, he marched with his army to the Morea, and leaving part of his troops to besiege Korinth, penetrated into the country, where he took Tharsa, Arriba, Phliasia, Pazenika, and other cities. One of the princes had retired to Mantineia, the other to Epidaurus, cities of Lakonia; which last the Soltân longed to be master of: but, finding it too strong to attack, he returned to the siege of Korinth; whereinto, in his absence, Asan had made a shift to get (M) with a good number of soldiers, and some provisions. Although the castle was accounted impregnable, being situated on a high rock, and inclosed with three very strong walls; yet provisions beginning to fail after the first wall had been battered down with cannon (N), the inhabitants obliged Asan to surrender by capitulation. This was followed by a peace; whereby the Despot gave up all the country which Mohammed had passed through with his army, and agreed to pay 2000 ducats tribute, and likewise yielded the Ægean Sea, the isle of Kalaura, the city of Patras, and the country adjoining to Akbaia ⁱ.

THE war being thus finished, Mohammed disbanded his forces, and went to see Athens; where he admired the Pyræum, the conveniency of its ports, and all the superb antient buildings.

^f KHALK. lib. viii. c. 9, & seqq.

^g DUKAS, c. 45.

^h CANT. Othm. Hist. p. 101.

ⁱ KHALK. lib. ix. c. 1 & 2.

(G) Demetrius and Thomas Paleologus, brothers to the late emperor John.

(H) By other writers called Arfanos, or Arfan, a Greek lord.

(I) Amounting to about 24,000 ducats.

(K) The year 861 of the Hejrah answers to 1456 of Christ; but as it begins the 28th of November, most of it coincides with the year 1457. However, still these transactions will be put a year earlier by the Turkish than the Christian historians; and indeed there is often a difference of two, sometimes of three or more between them. They differ no less in ranging facts; some putting that first which others place last.

(L) By Altimil seems to be meant the wall of the isthmus of Korinth.

(M) He was at Nauplia, a city and port then belonging to the Venetians, from whence he passed by sea to the port of Kenkbres, which was the port of Korinth.

(N) These were of a vast size, some carrying a ball of 875 pound weight. The artillery were generally cast upon the spot, the metal being conveyed to the camp for that purpose.

A. D. 1459.  ings. That city had been taken some time before by Omar, son of Turakan, governor of Thessaly, on the following occasion. On the death of Nerio Acciaoli, its prince, his duchess, who had a young son by him, became mistress of the state, by gaining friends at the Turkish court. Soon after, falling in love with a young Venetian gentleman, son of Pietro Palmerio, Podestat of Nauplium, who came there to trade, she proposed to put him in possession of all, provided he would turn off his wife, and marry her. Palmerio, fired with love as well as ambition, went back to Italy; and, having poisoned his wife, returned to Athens, and married the amorous duchess.

Delivered to Mohammed. Thus he became a great lord; but was much hated by the people. He took on him the guardianship of her son, whom soon after he carried to the Soltân, because Franko, son of Antonio Acciaoli, Nerio's nephew, had retired to the Turkish court, in hopes one day of obtaining the principality. Accordingly, as soon as Mohammed heard of the ill conduct of the widow, he gave the city to Franko; who sent the duchess prisoner to the city of Megara: where, soon after, she was made away with by his order. Upon this her husband went and complained to Mohammed, who, moved by his affliction, sent Omar to take Athens. That general found no difficulty to make himself master of the city: but the fortress holding out a long time, he at length prevailed on Franko to surrender it, in lieu of the country of Beotia and city of Thebes ^k.

Affairs of the Morea. MEAN time the Despot Thomas, uneasy under the Turkish yoke, began hostilities against his brother the Despot of Sparta, who had given his daughter in marriage to Mohammed, and dispatched troops to besiege Patras. Hereupon the Soltân sent forces against them under Khamus (O), surnamed the Spar-Hawk; who seized Ahmed, governor of the Morea, and Omar, his predecessor, to whom he had given his daughter in marriage: but as soon as they heard of the general's approach, they retired to Megalopolis, to their prince, who then assembled a body of Greeks and Albanians, to oppose the Turks. However, they were easily defeated: after which the general, leaving part of his army under Janus and prince Demetrius, to continue the siege, ordered the rest into the garrisons. Thomas, being informed of this, returned, and besieged the Janizaries which remained to guard the fortresses.

Genoefes declare war. AFTER this the Genoefes having demanded a restitution of Pera, as wrongfully detained from them, and Mohammed refusing to yield it, as they had actually made a voluntary surrender of it, as hath been before related, they declared war against him. Upon this the Soltân, passing over to Asia, took from them Amastris, on the Euxine Sea, by composition, and transported two thirds of the inhabitants to Constantinople.

Amastris taken. THE Chirkassians, under Artabales, had but newly retired from the siege of Trebizond, capital of the empire of Kolkhis, when Khiter Beg, governor of Amasia, came, and, surprising the suburbs, made two thousand prisoners. As that poor city was almost depopulated by the pestilence, and must have been taken, had the enemy persisted; the emperor John (P), offered to become tributary, and pay 2000 ducats yearly, provided the captives were restored: which Mohammed agreed to ¹.

State of the isles, BEFORE the taking of Constantinople, Mohammed bestowed Lemnos, Imbros, Thassus, and Samothrace (Q), islands in the Ægean Sea, on one of his officers. But Dorice, after the death of his father Palemedes, seized the lordship of Lesbos (R) and Lemnos, with that of Oenus; which were all quickly recovered. Yet the four isles submitted to the fleet, which arrived presently after from Italy, commanded by the pope's legate. But as soon as that fleet had set sail for Rhodes, Ismael, general of the Turkish galleys, over-ran Imbros and Lemnos; and seizing all the Italians, sent them to Mohammed, who put them to death at Philippopoli, where he then resided, the plague having driven him from Constantinople. Not long after, Zogon, having supplanted Ismael, and obtained the government of Gallipoli, took Thassus and Samothrace; sacked them intirely, and sent the inhabitants to people Constantinople.

and of the Morea. ASAN, having procured an army from the Soltân in favour of prince Demetrius, entered the Peloponnesus, and defeated prince Thomas, near Leontarium (S); where he afterwards besieged him for a few days: but, through the opposition of his adversaries, he was obliged to withdraw; for Omar, governor of Thessaly, and he were always at variance. For this reason, soon after, Mohammed gave his government, with that of the Morea, to Zogan; who, for his service in taking Morezin, the most famous corsair in the Levant seas, had in a short time risen to great credit. Zogan immediately entered Akbaia with his army, and sat down before the fortress, which forthwith surrendered; the Greeks who were there assembled dispersing themselves.

^k KHALK. lib. ix. c. 3.

¹ Ibid. c. 4 & 5.

(O) Dukas calls him Hamza.

(P) Called also Kalojohannes.

(Q) Now Stalimene, Lembro, Thraß, and Sarmadakkli.

(R) Now Miteîn.

(S) The same with Megalopolis.

a On the other hand, the Milanefes, whom Thomas had sent for, on their arrival, began to batter the city : but, having no more than one piece of cannon, were obliged to raise the siege, and retire to Naupactus ^m. A. D. 1459.

MEAN time prince Thomas with his forces reduced the country of Lakonia, and took the city of Kalamata, in the territory of Messene. He then went to besiege Mantineia : but, finding it was to no purpose, sent to sound whether Mohammed would give ear to an agreement with him. The Soltân, having had advice that Uzûn Hassan was in motion in Asia, consented to a peace, on condition that Thomas should restore all the places which he had taken from him, and pay 12,000 ducats tribute. The conditions were accepted of by the prince : but, not being able to raise the money, things were in much distraction among his subjects. Mohammed was so offended, that he put off his expedition against Uzûn Hassan, in order to fall upon the Morea. Prince Thomas distressed.

b BEING arrived at Korinth, Asan waited on him, on behalf of Demetrius, expecting to be vested with the command of his army : but when they were at Tegea, he imprisoned him, and all his adherents ; then marched to Sparta. Demetrius, amazed at this unexpected proceeding, would have retired to the castle, which is above the town : but when he heard that his brother-in-law Asan was a prisoner, he found he had nothing for it, but to go and present himself before the Soltân, who treated him with great kindness ; assuring him, that all past transactions should be forgotten, and that another country should be given to him instead of Sparta. However, he was detained in the camp, and guards placed over him. Prince Demetrius detained.

c AFTER this Mohammed went and seized a very fine and rich Greek city, which lies beyond Sparta, at the foot of the mountain Taugete, three miles from Paleopoli and the river Eurotas. Then he marched to Kastria, a strong city about eight miles distant, with a castle on a rugged mountain, 500 paces high. This place his Janizaries having taken, after a stout resistance, he ordered the garrison, being 300 men, to be put to the sword, and the governor to be cut in two lengthways. Next he took Leontarium, with the castle of Kadikea, where neither man or beast was spared. Out of 6000 inhabitants only 300 were taken prisoners, and they were put to the sword in cold blood. The rest of the cities of the Morea, terrified with this slaughter, surrendered by their deputies. Even Salvarium, in Arkadia, did the same, a very strong place, with a fine port over-against Pylos ; whose inhabitants, to the number of 10,000, were sent to people the suburbs of Constantinople ⁿ. Cities taken by the Soltân.

d MOHAMMED, after carrying prince Demetrius about with him for some time, guarded and bound, released him ; and, by his persuasion, sent Josbua to receive the city of Epidaurus, and bring away his wife and daughter, whom the Soltân seemed desirous to espouse. The citizens delivered the ladies ; but would not part with the city. After this Mohammed resolved to fall upon the places belonging to the Venetians.

MEAN time Zogan, governor of the Morea, who was sent to conquer the countries of Akbaia and Elis, took the city of Kalaurita, by surrender, from Doxas, one of the chief among the Albanians, who were afterwards all put to death. Then he marched to Grebenum, a very strong place : but, not being able to take it, he proceeded to Sancta Maura, another city of the Albanians ; whither the most wealthy people of the country had retired for safety. Those in the fortrefs having surrendered by composition, Zogan took possession ; but, contrary to his promise, let loose his soldiers, who slew many of the inhabitants, and made prisoners of all the rest. The other Albanian cities, in despair of finding, after this, any mercy from the Turks, would hear no more of surrendering on the faith of their generals. Conquests by Zogan.

f WHILE these things were doing on one side, Mohammed marched from Kardikea, to view Koron ; and then proceeded to Pylos, where prince Thomas was, with a ship waiting to carry him off, when he should see occasion : but the fleet of the Venetians to whom it belonged, putting in there, he was ordered to retire, to avoid giving offence to the Soltân. Accordingly, as soon as he knew that the Othmân army was encamped near the town, he withdrew ; and the Venetian ambassadors waited on Mohammed to renew their treaties. After his troops had scoured the country, and made a great number of Albanians captives, he sent prince Demetrius to reduce Beotia, and marched himself into Akbaia ; where he seized all the strong towns and castles, which the lords of the country yielded to him. Here, being informed of Zogan's cruelty at Sancta Maura, and the consequence of it, he ordered all the people to be set at liberty ; turning Zogan out of his post, which he gave to Khamus ^o. Prince Thomas retires.

THIS done, he took Grebenum ; and, marching towards Patras, subdued the city of Kastri- A. D. 1458.
menum. Then besieged Salmenika, situate on the top of a high mountain, with a castle on a steep rock, which he battered for seven or eight days to no purpose ; but the Janizaries Other cities taken by Mohammed.

^m KHALK. c. 6.ⁿ Ibid. lib. ix. c. 7.^o Idem, ibid. c. 8.

A. D. 1459. having found means to turn off the river from the inhabitants, they were obliged to surrender, and were all made slaves. The castle, where one of the Paleologi commanded, would have come to a composition; and Mohammed had, by way of preliminary, withdrawn with his army a league distant: but Khamus, whom he left before the place, having seized some of the inhabitants, the rest refused to capitulate. Hereupon the Soltân turned him out of his command, and restored Zogan.

He marched next into the country of Phæanum, where he put to the sword a great number of Albanians, who, on his parole, brought provisions to the camp. He used the same kind of deceit in the country of Pbliunte: for, observing that the Albanians were generally the cause of the revolt of the Greeks, he resolved to weaken their power, as the most effectual way to prevent rebellions for the future. After this, Mohammed returned to Athens; where being misinformed by the Janizaries, who kept the castle, that the people had conspired to deliver up the city to Franco Acciaoli, lord of Beotia, and lately duke of Athens, he had ten of the most considerable citizens arrested, and sent them to dwell at Constantinople. As to Acciaoli, he sent him to Zogan, who put him to death. Then setting forward, to return by Pherres to Adrianople, he ordered Demetrius to go before; and gave him the city of Ænus, with the revenue of the salt-pits belonging to it: besides 12,000 crowns out of the treasury^p.

Acciaoli put to death.

Salmenika surrendered.

MEAN time, Zogan, after ravaging the country, besieged Salmenika, and offered the inhabitants very advantageous conditions; which they rejected: but soon after, the chief of the Greeks, who, for a year together, had, with invincible courage (Q), sustained the war, and the continual assaults of the Turks, gave up the place; having liberty to carry off his effects.

Prince Thomas at Rome.

PRINCE Thomas, having retired from Pylos, went to the island of Korfu; where he left his family, and set sail for Italy. At the same time, he sent an ambassador to know if Mohammed would give him a great extent of country along the sea-coast, in exchange for the city of Epidamnium. The Soltân, by way of answer, put the envoy in irons: but soon after sent him back. Thomas, being arrived at Rome, was lodged in the pope's palace, and had a pension of about 3000 livres for his other expences^q. Thus the whole Morea fell under the power of the Turks, except such maritime places as were in the hands of the Venetians.

^p KHALKOND. lib. ix. c. 9.

^q Idem, ibid. c. 10.

(Q) Of this virtuous and magnanimous prince (whom we conceive to be Paleologus before-mentioned), Mahmud Bâshâ, the chief man at the Turkish court, said, that he had seen many deer, and other fallow beasts, in the Morea, but not one who might be called a man, except him. Khalk. Some will have this to be prince Thomas himself.

S E C T. III.

To the conquest of Bosnia.

Semendria surrendered.

Hejrah, 863.
A. D. 1458.

WHILE these things were doing in the Morea, the Soltân set forward to recover Semendria (R), or Semendria, which had been given by the Triballians, or Servians, to the king of Hungary; but, on his approach, the inhabitants went and delivered up the keys to him^r. The Turkish historians say, he besieged and took Semendria; which the Christians had subdued some years before. They add, that, within two years after the conquest of Constantinople, he reduced by arms, or capitulation, above 40 cities (S).

A. D. 1459.

Sinopi yielded by Ismael Beg.

IN 864 (T), he seized in Asia the territories of Kizel Ahmed (U), by the treachery of his brother Ismael Beg (X). Ahmed flies to Uzûn Hassan (Y). Hereupon Mohammed passes over with a great army; and, having routed Uzûn Hassan's forces, takes Sinopi^s. This city stands on a tongue of land, extending near five miles into the sea. It is surprisingly strong, being washed on two sides by the sea; yet is very pleasant. The country to the continent is a sandy plain; and the peninsula covered with orchards, and parks full of game.

^r KHALK. lib. ix. c. 5.

^s CANT. p. 107.

(R) Called also Sendrew, on the Danube.

(S) And, during his whole reign, 200 cities and 12 kingdoms, by the confession of the Christian writers themselves.

(T) Dukas places this expedition in the year 1461.

(U) That is, Red Ahmed, who first occasioned the war between Uzûn Hassan and Mohammed.

(X) Khalkondylas calls him Amontes; and says, he was reported to have spurred Mohammed to this expedition against his brother, whom he names Ismael.

(Y) That is, Hassan the Tall; he was king of Kappadocia. Cant. He was the first of the Turkmân race of Ak Koyunlu, who reigned in Persia. Dukas writes Ozûn Asim. Others Ussûn Cassan. See vol. ii. p. 702.

a THE Soltân, who was incensed against the prince of Sinopi, for having leagued with Uzûn Hassan against him, sent thither a fleet consisting of 150 sail of gallies and round vessels (Z); which arrived at Sinopi, at the same time that he, with his army, got thither by land, by way of Kastamona. But Mahmûd Bâshâ, arriving before the Soltân, had a conference with the prince, who agreed to surrender up Sinopi, on condition Mohammed would give him Philipoli (A). This was agreed to, and he retired thither. Kastamona and his other possessions submitted thereupon: for his territories, which were very rich, began at the city of Heraklea, which belonged to Mohammed, and extended from the kingdom of Pontus to Paphlagonia and the lands of Turgut. They yielded about 400,000 ducats yearly, and abounded in the best copper next that of Iberia; which, when our author wrote, brought the Soltân 40,000 ducats yearly. Mohammed carried with him to Constantinople a ship of 900 tons, which Ismael had built; and brought it into port, where he had a larger of his (B) own: but, both of them becoming unserviceable at sea, he built a vessel of 3000 tons; which soon after overset in the port by the weight of its mast.

A. D. 1459.

Huge ships.

It was after this, according to the Greek historians, that the Soltân marched against Uzûn Hassan; into whose dominions he entered after he had passed Sebaste (or Siwâs), and took the city of Koreykum. In his march forward, he was met by the mother of Uzûn Hassan; who reproaching him mildly with warring against those of his own nation, as well as faith, he agreed to make peace on two conditions: that her son, for the future, should neither ravage his territories, nor any way assist the emperor of Trebizond^u. According to Dukas, Uzûn Hassan, not having forces sufficient to oppose Mohammed, retired to the mountains on the borders of Persia. The Soltân then crossing Armenia, the river Phasis, and Mount Kaukasus, taking many places in his way, entered Kolkhis, and marched to Trebizond; where he found his (C) fleet^x. In his passage, Koyunlu Hissar was surrendered to him by Husseyn Beg, who had married the daughter of the king of Trebizond. Then, besieging this last city, David Comnenus, by the persuasions of his mother-in-law Sare Khân, delivers up himself and kingdom to Mohammed; by whom he is honourably received, and sent, with all his family, to Constantinople^y.

Peace with Hassan.

Trebizond besieged:

DAVID was son of the emperor Alexis, and brother of John his predecessor; on whose death, he, by assistance of the Kabazitans, who commanded at Mezokhalde near Trebizond, seized the empire, in prejudice to his nephew Alexis, who was but four years old. The cause of Mohammed's quarrel against David was, that he had entered into a close alliance with Uzûn Hassan, and given him his daughter in marriage (D), upon an assurance that his son-in-law would free him from the tribute which he was to pay the Soltân^z.

MOHAMMED BASHA, who was posted at Skilolimne, having had an interview with the great chamberlain George, the emperor's cousin-german, advised him to persuade David to surrender; which that prince consented to, provided the Soltân would marry his daughter, and give him a country of the same value with his own. Mohammed at first refused to come to any composition: but, at length, by the advice of his council, agreed to the terms proposed; upon which David surrendered the place, and, with his nearest relations, was carried to Constantinople. Mezokhalde, and the other places, surrendered, one after the other: and thus the city of Trebizond, with the whole country of Kolkhis, which, but a little before, composed a noble empire, fell at once into the hands of the Turks.

surrendered on articles.

THE people he disposed of several ways: some he made Janizaries, others slaves; and, some time after, put the emperor and his sons to death. For the wife of Uzûn Hassan having written to David to send her one of his sons, or else Alexes Comnenus, who was then at Meselin; George, the grand chamberlain, gave the letters to the governor of the princes: but fearing the worst, in case it should by any means come to the knowledge of Mahmûd Basha, that he was privy to such an affair, he took them back, and delivered them to the Soltân himself. The Soltân, having read them, ordered all the parties above-mentioned to be strictly guarded; and, after carrying them to Constantinople, to be put to death, not sparing George, the emperor's youngest son, who had turned Mohammedan. The daughter of Emperor put to death.

^u KHALKONDYLAS, lib. ix. c. 10 & 11. DUKAS, c. 45.

^z KHALKONDYLAS, lib. viii. c. 11. DUKAS, c. 45.

^x Idem, ibid.

^y CANTEMIR, p.

(Z) Thus Khalkondylas. Dukas says, the fleet consisted of 200 gallies of two and three banks of oars.

(A) Dukas says, this was Mohammed's offer.

(B) Perhaps that before-mentioned.

(C) Which Khalkondylas says, had blocked up the city by sea for a month before.

(D) This was Katharina Comnena, daughter of his brother John: she is called Despina Katun by some travellers of the same time. The time of this expedition is put by one of them in the year 1472. See Angiollollo's Account of the Life of Uffûn Hassan, and The Voyage of an anonymous Merchant into Persia; both in Ramusio's Collection of Travels, vol. ii. See also Univ. Hist. vol. vii. P. i. p. 292.

A. D. 1459. David, whom he had before taken to wife after a sort, he reduced to serve in the chamber^a.

Skânder Beg's successes. IT is time now to look back to Skânder Beg, and see what was doing all this while in Epirus. Mohammed, soon after his father Morâd's death, sent Hamza, with 12,000 horse, against that prince; who lying in ambush on the top of Mount Modrissa, they were, in their passage by night, attacked with great slaughter, and driven down again into the plain, where Amesa, the prince's nephew, was ready to receive him in as rough a manner. In this action 7000 Turks were killed, and the general, with many officers and common soldiers, taken prisoners. The year following, 14,000 horse, under Debreas, were sent against Skânder Beg; who, with 6000 choice men, marched to surprise him at Pologus, before he entered Epirus: but, being perceived by the moon-light, the Turks had time to draw up in order. However, the prince falling on furiously with his troops, and, after a sharp contest, killing Debreas, the enemy fled; leaving 4120 slain behind them. There fell on this occasion only a few of the Christians, among whom Skânder Beg distributed the spoil.

Besieges Belgrade. AFTER this, Skânder Beg, consulting at Dibra with Moses, the governor, who was in the greatest favour and authority with him, about laying siege to Sfetigrade; that general, having been corrupted by an emissary of the Soltân, advised him to change his design, and besiege Belgrade, on the borders of Epirus. With this view, the prince requested aid of Alfonso, king of Naples; which being arrived, he invested the place with 14,000 men; and so distressed it, that the Turks promised to surrender it in case they were not relieved in sixteen days.

His forces defeated. THE news of this siege coming to Mohammed, who was then going over into Asia against the emperor of Trebizond, he sent Sebalias Bâshâ, with 40,000 horse to raise it. The politic Bâshâ, having prevented notice of his approach, by corrupting Skânder Beg's scouts, fell unawares on that part of his army which lay in the plains. Musakhis, who commanded those troops, drew them up in the best manner he could, and made a brave resistance: but, seeing his men cut down in heaps, attempted to break through the enemy's ranks; and, after performing wonders, was slain with all his men. Skânder Beg would have come down from the mountains to his relief; but was dissuaded by his officers from so dangerous an enterprize. However, observing at last, that most of the Turks followed the pursuit, he descended suddenly, with 4000 men, and made great slaughter among those who remained in the plain. Then, attacking the Bâshâ's rear, did great execution. At length, night approaching, both parties retired to the hills: from whence Skânder Beg marched to Epirus; and Sebalias, in triumph, to Constantinople. This was the greatest overthrow Skânder Beg had ever till then received; his loss amounting to 2000 horse and 3000 foot, most of them Italians, besides his tents and artillery: about 80 also were taken prisoners. The Turks lost in all 3000.

Revolt of Moses. As soon as Moses heard of this defeat, he, with a few whom he had corrupted, fled to Mohammed; by whom he was honourably entertained. Skânder Beg was amazed at this accident; but afterwards, excusing the traitor, on score of the temptation, would suffer none to reproach him. Mean while he urged the Soltân to proceed in the war; and the following spring was sent with 15,000 select horse to invade Epirus. Skânder Beg advanced to meet him; and, joining battle, repulsed the van of the enemy: then attacking the main body, Moses, who commanded it, bent his force against the place where the prince was, with a design to kill him. In effect, a Turkish soldier, happening to encounter him, struck him backward on his horse; at which the Othmâns gave a great shout, as thinking him slain: but he, recovering himself, assaulted his adversary afresh, and slew him. Soon after the rest fled; Moses with 4000 only escaping the slaughter. The Soltân would have put him to death at his return, but for fear of discouraging deserters: and, finding himself neglected by every-body, he soon after fled back to his old master; who restored him to all his former posts.

End of Amesa. SOME time after, Amesa, in resentment of certain injuries done him, as he alleged, by his uncle Skânder Beg, withdrew, with his wife and children, to Constantinople. He was kindly received by Mohammed, who, the next spring, sent Isbâk, the Great Bâshâ of that city, at the head of 50,000 men; with orders, as soon as he arrived at Epirus, to proclaim Amesa, who had the charge of 5000 horse, king of that country, that the inhabitants might see that his quarrel was against their prince, not the nation. Skânder Beg, to prepare against this storm, levied troops in all parts of his territories: but lay himself only with 6000 men; and, as soon as the Bâshâ came in sight, fled, not, as usual, into the woods and mountains, but towards Lyssa, a maritime town of the Venetians, as if he despaired of keeping the country.

The Turks deserted. ISHAK BASHA hereupon marched farther into the country, contrary to the advice of Amesa, whom he had proclaimed king; and the third day came to the plains of Amatha: the night a following, he encamped in those of Pbarsalia, famous for the battle between Cæsar and A. D. 1400 Pompey; and next morning, removed to the foot of Mount Tumenist. Here Skänder Beg, who, by his spies, had watched all the motions of the enemy, came over the hill upon them, when they least expected him; and breaking into their camp before they could draw out in order, made such a slaughter, that they fled, maugre all the intreaties of Ishik and Ameſa; who both behaved gallantly; and were pursued till quite out of Epirus. Of the Turks were slain 20,000 by the lowest account; some say 30,000: and of the Christians, no more than 60 (E). The spoils were very great; and among the prisoners were Ameſa and a Sanjâk, with whom Skänder Beg entered Kroja in triumph.

b AFTER this, no hostilities were committed by the Turks for two years; and the third, in several battles. Mohammed concluded a peace for one year with Skänder Beg; but, as soon as it was expired, he sent Sinan Bâſhî into Epirus, with an army of 20,000 men. This was quickly defeated, as was another of 30,000, under Haffan Beg, who was taken prisoner; and a third of 18,000, commanded by Tuſſan Beg, fared no better. At length, Karaza Beg, an old commander, and acquaintance of Skänder Beg, was, at his request, sent against him with 40,000 men; which the prince being informed of, assembled a greater force than usual, and, sending 2000 men before to lie in ambush in the enemy's country, they defeated their vanguard, consisting of 4000 horse. Soon after the rest of the army entered Epirus: but a hard rain, which continued for three days, preventing any action, the old general thought fit to return home, without doing any thing. Upon this, the Soltân, finding that Skänder Beg was not to be subdued with such forces as he could then spare to send against him, dispatched an ambassador to him with rich presents, and proposals of peace; which was at length concluded in 1461, and continued for some time ^b. Peace concluded.

c THIS is the account given by the Italian and other Christian historians, relating to the affairs of Epirus, during this war: but Khalkondylas represents them in a very different light. According to that author, Mohammed sent a great army in summer (F) against Skänder Beg (G), whom Mcrad could never reduce, under the command of Joshua, son of Brenes; who over-ran that part of Macedonia bordering on the Ionian sea. But Skänder Beg, having demanded aid of the pope, and Alphonſo, king of Naples, his great friend, offering to give up Kroya in return for their assistance, a considerable body of foot was sent over; which, landing at Durazzo (H), entered the Turkish borders, plundering and carrying off all who fell into their hands. Then, joining that prince's troops, they besieged Sfetigrade; and possibly would have taken it, had not Joshua come unexpectedly upon them, and cut them all in pieces. Skänder Beg himself, who happened luckily to be absent, soon after retired to his friends in Italy. Epirus overrun. A. D. 1460.

d AT his return, he chose out a convenient place, which he fortified, to serve for a retreat, when pursued by the Turks. This place was near Durazzo, on the Adriatic coast; where there was a little peninsula of land, about three quarters of a mile over; which he inclosed with a strong wall, and peopled with Albanians. He likewise put Durazzo into a better state of defence than it was in before, and thus secured a retreat by sea, in case he should be obliged by superior force to quit the land. After this, forming a flying camp of Albanians, he betook himself to the mountains; appearing sometimes in one place, sometimes another, where-ever his presence was necessary, and had always an eye on the enemy; who soon after came and ravaged the country from one end to the other, carrying away men and beasts, and burning the towns and villages without opposition ^c. Skänder Beg's retreat.

e To corroborate this relation of Khalkondylas, Dukas says, that Mohammed put to death all the great men of Albania, and demolished all the forts through that country; excepting Monembasia, which he left standing, contrary to his intention. The same author adds, that the Soltân sent a fleet of 180 ships into the Egean Sea, without reaping any advantage from it: that he spent part of the following winter at Adrianople, and the rest at Constantinople; and that he ordered a ship of an extraordinary size to be built; and also the theatre, called the Great ship. Albania dismantled.

f Market for Cloaths, named, in Persian, Bezeſtan ^d.

THE Greek islands remaining still unsubdued, Mohammed, in 865, prepares a great fleet, Hejrah, 865; and attacks Mitylene; which, though bravely defended, at length is mastered. The rest would have shared the same fate, had he not been diverted by the Kazikla Voda (I), prince of Walakbia, refusing to pay the usual tribute ^e. A. D. 1460.

THE

^b KNOWLES's Ottom. Emp. edit. Ricaut. in Mahomet II.

^c KHALK. l. viii. c. 16.

^d DUKAS, c. 45.

^e CANT. p. 108.

(E) These almost impossible facts discredit the history of Skänder Beg.

(F) This was, as we compute, in the year 1460.

(G) Called by our author Skender, or Skander, son of Isanes.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(H) Called by our author Duras.

(I) He was a bloody tyrant. He impaled 6000 men for a trifling occasion; and thence got, among the Walakbians, the nickname of Kapalush, or Pale-maker. By the Christians he is called Dragula; but why (says prince

K k k

A. D. 1463.
Mitylene
attacked,
A. D. 1463.

THE Greek writers are more particular. According to Dukas, in the month of September (K), Mohammed, with a fleet of 67 sail, came before Lesbos, and summoned Nicholas Gattiluzio, who then held it, to surrender. Nicholas, who, to possess the estate, had strangled his brother Dominic (L) four years before, had, for the defence of the island, repaired the fortifications, and provided 5000 soldiers, besides the inhabitants; who, reckoning women and children, amounted to 25,000. On his refusing to give it up, Mohammed returned to Adrianople, and left the care of the siege to the Wazir Mahmud; who battered Lesbos with such vigour, that he beat down that part of the wall called Melanudion, with part of the fortification and towers^f. As the history written by Dukas breaks off abruptly here, we shall supply the rest from Khalkondylas.

and surrendered.

THIS author informs us, that so great a breach filled the besieged with terror; and that though, by the assistance of some pirates, they continued to make a few sallies, and defend the place; yet the prince, seeing no hopes of holding out, or of relief, sent to tell Mohammed Bâshâ, that he would surrender up the isle, provided some other lands were given him in lieu of it, as had been at first offered. Of this, the Bâshâ sent advice to Mohammed, who was so glad of the occasion, that he returned to make the agreement himself. The island having been surrendered, the commonalty were left to cultivate the land. Of the middle class of people, some were made slaves; others enrolled among the Janizaries; and the better sort of all were sent to Constantinople to re-people that city. As for the Corsaires, 300 in number, they were all cloven with the sword from the groin to the breast, and thus left to expire in torment.

The prince
beheaded.

Soon after his return to his capital, he imprisoned the prince (M), with Lucius, his cousin-german, lord of Ænus; who, though young, had assisted him in the murder of his brother: and though both of them turned Mohammedans to save their lives, yet they were soon after confined again, and at length beheaded^g.

THE prince of Walakhia having refused to pay the usual tribute, as before-mentioned, the Soltân marched into his country; and expelling him, made his younger brother governor of that province^h. The occasion and consequences of this war are more satisfactorily set forth by the Greek and other Christian writers.

Walakhia refuses homage.

MOHAMMED having sent to the Waywode (N) to come pay him homage (O), to bring with him 500 young men, and pay for the future 10,000 crowns a year tribute, that prince replied, that he was willing to pay the tribute, but would neither bring the 500 men, nor go and adore him. The Soltân, incensed at this answer, sent a considerable officer, with a secretary, to tell the Waywode to remit the tribute, and that their master would consider of the rest. But the Waywode, instead of complying, ordered them to be impaled: then crossing the Danube, he ravaged Disticta, and took many prisoners; whom he also impaled. After that, he defeated Hamza (P), governor of the province; who opposed him with 10,000 men: and having taken him, with many others, impaled them all.

Invaded by Mohammed:

MOHAMMED, mad with rage at this cruel insult, entered Walakhia with an army of 150,000 men (Q): but as the inhabitants had withdrawn into the woods and passes of the mountains, the Soltân met with nothing but a solitude for seven days together. At length he arrived in a more agreeable country; but found it planted with stakes, bearing the bodies of those who prince Cantemir) I know not, because that name is foreign to the Moldavian language. Cant. This tyrant was not Dragula, or Drakula, but Vladus, or Bladus, a son of his.

^f DUKAS, cap. 45.

^g KHALK. l. x. c. 2.

^h CANT. p. 108.

(K) Dukas places this expedition in the year 1463; which is three years later than the Turkish historians: nor can we well suppose him to be mistaken, considering he was himself upon the spot.

(L) Khalkondylas says, Dominic, called by the Greeks, Cyriak, put his elder brother to death; but names him not. He likewise surnames him Katalusio. But Dukas, who was an officer of his court, may be presumed to have known these matters best.

(M) His sister, who was the most beautiful lady in the east, was put in the Soltân's seraglio. She was the widow of Alexander Comnenus, who died at Trebizond after it was taken; and left a son by her, who afterwards became one of the greatest men at the Othmân court. Khalk.

(N) Khalkondylas calls him Vladus (others Bladus), and says Mohammed bestowed Moldavia on him, by the interest of his younger brother, who was the Soltân's catamite; for having wounded him on his first attempt, he afterwards complied, to secure his safety. As for Vladus, he was a monster in cruelty: at his first entrance, he seized all the considerable men; and not content to put them to death, impaled them alive. In a few days, he destroyed above 20,000 people; and, having fixed himself in the province, leagued with the Hungarians, designing to throw off the Turkish yoke. Khalk. l. ix. c. 12.

(O) Dukas places this before the expedition to Mitylene, or Lesbos; and in the year 1462.

(P) Khalkondylas says, he was decoyed by the secretary into an ambuscade laid by Khamuz (or Hamza); and that Vladus, having defeated and taken them, impaled them, to punish their treachery. L. ix. c. 13.

(Q) Khalkondylas says, 250 thousand; and that Mohammed himself, with 25 galleys and 150 transports, went by sea, and ascended the Danube, burning Bidina, and other places on its banks; among the rest Praylabum, the chief mart in Walakhia. The Soltân undertook this war at the instigation of Pogdan (or Bogdan), prince of Black Pogdania (or Kara Bogdania), who was then at war with Vladus, and had besieged Celium, or Kilia, situate on the Danube. L. ix. c. 14—16.

had

a had been impaled; among which was that of Hamza, dressed in purple silk. This struck him with fear; and in the night, the Waywode, breaking into his camp, made a great slaughter (R): but, at day-break, retired with his men¹. However, Hali Beg, son of Mikhael, being sent in pursuit, slew a great number, and took 2000 prisoners; whom Mohammed ordered to be slain before his face. A. D. 1493.

AFTER this, Vladus leaving 6000 horse to harass the Turks, marched with the rest of his forces to attack Pogdân (or Bogdan), who had invested Celium, or Kilia, a city on the Danube (S). The troops left to follow the Olbmâns had the rashness, contrary to their instructions, to engage the army, and were routed with the loss of 2000 men; which gave Mohammed an opportunity to range the country unmolested, and carry off 200,000 head of cattle, oxen, and horses. The country ravaged:

b THE Soltân left behind him Drakula, brother of Vladus, who, by his intrigues, gained so strong a party among the Walakbians, already disaffected to Vladus on account of his cruelty, that, by help of the Turkish troops left on the frontiers, he began to conquer the country. Hereupon, Vladus finding himself abandoned by his people, retired into Hungary; where, being accused before king Matkias, son of Huniades, by the relations and friends of those he had murdered, a rigorous sentence was passed upon him, pursuant to which he was sent prisoner to *Belgrade*²; where he remained in confinement ten years. At length, being set at liberty, he was slain in battle against the Turks. Vladus expelled:

c IN 867, Mohammed orders the Katirga Ilmani, that is, The three-oared port, to be made towards the south, within the walls of the city. Whilst he was employed in this work, the Greeks, in conjunction with the Venetians, raised commotions in the Morea; and having taken Ghingberjinlik, Sada, Ghiuzelje hissar, Duraj, and Ezornik, try to drive the Turks out of that province: but Mehemed Pasha, being sent with a great army to chastise the rebels, came on them so unexpectedly, that he not only recovered those cities, but subdued the country of Kojeh Hersék (or old Illyria). The Soltân, by way of thanksgiving for his victories, orders the church of the holy apostles (T) to be demolished, and a large Jâmi, called after his name, Mohammedieh, to be built in its room; which structure, scarce to be paralleled by the wonders of antiquity, was ten years in building. Other conquests: A. D. 1462.

d IN 868, assembling a great army, he vanquished and slew the prince of Bosna, or Bosnia Hejrah, 868. (U), then placed strong garrisons in the castles; and in his return, strengthened the borders between that country and Albania, by erecting fortresses in the narrow passages of the mountains³. A. D. 1463.

e THE war of the Morea, which is placed first by the Turkish, is, as it frequently happens in other cases, placed last by the Christian historians; who are more diffusive in the relation of facts. Mohammed having, after the Walakbian expedition, built several castles, says Khalkon-dylas; and among the rest, the faray, or seraglio, at Constantinople, and the castles on the Hellefpont; next spring (X), made war on the Illyrians (Y), inhabiting Bosfina; because their prince peremptorily refused to pay the usual tribute of 50,000 dukats. At the same time he resolved to invade the country of Sandal, the bastard son of him who before commanded the Illyrians (Z). The brothers quarreling about the possession of their father's territories, referred the decision to Mohammed; who adjudged it to Sandal, and ordered Isbâk, governor Bosna invaded,

¹ DUKAS, c. 45. KHALK, l. ix. c. 14—16. & seqq.

² Ibid. ix. c. 16, & l. x. c. i.

³ CANT. p. 108,

(R) Vladus divided his forces into two parts; sending one to hinder Bogdan from entering the country on one side. With the other part, not exceeding 10,000 men, others say but 7000, he retired into the woods; and the first opportunity fell on the Turkish camp, where he made great slaughter: but being pursued in his retreat, a great number of his men were killed, and 1000 taken prisoners. Khalk. l. ix. c. 15, 16.

(S) At the mouth of that river, in the Euxine sea.

(T) It was built by the empress of Justinian the Great, on a mount, near the middle of the city, higher than the other fix. The Jâmi, built in its place by Mohammed Fatih, being 100 cubits square, is thought to be the largest temple next to Santa Sophia. The architect was, they say, a Greek Christian, named Khrisodulus; who, in reward of this vast and wonderful work, was presented with a whole street, and other imperial gifts. They add, that Mohammed being told, that he said he could build a Jâmi more large and elegant, ordered him to be impaled, that his successor might want an architect capable of raising a nobler structure.

This story seems to be invented in order to account for an iron pale, fixed to the gate of the outer hall of the Jâmi, and inclosed by a little tower, so that only the point appears. For, supposing the Soltân could be induced by so idle a suggestion to put him to death: why in so cruel a manner? However, our author, prince Cantemir, alleges very good reasons to prove, that the said street was given to him as a reward by the Soltân.

(U) From Christian writers, he seems to have been Stephen, whose seat was at Yaxiga. Cant.

(X) The more western writers place this war in 1464; which corresponds with the nine last months of the Mohammedan year 868.

(Y) The Illyrians are an ancient people, inhabiting the country now called Bosfina, Bosna, or Bosnia. The Dalmatians, Myfians, Triballians, and Sarmatians, use nearly the same language spoken by them. They extend from the Ionian sea to the higher Isfria, or Sclavonia. Khalk.

(Z) Who was named Stephen, and had been dispossessed by his son.

A.D. 1463. of the Skopians (A), to assist him : hereupon Sandal made war on his brothers, and ravaged a the country.

and subdued.

MOHAMMED having crossed the river Dorobiza, which separates the Triballians from the Illyrians, marched to the Illyrius ; which having passed on rafts, he suddenly over-ran the country, and laid siege to the city of Dorobiza. This place, though exceeding strong, and of difficult approach, being situate on a high mountain, after a few days bombarding, capitulated. After this, he sent Mahmūd Bāshā to surprise the prince of the Illyrians ; who, on his approach, fled to the city of Klitia (B), situated in a marshy soil, so that it was inaccessible in winter : but the ground being dried by the heat of the summer sun, the Lāshā advanced to the very ditch, and prepared to attack the place. Hereupon it was surrendered to him, on condition that the lives of the prince and the inhabitants, with their effects, should be saved. b
His wife before had retired to Ragusa, to avoid the inconveniencies of war ; and carried much wealth with her, by his consent.

Country of Sandal subdued, with others.

THE country of Sandal reached to the very gates of Ragusa, with which he had some dispute. Having engaged in an amour with the wife of a Florentine merchant, he began to treat his princeſs with contempt. She, not brooking this ill usage, retired with her son, a youth, to the Ragusans ; who refused to send her back, unless Sandal parted with his mistress. Hereupon he declared war against them ; and meeting their army, the command of which they had given to his son, he defeated the enemy, and then invited the Soltān to join him against the prince of the Illyrians : but finding the Turks came in greater numbers than he desired, he stood on his guard to defend his country, in case they invaded it. c

MAHMUD BASHA, having performed this service, went to meet the Soltān : who in the mean time had marched to Jaytia (C) the capital of all the Illyrians ; which immediately surrendered to him, being frightened at the taking of Dorobiza, their strongest fortrefs. Several places submitted to the Bāshā in his way, by order of their prince, whom Mohammed carried with him into the country of Sandal ; for now all the Illyrians were subdued. The Soltān presently after sent to Ragusa to demand Sandal's wife ; but she, who had foreseen as much, retired in time to Italy. Then gathering all his forces, he entered the country of Sandal ; which he ravaged from one end to the other, and laid siege to his capital city : but not being able to reduce it, after a few days leaguer, turned his arms against the territories of Constantine, Karagusa, and Paul ; who all submitted to him, and were carried away prisoners. As to d the prince of the Illyrians, having been taken one morning, endeavouring to make his escape, Mohammed sent for him ; and notwithstanding the Bāshā's letters of security, had his head cut cut off on the spot : some say, he was slay'd alive ^m.

^m KHALK, l. x. c. 7, & seqq.

(A) The Skopians inhabit a province only 25 leagues in length from the Triballians (or Servians), and the river Dorobiza, to the country of Sandal, and the gulph of Ionia ; but its greatest breadth, from its reaching to the Pannonians and Triballians, is 60 leagues. At the Triballians begins the government of Ishāk ; that of Paul follows next, extending as far as the country of the Illyrians (or Bosfina). Khal.

(B) By others named Kliffa.

(C) Rather Jazika.

A. D. 1463.

S E C T. XX.

Wars with Skânder Beg and the Venetians.

^a THE Venetians, who were his next neighbours, saw with a jealous eye; the successes of Mohammed; and although the Turks, on several occasions, had used their subjects ill, yet were afraid to take up arms. At length, Joshua, son of Alban, having seized Argos by the treachery of a priest, and Omar, son of Turakan, made inroads on the territory of Naupactus (D); while both of them plundered the lands near Modon, in the Morea, which belonged to the Venetians, Viſtorio Capelli, by a generous speech, prevailed on the senate to invite the Hungarians to a confederacy, and then declare war (E). Ambassadors being sent on that occasion, with 25,000 dukats as a present, king Matbias (or Mathew, son of Huniades) raised forces; and entering unexpectedly into the Othmân territories, demolished the fortifications built by Sabutin to block up Belgrade; then advancing as far as the Save, routed the Turks and Triballians who opposed him, and carried back 20,000 slaves; which was all the work performed by the Hungarians.

^b THE Venetians on the other side, immediately put to sea 35 gallies and 12 great ships, filled with infantry, and 2000 light horse, under the command of Aloysio (F) Loridano. They were joined also by 4000 outlaws from Kandia. These all landing in the Morea, excited the inhabitants to a general revolt. The Turkish governor who resided at Megalopolis (or Leontarium) immediately sent advice of these motions to the Porte: while the Venetians (G), marching from Nauplium, laid siege to Argos; which presently surrendered, there being no more than 50 Janizaries in garrison, who had liberty to withdraw with their baggage. But soon after Jeronimo Bernardini, entering within land, contrary to his orders, lost 400 men by an ambuscade of the Turks.

^c THE first care of the Greeks and Albanians, was to repair the wall of the Isthmus, as well to prevent the escape of the Janizaries dispersed in the garrisons, as to keep out the enemy; and by the assistance of the Venetians, who brought stones and other materials by sea, that fortification was, in a few days, put in a state of defence. Mean time, they solicited the people on every side to join them: but those of Korinth rejecting their proposals, they laid siege to that city; which yet they were forced to raise soon after (H). They failed also to disaffect Akbaia; nor did any city of Lakonia revolt to them, excepting Sparta: for the Turks continually scoured the roads on all sides, which much disconcerted their measures. In short, as it was winter-time, and very cold weather, the soldiers could hardly be prevailed on to guard the wall: so that news arriving that Mahmûd Bâshâ approached with a great army, and was followed by the Soltân himself at the head of more numerous forces, it was thought fit to abandon the Isthmus, and retire to the places which were in their hands.

^d MEAN time, the Turks were no less afraid of the Venetians: for the Bâshâ being come to Larissa, Omar, governor of Thessaly, advised him to proceed no farther, till he sent to inform the Soltân, that his presence was absolutely necessary, the affair being of too great importance for his generals to execute. But soon after, letters arriving with an account how matters stood, Mahmûd marched forward; and finding the wall deserted, and the ships put out to sea, took his road by Korinth, directly for Argos, which was defended by 70 Italians; whom he took prisoners. Then passing through the country of Tegea, he encamped near Leontarium (or Megalopolis); from whence he detached Zogan (newly made governor of the Morea, in the room of Joshua, son of Alban), to furnish Patras, and other neighbouring places, with provision and military stores. At the same time, he sent Omar to ravage the Venetian territories, with 20,000 men; who, near Modon, took a town by assault: the inhabitants, about 500 in number, being sent to Constantinople, were cut in two by the middle, in the presence of the Soltân.

^e THE Bâshâ, finding the season unfit for attacking fortresses, left Omar and Asan at Sparta, to persuade the inhabitants of that city, Tenarus, Epidauros, and other places, to return to their obedience: but although they were strangely alarmed at the unexpected entrance of the Turks into the Morea, and many had fled to the mountains for security; yet, buoyed up by the Venetians, who promised great matters, from their own and the Hungarian invasion, they would hearken to no accommodation.

(D) Now Lepanto.(E) This happened a little before the peace concluded with Skander Beg in 1461.(F) In the original it is Jacomo, but the author was misinformed.(G) With 15,000 men, under Bertoldo Effe.

(H) Their general being killed.

A. D. 1463. MEAN time the Venetians recovered Lemnos, by means of one Kommenus (I), captain of a the fortress; who prevented the principal men of the island from selling it to those Italians, by delivering it up to them. After which, they returned to the Morea, with store of provisions to supply the fortresses¹.

Venetians
take Lemnos.

KOMINUS (or Kommenus), who had surprised the island of Lemnos from the Turks, was succeeded in his command by Ursato Justiniani, who scoured the Ægean Sea with 32 galleys; while Andreo Dandolo, by land, rashly engaging the Turkish horse near Mantineia, was defeated and slain, with 1500 of his men. Ursato had still worse luck at the siege of Mitylene, in Lesbos; where, in two assaults, he lost 5000 men: for grief of which, he died soon after in the Morea, and was succeeded in command by Jacomo Laurentani.

THE Venetians, much weakened by these losses, solicited the pope; who procured them great supplies from Germany, France, Spain, and other countries. They also intreated Skânder Beg to renounce his league with Mohammed, and join with them. The Soltân, fearing that prince should be made general of the Christian forces, sent to him; offering to pardon some incursions of the Epirots, in case he would renew the league. But Skânder Beg having at this time received a letter from the pope, signifying, that he, accompanied by the Christian princes, would speedily pass over to Epirus with a strong army, and exhorting him to declare war against the Turks; that prince, without much ado, broke into the Othmân dominions, and ravaging the country every where, returned with considerable plunder.

Skânder Beg
declares war:

His great
victories.

MOHAMMED, to put a stop to Skânder Beg's career, sent Seremet Bâshâ (K), with 14,000 men, who posted himself near Okrida, in Macedonia. The prince, on this advice, having placed 12,000 men in ambush, sent out 500 horse, with orders, in case they could not draw the enemy into the field, to retire on the least opposition, and so decoy them into the snare; which stratagem taking effect, the Turks were attacked on every side, and lost 20,000 men.

A. D. 1464. The treasurer of the army, with 12 other considerable officers, were taken prisoners, and ransomed for 40,000 dukats. Skânder Beg, on this success, returns to Epirus, expecting the arrival of the Christian forces: but the death of pope Pius, at Amana, as he was ready to embark with them, suddenly dispersed the army, to the great disappointment of those who depended on its assistance.

Venetians unsuccessful.

HOWEVER, the Venetians having made Vitorio Capelli their captain-general, went on with the war; and in a short time, took Aulis, in the isle of Eubœa (or Negropont), Lirsum, in the gulph of Thessalonika, and the isle of Himber. Then landing his men at Pyraeum, surprised Athens; from whence he carried all the people, with the plunder, to Eubœa. Here, being informed, that Pattras, in the Morea, would be delivered up to him by the Christian inhabitants, he landed 4000 foot, and 200 horse; who advancing in disorder within a mile of the city, were routed by the Turkish garrison. In this action, Barbarini, who led the foot, was slain; and Ragio, who commanded the horse, being taken, was impaled; and scarce a thousand of the men escaped to the galleys. Capelli was so concerned at this loss, and that which he sustained in his second attempt on Pattras, that he soon after died suddenly in Eubœa.

Servia ravaged.

A. D. 1465.

THE Venetians, much discouraged with this ill success, applied for assistance to Matthias Korvini, son of the famous Huniades (L), king of Hungary; who, taking their territories under his protection early in the spring, passed the Danube, at Belgrade, with a great army; and razing the forts which the Turks had built there, entered Servia, which he miserably ravaged, and then returned with 20,000 prisoners, besides vast plunder.

Balibanus de-fented by Skânder Beg.

MEAN time, Mohammed, to revenge the late overthrow of Seremet Bâshâ, sent 15000 horse, and 3000 foot into Epirus, under command of Balibanus Budera, an Epirot born, but bred a Mohammedan, and the first who mounted the wall at the taking of Constantinople. This general, arriving at Alcbria, on the frontiers of Epirus, attempted to surprise Skânder Beg; who was incamped with a few troops in the neighbourhood; but missing of his aim, soon after advanced towards a rugged hill, which incloses part of the valley of Valkhal, where that prince then lay with 4000 horse and 15,000 foot, who, on the others approach, retired to a hill behind them. Balibanus taking this for a flight, hastily came forward to attack him: but, after a long and doubtful battle, was routed. However, some of Skânder Beg's best officers, pursuing the enemy beyond their orders, were beset; and after a desperate resistance, taken prisoners. Among these were the famous Moses Galanus, Musachius, Giuiza, Perlot, and others. They were all sent to Constantinople, whither Skânder Beg dispatched an ambassador to obtain

¹ KHALKONDYLAS, l. x. c. 7—11.

(I) Kominius, a famous pirate, according to others.

(K) Perhaps Sir Ahmed, or Sari Ahmed.

(L) He was the younger son of Huniades; for whose sake, on the death of Leijlanc, the army elected him king, although he was then a prisoner at Rogere; and he became a far greater terror to the Turks than ever his father had been.

a their freedom : but the Soltân, rejecting either exchange or ransom, after treating them in the most opprobrious manner, caused them all to be slay'd alive ; in which torment they lived fifteen days.

BALIBANUS, after having corrupted Skânder Beg's scouts, would have surpris'd him in his camp at Oronikheum ; if he himself, ever on the watch, had not, in the dead of night, perceived the enemy at a distance, by the noise of their horses. Then quickly putting his army in order, gave them such a warm reception, that the greater part of them were slain ; the general and the rest with difficulty escaping. Balibanus finding artifice would not do, and having a recruit of 14,000 horse, and 3000 foot, marched to the great plains of Sfetigrade to attack Skânder Beg ; who, with only 8000 horse and 1500 foot, performed wonders. In the battle, his horse being slain, and himself bruised in the fall, the Turks flocked about to kill him : but he was rescued by his soldiers ; and presently after having killed Soleymân, a great Turkish commander, whom he encountered with, the enemy fled : while the victors pursuing, made a great slaughter, so that but a few, with Balibanus himself, escaped.

THIS commander, on his return to Constantinople, ascribed his ill success to the smallness of his forces ; and having applied for a strong body of troops, he was dispatched to Epirus with 40,000 men. Of these, taking 20,000 horse and 4000 foot, he marched the nearest way to Epirus, leaving Takûb Arnaud, otherwise named James the Epirot, with 16,000 horse to take another road, and so hem in Skânder Beg between them. Being arrived at the valley at Valkbal, the prince, who had 8000 horse and 4000 foot, marched towards him. He would have waited till Takûb came up, but his soldiers being impatient to engage, a fierce battle was fought ; when, in the midst of the engagement, the old garrison of Kroja arriving to the assistance of the Epirots, the Turks were overthrown with great slaughter, only Balibanus and a few more escaping. The Christians had scarce time to breathe, when Takûb advanced with his forces, and though much discouraged when he found Balibanus had been defeated, yet did not decline the combat. But Skânder Beg made short work of it : for, having singled out the general, he attacked and slew him ; on which the Turks fled, and in the pursuit, were most of them slain or taken. They lost in the two battles 30,000 men, whereof 6000 were prisoners ^m.

d DURING these transactions, Karaman Oglî Ibrahim Beg, the inveterate enemy of the Othmân race, dies (M), and leaves six sons. Ishâk Beg, the eldest, having driven out his brothers, and seized the whole dominion, they fly to Mohammed ; whom they desire to appoint a successor according to his pleasure. The Soltân, glad of the occasion, names Abmed Beg ; and advancing the rest to honours in his own court, sends him back at the head of a considerable army ; with which he enters Karamania, and defeats his brother, who flies to Uzûn Hassan ⁿ.

To return to the affairs of Skânder Beg. The Soltân, as the surest way to get rid of him, hired two Turks to assassinate him. The better to succeed in their design, they turned Christians ; but falling out together, and letting drop some suspicious words, on strict examination confessed the matter, and were executed. After this, Mohammed marched into Epirus, with 200,000 men, and invested Kroja : but fearing to be disgraced before it, as his father had been, left Balibanus, with 23,000 men, and eight generals more, each with 7000 under his command, to continue the siege. In his return to Constantinople, he took some forts from Skânder Beg ; and corrupting the governor of Khidna, where 3000 men were in garrison, the place was delivered to him, and all the inhabitants, contrary to articles, put to the sword.

f SKANDER BEG, unable to relieve Kroja, went privately to Rome, to desire aid of pope Paul II. ; but could obtain none. However, on his return, finding the succours which he had demanded of the Venetians, and other princes, he in a few days made up an army of 13,400 men, with whom he marched towards Kroja. By the way, he surpris'd Ionima and Hadar, going with a supply to their brother Balibanus, routed their men, and took them both prisoners. Then coming up with the besiegers, drove them from Mount Kruma, their greatest post, and nearest Kroja. Upon this relief, the city rejected the large proposals for surrendering, made by Balibanus ; who at the same time advancing against part of the garrison, which had made a sally, was shot by George Alexius through the neck ; of which wound he died. The Turks were so discouraged at this accident, that they silently retired, leaving their camp behind them ; and finding the passes of the mountains stopped, offered to deliver up their horses and arms for liberty to depart : but this being denied them, they resolved to fight their way through ; which after much loss they effected, to the great discontent of the common soldiers against Skânder Beg.

^m RICAUT, ubi supr.ⁿ CANT. p. 109, & seq.(M) In the year of the Hjrah 869 ; which began the 2d of September, 1464.

A. D. 1466.
Mohammed
invades
Epirus.

THE Spring following, Mohammed marched once more with a mighty army into Epirus: where having rebuilt the city of Valmes, he advanced towards Durazzo, belonging to the Venetians, with a view to surprize it. Here mistaking his aim, after some time he decamped from before it, and laid siege to Kroja: but, finding he could not prevail on the inhabitants, either by threats or promises, to surrender it, he went and razed Kbiuril (N), a city newly founded by Skânder Beg; and then returned to Constantinople.

Skânder Beg
dies.

SOON after this, Skânder Beg having made a progress through his kingdom to view the state of it, went to Lyssa, a city of the Venetians, there to consult with the ambassadors of the confederate princes, particularly about taking Valmes above-mentioned; which was a great annoyance to the Epirots. Here, being seized with a fever, he died the 17th of January, 1466, after he had recommended his wife and son to the protection of the republic; having lived 63 years, and reigned 24. His body was buried in the cathedral, and there rested till about nine years after, when the Turks took Lyssa, and with great respect dug up his bones. Some thought themselves happy to see and touch them; and such as could get a bit, set it in gold or silver, to wear about them; superstitiously imagining, that they should partake of the owner's good fortune °.

Albania reduced.

THE Turkish historians take no notice of Skânder Beg's death; but speak as if Epirus was entirely subdued about this time. Crouding the transactions of several years into one, they only tell us, in short, that Mohammed, to finish the reduction of Arnaud, or Albania, which his father Morâd had begun, by vanquishing Skânder Beg, its rebellious prince, and subduing most of the fortresses, marched thither in 870, and took all the remaining towns from the rebels. Some of them he demolished, and to prevent future commotions, commanded a strong city (O) to be built at the entrance of the province.

Hejrah, 870.
A. D. 1465.

Karamania subdued.

THE Soltân having now subdued almost all his intestine enemies in Europe, passes over into Asia; and resolving to revenge the injuries done to his ancestors by the Karamanian kings, enters their country with a great army; and expelling Abmed, with his brothers, makes his eldest son Mostafa, king of Karamania; which next year he thoroughly subdues, placing garrisons in Ak Saray (P) and (Q) Gbiulluk °.

Bosnia recovered.

DURING the transactions in Epirus, the Hungarians by land, and Venetians by sea, kept the Turks in continual play. King Mathias, pursuant to his promise to the latter, entered Bosnia, and never ceased till he had wrested the whole kingdom out of the hands of the Turks. These afterwards endeavoured to recover Jaziga, the capital, but were forced to raise the siege; and being followed by the king into Servia, he took part of that kingdom also from them: by which actions his name became as dreadful to the Othmâns, as that of his father Huniades had been.

Venetian successes.

ON the other side, the Venetians, and their captain-general, Canalis, burned several towns and villages about the bay of Saloniki (or Theffalonika) fortified Legostinum, in the gulph of Patras, and surprised Ænus, at the mouth of the river Hebrus; from whence Canalis returned to Negropont with 1000 captives. At the same time, the Venetians, assisting Nicholas Du Chaine against his brother Alexius, then at variance about the principality of Zadrina, gave the Turks a great overthrow, near the river Drino, in Epirus ° (or Albania).

City of Ne-gropont taken by Mohammed.

Hej. 874.
A. D. 1469.

THE island of Egriboz (or Negropont), the antient Eubœa, being the only place in Europe which seemed formidable to Mohammed, he, in 874, marched with a great army, attended by a fleet, into Greece; and, in one month, takes the strongest city of that age, in sight of a considerable fleet of the Venetians; who, after coming to the assistance of the besieged, retired to their great dishonour, without firing a gun °. With regard to this remarkable action, the Christian writers tell us, that, as the island of Negropont lay very convenient for invading the Othmân sea coast, and afforded the Venetians an easy retreat, Mohammed resolved to take it from them.

A. D. 1470.

With this view, he sent thither 300 gallies, under Mabmûd, the great Bâshâ, and followed himself with a great army. At his first landing, he took and razed Stora and Basiikon. Then laying a bridge of boats over the streight between the island and Akbaia, raised batteries against Khalcide, or Negropont, the capital city, by the direction of a traitor, who shewed his engineers the weakest parts of the wall; for which, being discovered, he was hanged. After 30 days leaguer, the Venetian admiral came in sight of the city; at whose appearance, Mohammed was inclined to raise the siege, for fear the enemy should break his bridge, and so cut off his communication with the firm land: but the admiral basely slipped the opportunity, while the Turks, pushing on the siege with double fury, at length carried the place by storm.

The island subdued.

° RICAUT, ubi supr.
° CANT. p. III.

° CANTIMIR'S Othm. Hist. p. 110.

° RICAUT, in Mohammed II.

(N) Perhaps the city of retreat, spoken of before by Herakleides.

(O) Perhaps Valles above-mentioned.

(P) Or white palace.

(Q) Rojicum, a town in the same country.

- a The assault lasted a whole day and night; yet, after they had been twice beaten off the breaches, they entered, and slew all who were in it (with the governor and a few more, who retired to the castle), contrary to their agreement. His daughter was spared, and presented to Mohammed as a mirror of beauty; but she, with great constancy, refusing to gratify his passion, he ordered her to be slain. This great loss the Venetians endeavoured to repair not long after, by surprising the island; but failed in the attempt^a.

THESE conquests induced several strong cities to submit to the Soltân; and, in 876, Kizul A. D. 1471. Arslân Beg, lord of Alaeb (R), voluntarily surrenders his dominions. In return for which, Mohammed bestows on him the province of Ghiumo'ljina (S) for ever^b.

- b THE Venetians, to prevent farther mischief, not only entered into a confederacy with pope Sixtus IV. Ferdinand king of Naples, Lewis king of Cyprus, and the grand master of Rhodes, but sent Katarini Zeno to Uzûn Hassan, with large presents, to induce him to make war on Mohammed; who, by his ambassadors, also endeavoured to dissuade him. Mean time, their captain-general, Mocinego, with his fleet, ravaged the island of Lesbos, or Mitylene, and the country about Pergamus, in Lesser Asia. Afterwards, landing at Knidus, he carried off a great booty. Then joining 17 galleys of king Ferdinand at Modon, returned to Asia; and pillaging the coast for four days, set sail for Hallikarnassus, where they took an immense spoil. There being joined by 20 galleys of the pope, and two from Rhodes, they sailed to Samos, and thence to Attalia, capital of Pamphilia, whose suburbs they plundered and burnt: but not being able to take the city, they ravaged the coast, and returned to Rhodes. There they met with the king of Persia's ambassador, sent to the pope and Venetians for great guns by his master, who had entered into a league with the Christian princes against Mohammed. The fleet next sailed to Karia; and carried from thence great spoil to Naxos. Here the galleys of Naples returned home, while Mocinego, with the legate, sailing back to Asia, took Smyrna; which they plundered and fired. Then, winter coming on, returned home likewise.

NEXT year Mocinego sailed again to the coast of Asia; and assisting Kassam Beg, prince of Cilicia, who with his brother Pir Ahmed had been dispossessed by Mohammed, they recovered Sikbinum, Korikus, and at length Seleucia, which restored him his territories. Then having ravaged the country of Lydia, he returned to the Morea^c.

- d ABOUT the same time Yusef Beg, general of Uzûn Hassan, in conjunction with a great army of Tatars, enters the Othmân dominions, and burns Tokâd: but invading Karamania, he is met by Mostafa the new king; and after a long and bloody battle, being defeated and taken, is sent in chains to the Soltân. To revenge this blow, Uzân Hassan himself, the next year, enters the Othmân dominions with a powerful army. Mohammed, who expected this invasion, hastens over to Asia, and meets the Persians at Payas (X); where a battle was fought with various success: but at length Mostafa, the Soltân's eldest son, who commanded the left wing, meeting Zeyno'ddîn, Uzûn Hassan's son, who led the enemy's right wing, after a fierce combat, unhorses him, and before he can recover himself, runs him through the body. Upon this, the right-wing flying, the Othmâns attack the left so furiously, that at length they betake themselves also to flight, Uzûn Hassan escaping with a few attendants only^d.

- e ACCORDING to the Christian historians (Y), who compute each army at 320,000 men, the Turks, having lost 40,000 in the first encounter, the Soltân thought fit to fortify his camp with a trench, the carriages and artillery. The Persians, flushed with success, came boldly to attack it: but their horse, terrified by the unaccustomed noise of the cannon, fell into confusion. This Mohammed perceiving, advanced with his cavalry, and after an obstinate resistance, put them to the rout. But although the Turks had the honour of the field, and took the enemy's camp, yet their loss was computed to be double that of the Persians^e.

THE roads being too difficult for a pursuit, Mohammed besieges Kara Hissar Sharki (Z), which he soon reduces, and then returns with part of his army, leaving the rest under the

com-

^a RICAUT. ubi supr.

^b CANT. p. III.

^c RICAUT, ubi supr.

^d CANT. p. III.

^e RICAUT, ubi supr.

(R) Perhaps the province of Philadelphia; which is called Alla Shâbr by the Turks.

(S) The Turkish name of a province and town in Rûm eli (or Thrace), near Larissa. Cant.

(U) The Christian historians place this action in the year 1474; and say, that Mostafa was defeated, with the loss of 30,000 men; and that Morâd, Bâsha of Romania, who had been sent with forces to assist the prince, was slain. Ricaut.

(X) A city and noble mart of Paphlagonia. Cant. We know none such in that part of Asia Minor: but there is a port called Payâs, or Bayâs, on the south coast in Mod. Hist. Vol. V.

the bay of Skanderûn, or Alexandretta. Perhaps a mistake for Ayâs, a little to the west of Enguri, or Ancyra.

(Y) They say also, that Uzun Hassan made war on Mohammed, as well at the request of the Christian princes, as to support his claim to the empire of Trebizond, in right of his wife (Despina Katun), the daughter of Kalo Joannes; by whom they say he had a daughter called Martha, who was the mother of Shâh Ismael Sofi.

(Z) A noted city of Paphlagonia, near Payas. Perhaps the Arsinga of the ancients. Cant. That cannot be;

A. D. 1474. command of Ghiedik Ahmed Pâshâ (A); who not only took Ermenak and Zilifkeh, but sub- a Kaffa taken. dued the whole province of Varsak (B).
 Hej. 876.

A. D. 1471. NEXT year, under the conduct of the same Pâshâ (C), he wrests from the Genoefes, Kieffe
 (or Kaffa), the strongest place in Krîm, which by that means is reduced to his obedience.
 Here he found Mengli Ghieray, descended from the princes of Kopchâk (D); who, after a long war with his brother, was forced to fly to the Genoefes. Him the Soltân appoints Khân of the Krîm, or Taurica Kbersonesus, and sends with an army to recover his country; which he effected, after killing his brother in battle. This was the first Khân of Tatary appointed by the Turks, and the first who in Krîm ordered the Khotba to be used in the prayers in the name of the Othmân emperor.

Defeated in While these things passed in the Krîm, Soleymân Pâshâ leads a considerable army into b Moldavia; Moldavia (E); where, being met by Stephen (F) near Falchi (G), on the Prut, a long and doubtful battle ensues; but at last, by the negligence of their general, the Othmâns are overthrown, and himself killed (H). Mohammed at this news marches next year with all his forces into the same country; which he lays waste, and carries away an infinite number of cattle and inhabitants, no enemy appearing to oppose him.

besieges Kroja. MEAN time Kroja in Albania being besieged by the Turks, the Venetians, under whose pro-
 A. D. 1477. tection it was, sent Francisco Contareni with an army; who meeting the enemy in the plains of Tyranno, routed them, after a very sharp contest: but the soldiers falling greedily to plunder, the Othmâns rallied and defeated them, killing 1000 with their general. After this, they not only made divers incursions into the countries of Dalmatia, Istria, and Carniola, but having c routed some Venetian troops at the river Sontium (I), ravaged the province of Friuli at their pleasure. They committed the same spoil the following year in the mountains towards Ger- many; and, after a twelve-month's siege, Skodra surrendered for want of provisions.

VENETIANS routed. MOHAMMED, to revenge the repulse he met with before Skodra, or Skutari (K), a strong
 A. D. 1478. city of the Venetians, in Albania, about four years before, sends Ali Beg to besiege it a second time with 80,000 men; who in their march burnt and destroyed the country. May 14, they arrived at the suburbs, and in a month were joined by 50,000 troops more. Having cast cannon, and built a wooden bridge over the river, they began the 20th of June to batter the walls with their artillery and mortars. July 2d, the Soltân himself arrived with his whole force, amounting in all to 350,000 men. At length, breaches being made, the Turks gave several d desperate assaults; and though they fixed their standards four or five times on the rampier, were still beaten off, once with the loss of 12,000 men; while the besieged lost no more than 400.
Mohammed, despairing of taking the place by force, after seven fruitless attacks, changed the siege into a blockade. Mean time Daud Gayola, great Bâshâ of Constantinople, being sent to take in the lesser cities of the Venetians, reduced Zabiakbe, on the lake of Skutari; and Lyssa, which the inhabitants deserted and fired. Drivasta also was subdued by Mostafa, Begler Beg

† CANT. p. 112, & seq.

be; for Arisinga is the present Arisingân on the Euphrates, far from Paphlagonia. Kara Hisâr Sharki signifies the Eastern Kara Hisâr, or black castle. There is a Kara Hisâr near Kaysaria, or Cæsarea.

(A) A famous general, afterwards prime Wazîr. He was called Ghiedik, because he had lost a fore tooth: and gave his name to a quarter or ward of Constantinople. CANT. The Christian writers say, that a sudden peace succeeded this battle, and frustrated the hopes which the Christians had on that side.

(B) Prince Cantemir takes it to be Paphlagonia: but Leunclavius says, Varsak ili is the antient Pisidia.

(C) The Christian historians call him Geduces Achmatas; that is, Gheduk Ahmed. And say, that the fleet was fitted out against Kandia (or Krete); but that the admiral, being disappointed in his design, sailed into the Euxine Sea, and besieged Kaffa: that the Genoefes, weakened by their losses at Constantinople, not being able to relieve the place, it surrendered on articles; which the Turks did not scruple to break. They place this surrender in 1476, four or five years later than the Turkish.

(D) Kapchâk, Kaschâk, or Kischâk. Instead of the ch, an j consonant is often used. This nation and country lies to the north of the Caspian Sea. Prince Cantemir supposes it to be the same with the kingdom of Tibet, or Turkestan: but they are widely different. See before vol. ii. p. 494.

(E) The Christian historians tell us, that the eunuch Soleymân was sent first with 80,000 men to besiege

Skodra, or Skutari, in Albania; but that Mathias, king of Hungary, did on that news so harass the Othmân territories, that, after he had lost 14,000 men in three months before the place, he was called home, to defend the frontiers. They place this transaction in the year 1475. Ricaut, ubi supr.

(F) This was Stephen, surnamed the Great, mentioned in a former note. He is called Tekkiur, or king of Moldavia, which is frequently named Bogdân by the Turks, from Bogdân, the son of this Stephen. CANT.

(G) A city and country of Moldavi; distant from Hussi (where Peter I. of Russia, made peace with the Turks in 1711) ten miles southward from the Ister (or Danube). CANT.

(H) The Christian writers say, he was so bewildered in the woods and fens by Stephen the Waywode, that he lost his whole army, and had much ado to escape himself. Ricaut, ubi supr.

(I) The Turkish historians place this defeat at the Sontium, in the year 1480 or 81. On which side the error lies in these greatly disagreeing dates, we cannot pretend to determine; but see no reason why the Venetians might not have kept as exact registers of their affairs as the Turks.

(K) Prince Cantemir, from his Turkish authors, relates, that in 882 Mohammed took Skanderûn: which must be a mistake for Skodra, or Skutari; and the rather as we find Eskudâr in the Turkish annals of Gaudier, which place its surrender a year later; viz. in 883 of the Hejrah, which began April 3, 1478.

of

a of Asia. After this, the Soltân leaving Ghedûk Ahmed to take care of the blockade with A. D. 1478.
40,000 men, returned to (L) Constantinople.

MEAN while the Venetians, seeing things go to wreck with them, sent Trevifano to the Porte; who at length, in 1478, concluded a peace, by giving up Skôdra, the isle of Lenmos, surrendered on and the strong castle of Tenarus in the Morea, besides paying yearly 8000 ducats; for which peace with they were to traffick freely to the Euxine Sea, and other parts of the Soltân's dominions ^{the Turks.}.

IN 884, Mohammed furnished Alao'ddîn Beg with an army; by whose assistance he vanquished Heirah, 884.
his father Badak Beg (M), and obliged him to fly to Cherkassî (N), king of Mesr. A. D. 1479.

THE next year (O), he equips a great fleet, under Gheidik Ahmed Pâshâ (P), to lay waste Italy. But this general, after ravaging Apulia, and taking some fortresses, is in the midst of b his progress recalled, on account of the new attempts of Uzûn Hassan. He is soon followed by a Venetian ambassador, who humbly sues for peace; which the Soltân at that juncture readily grants. But it was not lasting: for, in 886, Mesîb Pâshâ (Q) is sent with a great Heirah, 886.
fleet to subdue Rhodes; yet is forced to raise the siege, with great loss and dishonour ^{A. D. 1481.}.

THE facts here related are ranged, as in many other places, in a different order from what Cefalonia they are in the Christian historians, as appears from the instances of the defeat of the Venetians taken.
at the river Sontium, and their suing for peace. The latter also place the invasion of Italy subsequent to the siege of Rhodes. But first they inform us, that Mohammed, after the said A. D. 1480.
peace, sent Ghedûk Ahmed with his fleet against Leonardo, prince of Neritus, Zakynthus, and Cefalonia, whose countries he soon took: but that his army of 100,000 men, sent about c the same time into Transilvania, under Ali Beg, and other generals, was, after a very bloody battle, overthrown by the Hungarians at Alba Julia ^b.

THE Soltân was urged to this siege of Rhodes by Antonius Meligalus, a fugitive knight; Rhodes be- who falling sick by the way, was thrown overboard by the Turks, and drowned. The Othmân sieged:
army, consisting of 80,000 men, conducted by Demetrius, another treacherous knight of Rhodes, landed the 22d of June. The Bâshâ (R), after battering the walls for some time, made a breach; but Peter D'Amboise, the grand master, raised such works before it, that A. D. 1481.
Mesîb would not venture to enter it. However, a report being spread, that Mohammed was coming with 100,000 men, and 150 pieces of cannon, it much terrified the besieged, especially the Spaniards. At the same time, a plot was discovered, to poison the grand master, set on foot
d by the Bâshâ; who, having made a bridge over a narrow arm of the sea, in order to batter St. Nicholas's towers, Gervaise Rogers, an Englishman, found means in the night to cut the cables, and break it. However, a new bridge being made, the tower was battered for a while both by sea and land, till that bridge also was broken by the cannon of the place.

THE Bâshâ then tempted the grand master with great promises to surrender the city: but the siege finding he could not prevail with him either to do that, or pay tribute, he renewed his batteries raised.
with double fury; and a large breach being made, the Turks advanced to storm the same, but were gallantly repulsed; while 500 of those who had scaled the walls in another place, were slain. The whole loss amounted to about 5000 men. The grand master received four wounds in the attack. The Bâshâ discouraged with his ill success, and the rumour that the e Christian princes were coming to the relief of Rhodes, raised the siege, and left the island the 17th of August.

MOHAMMED, in hopes that if he failed in one place he would succeed in another, em- Italy invaded.
barked a great army at Vallona (or Aulona), a maritime town in the borders of Mace- donia, under the command of Ghedûk Ahmed, with design to get footing in Italy. The Bâshâ landed in Apulia, near Otranto; and after ravaging the coast, took the city; which being the key of that part of Italy, he caused to be strongly fortified, and victualled for Otranto eighteen months. Then went back to Constantinople, with an intention to return in the taken.
spring, and prosecute his designs: but, luckily for Italy, he was diverted by the troubles raised in Asia ^c.

^a RICAUT, ubi supr.

^a CANT. p. 114, & seqq.

^b RICAUT, ubi supr.

^c Ibid.

(L) Where, in Hejrah 883, A. D. 1478, he built a new palace; which is now the Soltân's court. Cant.
Othmân Hist. p. 114.

(M) It seems to be the province of Sina, or name of some king of those times, unknown to us. Cant.

(N) This is to be understood of Al Mâlek al Asbrâf Kayet Bey, the Cherkassian Soltân who reigned in Mesr, or Egypt, at that time.

(O) Here the defeat of the Venetians at the river Sontium is mentioned.

(P) The Christian historians in the room of this Pâshâ substitute one Alabekkus, or Marbekkus; by what authority I know not. Cant. Some Christian historians mention this Gheidik or Ghedûk Bâshâ, as they call him; though perhaps his name is taken from the Turkish authors, or the annals translated by Gaudier.

(Q) Mesîb signifies the Messiah; thus Issa Mesîb is Jesus Christ. Cant. The Christian writers call him Mesîtes Paleologus, and a kinsman of the late Greek emperor.

(R) The Christian writers call him Mesîtes, a corruption of Mesîb, his true name, and very common among Mohammedans.

A. D. 1481.
Mohammed
dies.

THAT summer the Soltân assembles all the forces of the Othmân empire ; and passing the Bosphorus, near Yuzkinder, pitches his tent under Maltepè (S), with a view to frustrate the designs of Uzûn Hassan (T) : but being in this place attacked with a violent fit of the gout, accompanied with other disorders (U), he in a few days was carried off, the 5th of Jemâzîo'lawel, leaving the empire to his son (X) Bâ-yezîd.

MOHAMMED lived fifty-one years, and reigned thirty (Y) and three months, exclusive of the time he ruled in his father's life-time.

His character
and person.

BESIDES his warlike virtues, of which he gave eminent proofs, he was famous for learning, wisdom, and a thirst after knowledge ; for his proficiency in languages, and patience in labours. He was also religious. In short, an accomplished prince, if he had made a conscience of breaking his word for the good of the state ^d.

ACCORDING to the Christian writers, he had nothing in his outward appearance answerable to the greatness of his mind. He was low of stature, and square set ; large limbed (Z), and of great strength. His complexion was Tartar-like, fallow and melancholic ; as were most of his predecessors. His looks were stern, his eyes a little sunk in his head, yet piercing. His nose so high and crooked that it almost touched his upper lip (A). He had very acute parts ; was skilled in the Turkish learning, especially astronomy ; and could speak Greek, Latin, Arabic, Khaldee, and Persian. He delighted much in history ; was very courageous and fortunate. He punished theft and all sorts of injustice with great severity. He had a great esteem for men who excelled in any art or science. But, to ballance these virtues, they say, that he had no regard for religion, or his treaties ; was very ambitious, and a great dissembler ; that he delighted in blood : and that his least displeasure was death ^c.

^d CANT. p. 115.

^c Ibid.

(S) That is, the rich mountain, or mountain of riches. It is a very high one, not far from Nizza ; which takes its name from a treasure once found at the foot of it. Ships in the Euxine Sea, when they come within eighty miles of the Bosphorus, discover and direct their course by it, although it is nearer the Propontis than that sea. Cant. The Christian historians say, that falling sick at Geirvisin (perhaps Gebesi), a day's journey short of Nikomedia, he died in three days, supposed to have been poisoned.

(T) The Christian historians say, that the king of Karamania, aided by those of Persia and Egypt, having defeated the Soltân, with Ghedûk Ahmed, haltered over to Asia.

(U) The cholick, which Christian writers say he was seized with three days after he began this expedition, might have been one of those disorders. Cant.

(X) Mossafa, his eldest son, is said to have been strangled by his father's command, for ravishing Ahmed Pâshâ's wife.

(Y) The Christians ascribe to him fifty-three years of life, and thirty-two of reign, including perhaps the three years of his reign during his father's life. Cant. Others only a life of fifty-two years, and a reign of thirty-one.

(Z) Philip de Commines says, one of his legs was swelled to a monstrous degree ; which was the reason that he commonly rode in a chariot.

(A) His nose is not represented so much hooked in his picture given us by prince Cantemir. This Soltân sent for Gentil Bellin from Venice to draw his face, and nobly rewarded him.

CHAP. IX.

The Reign of Bâ-yezîd II.

8. Soltân
Bâ-yezîd II.

AT Mohammed's death, his elder son Bâ-yezîd, who was Sanjâk, or governor, of Amasia, (B) was thinking of the Hâj (C), or pilgrimage to Mekka, when a message came from the Wazîr, signifying that his father was dead, and had appointed him his successor. At the same time he received a letter also, signed by the Wazîr and other great officers, exhorting him to come and take possession of the throne, and leave his intended pilgrimage to men of lower birth and more leisure ; adding, that it would be much more for the advantage of the Mohammedan religion, to prevent, by his valour and counsels, his enemies from recovering their courage and strength.

goes to Mekka.

BA-YEZID, surprised at this message, was for a while in doubt what course to take. Piety called upon him to perform his vow, and it seemed dangerous to leave the throne so long vacant. At last religion surmounts the care of the commonwealth, and fortune affords an opportunity

(B) Before Pâshâs (or Bâshâs) and Begler Begs were instituted, all governors of provinces went by the name of Sanjâk ; which is at present restrained to those who are set over provinces without the distinction of the Tug or horse-tails, and is subordinate to a Beg, as a Beg to a Pâshâ, and a Pâshâ to a Begler Beg. Cant.

(C) Hâj is a pilgrimage to the holy places, Mekka,

Medina, and Jerusalem ; which every Turk is obliged to perform once in his life, at a time when half his substance will discharge the expences. And thus he obtains the title of Hâjî, or pilgrim. The Karawân is commonly escorted by the Bâshâ of Damaskus, with soldiers and water-bearers ; who takes care that their number is never less than 14,000. Cant.

a opportunity to preserve both. Therefore he answers the Wazîr, that it was not in his power A. D. 1481.
to lay-aside his more than blessed pilgrimage; and had rather forfeit the empire of the whole world than leave his vows unperformed: but, lest the Othmân state might suffer any detriment, it was his advice, that they should reverence as sovereign his son Korkûd till his return. This Korkûd was of such sweetness and modesty that he excelled those more advanced in years. He had, on account of his good qualities, been kept by Soltân Mohammed about his person for two years; and at his death was in the army.

BA-YEZID, without staying for an answer, sets out for Mekka: and the great men, accord- Korkûd en-ing to his directions, confer the government on Korkûd; who caused his name to be men- throned:
tioned in the prayers, and stamped on the coin. At the end of nine months Bâ-yezîd returns
b from his pilgrimage, and sends letters to his son, and chief officers of state; desiring him to keep the empire, and them to obey him; while he lived privately at Nicea. It is doubtful whether Bâ-yezîd was led to this contempt of the crown by a zeal for divine worship kindled at Mekka; or that, fearing his son's power, ambition, and popularity, he thought it better to undermine him at Nicea by subtil arts, than hazard both his life and empire by an unseasonable demand of the supreme authority. The prime Wazîr Ali Pâshâ, having read the letter, assembles a council; and after some debate, decrees with their consent, that Mohammed's appointment should be strictly adhered to, and Bâ-yezîd alone acknowledged emperor.

HOWEVER, they resolve first to sound Korkûd; and the prime Wazîr, having obtained an His filial piety; audience, says to him, "Your majesty's resplendent father, by the divine aid, is returned in c "safety from Mekka to Hâlep; which we deemed it our duty to tell your majesty, in order "to know your pleasure concerning him and his arrival." Korkûd to this discourse replies,
"The services you have done the empire, ought to pass for so many proofs of your fidelity:
"but whilst, by so artful a speech, you endeavour to shake mine, I can scarce refrain from "taxing you with treachery. For you know my father did not absolutely and for ever resign
"the crown to me; but only commanded me to rule in his stead, till his return from a pilgri"mage, undertaken for his own and the public advantage. This I have done, because I "would not disobey a father's commands. Let him, now he is returned, receive his own
"empire; and I, resigning the scepter, will for ever profess myself both his son and vassal."

A FEW days after Korkûd, hearing of his father's approach, passes the Bosphorus, attended resigns to Bâd by all his Wazîrs and other officers, and meets him not far from Nicea; where he pays him yezîd.
obeisance, and commands the rest to follow his example. Then, ordering the Mimbar (D) to be raised, he takes his father by the hand, leads him to the throne, and, turning to the spectators, says, "This is indeed my father and lord; but he is also the governor and em"peror of the Othmâns. I have hitherto been his shadow: now the light is come the shadow
"vanishes: to him alone therefore pay obedience and reverence." After this he waits on his father to Constantinople; where, arriving the 29th of Jomazio'l Akbîr, in the year 1581, Bâ-yezîd is invested with the imperial crown (E); and next day Korkûd, with an allowance fit for an emperor, departs for Magnesia ^a.

THIS unexpected change of affairs seemed very unlucky to Jem (F), Sanjâk of Konia (or Jem rebels;
e Ikonium); who from Korkûd's youth had entertained great hopes of seizing the empire: but on Bâ-yezîd's mounting the throne, he reckoned his expectation intirely frustrated. He pretended the crown belonged to him, because Bâ-yezîd was born before Mohammed was Soltân; and alleged, it was a dishonour that the empire should be given to the son of a private man, in prejudice to the imperial issue. He charged his father's will with falshood, as not being written, but only coming from the mouth of a treacherous Wazîr. By such discourses he persuaded not only several cities, but also most of the Asiatic forces, that he was the right heir; and caused himself to be proclaimed emperor at Prusa. The inhabitants of this city and other places assisting him with money, he soon after raised a considerable army. But his dominion was neither firm nor lasting: for Bâ-yezîd, being informed of his brother's proceedings, passes hastily into Asia, with numerous forces; and meeting him near Prusa (G), f after a bloody battle, put him to flight. Jem, escaping with only a few attendants, fled first

^a CANT. Oth. Hist. p. 116, & seqq.

(D) Mimbar (or Member) is a chair like a bishop's throne; on which, raised with three steps, both the imperial throne, and, in great churches, the Vaidz, or preacher's pulpit, is erected. CANT.

(E) The Christian historians know nothing of Bâ-yezîd's pilgrimage, and the cause of enthroning Korkûd. They only say, that in a contest between Bâ-yezîd and Zemes (or Jem) the three great Eşbâs, Isâk, Mesîtes, and Abmed, returning from Otranto, set up Korkûd; who, on his father's arrival from Anafsa, freely resigned to him.

(F) Whether he derives his name from Jem, a delicious kind of grapes, or Jemm, a fabulous name of Soliman, or Alexander the great, Prince Cantemir knew not. The Christian writers have out of it made their Zemes and Zizem. CANT.

(G) The Christian writers say, Jem was defeated by the conduct of the great Bâshâ Ahmed near Nicopolis (or Ejki Shâhr).

A. D. 1481. to Hâlep, and then to Kaité Bay (H), king of Mefr (I), whose assistance he implores against his brother; who had not only seized the empire in his wrong, but had put his children to death.

his troops defeated;

KAITE BAY advised him to lay aside the thoughts of war, and go in a pilgrimage to Mekka, for that Bâ-yezîd had then great armies on foot; promising, at his return, in case the face of affairs was altered, to assist him to the utmost of his power. Jem, not liking dilatory measures, writes to some of the great men of Varsak and Turgad (K), with whom he had contracted a strict friendship, intreating their aid. This being readily granted, he feigns himself desirous to undertake the pilgrimage, and applies to Kaité Bay, who furnishes him with every thing, and attendants suitable to his quality. However, Jem, instead of going to Mekka (L), takes the first opportunity to give his attendants the slip, and flies with a few followers to his friends; who assemble the forces of those countries: but, being undisciplined troops, they are easily routed by the army of Bâ-yezîd.

flies to Italy for shelter.

JEM, after his defeat, for some time wandered alone in disguise about the maritime places, and at length gets a ship bound for Italy; but first for Rhodes (M): from whence sailing, with some of the natives, he visits the pope; who recommended him to the king of Naples (N). Here, in an elegant speech, he sets forth the cause of his flight, and implores the assistance of the Christian princes: promising, with an oath, that, in case he obtained their help, the Othmâns should never set foot in any Christian dominions. The Christian princes, who had been terrified with the Othmân arms, bad him take courage; assuring him, that they would do their utmost to restore him the first opportunity. One day, as Bâ-yezîd was talking of these things, there happened to be present an Italian captive, turned Mohammedan, who for his address in shaving was made Berber Bâshî (O). This man, whose name was Mostafa, being full of craft, hearing what the emperor spoke, fell at his feet and said: "If your majesty will vouchsafe to commit so weighty an affair to my management, I will free your mind from all care; and dispatch your brother, although he lurked in the most secret corner of Italy."

Mostafa's stratagem:

THE Soltân not only gave him power to commit the deed; but swore by the holy souls of his (P) ancestors to advance him to the dignity of prime Wazîr, provided he accomplished an undertaking so divine (Q) and advantageous to the Othmân empire. Mostafa, encouraged by these promises, flies to the Franks (R) dwelling at Pera, and conjures them to assist him to make his escape to his own country. Being arrived at Naples by their means, Jem, who happened to be there, hearing that an excellent barber was come from Turkey; and, curious perhaps to know what passed at Constantinople, orders the man to be sent for. When he came, being asked about the present state of the Turkish affairs, he replied: that as he had followed the business of a barber for some years in that capital, he never minded any thing but the improvement of his art, and how to procure his liberty; which, after long waiting, he had, he said, obtained by the help of some good men; so that now he could freely enjoy his country, and profess the Christian religion.

becomes Jem's barber;

IN answer to this Jem told him, that he had nothing to do with his religious affairs, for God had given to every man a free will (S): but, as he lived in a land where barbers seemed

(H) Not Caithaban, or Caith Bey, as the western writers give it: for it is a Tartarian word, compounded of Kait, Conversion, and bay, rich: which is added to avoid the ill sound of the Jislân (or Astân), which commonly stands for e. The Tatars of quality add Bay to their names, as the Turks do Chelebi. Kaité Bay, who was a Cherkassian (Mamlûk, or slave), was the Hannibal of the Othmân empire. Cant. Prince Cantemir seems to be mistaken, for Bay or Bey signifies in Turkish a lord, as well as Beg; though not so much used as the latter, except in Egypt and the coast of Barbary.

(I) Mefr is the Arab and Turkish name for either Egypt or Kayro.

(K) A province near Varsak, which is thought to be Paphlagonia. Cant. Rather Pisidia, as hath been remarked in a former note. The Christian writers say, the invitation was sent him by the king of Karamania, at that time living in a poor condition in Armenia; and that, joining their forces, they were defeated between Iknonium and Laranda.

(L) The Christian writers say, he made the pilgrimage to Mekka after his first defeat; but the Turkish historians ought to know best.

(M) The Christian writers tell us, that the grand master furnished him with a good retinue, and sent him to pope Innocent VIII.: also that Bâ-yezîd agreed to pay him 30,000 ducats, on account of his honourable usage to him.

(N) Here the Turkish historians are mistaken: for he was delivered not to the king of Naples, but to Charles VIII. king of France, then preparing for the Neapolitan expedition. Cant.

(O) Or chief barber, the sixth great domestic officer at the Turkish court. Cant.

(P) By the blessed souls of my ancestors, or by the soul of my grandfather, is the only oath used by the Soltâns; except in their covenants with the Christians they add, by the name of the most high God: by the truth of the Korân: by the pure spirit of the prophet, &c. Cant.

(Q) The Soltân's orders, of whatever kind, are received by the Turks as coming from God: and to disobey them is reckoned the highest impiety, though it be to the prime Wazîr to send him his head. Cant.

(R) It is customary with the Turks to call all Christian nations (the Poles, Hungarians, and others, excepted, who wear long habits), and especially the Italians, by the general name of Ifrenj, vulgarly Fireng. Giving also to each its particular name, though very different from those used by the respective people. Cant.

(S) This notion of free will in man, so contradictory to their doctrine of absolute predestination, is admitted by many, that the Christians may not at the last judgment excuse their not embracing the Mohammedan faith, from a plea of their wanting free will. Cant.

- a to be very unskilful, he only wished that he would become his tonsor: "for," added he, "since A. D. 1482. you have sojourned for some time among my countrymen, who you know shave with so light and pleasant a hand, that a man can scarce forbear sleeping under the operation, I hope you have acquired some share of their art." Mostafa, the better to deceive Jem, at first declined the office; but at last consents: pretending, "that he could not in conscience refuse the honour of serving so great a prince, and shaving the head of one whose face all good men desired to see at Constantinople."

- HEREUPON he is received among his chamberlains, to shave him on the usual days; and, for some time, discharged his office well. But Jem happening to fall asleep one day under his hands, when none of the other servants were in the room, Mostafa cuts the prince's windpipe with a sharp razor (T): then, binding the wound very hard with a handkerchief to prevent its bleeding, leaves the chamber, and tells those in waiting, that their lord was asleep; bidding them not to make a noise to disturb him. This done, he posts to a ship, which lay ready to receive him, and escapes to Constantinople. At his arrival he repairs to Bâ-yezîd, and acquaints him with what he had done. The Soltân, who could not believe the story, was soon after convinced by a report that Jem had been murdered by the treachery of some Christians.

HEREUPON Bâ-yezîd, mindful of his promise, promotes Berber Mostafa to the dignity of prime Wazîr. Then sending ambassadors to Naples for the body, it was delivered to them, and buried at Prusa, near the tomb of Morâd.

- c NOTHING was wanting in Jem which could be called virtue, prudence, magnanimity, fortitude, and wisdom. He had no equal of his age. He is chiefly praised for rhetoric and eloquence. When among the Christians, he was strictly observant of the Mohammedan rites; said his daily prayers, and finished Telaveti Korân, or reading of the whole Korân, every week.

- THE rival of his empire being thus removed, Bâ-yezîd, in 887, made a progress into the Moldavia Morea, and fortified the isthmus with two strong castles, towards the Corinthian bay. These he provided with good garrisons, in order to restrain the Christians, who frequently invaded the Othmân dominions on that side. Next spring, he ordered a Jâmi, Madreseh, Daro'ishîya, Imaret, and public bath, to be built at Adrianople, on the river Tunjeh. Then, marching with all his forces towards Moldavia (U), governed now by Stephen, he takes the bulwarks of the whole country, the strong cities of Kili (X), on the Danube, and Akkiermân (Y), near it, on the Euxine Sea. By this means he not only prevented the Moldavians from exercising piracy on that sea, but opened himself a way to annoy by incursions a province often attempted in vain.

- THE same year, the Begler Beg of Asia took the famous cities of Tarsu (or Tarsus), Kurshunli, and Kosunli (Z), while the great general Ghiedik Pâshâ is put to death^b. This is all the Turkish historians afford us concerning these two events, while the Christian writers, who place the latter first, and both before the Moldavian expedition, are more explicit. With regard to the first, they tell us, that Bâ-yezîd being at leisure to call Pîr Ahmed, king of Karamânia, to an account for assisting his brother Zemes (or Jem), marched into the country, and took Tarsus. Mean time the king, having obtained aid of the Soltân of Egypt, met Bâ-yezîd, and fought a fierce battle; but, towards sun-set, rushing boldly to support his troops in the midst of the Turks, he was slain. The consequence of which was the defeat of his army, and intire conquest of his country. In the same expedition the prince of Trakhea was induced to submit to the Othmân yoke, and receive in exchange some other territories of Asia Minor.

^a CANTEMIR Othman Hist. p. 119, & seqq.

(T) The Turks here acquit pope Alexander VI. from the execrable crime charged on him by Christian and even catholic writers, and believed for so many ages: namely, that the pope, fearing Charles might give him up, to ingratiate himself with Bâ-yezîd, had him poisoned at Taracina, in his march to Naples with that king. The reader is left to embrace which report he pleases. Cant. They place this event in the year 1495; whereas the Turks mention no date.

(U) Prince Cantemir had often admired, in looking on the maps of Hungary, whence it was that the limits of Walakbia and Moldavia were so erroneously marked. Nor had he ever seen one ancient or modern map but what abounded with gross errors: thus, the cities of Kili and Ak Kiermân, commonly placed in Walakbia are distant more than 300 miles from its borders; nor ever belonged to it, but to Moldavia. Cant.

(X) Called by the Moldavians Cilia, the ancient Lycostomos, a city situate at the northern mouth of the Danube, which is larger and deeper than the other four. It is distant from Galokh, a considerable mart of Moldavia on the same river, thirty-eight hours or leagues. Cant.

(Y) Formerly Moncafter, the Ozia of Herodotus, now called by the Moldavians, Czitate Alba, or White Town; which the Turkish name also signifies. It is a most ancient city, famous for the exile of Ovid, from whom a lake near it, called Ovid's Lake, seems to have received its name latterly from the Moldavians. Cant.

(Z) Kurshunli signifies lead: but prince Cantemir knows nothing of the name or situation of Kosunli. There is another Kosunli in the Krîm, called Grimze by Herodotus, or, according to others, Kherfonesus. Cant.

As

A. D. 1489.

Ahmed Bâshâ
translated,

As to the death of Abmed Bâshâ, the Turkish historians ascribe this great man's fall to his being falsely accused of an attempt to dethrone the Soltân, in favour of his eldest son (A); but the Christian writers assign another cause and manner of his death. According to them, while Abmed Bâshâ was absent from court, Isbâk, an antient Bâshâ, bearing a grudge to him, for having divorced his daughter on suspicion of incontinency, represented him as such a very dangerous man, on account of his great interest with the Janizaries, that Ba-yezîd resolved to destroy him. With that view the Soltân, at his return to court, invited him to supper; and, having drank plentifully, ordered vests to be given to his guests: but that for Abmed was of black velvet. The Bâshâ, enraged at this token of death, is said to have cried out, Thou son of a whore, since thou intendest so much cruelty, why didst thou not inflict it before thou hadst forced us to drink this impure and forbidden wine? Then, sitting on the ground, and being ordered to stay after the rest, as the executioners were going to do their office, the Soltân was prevailed on by a favourite eunuch to defer his death, for fear of the soldiery. In effect, being informed by his son of the danger Abmed was in, the Janizaries ran in shoals to the court.

and slain.

BA-YEZID, then appearing at a window, demanded the reason of their tumult. They insolently answered, that they would teach him, as a drunkard, beast, and rascal, to discharge his high office with more discretion and sobriety: calling him, by way of contempt, Batcbelor or Scholar. Being obliged to release the Bâshâ, they carried him with them on their shoulders; often asking him how he did, and how he felt himself. Abmed not only thus escaped death for this time, but was also restored to his places, and seemingly to the Soltân's favour; yet, some time after, he was slain by his order as he sat at supper in his court. Bâ-yezîd, being likewise incensed at the Janizaries, for what they had done in Abmed's favour already, and having reason to believe they might attempt something farther in revenge of his death, formed a design to cut them all off. But from this bloody act, as very dangerous, he was dissuaded by some Bâshâs, whom he consulted; and the Janizaries having at length penetrated his design, he, to divert their resentment, marched into Moldavia, where he took the cities ^c, as above-mentioned.

War with Egypt.

AND now began to be kindled between the Othmâns and Mamlûks of Egypt those seeds of war, which, after numberless battles, ended in the ruin of the latter. Bâ-yezîd and Kaité Bay long beheld each other with jealous eyes; but neither dared to attack the other; believing both empires so firmly established, as scarcely to be subverted by human strength. The Othmân was superior in extent of dominion and number of armies: the Egyptian was strengthened by the annual accession of Cherkassian troops, the most warlike of all nations. Kaité Bay gave Bâ-yezîd a plausible pretence for a war, by protecting his brother Jem, and supplying him privately with money: but the latter thought proper to stifle his resentment till a more favourable opportunity, which shortly after presented itself.

Alaidulet tributary.

ALAIIDULET (B), a petty prince of some provinces in Asia, to enlarge his dominion, attempted to take some cities belonging to the kingdom of Mesr, or Egypt: but, being defeated, and unable to withstand the Cherkassians (C), he sues to Bâ-yezîd for assistance (D); offering, on that condition, to subject his territories to him as a fief, by having his name stamped on his coin, and mentioned in the public prayers. Some Turkish auxiliaries being thus obtained, he re-attacks the Cherkassians; and, after several battles, fought with various fortune, takes from them Gyullek, Sues (E), Adana, Kaysariâ, and Antâb.

KAITE BAY, perceiving Bâ-yezîd's policy to weaken his forces by the sword of another, follows his example, and opposes Kior Shâb, his neighbour, to Alaidulet. These little princes, thus supported by the two Soltâns, contended for some time with such various success, that

^c LEUNCL. Hist. Musulm. and KNOWLES edit. Ricaut, in Bajazet.

(A) This Bâshâ was accused of soliciting Abmed Bâ-yezîd's eldest son to the rebel: but, his innocence appearing after his death, the Soltân often lamented the loss of so able a counsellor, as well as soldier. Cant.

(B) Possibly one of the Persian governors, often before mentioned, who left his name to the country possessed by him, which some maps corruptly ascribe to Aladuli. It is a country shut in with the Taurus, and Antitaurus, or Cappadocia. Cant. The same author, in a note, p. 181, more distinctly tells us, that this country is bounded on one side by mountains of Kappadocia, and people called by Cædrenus Manzures; on another by Syria; on the east by Armenia Major; towards the Othmân dominions by Amasia; and towards Karamania by Adana (near Tarsus). The Turks call it Alaidulet Mamlukyeti; that is, the province of Alaidulet; also Zun'lkadir. See other notes hereafter in Scim I. and Soleyman I.

(C) They are the most noble of all the Scythian people, inhabiting a mountainous country between the Euxine and Caspian seas. The Russians call them Czerkiesji Pætigoriki, to distinguish them from the Kozak Cherkassians: for all the Ukrain Kozaks are in the Russian tongue called Cherkassians. Prince Cantemir gives a farther curious account of the former, and in another note, p. 156, says, none of them are ignoble.

(D) The Christian historians represent this matter quite differently: they say, that Karagusa, invading Syria in 1487 with a strong army, his van was defeated in the straits of mount Taurus by Aladules, a mountain king, and Isfender Bâshâ, who commanded it, taken prisoner; which obliged Karagusa to retire. Perhaps Aladules is mistaken for Kior Shâb.

(E) It should, perhaps, be Sis; which was the capital of Lesser Armenia; whereas Sues, or Suez, is in Egypt.

their

a their respective countries were sometimes subject to the Cherkassians and sometimes to the Oth- A. D. 1489.
mân dominion ^d.

THE Christian writers, who make the Turks principals in this war, tell us, that Abmed Syria invaded Pâshâ, being sent into Syria, was by the Egyptians and Arabs, at Tzukur Ova, overthrown, by the Turks.
and taken prisoner (F). Hereupon the Soltân, next year, sent a great fleet, as well as army, against the Soltân of Egypt, who met the Turks near mount Taurus, in Cilicia; and, though much inferior in force, attacked them. The battle having lasted all the day, both parties retired to their camps. The Egyptians, finding their carriages and provisions taken away without knowing by whom, renewed the battle next day with double fury, and fought again till night parted them. But the Turks, having lost 67,000 men out of 100,000, fled in the b night, leaving their tents and provisions behind them. The Egyptians likewise, having lost half their number, retired to mount Taurus; till, being informed by their spies of the flight of the enemy, came down and seized their camp. Hence those in the battle itself scarce knew which side got the victory. The Turkish fleet had no better fortune, having been destroyed by a tempest at the mouth of the river Orontes. Hereupon Bâ-yezîd made a peace with the Egyptian Soltân, restoring to him all the places he had taken from him. Nor is this account inconsistent either with what is before related, or follows after, from the Turkish authors; who indeed may be supposed better acquainted with the springs of action than the Christian writers ^e.

BA-YEZID at length, by experience, found that the power of the Cherkassians in Egypt Cherkassia c could never be subverted, or weakened, unless their native country was destroyed, and the or r-run.
way shut up by which so many forces were every year conveyed into Egypt. Therefore, pre- Hej. 880.
tending to make peace with the Soltân of Egypt, he recalls his troops; and, in 889, unex- A. D. 1484.
pectedly invades Cherkassia; over-runs the country, and carrying off a great number of captives shuts up the entrances of the mountains (G), by which it is surrounded with castles, and intirely hinders the inhabitants from coming out. The supply of soldiers being thus cut off, Kaité Bay, who daily saw his own forces diminish, and those of his enemies increase, is said to fall sick with grief and die; as did the same year Abdo'llah, Bâ-yezîd's son.

IN 890, the Soltân sent an army into Moldavia; where a great slaughter was made of the Moldavia inhabitants: and next year again reduced the rebellious country of Yarsak ^f. The success of harassed.
d the Moldavian expedition is represented very differently by the Christian historians. They Hejrah 890.
say (H), that Bâ-yezîd, being freed from his fears by the expulsion of the French out of Na- A. D. 1485.
ples, and the death of his brother Zemes (or Jem), sent Bali Beg to invade Podolia and Russia; where he did great mischief: but that, being forced home by the approach of winter, and about to pass through Moldavia, the Waywode denied him either passage or provisions; which made his army straggle: and thus such numbers of them perished, either by fatigue, hunger, cold, or the hands of the Moldavians, that the Turkish historians relate, they lost 40,000 men in this expedition ^g. To return to them.

WHILST the Othmân affairs thus flourished in the east, the Mohammedan religion received Mohammed-a grievous blow in the kingdom of Endelos (I). After several defeats, the Musulmans are ans expelled e every-where expelled, put to the torture, and compelled to abjure their religion. In this Spain.
distress, they set forth to Bâ-yezîd, by their ambassadors, the cruelty of the Spaniards, and implore his assistance, as head (K) of the Mohammedan commonwealth. Accordingly, next summer he sent a great fleet into the Mediterranean, under Kiemal ali Pâshâ; who defeated the Christian naval force, laid waste the island of Malta, and plundered the coasts of Spain and Italy.

FLUSHED with this success, he, in the year 894, sent general Yakûb, with an army, into Kroatia re-Kroatia and Bosnia, to make a thorough conquest of those countries. After he had taken duced.
several castles, and marched over the whole region, he met the Christian forces; and, hav- Hejrah, 894.
ing made a great slaughter of them (L), took many prisoners of quality, with their leader, A. D. 1489.
general

^d LEUNCL. & RICAUT, ubi supr.

^e CANT. ubi supr. p. 125, & seqq.

^f CANT. p. 129.

^g LEUNCL. & RICAUT. ubi supr.

(F) This affair is placed in the year 1488, by the Christian authors: but fell in 1483, or 84 at most, according to the Turkish; and, generally speaking, we find a difference of three or four years between the two sorts of authors, with respect to the transactions in the former part of this reign.

(G) Those of Arzerûm, Demur Kâpu, and Derbend. Cant. Derbend itself is also called Demur Kâpu.

(H) They place this expedition in the year 1497, twelve years later than the Turkish historians; so that there must be some very great error on one side or other: but we must leave it to future writers to examine more thoroughly where the faults lie.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(I) Or Andalos, that is, Andalusia; which name the orientals formerly gave to Spain in general: but at present the Turks distinguish Spain from Portugal.

(K) The historian gives him this title too soon; for the Soltâns did not assume it till Selîm I. conquered Egypt, and carried away the Khalifab.

(L) The Christian writers, who place this war also in the same year with that of Moldavia; viz. 1497, say, that Kadum Pâshâ, being sent into Illyria, spoiled that country, with part of Kroatia; that, being met near the Morava by 9,000 Kroats and Hungarians, he slew 7000 of them; and that, cutting off their noses,

A. D. 1489. general Yami (M). The same year, Bâ-yezîd married his daughter to Abmed Mirza Oghîr a Oghî (N).

Conquests in Asia. Hej. 895. A. D. 1490. A. D. 1496. In the year 895, Soltân Yakûb (O), king of Azerbejân, dying, the great distractions, which ensued, gave Bâ-yezîd, as well as the king of Egypt (P), an opportunity of seizing the provinces destitute of governors. The armies engaging, the Turks became victors; and, after six years roaming over the east, at length, in 901, all those countries, for which Bâ-yezîd and the Cherkassians had contended, were annexed to the Othmân empire.

The Rhodians defeated. In 902, the Rhodians were defeated, with great slaughter, by the Turkish general, Nasû Beg. At the same time, Abmed Mirza, married seven years before to Bâ-yezîd's daughter, on pretence of hunting, flies from Constantinople to Tibris (or Tauris); where he is chosen king (Q).

Hej. 905. A. D. 1499. NEXT year, Bâ-yezîd laid the foundations of a Ûami, an hospital, a Taalim Kbara, and school; which were finished in eight years. In 903, the Soltân, marching with great forces into Greece, takes Anibakht (R) at the first assault; and next summer, on the first day of Moharram, becomes master of Mothone, or Modon, by storm; and of Koroni, by surrender^a.

Friuli invaded by the Turks: THE Christian historians join together this invasion of Greece and that of Italy, hinted before by the Turkish, but without mentioning either the circumstances or cause of it. According to the former, Bâ-yezîd, having been solicited by Sforzia, duke of Milan, to engage in a war against the Venetians, who had confederated with Lewis XII. king of France, to conquer his territories; the Soltân, mindful of former injuries done him by the republic, made great preparations both by sea and land against them; and, on a sudden, ordered Skân-der Pâshâ, with 12,000 horse, to break into Friuli, in Italy; from whence he returned with the spoils of the country.

AT the same time, the Soltân put to sea a very numerous fleet, and marched in person with a great army along the coast of the Morea to keep a communication with it. Grimani, the Venetian admiral, delayed attacking the enemy's ships for several days, expecting that they would put from the shore, and advance to fight him. At length, Andreo Lauredano and Albani Armerio, newly arrived from Korcyra to be present at the action, impatient of delay, began the engagement; and quickly boarded a great vessel, commanded by Baruk, of Smyrna, a famous pirate; who blowing up his ship, the other two perished with her. Some others fought also; but the greater number of Venetian gallies lay looking on at a distance, and did nothing: for which the admiral was mightily blamed, and afterwards banished by a decree of the senate. Mean time, the Turks, in great fear, with some difficulty, got into the gulf of Lepanto; where they besieged the city closely by sea and land, and in some time had it surrendered to them.

A. D. 1500. THE year following, which was 1500, Bâ-yezîd fitted out a yet greater fleet for the Morea; and at the same time, entering by the isthmus of Korinth, sat down before Modon. His batteries having made four breaches in the walls, the Turks gave two fierce attacks; but were repulsed both times. In the interim, the Venetian admiral, Trevisano, coming from the isle of Zant, where he had lain with three great gallies, laden with necessaries, under three resolute commanders, they broke through the Turkish fleet, and ran themselves aground under the walls of the town. But while the soldiers, as well as citizens, overjoyed at their arrival, ran in crowds to welcome them, leaving several places to the landward unguarded, the Janizaries, seizing the opportunity, entered the city without much opposition, and put most of the people to the sword; among whom were the governor and bishop: besides 1000 who were slain before the Soltân's tent.

the Venetians, Cefalonia: HOWEVER, to make some reparation for this loss, next year, admiral Pisaurio (for Trevisano was dead) pursuing the enemy's fleet to the mouth of the Hellepont, took above 20 of their gallies; and the isle of Ægina in his return. Then, joining with Gonsalvo the Great, sent by king Ferdinand of Spain to aid them, he at length, by that general's conduct, wrested the city of Cefalonia from the Turks; which was followed by the reduction of the whole island. Not long after, being informed, that part of the Turkish fleet lay in the bay of Ambracia,

^a CANT. ubi supr.

he sent them to Constantinople. Leunclav. & Ricaut. in Bajezet.

(M) This is the famous count John Torquatus; who according to the Christian writers, died in this engagement, not vanquished, but tired with victory. Which of the two accounts shall we believe? Cant.

(N) He seems by the title of Mirza to have been a Persian prince. The additional Oghîr Oghî signifies the son of a happy omen. It signifies also, son of a thief. Cant. This seems to be a Turkish corruption, or nickname; for Abmed was son of Ogurlu Mohammed, son of Uzûn Haffân.

(O) He was son of Uzûn Haffân, or Haffân Beg; and third Soltân of the White Sheep dynasty of Turkmâns.

(P) He must have been Kaité Bay, or Kayté Bay, and not his successor, as in the text of Cantemir: for Kaité Bay did not die till the year 901.

(Q) He made himself king, by defeating his predecessor Rostam Beg, fifth Soltân of the White Sheep race.

(R) Or Lepanto.

^a he sailed thither from Korfu; and sending the greater part of his fleet to the isle of Neritos, A. D. 1500. with eight gallies only entered the bay, burned one great galley of the Turks, and carried away eleven more laden with ammunition and provision. Soon after, he took the castle of Pyllos; but it was quickly recovered by Kamalia, a notable Turkish pirate. Pisaurio had not the like success in his attempt to burn the enemy's gallies in the river Eante, on the coast of Macedonia: for the 200 soldiers, sent in their vessels up the river to set them on fire, being hindered to return by a contrary wind, were beset by the enemy, and all slain.

^b ABOUT this time, Bâ-yezîd took the city of Durazzo (S) from the Venetians; who were ^{the Turks,} now sore pressed with the long war: but, receiving some aid of shipping from the French, the ^{Durazzo.} admiral sailed to the isle of Lesbos, and laid siege to the strong city of Mitylene (T). While ^{Hejrah 907.} a breach was making in the wall, he went with part of his fleet to Tenedos in quest of the enemy. Mean time, the French, contrary to the advice of his vice-admiral, having attacked the breach, were repulsed: as they were on a second attempt at their return. Discouraged at this ill success, they sailed homewards, and in their passage many were cast away. Of which proceedings the Venetian admiral highly complained to the grand master of Rhodes, whom he found at Paros coming to their assistance. However, next spring, being joined by some of the pope's gallies, he suddenly besieged and took Neritos, or St. Maura, with the whole island. But this they held not long: for, the year following, a peace was concluded between ^{A. D. 1503.} Bâ-yezîd and the republic; whereby Neritos and Leukadia were restored to the Turks. On ^{Peace con-} the other hand, the Soltân obliged himself to restore all the merchant-goods taken in the late ^{cluded.} war, to allow the subjects of the republic safe traffick to the Euxine Sea and Constantinople, with the privilege of having a consul in that city; and, lastly, to settle the limits between the two powers.

^c THE same year, Bâ-yezîd, having ravaged Albania, in his return was met by a Derwîsh, Bâ-yezîd in or Turkish monk; who advancing, as if to receive alms, struck him with a short scymitar; ^{danger.} but, the Soltân's horse starting, he missed his blow; and, being knocked down by Isfandiar Bâshâ, was torn in pieces by the soldiers. Bâ-yezîd after this, having made peace with all his neighbours (U), disbanded his army to take their pleasure after so many toils ¹.

^d IN 916, Sheytân Kûli (X) began at Beg Bazâr (Y) to broach his heresy in the Korân; ^{Hejrah 916.} which he supported by miracles, and thereby so bewitched the credulous vulgar, that in a ^{A. D. 1510.} short time he had an army of followers. Hereupon Bâ-yezîd instantly sent forces to dis- ^{Shâh Kûli, an} perse those riotous assemblies, under Ali Bâshâ; who, defeating the impostor in battle, com- ^{impostor,} pelled him to fly into the dominions of Shâh Ismael; where, meeting with more liberty to spread his poison, he infected the king (Z) and the whole Persian nation ².

^e THE annals of the Soltâns afford a better, and, in our opinion, more impartial account of ^{rebels in Asia:} this transaction. According to them, Shâh Kûli was the son of Hassan Khalif, one of the principal men of the province of Tekin, or Teke-ili (A); and, having retired for six or seven years to a secret cave, without ever stirring out, was looked upon as a holy man. Bâ-yezîd, not knowing that he was a Kezil Bâsh (B), and of a different sect in religion, sent him yearly 7000 aspers. At length, leaving his cavern, and being joined by many of his followers, he, on a fair day, entered Antalia (C), and plundered it; slaying the judge, and hanging up his quarters. By the artifices of his emissaries, having in a little time gathered 10,000 men, he marched against Karagosa, Beglerbeg of Anatolia; whom he defeated and took prisoner. Then, advancing to Kutabia, the capital of that country, summoned the inhabitants to deliver it up to him; and, on their refusal, impaled the Bâshâ in their sight. On this, Korkûd set out from Manissa (or Magnesia), with forces to oppose Shâh Kûli; but, being put to flight, wrote to acquaint his father with this rebellion. Bâ-yezîd, enraged at Ali Bâshâ, and ^{defeats the} ^{Turks:}

¹ LEUNCL. & RICAUT, ubi sup.

² CANT. p. 134, & seqq.

(S) The Turks do not mention this conquest, no more than the taking of Cefalonia and other losses.

(T) The Turkish historians only say on this occasion that, Hejrah 907 (A. D. 1501), the Isfrangi (or Franks), with a great fleet, besieged Mitylin; but that, 50 gallies coming to its relief, the enemy retired. On which peace ensued. Cant. Othm. Hist. p. 133.

(U) Peace was made with the Venetians by the assistance of one Andreas Grittus, then a slave at the court of Bâ-yezîd; by which Leukas and Neritos were restored to the Turks, and Cefalonia to the Venetians. Cant.

(X) The Turks gave him this name, from a belief that he was a magician, and dealt with the devil; or rather maliciously, because he undertook to correct the Korân, and give a new explanation of it, changing his true name of Shâh Kûli, or the slave of the Shah, into that of Sheytân Kûli, the slave of Satan. Prince Can-temir, in a note, says, that he was, by the Persians, held for a saint, and called Sof, or Sophus, that is, he says, wise. But on what authority we cannot imagine; for Sof, not Sophus, signifies a person clothed in woollen, or a religious man.

(Y) Beg, or Bek, Bazâr is a town of Anatolia in the road from Isnik, or Nicea, to Engûri, or Ancyra; not far from the latter.

(Z) This is a slur, and not fact; for Shâh Ismael had his religious principles from his father Sheykh Hayder: from whom, with more probability, the Christian writers say, Shâh Kûli took his opinions.

(A) A part of greater Phrygia.

(B) That is a Red Head; a nick-name given the soldiers of Shâh Ismael, from their red caps.

(C) The same with Attalia, or Sattali, in Pamphilia.

A. D. 1510. retires to Persia.

the other Wazîrs, for not informing him of this affair, sent him with troops into Asia, and ordered his son Abmed to join him from Amasia. Mean time, Shâb Kûli, breaking into Karamania, defeated and slew Hayder, its Bâshâ, with Zindis Kemal Beg. Then, marching to the plain of Zibukkia, was met by Ali Bâshâ; who attacked him. Hassan Kalfa, father of Shâb Kûli, having been slain with an arrow, a tumult arose in the rebel camp; on which the Bâshâ rushed into the midst of the enemy, and was killed by them; whereupon his army fled. After this victory, Shâb Kûli bent his course towards Tabriz, in Persia; and, in the way meeting a karawân with goods belonging to Shâb Ismael, though he did not know so much, plundered it, and slew all the men: for which, on his arrival at Tabriz, he, and his chief officers, were put to death by Ismael's orders¹.

THIS transaction is told with some variation by other authors. The Turkish historians, used by Leunclavius^m, mention nothing of Shâb Kûli's robbing the karawân; and say, he was graciously received by the king of Persia. The Christian writers have added many circumstances from report, not to be depended on.

Great earthquake.

THE same year, 1509, there happened a dreadful earthquake at Constantinople, on the 14th of September; which last 18 days, and destroyed 13,000 people, besides a great many buildings. It was followed also by a mortality, which carried-off numbers of peopleⁿ.

Selim rebels:

ABOUT the same time, the Soltân, being much afflicted with the gout, contracted by luxury, and old age drawing on, he resolved to resign the empire to his eldest son Abmed: with this view, sending for him from Kontyab (or Ikoniûm), he declares him heir of the empire, and proposed to retire to Magnesia. But as he had discovered his intention, before he had gained the great men to Abmed's interest, it did not succeed to his wish: for Selim, who was governor of Trabezond, on this news, crosses the Euxine Sea, with the forces of his province, and marches to Adrianople. From thence, under pretence of paying his duty to his father (D), he hastes with 20,000 men to Constantinople, hoping the Janizaries, who were in his interest, would join him. Bâ-ye-îd, perceiving his son's design, with what forces happened to be in the city, bravely meets him at the village Ogrîs, near Chorlo; where, in Jomazio'l awel (E), 917, after a long and doubtful battle, Selim is put to flight. The Soltân forbids all pursuit, in hopes, he said, his son would lay aside his fierceness, and be convinced by this fatherly correction, that God approves not the rebellion of children against their parents. Thus Selim, escaping by the goodness of a parent, got safe to Varna; and thence, by sea, to Kâffa (A), in the Krîm.

is defeated.

A. D. 1511.

Invited by the Janizaries,

BA-YEZID, on this, sends again to hasten Abmed; who, instead of coming (B), made answer, that his father in vain attempted to confer the crown on him, since he knew not only the Janizaries but all the great men were inclined to Selim, and wished him to be emperor. Bâ-yezîd, finding Abmed's diffidence, and being desirous to debar Selim from the throne for his disobedience, thought to defer his purpose till a more proper opportunity: but as it seemed difficult to revoke his declared resolution of resigning, because whatever is said or done by the Soltâns is believed unretractable, he privately endeavoured to induce the great men to petition him to alter his mind. But these, on the contrary, encourage the Janizaries (weary of ten (C) years rest) to favour Selim, and acquaint that prince by letters, that they have unanimously resolved to salute him emperor, and not suffer Bâ-yezîd to depart from his declaration of resigning.

SELIM, terrified perhaps by his former danger, at first refuses his consent, and tells the conspirators: "that he is far from despising the throne, but was unwilling to do any thing contrary to his father's pleasure; especially as he had been taught by late experience, that the hand of God was against him." The Janizaries, notwithstanding this answer, repeat their instances by the Zemberekchi Pâshi, or chief of the military engines; affirming, that they would all swear not to desist till they saw him raised to the throne, even against his father's will. Persuaded at length by these promises, Selim departs from Kâffa, with a few attendants;

¹ Annales Soltan. in Bajazet II. ubi supr.

^m See Hist. Musul. Turk. in Bajazet II. p. 662.

ⁿ RICAUT.

(D) The Turks are enjoined by their law to visit their country and parents, if in their power, after a long absence; so that, if a servant asks leave to visit his country, the master cannot deny him, without being chargeable with the servant's sin. This was Selim's pretence; for he had not seen his father since he ascended the throne. Cant.

(E) The fifth month.

(A) He is said to have married the daughter of Mohammet Ghiarây, Khân of the Krîm; who assisted him with shipping to pass into Europe.

(B) The Turkish annals say, he came and encamped at Eskûdar, or Skutari, opposite to Constantinople; and then returned, seizing the provinces of Asia Minor.

Korkûd, being forced out of Maniffa, retired to Constantinople; and afterwards had a friendly conference with his brother Selim: but, on his being raised to the throne, went back to Maniffa. The Christian writers say, both Abmed and Selim rebelling against their father, Korkûd repaired to Constantinople; and that, pleading the merit of his dutiful resignation 30 years before, Bâ-yezîd promised, as soon as Selim was gone into Asia against Abmed, to resign the empire to him: that Selim, on advice that Korkûd was at court, hastened thither; and, being there proclaimed Soltân by the Janizaries; Korkûd fled to Magnesia (or Maniffa).

(C) So Prince Cantmir computes the space. The Turks say only some time.

and,

a and, under the former pretence of saluting his father, goes to Constantinople. On news of his arrival, the Fanizaries flock together in the streets; and, joyfully meeting him at the Top Kâpu (D), accompany him to the Eni Bâghche (E), where they had prepared tents for him.

BA-YEZID, troubled at this new unexpected affair, and perceiving nothing could be done by force, on the eighth day sends Koja Mostafa Pâshâ, his prime Wazîr, to ask his son, If he desired to visit him, why did he delay? But if, under those proceedings, he only concealed his impiety, why did he vainly spend the time? Selîm, who perceived Bâ-yezîd's policy, returns a no less ambiguous and acute answer. Saying, "he would not in the least disobey his father's "orders, but was ready to go where-ever he thought fit to send him; provided he pleased to satisfy some doubts he had entertained concerning the present administration of affairs.

b " Sofî Oglî (F), a man of no account, has risen in the east, and with a swift progress laid waste the Othmân empire, as far as Kaysariya; whilst you, instead of defending the provinces, are an idle spectator of his victories. On the other hand, a Cherkassian (G) of obscure birth and name, who ought to be prostrate under the sword of the Othmâns, has made himself master not only of Egypt, but also of many countries in Syria, formerly subject to our dominion (H); and holds them to this day as if they were his lawful inheritance. To such contempt the majesty of the empire, revered under our ancestors, is fallen, that they, who formerly, under the reign of Bâ-yezîd, were feared by the neighbouring nations as invincible heroes, are now, under the same reign, as men unactive and effeminate, scorned and affronted. Where is now the honour of the Ali Othman scepter?

c " Where the military discipline? Where the zeal of propagating the law? Where the art of government? Is it thus the empire is enlarged? Is it thus the order of our hitherto invincible soldiery is preserved?—These things duly weighed, let my father himself judge, whether they, who, by their own consent, permission, or negligence, have been the cause of these mismanagements, can escape punishment: for unless a timely remedy be applied to these corruptions, we shall be obliged to ascribe the approaching, and almost unavoidable ruin of the empire to our sloth, and not to the bravery of our enemies."

THE Wazîr having reported to the Soltân his son's answer, Bâ-yezîd is said to have replied: Bâ-yezîd replies: "I too plainly see my son's business is not to visit his father: but right or wrong to seize the empire. However, I am convinced it is designed for him by heaven, from my dreaming

d " (I) last night, that my crown was, by the soldiers, placed on his head. Since therefore I deem it impious either to act or attempt any thing against the will of God, with an humble resignation to divine providence, I lay down the ensigns of government, and will and command that Selîm be by all saluted emperor." With this his resolution he instantly acquaints Selîm, and desires his permission to live privately at Dymotika. Selîm intreats his father to remain in the new palace; for that he would be contented to reign in the old one. But Bâ-yezîd still urged his request; alleging, that one scabbard could never hold two swords. At length, having prevailed, he took with him the most precious things out of the treasury, and departed from Constantinople, accompanied by Yunus Bâshâ, and a few friends, the 10th of Sefr, in the year 918.

e SELIM, with the great men, attended his father to the Kuchuk Çekmeje (K), or Little Bridge, two hours distant from the city. In the way, he talked to him about settling the state; and desired his blessing. After which, taking leave of his father, he returned to the palace; where he received the imperial diadem with the usual solemnities.

MEAN time, Bâ-yezîd pursued his journey so slowly, halting, on pretence of indisposition, in almost every village, that it bred a suspicion in his son, that he hoped to be restored to the government, which he had unwillingly resigned, by some popular commotion. Perhaps this was the cause, that, when he was scarce 40 miles from Constantinople, he ended his days by an unexpected martyrdom (L). The Wazîr and great men being ordered to bring back the

* CANT. p. 136, & seqq.

(D) Or gate of the warlike engines, in the western part of the city. Cant.

(E) That is, the new garden; but at present a pasture about a mile in compass, and called Khayr.

(F) Ismael, king of Persia.

(G) The king of Egypt.

(H) This is all rhodomontade. When were any countries of Syria under the Othmân power before the time of Bâ-yezîd? The Mamlûks were an older monarchy than that of the present Turks; and held Syria, as well as Egypt, before the time of Soleymân Shâh. Perhaps they claim under the Seljûks.

(I) The Turks are very superstitious about dreams; and think, that the pure soul of a Musulman foresees.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

and is admonished of some things in a dream. Cant. Or was not this to make a pretence for doing what he saw must be done?

(K) It is the town formerly called Athyra, in the road to Adrianople, and six hours from Bujûk Çekmeje, or Great Bridge. Cant.

(L) From hence may be inferred, that what Philip Lonicerus, tom. i. part 5. c. 22. relates of his death out of Antony Mansvin, is not a fiction; viz. that he was murdered on his journey by the hands of a Jewish physician, though the Turks do not plainly confess the deed. Cant. What regard then is to be paid to their authority as historians?

P p p

body,

A. D. 1510. body, Selim himself meets them on foot in a mourning habit without the city ; and, in a pompous procession, orders the corps to be buried in the Jâmi founded by Bâ-yezîd.

THIS Soltân lived 62 years (M), and reigned 32.

His character :

HE was, according to the Turkish historians, a valiant active prince, of an invincible mind, even in adversity ; and had, by exercise, acquired such strength, that few could equal, and none surpass him. He was a punctual observer of the law, and a great patron of the learned ; to each of whom he not only gave every year 10,000 Akche (N), but also bountifully supplied them with Softa (O), and provisions. He was himself so well versed in all parts of literature, that he was esteemed by his people the prince of learning. By his conduct, or good fortune, the Othmân empire was enlarged, and grievous wars waged with great honour. He repaired the walls of the city, demolished in many places by an earthquake ; and, in the Brasser's Market (P), raised a stately Jâmi, of admirable workmanship, with another at Amasia, no less beautiful, though not so large : not to mention the many Madreseh and Imârets erected by him in several cities. He built, near Ozmânjîk, over the river Kizîl Irmâk, or red stream, a marble bridge of 19 arches ; and another of square stone, with the same number of arches, over the river Ghioz Sui, that is, water of the eyes, in the province of Sârikhân.

Superstitious
conc. it.

HE is said to have carefully preserved the dust, which stuck to his cloaths in his expeditions, through the whole course of his life ; and in his last hours conjured those present, with direful imprecations, to make a large brick of it, and place it in his monument, under his right arm, instead of a cushion ; declaring, that he had always regarded the Hadis, or saying (Q) ; viz. " If any man's feet have been sprinkled with the dust in the path of the lord, him will God preserve from hell-fire." This is commended by the Turks as a singular instance of piety in Bâ-yezîd.

His sons :

HE had five sons, Abmed, Selim, Shehîn Shâh, Alem Shâh, and Korkûd°. The Christian writers say, he had a numerous issue, although only four were remarkable ; Abmed, Mohammed, Korkûd, and Selim. Of these they relate, that the second seemed most worthy of the empire, as having a lively spirit, acute parts, and generous disposition : however, the immoderate affection of the people to him hastened his death. As Abmed and he were by the same venter, they loved each other greatly : but Mohammed, having the curiosity on a time to see how his brother behaved, went from Magnesia, which was his government, with two friends, disguised in religious habits, to Amasia ; where they received no more than five aspers from Abmed for their music and devotion. This so offended Mohammed, that at his return he wrote his brother a reprimanding letter ; in which he so rallied him for his niggardliness, that Abmed was never after friends with him. Not long after, Mohammed, with some friends disguised in sailors cloaths, went to Constantinople : of which Bâ-yezîd being afterwards informed, it raised so many suspicious thoughts in his head, that at last he wrote to Asmebedi, who was Mohammed's secret enemy, to poison him ; which was soon after effected. Yet the Soltân shewed great concern for his son's death, and condemned the murderer to perpetual imprisonment. This happened a little before the rebellion of Selim P.

fatal frâlics.

° CANT. ubi supr.

P RICAUT. al. supr.

(M) The Christian writers make him 76 or 80.

(N) White, a translation of the Greek word Aspron. It is a piece of money less in weight and value than all other coin, the brass half-penies, called Mangbir, excepted ; 120 of them make a Leonine, and 300 a Venetian crown. Cant. These are the money commonly called aspers by Europeans.

(O) Softa are a kind of clothes, made of woollen.

(P) Not far from the old palace called anciently Khalkotrater. Cant.

(Q) That is, Saying of Mohammed. There is a collection of these sayings, or prophecies, called Hadis an Nebevi, or sayings of the prophet, to distinguish it from the Hadisi Kudûs, or divine sayings, contained in the Korân ; which were dictated by the angel Gabriel. Cant.

C H A P. X.

The Reign of Selîm I.

S E C T. I.

Transactions to the War with Egypt.

^a SELIM, who was surnamed Yavûz (R), ascended the throne on the 19th of Sevr, 918, A. D. 1512. in the 46th year of his age, having been born in the year 872, whilst his father was lord of Amasia. His brothers, either on account of his interest with the soldiery, or else to avoid the sallies of his passion, did not dare to contradict his election. Only Abmed, who knew he could no-where be safe whilst Selîm was on the throne, resolved, through despair, to remove him if possible. Hereupon, allured by a false expectation, that some great men, who favoured his brother only in appearance, would espouse his cause, he, with all the forces of Amasia, prepares to pass into Europe. Selîm, having had early notice by his spies of Abmed's design, leads his forces into Asia, in order to surprise him before his whole army was assembled; as in effect he did. However, Abmed bravely met his brother with what troops he had at Enishâbr, and fought in the foremost ranks; so that he more than once rallied the broken wings: but at last his army, being overpowered by numbers, was intirely broken, and most of his men slain; few endeavouring to escape by flight, among whom was Abmed: but, being taken, he was immediately strangled, and buried at *Prusa*⁹.

OTHER writers say, that Abmed, on Selîm's approach, fled to the mountains bordering on Armenia, and endeavouring to raise forces; while his brother, unable to winter in so cold a country, retired to Prusa. From thence he dispatched Ufeghi Bâshâ to surprise Morâd and Alao'ddîn, two of Abmed's sons, in Amasia: but having notice of his design from Mostafa, the old Bâshâ (who detested his cruelty to his other nephews, although he was the main promoter of his advancement to the throne), they laid an ambuscade for Ufeghi; who was taken, and most of his men slain. The captive Bâshâ, however, discovered the treachery of Mostafa, and gave advice of it to Selîm, who immediately put him to death: on which news, Abmed served Ufeghi the same sauce.

SPRING drawing nigh, that prince was solicited by his friends, in his turn, to fall suddenly on Selîm: who, for want of his European forces, might easily, they said, be vanquished. Accordingly, he set out for Prusa with 15,000 horse, leaving for haste his foot to follow by easy marches. Selîm, advised hereof, prepares to oppose him; and, having intercepted the letters of some friends of Abmed, directed from his own camp, urging him to come before his brother's forces were joined together; he first puts the conspirators to death, and then sends letters in their names, renewing their instances to hasten his march, and not stay for his foot: for that, as soon as the signal of battle was given, they would raise a tumult in the army, and slay Selîm.

^a AHMED, on this encouragement, advances as far as the river Parthenius (S); where Sînân Ahmed taken Pâshâ, who was sent before with 15,000 Asiatic horse to try the enemy's strength, fell unexpectedly in their way, and was defeated, with the loss of one half of his men. Selîm, however, not discouraged, marched on to the river Elata (T); and crossing to the other side, where his brother was encamped, placed 1000 men in ambush in a wood, under the command

⁹ CANT. p. 143, & seq. LEUNCL. in Bajazet II.

(R) Yavûz properly signifies ferce, or savage, and from thence passionate. This name, it is said, was applied to Selîm for his rage and tyranny, with which he pursued not only criminals, but also the innocent, even his father and brothers. Having once ordered his prime Wazîr to pitch his tents in a proper place, and the Wazîr only asking to what quarter he would have them pitched, he was immediately put to death without any answer made him. His successor met with the same fate the same day: but the third, made wiser by the examples of the other two, pitched the tents to the four quarters of the world. So that, being asked by the Soltân to what quarter the expedition was prepared, he answered, that every thing was in readiness, let him design his march what way he thought fit. Hereupon, Selîm replied, the death of the two first has saved the life of the third, and procured me a good Wazîr. CANT.

(S) Now Bartin, a corruption of the old name.

(T) Now, it is thought, called Halzebli.

A. D. 1513. of Khân Oglî, a young Tatar prince, his brother-in-law, with orders to fall on the enemy's rear, when the battle was begun. Next day, both armies being ready to engage, Abmed sent to challenge Selim to decide the quarrel by a single combat; and, on his refusal, charged his right wing, sword in hand, with his Persian horse, who made the Turks retire. Then going to the support of his other troops, who were worsted by Selim's left wing, and main body, where the Janizaries fought, he renewed the battle, bearing down all before him, with great courage and order. But while he was in great hopes of victory, Khân Oglî, issuing forth out of the wood, attacks his rear; so that his small army being every way hemmed in, fled as well as they could to save themselves. Abmed got off among the rest: but falling with his horse into a ditch, he was there taken, and put to death by his brother's order: but his two sons, before-mentioned, escaped; the first into Persia, and the other into Egypt.

put to death.

Korkûd
strangled.

A FEW days after, Selim leads his victorious troops against Korkûd, who had hitherto chosen to reverence his brother, and see what fortune would allot him, rather than imbrue his hands with fratricide: but finding his submission disregarded, and his blood thirsted after, he meets Selim with such troops as he could raise in haste (U); proposing rather to die not unrevenged, than to conquer. Accordingly, being easily vanquished, and deserted by his people, he wandered alone in the night through desert ways, and by day conceals himself in obscure caves; intending, as it was thought, to fly, like his brother Jem, to the Christians. Selim, to prevent this, causing him to be more diligently sought after, he was at last discovered by a soldier, and brought to his brother; who, without giving him an opportunity to speak for himself, though he earnestly desired it, delivers him to the executioner to be strangled.

Selim marches into Persia against the Shâh.

SELM, after settling the affairs of Asia, returned to Europe, and went to reside at Adriano-ple; because his capital was afflicted with the plague, which swept away 160,000 persons.

Hejrah, 920.
A. D. 1514.

THE Soltân having thus destroyed the rivals of his empire, as well as some domestic enemies (X), turns his thoughts to foreign conquests. The chief object of his resentment was Soltân Gaurî, king of Egypt, with whom Bâ-yezîd had made a peace; but fearing lest Kizîl-bâsh Shâhî (Y) should fall upon him in the interim, he resolves to humble the Persians first. With this view, in the year 920, leading a numerous army into Asia, he marched to the plain called Kaldirân (Z), at Tibrîz, or Tauris; where, finding the enemy's troops not inferior to his own, he calls a council of his Wazîrs and friends, who were for deferring the battle till next day, that his forces might have time to recover from their fatigue. Selim did not think this reason good, because the enemy was equally fatigued, and therefore gives orders to prepare immediately for battle. Then sending for Pîrî Pâshâ, his Defterdâr (A), or treasurer, he bids him give his opinion in the case; which happening to be agreeable to his own (B), Selim cries out, that assuredly, to his own and the empire's great loss, this man had been till then uninvested with the prime wazîrship.

A great battle.

HEREUPON he commands the enemy, who had invested the city with their forces, to be invested and attacked. The battle began with the great guns; which were discharged by the European troops, stationed so unluckily, that an opposite hillock either received the balls, or sent them over the Persian camp. Upon this Sinân Pâshâ (C), advancing with the Asiatic forces, drawing their field-pieces after them, when he came within cannon-shot, ordered the

* LEUNCL. Hist. Musul. & Annal. Soltan. RICAUT, in Bajazet II.
LEUNCL. ubi sup.

* CANT. p. 144, & seq.

* RICAUT, ubi sup.

* CANT. p. 145, & seqq.

(U) According to others, Korkûd made no opposition, but fled towards the sea, in hopes of getting a passage to Kândia, or Rhodes: but being prevented by the Turkish galleys, which lay on the coast, he hid himself in a cave by the sea-side, not far from Smyrna; whence sending his man for relief to a cottage hard by, he was discovered by a peasant, and taken. Before his death, being allowed to write his mind, he did it very readily in Turkish verse; setting forth his brother's cruelty, and praying for vengeance in so pathetic a manner, that Selim, on sight of it, burst into tears, and professed great sorrow. He likewise caused 15 of those whom he sent to search for him, to be put to death. Ricaud, in Selim I. See also Leunclavius in Selim.

(X) These were some great courtiers who privately favoured Bâ-yezîd (or Abmed), and were all put to death. Cant. Among them also may be reckoned the sons of his brother, Or Khân, son of Alem Shâh; Mehemet, of Jehân Shâh; Or Khân, Armîsa, and Musa, sons of Mohammed: all young princes of great hopes, especially Mehemet, who had admirable perfections both of body and mind. He slew two of his executioners before they could do their work.

(Y) This is, king of the red heads; meaning Ismael

Sofî, so nicknamed in hatred by the Turks, for the reformation of the Korân before-mentioned; which he gave a sanction to. Cant.

(Z) According to the opinion of many, it is a spacious plain, under the walls of Tibris, and still retains the name of Khaldirân. Others think it is a small town not far from that city. The word signifies a man who exposes any thing to theft, from the verb khalarum, to steal: hence khaldirum, to cause to steal. Cant.

(A) Spelt also Tefterdâr.

(B) Among other things, he said, it was a good omen to attack the enemy at first sight, and fall on them before they can open their eyes. On which prince Cantemir observes in a note, that the Turks are persuaded, if they make the first onset, the victory will be theirs: yet that, in the last war with the Germans, the best and most prudent of their generals were entirely of another opinion.

(C) A very famous general among the Turks. At Constantinople, a stately building of his stands on 50 marble pillars, in the entrance of the inner port, over-against Pera: where the Rossânjî Pâshâ is wont to reside in the spring. Cant.

- a foremost ranks to open, and give room for the artillery to play; which made such a slaughter, A. D. 1514. that the Persian troops, before like a wall, seemed now to resemble streets and lanes (D). The enemy's ranks being thus broken, the signal is given to charge them hand to hand with swords and javelins; by which means one half of their left wing being slain, the rest are forced to fly. The Shâh perceiving the danger they were in, leaves the right; and, with the best regiments, coming to their relief, bravely repels the Othmâns, now intent on the destruction of the rest. Selim, on the other hand, perceiving his right wing oppressed with numbers, places 13,000 Janizaries on their flank, with orders first to charge the enemy at a distance with ball, then attack them sword in hand; and thus, by bearing the brunt of the battle, give the others time to rally.
- b THESE orders having been duly executed, the Persians were so fiercely attacked, that they Shâh Ismail; defeated. began slowly to give ground, and at last to fly: the right wing, who still bravely maintained the combat, perceiving this, and despairing of victory, fled likewise, to their eternal dishonour. The Shâh himself could not have escaped by the swiftness of his horse, if the night coming on had not put an end to the pursuit. Besides many thousands slain (E) and taken prisoners, the Persians lost the leaders of both wings, Mehemed Khân and Tekieli Khân, the bravest generals at that time in the Shâh's dominions. Selim found in the Persian camp the immense treasure and rich furniture of Ismail Shâh (F). After this, he declared Pîri Pashâ, the adviser of the battle, Wazîr; and orders all the Nisa and Sabian captives to be dismissed, saying, it was unjust to make slaves of men who mere Sunni (G), and forced into arms; and that the vanquished were rather to be treated with clemency than cruelty.
- c NEXT day, the inhabitants of Tauris, finding themselves deserted by their king, surrendered Tauris surrenders. the city to Selim; who enters and refreshes his soldiers for a few days. Then, leaving a strong garrison, returns to Amasia, his farther progress being obstructed by the enemy laying waste the country. From hence he sent to Constantinople many captives famous for birth and learning; among whom was Husseyn, son of (H) Bikarar *. This is the account given by the Turkish historian or historians made use of by prince Cantemir: but other writers of the same nation, as well as Christian, relate this war in a different manner; and affirm that Ismail began it first, on the following occasion.
- THE Shâh having sent an ambassador to compliment Selim on his accession to the throne, Morâd invades Anatolia. and withal a lion by way of present; the Soltân, thinking it was done to affront him, sent back two dogs by way of return. Ismail, more incensed at this contemptuous usage, resolved to make Morâd, son of Abmed, the instrument of his revenge. The Shâh taking compassion of this young prince, had given him his daughter in marriage, and early in the spring next year sent him with 10,000 horse into Kappadocia, as well to make trial of the people's affection to him, as the enemy's strength. At the same time he ordered Vasî Oglî, a famous commander, to follow with 20,000 horse more, keeping still a day's march behind, while he himself, with a much greater power, staid in Armenia, for fear he should want provisions. When Morâd had entered Kappadocia, several places surrendered to him; others he took by force, which he destroyed. His design was to have proceeded to Amasia: but was prevented by Khemdem, Selim sets out. Beglerbeg, of Anatolia, an old experienced commander; who, with a great army, met him at Siwâz, or Sebastia†.
- By this time Selim, being arrived at Prusa, quickly assembles an army of 40,000; and, setting forward, in thirty days comes to Arsingân. There understanding how the enemy had ravaged the country, and retired, he resolved to follow them close: but when the affair came to be proposed in council, a great many difficulties were started, as the length of the march, the cold of Mount Taurus, and heats of the Armenian plains, besides the danger from the petty kings of Armenia; especially Alaideulet, lord of the mountains, who, it was thought, ought not to be left behind. Khemdem therefore advised him to refresh his men, and wait for the enemy in Kappadocia. But Selim, disliking this council, spoke contemptuously of the giver; which affording his enemies an occasion to ruin him with the Soltân, they went so far as to pro-

* CANT. p. 148, & seqq.

† PAUL JOVIUS. LEUNCL. RICAUT, in Selymus.

(D) Sekak or sekak, street by street; a Turkish phrase, signifying confused heaps here and there. CANT.(E) But the number on either side is not mentioned by the Turkish historians. CANT.(F) Instead of Shâh Ismail, perhaps by way of contempt.(G) This is an inviolable law with the Turks, unless they be rebels; and then they must either be put to death, or released: but the Tatars do not observe this maxim, of which prince Cantemir, on this occasion, gives an instance.(H) He was the Mecenas of the oriental musicians; and had the greatest regard for Hoja Musîkar, the Orpheus of the Persians, and his scholar Gulâm the Arab. All Turkey and Persia were delighted with their melody and songs, till the time of Soltân Mohammed (the 4th), in whose reign the science of music, almost forgotten, not only revived, but was much improved by Ozmân Effendi. CANT.

A. D. 1514. cure false witnesses to swear that he had received a great sum of money from Morâd. Whereupon Selîm, without more ado, ordered him to be put to death. a

Enters Armenia.

AFTER this, he marched to the borders of the Lesser Armenian kings, whom he desired to join him against the Persians; promising to bestow upon them all the conquest: but their answer was, that they had taken up arms for no other end than to secure their territories, and without any design to offend either him or the Shâb. At the same, they offered him a free passage through their states, provided he would commit no hostilities; and promised when he was entered into the Greater Armenia, to supply him with such provisions as their poor countries could afford. Hereupon Selîm, dissembling his resentment, passed the mountains, and in eight days came to the Euphrates; along which he kept, for fear of wanting water, till he came to its source in Mount Periaro (I); where he encamped. From thence he sent scouts b to get intelligence; who after two days search, returned without one prisoner, and told him, that all the country lay waste, and was deserted by the inhabitants. On this he began to fear treachery, and called to mind the advice of Khemdem: yet he appeared chearful, and understanding, by his guides, that to the right, beyond the mountain, was the most fruitful country of all Armenia, he bent his course that way; and having, after a long progress, crossed the Arâs, above Koy (K), he marched to the Kalderân plains (L), which are in its neighbourhood.

Encamps near Koy.

Prepares for battle.

SHAH Ismail, who was near at hand, to prevent the enemy taking that city, resolved forthwith to give them battle. But first he sent a herald, with some attendants, to expostulate with Selîm, about invading his master's country, and bid him prepare for battle next day; while c those in company observed his camp. The Soltân, in answer, required Morâd might be given up; and, on that condition, promised to return home. Next day he set forward against Ismail, in order of battle; though he could by no means learn what force he had: so faithful were the Persians to their prince, that not one of them deserted to the Soltân, though many of the Turks went over to the Shâb.

His great
forces.

SELIM, who had 80,000 cavalry in his army, posted Hassan Pâshâ, with the European horse, in the left wing; and Sinân Pâshâ, with the Asiatic horse, in the left, having the Akanji before them: the Asapi were placed in the main battle; and behind moved the artillery guarded by 4000 horse. Then followed Selîm himself and his Janizaries, encompassed with small field-pieces and carriages, besides a double fortification of his chained camels. He also ordered his d foot, who were in the van, on the approach of the enemy's horse, immediately to open for the cannon to play upon them.

Those of Ismail.

THESE dispositions being made known by deserters to Ismail, he divided his forces into two bodies likewise; one commanded by himself, and the other by Vâstî Oglî. Ismail's force was very small (M), compared with that of the Turks, consisting of 30,000 horse, without any foot; but among them were 10,000 men at arms. These were all brave troops, armed with lances, scimeters, and maces: the rest, who fought with arrows, or staves, wore cuirasses and helmets. The Persians, not regarding the number of their enemies, reckoned to amount to 300,000, boldly advanced against them; and the Shâb, observing that the Asapi, on his approach, divided for the artillery to play, he did the like with his troops, and presently charged the Turks right wing. After a terrible fight, he slew Hassan Pâshâ himself, and a great number of his men; forcing the rest to retreat to the place where Selîm was with his Janizaries ².

The battle
doubtful.

ON the other side, Vâstî Oglî, having received no small harm from the enemy's artillery, because he was not so nimble as his master in opening his troops, charged the Asian horse in the left wing, and made a great slaughter. But that general happening to be slain, the Othmâns renewed the battle with great fury, and with their harquebusiers drove the Persian horse head-long upon the Turks common foot. Yet the Persians valiantly breaking through those foot, pierced even to their cannon, which they took; and like conquerors came to the right wing, where Ismail was vigorously charging the European horse, who, retreating, sent to Selîm for help. Hereupon, the Soltân opened in two places the carriages, with which he had barricaded e his horse, and detached part of them to succour the distressed Europeans: but could neither by

² PAUL JOVIUS, &c. ubi sup.

(I) Minadoi says it was in his time called Kheilder; but Tavernier, Tournefort, and other later travellers, assure us, that the Euphrates rises about six hours journey from the city of Arzerûm, in the mountain called at present Minghiol, or the thousand springs.

(K) That must be to the north of the city Koy, which may be about 60 miles to the west of Taurus.

(L) These plains, according to Minadoi, and others, lie near Kay, possibly between that city and Tabriz, or Tauris, but rather nearer the first than the last; drawing, perhaps northward towards the river Arâs, the antient Araxes. See p. 243.

(M) But it seems incredible, that so small a number should make such a stand against, and almost vanquish, 300,000; especially considering the Turks had above double the number of horse, and fight nearly on a par with the Persians.

a fair nor foul means make the Janizaries go briskly on. So that the Persians, in this heat, surrounding the cavalry, hewed them down like sheep; and were ready to attack Selîm in his greatest strength, when Sinân Pâshâ, though his wing had been in a manner overthrown, following the enemy over heaps of the slaughtered foot, came seasonably to the Soltân's assistance, and restored the battle, now almost lost, with so much fury, joined to the thundering of the Turkish cannon, that the Othmâns, among their dismal days, term this only the day of doom. A. D. 1514.

THE fortune of the day now began to change, chiefly through the invincible courage of Ali Beg, and his brother Mehemed, of the noble family of Mikail Koffi; and Ismail happening to be shot in the left shoulder, was persuaded by his officers to retreat. This he the readier did, on hearing of the death of Vahti Oglî; and in so good order, as to have no resemblance of a flight. As he passed by Tauris, he required the citizens to open their gates to Selîm, rather than be utterly ruined. The wearied Turks did not pursue the Persians at all; but entering their camp, took all their tents, and many noble ladies; who, after the Persian manner, had followed their lords to the wars. And what is very remarkable, there were found among the slain the bodies of many women armed, who had fought beside their husbands in the battle. These Selîm ordered to be decently buried; and set at liberty all the rest, excepting one of Ismail's wives, whom he gave in marriage to a Pâshâ. In this famous battle, fought the 7th of August 1514, Selîm lost 30,000 men of the flower of his army, with Hassan Pâshâ, and seven Sanjâks; among whom were the two valiant brothers before-mentioned. The Persians overthrown.

c FROM the Khaldirân plains, Selîm marched to Tauris, and lodged his army in the suburbs. Some say he was afraid to go into the city but in disguise: others affirm, that he made a great feast in the Shâh's palace. His design was to have spent the winter in those parts: but the Janizaries declaring they would desert him if he staid, and Selîm at the same time being informed, that the Shâh was making great preparations against him, he, contrary to his promise, exacted a great sum of the inhabitants of Tauris, and carrying along with him 3000 workmen, best skilled in making armour and weapons, he marched back with all speed to the Euphrates. But, before his whole army had crossed that river, the Georgian horse, the van-guard of Ismail's army, came in sight; which struck the Turks with such a fright, that 2000 of them were drowned, several field-pieces were left sticking in the mud, and great part of their baggage carried away by the stream: for all this the enemy got a considerable booty there. The Turks harrassed in their turn.

THEIR passage over the Antitaurus was yet more dangerous than that of the Euphrates; for they were continually alarmed and attacked by the mountain people, who did them much harm. This was all done by the orders of Alaideulet, though he pretended it was not in his power to help it. However Selîm, who knew to the contrary, put off revenging the ill-offices of that prince to a more favourable opportunity; and at last, with much ado, got safe to Trapezond. From thence he proceeded to Amasia, where he spent the winter in recruiting his army; designing, in the spring, to go and call Alaideulet to an account for the damage done him in his last march^a.

e THIS is the account given by Paulus Jovius of the wars between the Turks and Persians; Cause of the with whom, for the general, Angiolello, who served in the army of Uzûn Hassan, Ismail's predecessor and father-in-law, agrees (N). According to that author, the Soltân would never have undertaken the war against Ismail, but for the encouragement given him by several of his lords, who dwelt on the frontiers of Turky; particularly the Kurdi, inhabiting the mountains of Bitlis, who were the Shâh's (O) enemies. These having invited him to invade Persia at a time when Ismail was at war with the Tatars, and his forces at a great distance in Khorassân; Selîm fearing, that, if the Shâh routed the Tatars, he would soon make up matters with the Soltân of Egypt to his prejudice, in 1514, marched with a great army to Amasia; from whence, in May, he set forward, passing by Tokâd and Siwâs, where the dominions of the Shâh began (P), to Arsingân, making great spoil in his way.

f ISMAIL, being informed of these proceedings at Tauris, sent Stuji ali Mehemed Beg, and Kara bek Saru pira, two of his best generals, to raise forces in Diyârbekr, his army being still in Khorassân. These commanders, having gotten together 20,000 men, advanced to the passage of the Euphrates: yet, finding that Selîm's forces were greatly superior to their The armies meet.

^a PAUL JOVIUS, ubi supr.

(N) Jo. Ant. Manavini, a Genoese, who pretends to have served in the Turkish army, relates, that tho' Selîm defeated the Persians at the river Euphrates, yet having afterwards been defeated himself in his way to Tauris, turned back without going to that city; which, being contrary to the testimony of all other authors, shews his history of those wars quoted by Knoroles, to be fictitious.

(O) Our author gives him the name, or title, of Sofi, instead of Shâh.

(P) Hence it appears, that in the time of Ismail, the Persian empire, which is now bounded by the Tigris, extended on this side of the Euphrates, six or eight days journey within Asia Minor.

A. D. 1514.

own, did not think proper to wait for him ; but, turning off, marched to Koy, where there is a large valley, like a plain, called Kalderîn ; in which they encamped, and were joined by Ismail in person. Mean time the Turks destroyed all the country through which they passed ; and being at length arrived, at such time as the Shâh was returned to Tauris to raise more forces, the two generals thought fit to attack them ; which they did with inexpressible fury. On the other hand, the enemy fought out of necessity, as they wanted provisions, and knew they should all perish if they lost the victory.

Persians defeated.

THE 23d of August, the first Persian squadron, composed of half the army, led by Stuji ali Mehemmed Beg, attacked the troops of Anatolia ; which he worsted, and broke : but, Sinân Pâshâ coming on with the forces of Romania (Q), an infinite number of men were killed ; and at length, Stuji ali's squadron being broken, he was himself taken prisoner, and his head b struck off ; which was afterwards sent to the Shâh. Hereupon the second Persian squadron engaged, and fought so bravely, that the Soltân was obliged to retire with his camp to the place where the Janizaries and the artillery stood, his army being broken and almost ruined. But by the conduct of Sinân Pâshâ, who inspired them with new courage, the Persians were at length defeated, and Karabek, their general, taken prisoner ; whom Selim, after giving him very injurious language, ordered to be put to death. They likewise lost all their tents, and one of the Shâh's wives was found among the captives.

The Shâh retires.

THE Soltân, after this victory, which he bought with the lives of a great many soldiers, rested at Koy ; while the news of the defeat being brought to Tauris, the Shâh departed immediately, with those who escaped, and all his treasures, for Kashbîn, in order to raise new c forces. Hereupon the inhabitants of Tauris, seeing themselves exposed to the Turks, sent two ambassadors, with several presents, to Selim ; who, going to that city, picked up 700 families of different trades, and sent them to Constantinople. As provisions grew short in his army, and he was apprehensive the Persians would return with more force to attack him, he staid there but three days. In his way back, he suffered much for want of provisions, and by the attacks of the Hiberi (or Georgians) ; but, at length, he got safe to Amasia b.

Alaideulet conquered.
Hejrah, 921.
A. D. 1515.

As Selim had learned by this year's experience, that nothing could be effected in those cold and mountainous regions, which bounded Persia, unless by early expeditions ; in the year 921, soon in spring, he marches from Amasia, and suddenly takes Ghiumah and Bayburud (R) from the Persians, who little expected so early a visit (S). Then sending part of his army, d under Ferbâd Pâshâ, against Alaideulet, son of Zoulkadîr (T), who was believed to have favoured the Persians, the Pâshâ came on him unawares ; and, having routed his forces, cut off his head. Hereupon Selim gives his dominions to Ali Beg (U), son of Shâh Suvar, who had faithfully served him at court, on condition the Soltân's name should be mentioned in the public prayers ; and, towards the end of the year, returns to Constantinople e.

His stout defence.

THIS war is more circumstantially related by the Christian than the Turkish historians before us. The former tell us, that, on Selim's approach, Alaideulet brought all his horse, to the number of 15,000, into a large valley ; commanding his foot, which were numerous, to keep the mountains on the right and left. In this situation he waited for the Soltân ; who, relying on the multitude of his forces, made no scruple to attack the enemy, though at so great disadvantage. Accordingly, he ordered Sinân Pâshâ (X), now made general of the European horse, to form himself in a square body, and charge them in front, since the place would not permit him to use wings ; while he himself, with the Janizaries and Asiatic horse, followed in the rear. Mean time, the soldiers of Alaideulet fought valiantly, and still kept the advantage of the ground against the Turks ; who were grievously galled by that prince's foot from the sides of the hills, with arrows and darts.

SELIM, finding such unexpected resistance, sent some companies of musketeers to support their fellows ; and, at the same time, commanded his Janizaries to ascend the hill. The mountaineers, terrified with the shot, and not able to endure it, presently fled ; but, not being

b ANGIOLELLI. Vitæ & Fatti del Uffun Cassano, cap. 18. in Ramusio's Collection of Voyages, vol. ii. p. 74.
c CANT. p. 152.

(Q) The author mistakes ; he commanded the Asian troops in this war, although in that against Alaideulet he is said to have been made general of the European horse.

(R) Rather Bayburud, or Beyhurt, a town midway between Trebizond, or Trebizonde, and Arzerûm.

(S) Angiolullo says, he sent one part of his army under Sâkîr, who took Tania, a great city of the Persians, inhabited by 150,000 people. Others mention Klamafem, a strong town on the Euphrates. A mistake, perhaps, for Kamak, about 21 miles south of Arsingân ; which the Turkish author, given by Leunclavius, says, was taken by Selim in this expedition.

(T) The annals of the Soltâns say, that Alaideulet was prince of the province of Dhu'lgadîr, or Zou'lkadîr, as it may be pronounced, though written the same way.

(U) One of the noble Persian refugees to Soltân Selim. An instance of fidelity (confidence, or gratitude), among the Turks. Cant.

(X) Prince Cantemir's author substitutes Ferbâd Pâshâ ; but the other Turkish writers before us, as well as the Christian, ascribe this service to Sinân Pâshâ.

a able to make great speed through the roughness of the way, were killed in heaps: so that the foot suffered most, while the horse, being at length put to flight in the plain, retreated with their king to their strong-holds, without much loss. The Soltân pursued the enemy in that rough and barren country for seven days; but, finding it to little purpose, encamped, and sent the Pâshâ, with the light horse, to hunt them out. Mean time Selîm was informed by the prisoners, that Alaideulet had intrenched himself on a strong rock, whither he had conveyed store of provision, and was resolved not to venture another engagement, till he had drawn his enemies to the straits leading to his camp; especially as he was afraid of being betrayed by his kinsman Ali Beg, who first fled out of the battle. A. D. 1515.

b THE Soltân, on this advice of the captives, ordered their chains to be knocked off; and, loading them with presents, sent letters by them to Ali Beg, to excite him, at so proper a juncture, to revenge his father's death. The young lord, being thus easily prevailed on to join Selîm, went over to Sinân Pâshâ, with a considerable part of Alaideulet's horse. Upon which, that prince, flying to hide himself in a cave, was there taken, and a few days after, by the Soltân's order, put to death. His head, in derision, was carried about as a spectacle thro' all the Lesser Asia; and afterwards sent by Selîm to the senate of Venice, as a loathsome evidence of his victory. He reduced the conquered kingdom into the form of a province, dividing it into three parts, where Sinân Pâshâ commanded in chief, and then returned to Constantinople. In his absence, this same year, Yunus Bâshâ, Sanjâk of Bosnia, recovered that country which king Matthias of Hungary had wrested from Mohammed II. He likewise took several frontier places, and even cities in Hungary itself. The Hungarians hereupon raised great forces, and besieged Semendria; of which notice being given to Selîm, who then besieged Kamakb, on the Euphrates before-mentioned, he ordered the European forces to assemble; who, coming on the Christians unexpectedly, obliged them to raise the siege.^a Taken and put to death.

c NEXT year a fresh opportunity offers of enlarging his empire. The nation of Kâra Amîd (Y), inhabiting the province of Diyârbekr (Z), having long endeavoured to throw off the Persian yoke, attempted to do by stratagem what they could not effect by force. With this view, they contrived a counterfeit letter to be brought from the Shâh by a messenger to the governor Kâra Khân, commanding him to march out of the city within five days, and encamp in a place called Kavakilder, and there wait for farther orders. Kâra Khân, not suspecting any deceit, departed accordingly, with all his forces and family: after which, the citizens shutting the gates, put the garrison to the sword; and then sent a letter to Selîm, promising to surrender the city to him, with a request that he would appoint for their prince Mehemmed Beg, son of Bilikli Oglî (A), their countryman; who was then at his court. This proposal was very agreeable to the Soltân: but, suspecting some fraud from that deceitful people, deferred sending an answer for a whole year, choosing rather to lose them than hazard his troops. At length, being tired with the continual hostilities which they had with Kâra Khân, Chemsîd Beg, a rich nobleman, who possessed above 300 villages in that country, gains credit at last for his nation, after several messages to Selîm, and obtains what was desired. The Kara Amîd revolt from Ismail. Hejrah, 922. A. D. 1516.

d THE treaty being ratified, the Soltân creates Mehemmed Beg, ibn Bilikli, Beglerbeg of Diyârbekr, with sovereign authority, and gives him the whole kingdom; allowing him, moreover, an annual pension of 40 Yuk (B), on the sole condition of being faithful. Hereupon the new prince hastes to take possession of his dominions; which, with consent of all orders and degrees of the people, he annexes to the Othmân empire. Mehemmed Beg made their prince.

SELIM, knowing that Kâra Khân's order would not be extinguished by Mehemmed's presence alone, he, in 922, sends a good body of troops to his assistance, with a letter upbraiding his backwardness in chastising that Persian's insolence. Mehemmed, stung with this reprimand from the person to whom he owed his life and fortune, without waiting for the imperial forces, with what troops he could raise, marched against Kâra Khân: but, while both armies stood ready to engage, a great cloud of butterflies appeared in the air between them; and dividing

^a LEUNCL. Hist. Muful. & RICAUT, in Selymus.

(Y) Kare Emîd, that is, the Black Midi, who inhabit the country between Urfa and Vân, in Asia. Cant. We meet with no such nation as the Black Midi. By Kare-Emîd, or Kâra-Amîd, are to be understood the inhabitants of the province of Diyârbekr, who take their name from the city itself; which is called also Kâra Amîd; Kâra, or black, being only an epithet added to Amîd, which is the antient Amîda of the Greeks. The inhabitants of Diyârbekr were a mixture of Arabs, Kurds, and Turkmâns, of the Kâra Koyunlu, or Black Sheep, family, who reigned in this country before their dynasty was destroyed by Uzun Hassan, founder of the Ak Koyunlu, or White Sheep, dynasty.

(Z) Diyârbekr signifies the province of Bekr, a country on the borders of Kurdestân, containing at present all Mesopotamia to the confines of Mosul, the Nineveh of the antients. Cant. Diyâr Bekr signifies the country of Bekr, or perhaps of the girl, which Bekr signifies in Arabic.

(A) Bilikli is a nickname given those who have prominent whiskers. Cant.

(B) Yuk is a certain sum of money used in the accounts of the treasury, consisting generally of 100,000 aspers. Cant.

A. D. 1516. { themselves into two parties, the white go to the Turks, and the red to the Persians: presently a the white charge the red, and, after a fierce conflict, rout them. The Turks, encouraged by this good omen, bravely fall on the Rafazi (C), and easily defeat them, already dispirited by superstition. The commander himself being found among the prisoners, his head was instantly struck off, by the victor's order.

His great successes.

MEHEMMED BEG, flushed with this unexpected victory, besieges the strong city of Mardûn (D); which was forced at length by pestilence and famine to surrender. A few days after, having taken Musul (E), at the first assault, he destroyed it with fire and sword. These two bulwarks being thus reduced, the lesser cities (F) were easily subdued: so that, within a short space, the whole kingdom of Kyûrdi (G), and of Jazîreh (H), was annexed to the Othmân dominions, to the great reputation of Mehemmed Beg, as well as joy of Selim; who, by the rapid course of his victories, is inspired with a thought of subverting the Persian empire, or, at least, of entirely weakening it ^m.

^m CANT. p. 152—157.

(C) Or heretics. So the Turks call the Persians, as being of a different sect in religion. They likewise slanderously ascribe other heresies to the Persians, because the knowledge of them came first from Persia. Cant. The Arabs pronounce Rafedhi.

(D) Vulgarly called Mardin, a very noted city of Mesopotamia. Cant.

(E) A famous city, supposed to be the antient Nineveh. Cant. The ruins of Nineveh are said to be in the neighbourhood of this city, which is variously named by authors, Mosul, Muscl, Mozul, &c.

(F) These were Anna, Hadiza, Hegheti, Sujari, Hefn Keyfa, Jemishborg, Amadia, Sudek, Jeidjeon, Baldir, Ham, Zerbak, and Khayzan. Cant. Our author writes Hafinkesi for Hefn Keyfa. Amadia should more properly be Ommadiya.

(G) This kingdom, if I rightly remember, extends from the borders of Syria to Shebrezûl and Vân, or Wân, on the borders of Persia. The inhabitants are called Kiurdi, and speak broken Persian. Cant. These are the people commonly called Kûrds, which is pronounced as if the û had something of an i in it, therefore better expressed in writing by a y; which reduces the name to a monosyllable, as in effect it is.

(H) Jazîreh signifies an island, and is the same country with Mesopotamia, lying between the rivers Erât, or Euphrates, the Morûd, a branch of that river, and the Shât, or the Tigris. Cant. Jazîreh signifies also a peninsula, which is more applicable to Mesopotamia than an island.

S E C T. II.

The conquest of Egypt.

A. D. 1517.

War with Egypt. Hejrah, 923.

WITH this view, in the year 923, he departs from Constantinople, with a more numerous army than before, and encamps near Halep: not far from which city Soltân Gauri (I), king of Egypt, met him with equal forces; and, sending him ambassadors, offers friendship (K), and assistance against the Persians. But while these things were in agitation, a party of Cherkassians, either with or without their sovereign's connivance, intercepted certain camels going to the Othmân camp, and plundered them. Selim, taking this as done to affront him, on a sudden lays aside the Persian expedition; and, declaring war against Soltân Gauri, turns his arms against Egypt ⁿ.

Occasion of it.

In an account of this war (L), written by a very considerable Turkish officer, who was in the expedition, we find that it was expressly designed originally against the Soltân of Egypt. The Kadhi'lasker informs us, that in the year 1516, Selim having been apprised of the treaty concluded between Kansu al Gauri and Shâh Ismail, determined to go against the former with a powerful army, the rather as he knew Ismail had work enough cut for him by the Green:

ⁿ CANT. ubi sup.

(I) Or Kansu al Gauri, commonly called by the European historians Kampson Gaurus.

(K) The Turkish author translated by Leunclavius says, he sent ambassadors from Egypt to expostulate with Selim the cause of invading his dominions, and offering to make peace in very modest terms: but the Christian writers, in conformity to some Turks, say, that Kansu Gauri was already in Syria, with an army, designing to aid the Persians, his friends and confederates, in case Selim should proceed against the Shâh; and that Selim having sent ambassadors to desire him not to interfere between them, the Egyptian Soltân declared he would oppose him in case he proceeded; and that he would make no peace with him, unless he restored the son of Alaideult to his father's kingdom, which had been under his protection. At the same time, reproaching him with his restless disposition, cruelty and parricide.

(L) It is inserted by Angiolello, at the end of The Life and Actions of Uzûn Hassan, published in the second volume of Ramusio's Italian Collection of Voyages. The account of Selim's war against the Soltân of Egypt was written originally in Turkish by a Kadhi'l Asker, or judge of the army, to a Kadhi of Constantinople, and translated into Italian, we presume, by Angiolello.

^a Heads (M). With this view, his army, in May, passed over into Anatolia, and Sinân Pâshâ ^{A. D. 1517.} was sent before with a body of musketeers, and a train of artillery, into Karamânia. The Shâh, on this advice, dispatched ambassadors to advise Kansu to march with his forces on that side, in order to rout Sinân Pâshâ, while he proceeded on the other. Accordingly the Soltân, with a numerous army, came to Halep. As soon as Selîm heard of this, he left Constantinople on the 5th of June, in order to succour his general. On the way, he sent the Kadî'lasker (N) and Zakbaria Pâshâ, his ambassadors, to the Soltân of Egypt, to know the reason of his coming to Halep, which was not customary: and, as they had not an expeditious answer, they concluded that he held intelligence with the Shâh. ^{Embassy to Kansu,}

HEREUPON Selîm, having assembled all the doctors and learned men, asked them, what the law of God commanded on this occasion? He was answered, that it was lawful first to cut off that evil thorn, and then proceed where God should guide him. On this, he marched joyfully towards Halep, and encamped in a fine plain, near the venerable grave of the prophet David. This is the Kadî'lasker's account of the occasion of the war; which differs in many other particulars from that of Saadi Effendi, to whom we shall now return.

AT the same time Selîm receives letters from Kair Beg, governor of Damaskus (O), and Gazel Beg, of Halep, who bore a mortal enmity to the Soltân; wherein, having set forth his tyranny, ingratitude, avarice, and design against their lives, they promise to desert to him in the heat of the battle, and become his subjects; requiring no other reward than that one of them should have for life the government of Egypt, the other of Damaskus. Selîm, having granted these conditions under his hand, and confirmed them by an oath, the traitors, following his directions, urge on Soltân Gauri to a battle. The Soltân believing this advice of his generals was the effect of their valour, draws up his forces in Burj Vaik (P), and marches against the Othmâns: who were so placed, that they they might receive the enemy from what quarter soever they came. The Cherkassians (Q), with a slow pace, approach within bow-shot: then, rushing with a great cry on the Turks, furiously charge them, and, notwithstanding their gallant resistance, force them to give ground.

BUT, while they are in the greatest hopes of obtaining the victory, Kair Beg in the right, and Gazel Beg in the left wing, going over to the enemy (R), strike the Cherkassians with the utmost terror. However, chusing rather to die than be overcome, they renew the battle, and so fiercely press the Othmâns, that, notwithstanding the numbers against them, victory seemed to incline to their side. ^{His forces defeated.}

HEREUPON Selîm, observing that the Cherkassians, by their nimbleness and agility of body (S), avoided the strokes of swords, spears, and darts, orders the horse to halt, and placing the Janizaries in the front, commands them to fire on the enemy.

His orders were so well executed, that the Cherkassians, astonished at the sudden slaughter of their men, fall back to close their ranks (T). The Turks, seeing this, gave them no time to renew the fight, but, rushing on them like a deluge, easily routed the broken troops. Soltân Gauri, finding all hopes of victory vanished, resolves not to survive the disappointment: so, piercing into the thickest of his enemies, he overthrows all he meets, and flies through their ranks, as if they were so many sheep. He looks and calls for Selîm, challenging him to single ⁹ See ANGIOLELLO, ubi sup. cap. 20. ad finem.

(M) The Yeshil Bâshi, or Green Heads, are the Uzbek Tatars, so nicknamed from the colour of their caps; as for the same reason the Persians are named Kezil Bâshi, or Red Heads.

(N) The author, as we conceive, of this narrative.

(O) The Kadî'lasker calls the governor of Damaskus, Sibes; and says he was slain in the battle: and makes Kayer Bek governor of Hâlep.

(P) That is, the tower, or fortress of Vaik, a place near Hâlep, or Aleppo. The Turks give the name of Burj, or Zodiac, to the turrets of their fortresses, in allusion to their surrounding those places, as the zodiac does the sphere. Cant.

(Q) The Turkish author affects every-where to call them Cherkassians, and not Mamlûks, or slaves. Perhaps because that appellation may be as well applied to the Janizaries (and indeed all the officers military and civil of the Othmân empire, of whom he was himself one), as to the soldiery of Egypt, in imitation of whom they were perhaps instituted; although the custom of training bought slaves to arms was practised by the Arab monarchs, and their successors, in Asia. Besides, the Egyptian soldiery consisted of the slaves of others as well as Cherkassians: whence, in the Turkish annals of Gau- dier, we find them distinguished into Cherkassians and Mamlûks, or slaves; that is, we presume, other slaves.

(R) Other Turkish as well as Christian writers make Jamburdi Gazel Beg true to his master, and not to have joined with Selîm till Egypt was conquered. Particularly the Kadî'lasker says, that the Mamlûks, being pursued by Yunus Pâshâ, and overtaken at the city of Kamau, Al. Gazeli fled to Kayro: but Kayer Bek, lord of Hâlep, submitted; and, being brought to Selîm, was kindly received, seated near the great lords, and loaded with rich presents. So that, according to this author, he did not go over to Selîm in the battle.

(S) Baumgarten, who travelled into Egypt in 1567, about ten years before this revolution, gives a surprising account of their feats of agility, in riding and shooting. Book i. c. 20. in Church. Collect. vol. i. p. 398.

(T) The Kadî'lasker says both sides were repulsed by turns, five or six times: that the lord of Hâlep at length fled with his troops before Sinân Pâshâ; who then fell on the lord of Damaskus; but, not able to stand the attack, he fled also; and in his flight had his head cut off. Soon after which followed the death of the Soltân Kansu Gauri. And this is all that officer says about it.

combat :

A. D. 1517. combat : but, fortune not throwing the Soltân in his way, he returns as he came ; and, imagin- a ing that he slew Selim in every Turk, makes a dreadful havock among his troops. At length, not wounded amidst so many swords, which is wonderful, but tired with wounding, and his Falls down
dead. breath failing through heat, he falls down dead among his slaughtered foes ^p.

Acts against the advice of Gazeli Beg. THE other Turkish historians give a very succinct account of this battle : they only tell us, that Selim, after drawing up his forces like an expert warrior, made use of stratagem, sending Ali Beg before-mentioned to lie in ambush, and, when the two armies were engaged, to attack the Egyptians in the rear ; who, by this means, being put between two fires, were soon defeated ^q. But the Christian writers relate some particulars not mentioned by any of the Turkish, excepting the Kadhi'lasker, with whom they in the main agree. They impute the loss of the battle, in good measure, to the pride and vanity of Kansu Gauri, who could not be persuaded ^b that Selim intended to attack him, till he was informed by his spies, that the Soltân had crossed mount Amân, and lay encamped with his army two days march distant. Being much perplexed at this unexpected news, and in doubt whether he should fight or retire, Jamburd Gazel Beg, governor of Apamia, or Afamîya, advised him not to think of so rash an attempt as to engage such numerous and well-disciplined troops with so small a force (not exceeding 12,000 Mam- lûks, with their armed servants), but retire towards Damaskus : adding, that there he might recruit his army out of the garrisons, and with Arab troops, before the Turks, with their heavy carriages, could come up ; and thus, protracting the war till winter, distress the enemy for want of provisions, as well as give the Persians time to join them, while cannon might be procured also from Rhodes and Cyprus.

Order of battle.

KANSU was inclined to follow this advice : but the foolish hardiness of the Mamlûks, eager ^c for battle, and especially the influence which the treacherous Kayer Bey, governor of Halep, whose brother the Soltân had poisoned some years before, determined his mind the other way.
 Upon this he went and encamped ten miles from that city, on the river Singa (U), and divided his army into four bodies. The first was commanded by Kayer Bey, the action being in his province : the second by Sibes, the brave governor of Damaskus, surnamed Balvan, or the Tumbler, from his agility. After these followed Gazel Bey, to relieve the other two, as occasion might require ; and Kansu himself, in gilt armour, led the fourth. On the other hand, Selim placed his Asiatic horse in the right wing, his European in the left, the Janizaries and artillery in the main body : before these, in the middle between the wings, he posted his wings, ^d he posted his brave pensioners, among whom, contrary to his custom, he chose to serve that day.

Kayer Bey's treachery.

KAYER BEY, as soon as he approached the enemy, briskly charged the European horse, and presently, as if he would have surrounded that wing, wheeled to the rear of them ; and there, falling on the sutlers and other followers of the camp, pretended to make a great slaughter among them. Mean time Sibes in the other wing, forbearing to charge in front, entered athwart the enemy's ranks, where his Mamlûks made a terrible slaughter of the Asian horse, and penetrated to their very standard. So that, having broken in two the right wing of the enemy, and fallen between the front and rear of the pensioners, they brought no small terror on the main body : for Selim, by this brave action almost cut off from his foot, in which he placed ^e his greatest confidence, was now in imminent danger of being overthrown ; and the rather, as the Janizaries were at the same time furiously charged by the faithful Gazel Bey, who, seconding the design of Sibes, had set upon the front of the enemy's battle. The Asian horse also, broken and cut to pieces as aforesaid, found no means to rally and renew the fight.

The Mamlûks
defeated.

BUT in this extremity Sinân Pâshâ, coming in with his horse, mightily encouraged the Turks to continue the battle ; and Selim's cannon playing at the same time on the Mamlûks, made a great slaughter among their troops : who, though forsaken by Kayer Bey, lost neither courage nor conduct, but closing together in a body, broke through the enemy with great slaughter, and so retreated to their camp. Mean while Kansu Gauri, who advanced to relieve ^f them, being informed of their flight, and the desertion of Kayer Bey (but for whose treachery the Turks must have been infallibly overthrown) was greatly dismayed. At the same time, the enemy coming on, soon put the troops about him to flight, while he, being a corpulent man, and very old, fell off his horse, and was trodden to death. This famous battle was fought August 17th, 1516, the same day on which, two years before, Selim overthrew Shâh Ismail, in the Kalderân plains. The Egyptians, beside their Soltân, lost above 10,000 of their brave Mamlûks, and the Turks 3000 horse. To return to the Turkish historians ^r.

^p CANT. p. 157, & seq.

^q LEUNCL. Hist. Musul. in Selymus.

^r RICAUT, in Selymus.

(U) By Singa here must be understood the river of Halep, called Kowik, or Kaik. For the Singa runs seventy or eighty miles to the north. Great confusion rises in history from authors making use of ancient names of places, whose situations they are generally unacquainted with, instead of the modern.

a AFTER the victory, the inhabitants of Halep, with their keys, meet Selîm, who receives ^{A. D. 1517.} them with much honour, and presents each of the principal citizens with a Khilaat (X), or vest. <sup>Halep surrendered.</sup> Next Friday, going to the Jâmi, he hears his name mentioned in the prayers, and commands the reader, whilst yet in the pulpit, to be clothed with a vesture wrought in gold, and alms to be distributed liberally not only to the ecclesiastics, but persons of all conditions. This clemency caused not only the lesser towns in that region to offer themselves to the conqueror, but also the inhabitants of Damaskus to send their elders to meet the Soltân on his approach (Y), and implore his mercy as well as goodness. These he receives with a pleasant countenance; and, after twice reading their petition, promises to do every thing they desired.

b NOT content with these instances of clemency, he thought proper to gain the hearts of the Damaskus superstitious people by some testimonies of his piety. With this view, the day of his entrance ^{submits.} into Damaskus he ordered divine service to be performed in the Jâmi of Bani Ommiyah (Z), and prayers offered for his welfare. Next he visits the monument of the famous Mubiddîn (A), without the city. The old men could scarce remember to have heard their fathers mention the burial of this hero; and the monument itself was not only laid in a vile place, but so covered with filth by such as were ignorant of the precious relics it contained, that it looked more like a dunghil than a religious place. Selîm, having expressed a due abhorrence of the impiety of the ^{Selîm's piety,} inhabitants, orders the dirt to be instantly removed, and finds a marble stone, with an inscription to this effect: This is the Monument of Sheykh Mohammed Ebn Arabi, Conqueror of Spain. The emperor, being from hence satisfied that the hero's body lay there, erects over the monument a large Kubbeh (B), and near it a Jâmi, with an hospital, where he orders the poor to be daily supplied with meat and drink. He moreover exempts the whole from taxes, and confirms these appointments with a Khati-Sharîf (C). The Turks believe these pious works were amply made up to Selîm; since they ascribe to the virtues of this Sheykh, and his favour with God (D), the victories which he obtained against so large and powerful a kingdom.

c WHEN he had thus spent some days at Damaskus, he leads his forces, big with the hopes of ^{and severity.} victory, towards Elkair (E) (or Kayro). In this march, being arrived at Khâni Yunus (F), and talking freely with his officers, Hiisân Pâshâ, one of his Wazîrs, with more boldness than prudence, asks, Most auspicious emperor, when shall we enter Kuthuir Kais (G)? Selîm, perceiving

(X) It is a robe of various colours, distinguished with a gold or silver border, given by the Soltân as a token of honour to persons at their entrance into office, or for some notable service done. It is also commonly called Kaftan, and is of three sorts. Cant.—Also Kalât.

(Y) The Kadhi'lasker says, Selîm first encamped by the city, with great magnificence; and that, as there were people here of seventy-two different nations, a more splendid appearance was never seen.

(Z) In prince Cantemir's history it is, by some mistake, both in the text and note, written Beni Ummie, for Ummie, or rather Ommiyah. It was first a temple of the Sabeans, then of the Christians; who being dispossessed by the Khalifah Walid, son of Abdo'lmalek, of the house of Ommiyah, in Hej. 86, A. D. 705, he for several years laid out the whole revenue of Syria in beautifying it. It was reckoned one of the finest structures in the world, till ruined by Timûr, in the year 1400. See Ebu Al Amid, c. 13. and D'Herbel. Biblioth. Orient. p. 291, art. Demschak.

(A) Prince Cantemir will have this person to be one of the Khalifahs, and the same with Musa, who sent his general Tarif, in Hejrah 92, to conquer Spain: but Musa was no Khalifah. As Mohammed was his proper name, and Mubiddin a surname, he may possibly have been Mohammed Abdo'lmu'men, son of Tomrût, who took the name of Mohadi, or the conductor of the faithful. This commander, after driving the Moravidah, or Marabûts, out of Africa, drove them also out of Spain, in Hejrah 519, an. 1125, and founded the race of princes called Meabiddin, for which we suppose, by some mistake, Mubiddin has been inserted in the text. But then he is here called Ebn Arabi, not Ebn Tomrût. And, if he reigned in Spain, how came he buried here?

(B) Of this word Kubbet, or Kubbat, signifying in general an arch, our cupola is a corruption.

(C) That is, holy character. Under which appellation is properly comprised the Soltân's name, confirming any mandate or letter. It is placed in a sort of cypher, or flourish over the mandate, and is commonly called Turreb, or Tura. Cant.

(D) Although the Turks believe that the souls of the deceased can give no assistance to the living; yet we read in the best Mohammedan divines, that the dead are appeased by the prayers of the living; and, in their turn, intercede with God to grant their petitions. They likewise own it meritorious to reverence departed saints, and religiously visit their monuments: but are chiefly commanded by their law to invoke the names of Mohammed and his successors; and write them on tablets or boards, which they hang up in the Jâmi and other buildings. They also inscribe them against the walls in large letters. In the middle of the tablet they describe the person of Mohammed, with a ruddy complexion, long visage, flat nose, bluish eyes, black beard, eight inches long, broad chest, slender waist, round hands, long fingers, strait legs, broad feet, with longish toes, &c. but never dare paint any part of him but his hands and feet: though the Persians are not so superstitious. Cant.

(E) It is commonly by our countrymen falsely written Alkâir; so Alkorân, instead of Elkurân. Cant. With regard to this note, which seems to contradict the English manner of writing those words, it may suffice to observe here, that the Alif in the article Al must be pronounced like a in fat, hat, or art; not like a in all, nor like the English e, as pronounced at present: thus, although Erpenius, a foreigner, writes Elif, Mr. Vaughan, in his grammar, writes Aif. The like may be understood of Korân. Although the pronunciation differs among the orientals according to time and place; the Turks, Persians, and people of Marokko, sounding the Alif in some words softer than the Arabs, and in others changing it: thus, instead of Iran (Irawn), the Persians say Irûn (Iroon). As to the word Alkair, it is like Kayro, a corruption of Kahera, the Arabic name of the capital of Egypt, which is also called Misr by the Turks.

(F) That is, John's Inn. Cant. The other Turkish authors instead of this place put Ramla, supposed to be the antient Rama: and we the rather think them in the right, because Khani Yunus seems to be the same name with Khano'ljuni, mentioned afterwards, and inserted by some oversight.

(G) A village or suburbs of Kayro, seeming to have been some narrow and difficult place. Cant.

A. D. 1517. his too great familiarity with his friends bred disrespect, replied, We shall enter, indeed, when a God pleases; but for thee, it is my pleasure that thou stay here: and immediately ordered his head to be struck off.

Visits Jerusalem.

FROM thence he marched to Gâza; where, hearing that Kûdsharîf (or Jerusalem) was not far off, he became exceedingly desirous to see a city the fountain of so many prophets, and the scene of so many miracles. Accordingly he went thither with a few attendants; and, in three days, performing what religion required, returned to his army. Then, pursuing his route, he takes by the way Sifido'lbâbr (H), and Kbano'ljuni (I), where he leaves such as were disabled by wounds or fatigue. As soon as he was gone, the people of Gâza, imagining that he would be cut off with his army by the Cherkassians, killed all the sick, and their physician, committed to their trust.

The Turks in danger of being surprised.

THIS part of the expedition is represented differently by other historians, particularly the Kadhi'lasker before-mentioned; whose account we shall here follow, supplying it from the rest in the notes. According to that officer, when Selim had been a few days at Damaskus, he ordered Mamet Bey and Skander Bey, two lords of Greece (K), to march with their troops to Gazzera, or Gaza, at the entrance of isthmus of Egypt. In their way, they were often attacked by the Moors (L) and Arabs. News of this being carried to Kayro, Al Gâzeli, who was a valiant commander, and newly arrived there from the last battle, asked leave of Tumân Bey, the new Soltân, who had been grand Diadâr, to march against them with 5000 Mamlûks. The Turks at Gazzera, on this advice, were in no small perplexity: but, in the interim, Selim having, to reinforce them, detached Sinân Pâshâ, with 15,000 men, that general joined them before the enemy arrived.

AL GAZELI, who at the same time was not far off, was greatly vexed at this disappointment. However, he lost not his courage, but exhorted his men to do their duty; resolving to surprise the Turks in the night. Sinân Pâshâ, being apprised of his design, drew up his men in order of battle, and the night was spent with great joy, by firing of guns and lighting up fires in the camp. When we began to march, says our author, the people of Gazzera imagined we were returning to join the emperor; and, having put to the sword the sick whom we left behind, sent word to Al Gâzeli, that we were fled, which gave him great satisfaction for that night: but when, at three o'clock the next day, he saw the dust raised by our army, which advanced to attack him, he was greatly dismayed.

Sinân Pâshâ's speech.

As we drew nearer, we alighted to buckle the girths of our saddles tighter: then we asked pardon of each other, shook hands, and saluted; praying to God, that, through the merits of Mohammed, and his four assistants, Abubekr, Omar, Ozmân, and Ali, as well as of all the antecedent prophets, he would help the cause of the good. Then Sinân Pâshâ, speaking to his troops, told them, "That they had defeated more numerous armies, and won greater battles, than that which they were going to fight could be. He exhorted them to stand firm; for that whoever was to die must fall, whether he fled or not; and that he who was not predestined to die would fight. He added, that as wethers were good to be sacrificed, so they ought to fight for their lord. Let vengeance, continued he, be taken for our friends who were killed by these dogs in the first battle, whose bodies, if they could speak would cry, kill! kill! By conquering you will obtain great rewards from your lord, and gain eternal fame: while many of you who are now in low stations will be promoted to high posts."

Gâzeli Bey routed.

To this harangue they all answered, "God grant long life to the lord! let all the world be subject to him, and those, who would not have it so, die! Let us march! let us march!" Then marching forward, both armies engaged. The Cherkassians sustained our onset with great courage and force: each side having often given way, from the hour of three till noon, and lost many men (M). At last they were broken, and our troops remained victors, with a great

* CANT. p. 159—163.

(H) That is, White Sea. But the antient name of this city and the next was unknown to prince Cantemir.

(I) This signifies, The inn of the Ionians, or Greeks, and seems to be the Daro'l Rûm, or House of the Greeks, as the Arabs call it; often mentioned by Sanutus and the historians of the crusade, who place it about fifteen miles from Gaza, in the way to Egypt. Thevenot, in his Travels, p. 179, writes it Caunions.

(K) We presume the word in the original was Rûm-ili, which answers to Greece in general, or perhaps more particularly to Thrace.

(L) As we know not what word was used in the original, by Moors we understand the Egyptians, or other Mohammedans, who were not Turks.

(M) The Othmâns placed their musketeers in the wings of their army, which was drawn up in a great length, the more easily to use their pieces, and hem in the Egyptians; and in the middle they posted their horse, to receive the first charge of the Mamlûks. The battle for a long time was doubtful: for, although the Turks far exceeded in number, yet the Mamlûks were the braver men, and could not have been overcome, if they had not been surrounded by the enemy. They lost in this action, besides a great many Arabs, the governors of Alexander and Kayro, with about 1000 Mamlûks. The Turks also had 2000 of their best horse slain, and some considerable commanders. Leunclavius. Ricaut, in Selymus.

booty.

a booty. The Mamlûks fled back, pursued by part of our army, while the rest returned to Gazzera, with the Pâshâ; who ordered the heads of all the slain lords to be filled with straw, and those of inferior persons to be fixed on palm trees, in memory of the battle. The greater part of two hundred (N) Solâks, sent by the Soltân to meet Sinân Pâshâ, being attacked by the Arabs in their way, were killed, and all the rest slain in their retreat excepting six. These not being able to give any account of the Pâshâ, Selim rose in great fury to go in quest of him; but was quickly freed from his concern by the arrival of some Moors, with intelligence, that Al Gâzeli had been defeated, and the Turkish army was returned to Gazzera in triumph.

b THE Soltân, highly pleased with this news, marched from Damaskus to Peneti, where the Solâks were killed, which was plundered and burnt. From thence he went to Jerusalem; but met with much rain and bad weather, which occasioned great fatigue, and the death of many. He distributed a deal of money among the poor of that city, and offered sacrifices of good wether-sheep. In his march from thence to Gazzera he entered a terrible valley, where not above two horsemen could ride abreast. The Arabs had seized on this pass, and amassed heaps of large stones to cast down upon us: but the Janizaries having found means to discharge their fire-arms, notwithstanding the rain had put them out of order, the Moors were put to flight, and some killed. As we approached Gazzera, the valiant men of Greece, well clothed in the enemy's apparel, came a bow-shot from the town, to meet the lord. The Moors were quite stupefied at the sight of so much pomp. The whole army being divided into two bodies, c the Soltân placed himself between both, and received their compliments. On sight of Sinân Pâshâ he thanked him heartily, together with his troops, and made them large presents.

HAVING rested four days at Gazzera, Selim marched to Kasali; which was plundered, to be revenged on the Arabs of the place, who had opposed them in the valley. The rains which fell had rendered the road thither commodious, and we took the direct route for Kayro. Thus far the Kadbi'lasker. It may not be amiss to add, from other authors, that, although the way lay through an uninhabited scorching desert, where the sand moved with the wind, like the billows of the sea, yet it was at that time so laid by a three days heavy rain, followed by calm weather, that the army, notwithstanding it was molested in its march by the Arabs, got in eight days within a small way of Kayro ^{Arrives near Kayro.}.

d UPON the enemy's approach Tumân Bey (O), sprung from the noblest Cherkassian family, having been elected in the room of Kansu Gauri, by a council called by those who had escaped from the late battle near Halep, and qualified with the title of Muluk Esbref (P), assembled all the remains of his nation, with some auxiliary troops of Arabs, amounting in all to about 40,000 choice men, encamps in a place called Ridania (Q). Here they fortified themselves with cannon, and various contrivances (R), in expectation that Selim, on his coming up, would instantly attack their camp, and so be taken in their toils. But the Soltân, informed of their snares by his spies, as he was superior in number, orders part of his forces to march round the enemy's camp, near Jebeli Maktab (S), and, at a signal given, to fall on their rear.

e THE Cherkassians being thus surrounded on all sides, in the first ten days of Jemazio'lawel, in the year 923, there was fought so bloody and obstinate a battle as can hardly be described. The enemy, overpowered by numbers, are sometimes forced back, yet as often renew the

^c ANGIOLELLO, LEUNCL. & RICAUT, ubi sup.

(N) Others say, 2000 horse were sent; and that they had all been destroyed by the Arabs, had they not met at Rama with a strong body of troops under Juleb, governor of Akhania, going to Sinân Pâshâ: yet both parties had much ado to get back. Leuncl. Ricaut.

(O) Called by our historians Tomombeius. Tumân Bey signifies the lord or commander over ten thousand: a military post, first established among the inhabitants of Tartary by Jenghiz Khân. He was great Darvidâr, Dorvidâr, or Diadâr, which was the same with Wâzîr among the Turks.

(P) Muluk Esbref signifies the most holy, or most auspicious. Cant. Our author should have added king. The reading is properly Mâlek Asbraf: which last word signifies most noble, and was not peculiar to Tumân Bey, but was the title or surname of many of the Soltâns of Egypt, Syria, and of Tumman in Arabia: hence Sharîf, or the most noble; which title is assumed by the descendants of Mohammed.

(Q) The Christian writers call in Rodania, a village near that of Maturea, another village, famous for the balm, six miles to the north of Kayro.

(R) These were ditches dug across the fields and highways, covered with earth and hurdles. The Kadbi'lasker informs us also, that the Soltân had mounted his cannon with design to have discharged it all at once upon the Turks, as soon as they approached; and had prepared 14,000 Mamlûks and 20,000 Arabs ready to fall out afterwards and disperse them: but these things being discovered to Selim by six Mamlûk deserters, he of a sudden changed his route, and marched where the enemy's artillery could not annoy his army. See Angiolello in Ramusio, vol. ii. also Leunclavius, and Ricaut in Selymus.

(S) Prince Cantemir thinks it should be Makhtab; which signifies a bill or mount; whereon the monuments of the antients, and the pyramids are placed. But the pyramids are not on the side of the river where the battle was fought. It is rather the hill called Makottam, which lies to the south-east of Kayro, there being only a passage between it and the castle, nor is there any other mountain thereabouts.

o charge;

A. D. 1517. charge; the king himself fighting always in the front, and animating his soldiers by his example. The battle is continued for some time with broken ranks, when at last Tumân Bey, seeing part of his forces slain, part taken prisoners, and victory no way to be hoped for, with a select band, opens a passage through the thickest of his enemies, and flies to Sheykh Arab (T), son of Bekkaar. Thus the Othmâns, though not without great slaughter of their men, obtained a complete victory. On their side fell the hero of his age, the renowned general Sinân Pâshâ (U); whose death was so grievous to Selim, that he is said, long after the taking of Kayro, to have lamented in this manner: Misr, or Egypt, have I gained, but Yusef, or Joseph, have I lost: without Yusef what signifies Misr?

Their forces. OTHER writers furnish us with more particulars of this battle, which decided the fate of Egypt. As soon as the two armies engaged, Tumân Bey, who had 12,000 Mamlûks and a multitude of Arabian horse, ordered the latter to go and hem in the wings of the enemies forces (X), and to skirmish with them behind. Mean time the cannon played furiously on both sides, till most of the Égyptian gunners were slain, and several of their pieces broken: whereas Selim had several Christians to manage his artillery, who did him excellent service. Hereupon they joined battle every-where. Tumân Bey fought in the main body against Selim; the wings of the Mamlûks encountered those of the Turks, and the Arabs valiantly charged them in the rear (Y): so that four sharp engagements being carried on at the same time, there ensued such a hideous noise, with the clashing of armour and other weapons, that nothing could exceed it.

Gallant behaviour of the Soltân. GAZELI BEY, to retrieve the loss he had sustained at Gâza, fell with surprising fury on Jonus Pâshâ, in the left wing, and broke in upon his ranks, while the Arabs fiercely pressing him behind, forced those European troops to fly; which they never did before. Here the famous Sinân Pâshâ, coming to their relief, was, by Bidon and his Mamlûks, slain, with all his followers; besides 500 select Janizaries, who, being surrounded, were in a trice cut to pieces. On the other side, Mostafa, with the Asian horse in the right wing, pressed so hard on the Égyptian left (Z), that, with the help of Selim's cannon, which made great slaughter among them, he not only disordered but quite overthrew him. At the same time Tumân Bey, who was a large man, and of great strength, breaking through the main body of the Turkish horse, penetrating in person to the foot, hewing down all before him; and the Arabs, casting themselves in a ring, performed their parts with great bravery. This brought on Selim, with his foot and resolute Janizaries; who, with dreadful fury, renewed the battle; which continued with great obstinacy from four till sun-set (A). But, at length, Tumân Bey, fearing a total overthrow from the number of his enemies, founded a retreat, though needless, as night approached, and abandoning his camp and train of artillery, retired towards Kayro (B). In this flight the Diadâr (C) (or Dowidor), and the gallant Bidon, were taken, and put to death next day by Selim's order; though the first was mortally wounded, and the latter had his leg shot off. This battle was fought on January 24, 1517.*

Fortifies Kayro. THE brave Tumân Bey, no-ways discouraged by so many misfortunes, encamped with the remainder of his troops between Kayro and the Nile (D). These he recruited with 8000 Ethi-

* CANT. p. 164.

* LEUNCL. & RICAUT. ubi sup.

(T) Sheykh Arab signifies no more than an Arabian Sheykh. These are more concerned in the ecclesiastical than civil government; and pretend to be the immediate successors (or descendants) of Mohammed. Of these there are seven races, chiefly celebrated among the Turks. Prince Cantemir saw one of these Sheykhs, who, in a visit to Soltân Mostafa II. sat all the while, and familiarly conversed with him. Whenever he talked of the Soltân, he called him his Bizum Vekil; that is, vicegerent, or lieutenant. Cant.

(U) At the same time all his men, who eat of his bread and salt, and were many, fell a sacrifice; saying, with the cloaths on, which he has given us, we are willing to die with our master. They washed him with their tears, wrapped him up in the finest linen, sprinkled him with the water of Zemzem, a well in Mekka, and, having dug a grave, buried him. Thus the Kadhi'lasker.

(X) This the Turks are before said to have done to the Cherkassians.

(Y) The Kadhi'lasker informs us, that Al Gâzeli attacked the Grecians, or European troops, commanded by Sinân Pâshâ; Allem, the Wazir, or Diadâr, those of Anatolia, led by Mostafa Pâshâ.

(Z) The Kadhi'lasker says, they fell on with such rage, that they cut down the Cherkassians like blades of corn, to the amazement of all. The emperor's squadron and Grecians likewise fought the enemy gallantly.

(A) The Kadhi'lasker says, the battle began in the morning, and continued with great obstinacy till noon; when Sinân Pâshâ was killed.

(B) Towards evening, says the Kadhi'lasker, as every one was fatigued, they retreated; and the Cherkassians, making a shew of taking breath, betook themselves to flight, some to Kayro, others elsewhere. They were followed by the Grecian troops, who killed a great number, and made many prisoners. These latter were all put to death that night, by order of Selim, who lay in the field of battle.

(C) That was Allem, before-mentioned. Jovius calls him Helmys, and the Turkish author, translated by Leunclavius, Allen.

(D) The Turkish army, according to the Kadhi'lasker, rested three days on the field of battle, and the fourth marched to Bikkieri, on the Nile, where they staid two days. Mean time the Mamlûks, to the number of 9000, joined the Soltân, in order to attack the enemy in the night; but Selim, being informed of their design, kept on his guard: however, the Cherkassians attacked his army next day.

a opian slaves. He likewise armed the Jews, Arabs, and the sons of the Mamlûks: but, as he wanted artillery, and had not force enough to oppose the enemy in the field, he resolved to surprise them in the night. This design being betrayed to Selîm, he stood on his guard, and ordered great fires to be made throughout his camp: so that the Egyptians were repulsed with great loss. Tumân Bey, upon this, retires to Kayro; and, by help of the inhabitants, fortifies the gates and avenues; for it had no walls. Then he collects all his strength in the broad street, leading from the east gate to the castle, which he likewise supplied with soldiers. The rest of the streets he took no care of; for they were so narrow and crooked, that no great artillery could be brought in by them, or soldiers enter without great danger.

A. D. 1517.

HOWEVER, Selîm, being informed of all this, next morning by sun-rise, entered by the Bâb The city at- b Zuil (E), the chief gate of Kayro; and at the same time thrust in his horse at divers avenues tacked.
of the city; but introduced his Janizaries by the largest street. Immediately horse encountered horse in the narrow streets and lanes; while the foot, with their light field-pieces placed in front, cleared the way before them. Yet were they still valiantly opposed at the barricades and trenches; where after the most bloody conflict that can be imagined, the Turks, pressing on one another, tumbled by heaps into the covered trenches, and perished on the sharp stakes planted there on purpose by the enemy. The very women and children had a share in the battle, assaulting the Turks with stones, tiles, and the like, from the tops and windows of the houses: while many of the Egyptians, who hated both the Mamlûks and Turks, attacked sometimes the one, sometimes the other, as they saw fortune was likely to declare herself. In c short, the lanes and streets did so flow with blood, that the dust, which at first rose very thick, was quite laid.

THE fight had now lasted two whole days, when the Mamlûks, being weary and but few, Terrible began to give way: yet, the third day, considering their all was at stake, they fought with such slaughter.
renewed courage (F) that they drove the Turks a great way back, and took some of their cannon, which they turned upon them with good success. It is said, that Selîm, upon this repulse, despairing of victory, and seeing Tonus Pâshâ slain before his face with a stone from a window, ordered the houses to be set on fire (G); so that while the inhabitants were calling out for mercy in the flames, the Turks fought but faintly, expecting the sound of a retreat. While d things were in this suspense on one side of the city, Mostafa had beaten the enemy on the other side, and seized the horses of the Mamlûks, which stood ready bridled and saddled in the broad street, to secure their escape, in case they should be constrained to fly. This news raised the sinking spirits of the Othmâns, and so discouraged the Mamlûks, that they betook themselves to flight, and abandoned Kayro to Selîm, who immediately sent to quench the fire.

THE Kadhi'lasker informs us, that, after the fire had been extinguished, as set forth in the Tumân Bey last note, the Cberkassians renewed the battle in such a manner, that the arrows fell as thick as flies.
rain. The fight continued with the same fury all the day; so that streams of blood ran thro' the streets. Night coming on, the Cberkassians, who were fatigued and weak, retired into a mosque, where they held out gallantly, as if in a castle, for three days and nights. Being at last e pushed very hard, it was taken. Tumân Bey fled in disguise; and Selîm went to take some rest, while the army was intent on plundering and taking prisoners; whose heads were afterwards cut off on the Nile.

AL GAZELI, who had been out of Kayro raising Arab troops, was returned near the city, Gazeli Bey at such time as Selîm had caused proclamation to be made, that all the Cberkassians who would submit.
submit in three days, should be pardoned. This brought in a great number, who were at no great distance, to present themselves. He also came and bent his knee; all receiving large presents. After this, Selîm, accompanied with the great white standard, drums, kettle-drums, and fifes, went to the Soltân's palace. Here the treachery of certain Mamlûks having been discovered, they endeavoured to escape; but being taken, some were put to death, and the rest imprisoned for a few days, and then drowned in the Nile. Selîm likewise detached Al Gazeli and f a Begler Beg to Kayta (H), with orders to pillage that city, and punish the slaves there, who

Y LEUNCL. & RICAUT, ubi sup.

(E) In Ricaut Bosuela; doubtless a mistake for Bab-fuela, or rather Zuil.

(F) The Kadhi'lasker says, they thought of nothing else but to die sword in hand, looking on it as a disgrace to fly, and leave all their effects in the hands of the enemy.

(G) The Kadhi'lasker says, that Selîm, finding he could not break the Cberkassians, ordered the city to be fired; which was done by the Janizaries, in several places: but that the Mamlûks crying out most frightfully for mercy, the Soltân, in pity, ordered the flames to be extinguished. Our author adds, that it was a miracle the whole city was not burned down; and that the enemy renewed the battle with surprising fury.

(H) Rather perhaps Katîa, or Katiya, a city near Tina, the ancient Pelusium, and Farma, miscalled Faramida, at the eastern mouth of the Nile, above sixty miles to the east of Demyat, or Damietta. Other writers, as Leunclavius and Knowles, put Akhasia, instead of Al Kayta, or Al Katiya.

A. D. 1517. had greatly insulted his soldiers, sent thither to procure necessaries for the army. The place a being accordingly plundered, and the Moors put to death, those of the neighbouring places became as tame as hens.

Selîm offers peace.

WE were all attentive, continues the Kadbi'lasker, to see what the Soltân Tumân Bey, who had passed the Nile, and fled into the country of Saetta (I), intended to do. On the other hand, he, no less desirous to know what the Turks did, sent emissaries to Kayro, secretly to engage the citizens to use them ill (K). Mean time, Omar (L), a Moorish, or Arab, lord, came privately to kiss Selîm's hand, and informed him of the whole; for which he was rewarded with a Sanjak in Saetta. Hereupon guards were set on every place, and artillery planted on the banks of the Nile; so that not a bird could pass. It was afterwards resolved to send two grandees, with the Kadbi of Kayro, as ambassadors to the Soltân, to exhort him to humble himself to Selîm; and promise him, on that condition, to give him a great standard, with the lordship of Kayro (M). But the Cherkassians, when they had the ambassadors in their power, put them to death^z (N).

Another bloody battle.

As soon as Selîm heard of this cruelty, he ordered bridges to be built across the Nile, and Mostafa to march over with his whole army. Of this design the Soltân having been informed, he, with 5000 Cherkassians and 10,000 Arabs well mounted, set forward; and in one day and night made such speed, that they drew near the Turks at such time as part of the troops of Greece had crossed the river, and the rest were getting over; little expecting so sudden a visit from the enemy. But those appointed to mark out a place for the emperor's tent, perceiving their approach by the dust which their horses raised, in a great surprize, mounted, and Selîm sent to order Mostafa to do the like. The Cherkassians stripped the Turks of every thing till they came to the standard; but the latter, being there reinforced, repulsed them. The enemy rallied a-new, and drove back the Othmâns with so much slaughter, that the blood ran like a river (O). The Moors only fought to give the Cherkassians time to breathe; and the Turks had all the disadvantage on their side. However, they stood their ground, though to their great loss.

The Soltân flies.

AT length the Pâshâ (Mostafa), who was in Selîm's presence, seeing the battle in danger of being lost, drew his scymitar in a rage, and ran towards Tumân Bey, determined to deprive him of life, and afterwards fall himself. The Grecian, or European, troops, beholding so much bravery in their commander, followed with a resolution to act in conformity with him; and certainly, had courage been then wanting, they must all have quickly bid adieu to life. The battle being thus renewed with so much vigour, the Soltân perceived that the Turks were resolved to obtain the victory: at the same instant reflecting with himself, that from a great lord he was reduced to an insignificant slave, and from immense riches to extreme poverty; he fixed his eyes on the heavens, and expostulated in such bitter terms, as filled all those who heard him with grief and compassion. After a great many exclamations and infinite tears, he fled by day and night till he came to a bridge, where he rested for a while. Mostafa, with the Grecian band, pursued him, while Selîm set out for Kayro; but as he continued his flight, he kept out of their reach.

He is taken, and put to death.

THE Bâshâ had now been four days and as many nights in pursuit of him, when he, through fatigue, was obliged to retire to a farm-house of the Moors: but the Turks, being also soundly tired, could not easily come up with him: They therefore wrote to those of the farm, to keep a guard, and take care that the Soltân proceeded no farther, under pain of having it pillaged and burned. Shaykh Affaim (P), who was chief of the farm, having acquainted all the rest with this order, the Moors surrounded Tumân Bey and his Cherkassians in such a manner, that they could not escape: but when the Turks came up, they threw themselves into a neighbouring lake; where part of them were cut to pieces, and others made prisoners. Tumân Bey

^z ANGIOLELLO, ubi sup.

(I) By which, we presume, is to be understood, not Saïd, or Upper Egypt, but Shiba, or Shibat, corruptly Scetis, and Scithiaca Regio. It is the same which is otherwise called the desert of St. Makarius, and the valley of Habib or Natron, which is the Nitria of the antients. It lies to the west of the Delta, or Lower Egypt, and extends northward to near the sea-coast, between Alexandria and the tower of the Arabs. See Renaudot's Hist. Patriach. Alex. vol. ii. p. 167. and Pocock's elaborate map of Egypt. In Leunclavius and Knowles this country is called Segasta, and said to border on Cyrenaica, as Saetta or Shibat does.

(K) Others say, they sent to invite him.

(L) Corruptly by some, Albucomar; doubtless for Abû Omar; that is, the father of Omar.

(M) Others say, he offered to restore the kingdom to Tumân Bey, on certain reasonable conditions. See Ricaut in Selymus.

(N) Some say, it was done without Tumân Bey's knowledge. Ibid.

(O) Tumân Bey's design was to clear his way to the head of the bridge; that, by breaking it, he might prevent more of the enemy from getting over: but Mostafa had retired thither with his broken troops, and made a stand till more got over the river. Ricaut.

(P) He seems to be the Shaykh Arab of prince Cantemir's historians.

a was taken knee-deep in water (Q), and brought to the Pâshâ, who thereupon dispatched a courier to the emperor with an account of what had passed. A. D. 1517.

THE messenger was received with great joy, and all the Sanjâks and lords kissed his majesty's hand. The Soltân was not brought into Selîm's presence, but lodged in a tent near him, and strongly guarded. Mostafa fought another battle at a farm-house, near the Nile, with the Moors; who, in conjunction with some Mamlûks, had murdered and plundered the Turks. Having destroyed this house, he staid in the neighbourhood four days, and then returned to the emperor; who held a court, and ordered that Tumân Bey, the Soltân, should be carried on a mule through the country of Kayro, and hanged at the gate called Bâbzowelet (R); which was accordingly executed. This was the end of the kingdom of the Mamlûks, and beginning b of Soltân Selîm's greater grandeur^a. Here the narrative of the Kadbi'lasker ends. We find nothing in prince Cantemir's history from the Turkish authors concerning what passed after Tumân Bey's flight from Kayro, till the time that he was taken: which event, with the circumstances preceding that prince's death, he relates in the following manner.

As the conquest of Egypt could not be secure so long as Tumân Bey remained at hand, ready to attempt a change, as soon as the Othmân forces were withdrawn, Selîm, to prevent the danger which threatened from that quarter, sends ambassadors, with noble presents, to Sheykh Arab; desiring him to deliver up his enemy, and advising him rather to gain his friendship by good offices, than incur his indignation by fruitless obstinacy. The Sheykh, either fearing the Soltân's power, or gained by his presents, shamefully delivers up Tumân Bey, contrary to the c law of nations; and particularly against the Arab Ray (S). But the bravery which could not affect the mind of a base friend, appeased the wrath of a generous enemy. For Selîm, when the king was brought bound into his presence, and his fortitude plainly seen, could not refrain from giving him liberty, and bidding him daily eat at his table. Thus Tumân Bey, having purchased his freedom by his virtue, conversed both in public and private with his conqueror; informing him of the state of the Egyptian affairs, with the laws, genius, and manners of the people.

BUT the miserable captive shortly after bitterly experienced how fortune sports in human affairs. Selîm could not but admire his heroic virtues, singular fortitude, sound counsels, and grave deportment. He thought it base to put such a man to death; and, as he seemed to d free him from all danger, he had resolved to take him into his friendship, and set him over the kingdom of Egypt (T). These things being known to the people, they began already to express their hopes; that, by being vested with so great authority, Tumân Bey would, soon after the Soltân's departure, have it in his power to help the Arabs to expel the Turkish garrisons, and restore the Cberkassian dominion. For a while Selîm was unwilling to give credit to such reports, as thinking them raised by enemies: but finding them to continue, he ordered Ali Beg, son of Sheykh Suvar, whose father had lately been fastened to an hook by the Cberkassians, to hang up the unfortunate king in the gate of Kayro, called Zavil (U), with these words: How great my mercy was, is already declared: but what the malignant speeches of the vulgar, though on his side, can effect, let the wretch himself experience. The order was gladly e executed by Ali Beg on the tenth of Rabio'lauwel.

THE unexpected death of their king infused a terror into the Egyptians not to be expressed. They who before, with concealed indignation, bore his unjust dominion, now ran in a suppliant manner to Selîm, intreating his clemency, and promising faithful obedience. The Soltân pardons them, on condition that they delivered up the concealed Cberkassians. Hereupon the common people, fond of novelty, search every-where for their former lords, and drag them bound to Selîm, to be butchered. This prince having the next day ordered a theatre, with a throne on it, to be erected on the banks of the Nile, commanded all the prisoners, said to

^a ANGIOLELLO, ubi sup. See LEUNCLAVIUS and KNOWLES, who agree pretty well therewith.

(Q) Others say, he hid himself in a marsh, where he was found by the peasants among the reeds, standing in water up to the shoulders. See Ricaut.

(R) Zavil, or Zuil, as before. Others say, he was first tortured to discover the vast treasures of Kansu Gauri, supposed to have been hidden by him: and that, after being publicly strangled, he was hanged by the neck under an arch of the gate, April 13, 1517. Ibid.

(S) That is, parole, or word of security and protection. The Arabs boast themselves to be of all mortals the strictest observers of their parole; and perhaps very justly. It is death by their laws to kill a man to whom the Ray was given. When they have given a prisoner of war the Ray, they draw a circle round him, out of which he must not stir, though dying with hunger, till the ransom be paid, even though his party should gain the victory; for, in that case, he would by friends as well as foes be deemed a man of no honour or credit. Cant.

(T) This, which happened before Tumân Bey was taken, is here artfully but partially put afterwards, to magnify Selîm's generosity; and perhaps to extenuate his tyrannical treatment of the Soltân; whose only crime was self-defence.

(U) Rather perhaps Zuil.

A. D. 1577. exceed 30,000 (X), to be beheaded in his presence, and their bodies thrown into the river. ^a
 The second day he makes a triumphant entry into Kayro; but, after a few hours stay, departs, and encamps near the Nile, in a place called Ruz. Having allowed his forces time for refreshment, on the seventh of Jemazio'lawel, he marches towards Iskanderiyâ, or Alexandria: but the city having avoided his indignation by a surrender, after settling the affairs of it, he returns to the inland parts of Egypt, and appoints Khair Beg governor of the kingdom ^b.

Raïs Soleymân yields up the fleet.

MEAN time Raïs Soleymân, admiral of the Egyptian fleet, came and paid allegiance to Selim. This fleet had been built in four years time, at Swîz, or Suez, at the end of the Red Sea, by order of the late Kansu Gauri, and was designed against the Portugueses; who, by their discovery of the Indies by sea, and conquests made there, had diverted the course of trade, which ^b before passed through Egypt, to the extreme prejudice of that country. It was sent out under the command of Amîr Azîz and Raïs Soleymân: but news arriving, while they lay at Jidda, the port of Mekka, of the death of that Soltân, and Selim's entrance into Egypt, a mutiny arose among the soldiers: the issue of which was, that Amîr Azîz, who favoured Tumân Bey, was obliged to fly to that city for refuge: and, being some time after delivered up to Soleymân, who threatened else to attack the place, he was drowned in the night. After this Soleymân sailed back to Swîz, and went to submit himself to Selim, as hath been already mentioned.

EGYPT and its provinces being thus brought into subjection to Selim, he, in the beginning of July, sailed down the Nile to Alexandria, there to view his fleet, sent by Piri Pâshâ and ^c his son Soleymân, from Constantinople; whither he removed 500 of the best families from Egypt, besides the treasures of the country, and then returned to Kayro; from whence he soon after set out on his return for Europe.

Yonus Pâshâ put to death.

YONUS PASHA was become so popular by his valour and liberality, that Selim sought an occasion to destroy him; which that officer soon furnished him with. A few days before the army was to depart for Syria, the garrison of Kayro petitioned for an augmentation of their pay. The Soltân, always liberal to his soldiers, readily consents, and orders Yonus to see it done: but the Pâshâ, carried headlong by the resentment he had conceived at the advancement of Kayer Bey to the government of Egypt, which he thought himself more worthy of, gave the treasurers and paymasters no orders about it. His view was to incense the soldiery ^d against the Kayer Bey, as the author of those wrongs, and by that means get him displaced: but the Pâshâ was fatally out in his calculation; for, when pay-day came, and no money was to be had, the governor and officers of the treasury, after excusing themselves to the insulting soldiers, dispatched messengers to Selim, then at Larissa (Y), to acquaint him with the matter. The Soltân, highly incensed, sends for Yonus; who alleged, that he had no ill intention in what he did; that the soldiers had been already sufficiently enriched by the spoils of Egypt; and that his majesty's coffers were empty: but Selim, not giving him leave to proceed, ordered him to be executed in his presence (Z); as an example for disobedience ^e.

Selim's conquests and farther designs frustrated by death.

BEING arrived at Gaza, to revenge the perfidiousness of the inhabitants, he puts every soul to the sword, and razes their city to the ground. Afterwards, coming to Damaskus, he delivers that city, with the government of Palestine and Syria, to Gâzeli Beg, according to agreement. In short, within the space of one year, and in the same expedition, Selim added more territories to the Othmân empire, than any of his predecessors had been able to subdue in his whole reign: for he not only conquered all the dominions of the Cberkassians, in Asia and Egypt, but likewise reduced to his obedience, as it were by-the-by, other strong and famous cities of Asia; such as Malatiya, Dierbeghi, Derendâ, Behtisi, Kierkieb, Kiakble, Berejik, Antâb, and Antakbia (A). Even the Sharîf of Mekka (B) brought the keys of his city to Selim, whilst he was was about Kayro, and openly acknowledged his sovereignty. He was honourably received by the Soltân, who appointed his son, famous for virtue and learning, his successor in

^b CANT. p. 165, & seqq.

^c LEUNCL. & RICAUT, ubi sup.

(X) This author makes Selim's cruelty vastly greater than any other historian.

(Y) Rather Al Rijha, called by some, Laris, Riche, and the like. It lies about twenty miles to the south of Gaza, at the bottom of a gulph of the same name, or Al Rijha.

(Z) Others say, that, talking to him aside, he of a sudden, in a rage, ordered him to be thrown to the ground off his horse, and the Solak Basbi to kill him. Leunclavius. This Yonus had married a beautiful Greek lady, named Manto, whom, after the death of her husband in the wars, he took prisoner: but in time growing extremely jealous of her, though without cause, she proposed to make her escape to her own country; which he discovering, slew her with his dagger.

(A) Of these cities, Malatiya, Derenda, Berejik, or Bir on the Euphrates, Antâd, and Antakbia, or Antiokh, are pretty large: the rest are rather towns than cities. Cant.

(B) He was before this Soltân's reign a sovereign prince over Mekka, and some other cities of Arabia: but from Selim's time he has acknowledged the Turkish emperors for guardians and protectors of the Musulmân affairs. Cant.

a the principality. By the authority of this man, the tribes of the wandering Arabs (C) were induced voluntarily to submit to him, and deliver him a writing for a testimony of their fidelity, with some of their principal countrymen in hostage. A. D. 1519.

BEING arrived at Halep, in Ramazân, 925, he was met by a Persian ambassador, sent by Hejrah, 925. a feigned submission to divert the storm which threatened his master. The more easily to obtain his ends, besides making magnificent presents, he tries to sooth the ambitious Soltân with new titles; after flatteringly styling him Shabîm Shâbi alem, ve Sâheb Kerâni bani Adam, that is, The emperor of emperors (D), and sole conqueror (or Autocrator) of the sons of Adam. Selîm's pride was so swelled with such great victories and vain congratulations, that, having made his triumphant entrance into Constantinople, he, (E) the next year, as if the fortune of war had been at his command, binds himself with an oath, not to recede a step till he had subverted the empire of the Persians, and utterly extinguished a nation perfidious to God, and hateful to man (F). This he did in a belief, that he should afterwards subdue, without difficulty, the Christian princes. But providence seemed to thwart his arrogant designs: for he is obliged, for want of money, both the external and internal treasures (G) having been exhausted in the late expedition, to defer his intended war the first year, and turn his thoughts to raising new supplies out of the conquered countries, which took up another year. Winter drawing on, to divert the time he resolves to visit the monuments of his ancestors at Adrianople: but he had scarce reached the villiage Suafîdi (H), when he was seized with a slight fever. Next day, there appeared in his thigh an imposthume (I); which so tormented and weakened him, that all the sinews of his body and feet (K) were contracted and dried. The tumor was indeed opened by a skilful surgeon, and remedies were applied: but the obstinate ulcer so infected his whole body, that, after forty days of torture rather than sickness, the splendor of the Othmân empire expired, on Sunday the ninth day of Shawâl (L), about sun-set^d.

FERHAD PASHA, who alone had staid with the Soltân, concealing his death from all but the His successor. rest of the Wazîrs, for fear of some commotion, immediately sends notice to Soleymân, Selîm's son, then residing at Trapezond; who, on receipt of his letter, hastened to Constantinople, where all the great officers, cloathed in mourning, salute him emperor, in Shawâl, 926. The Hejrah, 926. same day, after noon, he went, attended by his courtiers, to meet his father's funeral, and A. D. 1520. conducted the body, with great pomp, to the Jûmi built by Mohammed II. where it was d interred, with this epitaph inscribed on his tomb; This year Soltân Selîm departed to an everlasting kingdom, leaving the empire of the world to Soleymân.

SELIM lived 54 years, and reigned nine years and eight months (M). He had all the Reign and character. qualifications of a hero; with an able head, strong arm, and great contrivance: indefatigable, where the safety of the state was concerned, very fit to manage affairs, and extremely quick in discovering hidden designs. He frequently walked in disguise about the public places, streets, and camp, as well by night as day; and punished severely whatever he found contrary to his laws or the common good. He had also his spies, dextrous in their business; who, mixing with all companies, daily reported to him what they had heard or seen. By these means, he was so well acquainted with every thing which passed, that it became a common saying in his

^d CANT. p. 167, & seqq.

(C) As Bani Ibrakîm, Bani Sewalem, Bani Ata, Bani Affyia, Bani Sâud, and many others. There being above 70 nations or tribes of them sprung from different branches, who range the deserts, and all speak the Arabic language; but in such different dialects, that they can hardly understand each other. Cant.

(D) Though all the Turkish emperor's titles are very lofty; yet at court, when mention is made of him, these are never used: but the common appellations are Pâdishâhi alem Penah, the emperor who is the refuge, or protector, of the world, and Alî Othmân Pâdishâhi, emperor of the sons of Othman. Cant.

(E) Other writers say, the thing which hastened him home was the advice he had received, that several Christian princes, at the instigation of pope Ieo X. had entered into consultations about making war on him: and that at his return he made great preparations, especially by sea, for an invasion, as was supposed, either of Rhodes or Italy. But that he was prevented by death, while visiting the cities of Lérac. Ricaut.

(F) This is to be understood only of themselves, the Persians being in more esteem with other nations than the Turks; who bear them an implacable hatred ever since the time of Stâb Ismail.

(G) The external called Djebkâzîneh, containing the public money of the Musulmâns, which the Soltân himself cannot touch without danger of a rebellion, unless in the utmost necessity: Over this presides the Defterdâr, or high treasurer. Ich-khâzîneh, or the internal, is also called the imperial treasure; which is at the Soltân's disposal. Over this presides the Haznadâr Bâshi. Cant.

(H) That is, he has swam over the water. The name was given on account of an action of Bâ-yezîd II. who, being denied the purchase of the bridge there by the Pâshâ who erected it, swam over the torrent with great danger of his life; saying in verse, that it was better to be swallowed up by the waters, than to pass over the bridge of a sordid discourteous man. Cant.

(I) The Christian writers say, that he was struck with a cancer in his reins; which so corrupted his body by degrees, that he became loathsome both to himself and others. Ricaut.

(K) The Turks consider this as a judgment on Selim, for swearing that he would not draw back his foot till he had subdued the Persian empire. Cant.

(L) The Christian historians place his death in September, 1520, near the city of Chiurli.

(M) The Christian writers say he lived 46 years, and reigned eight. Ricaut.

A.D. 1520.

time, the emperor will know to morrow what passes in the chamber between man and wife: and a this diligence, to pry into people's behaviour, proved of so great service to the empire, that, during his absence in such remote expeditions as were undertaken by him, there happened no rebellion but what was stifled in the very birth.

Horrible cruelty.

In short, this Soltân would have merited immortal praise, if he had not, by his proneness to anger and cruelty, sullied the lustre of his virtues, and caused himself to be branded with the appellation of Yavuz (N). On which occasion, it may not be improper to relate one instance. Two years before his death, Turkomania (O) being infested with a robber, who, at the head of a considerable force attempted to become master of that and the neighbouring provinces; Selim sent against him Ferbâd Pâshâ, with great part of his forces: but before his arrival, the rebels had been routed by Ilbistân Beg Mehmed, son of Sheykh Savur. While the Pâshâ, not daring to return without the emperor's order, encamped about Amasia, a malicious slanderer, under the pretence of fidelity, tells him that a counterfeit Morâd, who pretended to be the son of Soltân Ahmed, had drawn the whole city to his side, with above 700 robbers. Ferbâd, without examining into the matter, acquaints the emperor with what he had heard, and desires his orders in this imminent danger. Selim, trusting perhaps to his general's prudence, commands, without any inquiry, that all the chief men of the country should be impaled. By this precipitate and cruel order, above 600 innocent persons of note suffered that infamous as well as horrible punishment; others were beheaded, and the rest dragged through the streets at the tails of horses.

Remarkable passages.

SELIM alone, of so many Turkish emperors, shaved his beard after he ascended the throne, contrary to the received custom, as well as the precepts of the Korân; by which the sons of princes are enjoined (or permitted) to do it before, but not afterwards. The Soltân being, on this occasion, gently and facetiously reproved one day by the Mufti, answered, that he did it to prevent his Wazîrs from having any thing to lead him by.

THE Turks relate of him, that he always had by him, or in his hand, a club, called Topûz (P); of which they say, this was the occasion. In the time of Bâ-yezîd, some provinces bordering on Persia, for peace sake, paid yearly to that emperor, by way of tribute, a certain number of carpets, called Chul. His father being dead, the governors of those provinces sent to know whether this slight tribute was to be continued or not. His answer was, Tell the infidel Kezilbâsh, or Red-head, that the father of the carpets is gone, and the father of the clubs (Q) is come in his room. The Turks are full of such stories of their Selim; which for brevity are omitted.

WE shall conclude with a passage from the Christian writers. They tell us, that Selim one day, during his last illness, leaning his head on the lap of Piri Pâshâ, whom he loved above all the rest, he said, O Piri, I see I must shortly die without remedy. The Pâshâ, taking this occasion, told him, he would do well to build an hospital for the relief of the poor, with the great wealth taken from the Persian merchants in several parts of his empire: the Soltân answered, Wouldst thou have me, Piri, bestow other men's goods, injuriously taken from them, on works of charity, for my own vain-glory? That I will never do: nay, rather see that they be restored to the right owners; which was done accordingly†.

† CANT. p. 172, & seq.

(N) As mentioned at the beginning of his reign. Prince Cantemir has transcribed some things relating to this Soltân from a most elegant, but scarce book, concerning Mohammed II. Bâ-yezîd II. Selim, and Soleymân, written by Ali Effendi. An author no less grave than studious of truth, and void of flattery, says the prince, by whom he is often mentioned.

(O) It may be questioned if this name be in the original Turkish author made use of by prince Cantemir. In case it be, by it must be understood the countries of Di- yârbekr and Armenia, subject not long before to the Turk-mâns of the Black and White Sheep.

(P) In his picture published in prince Cantemir's history, he is drawn with a Topûz in his hand, and resting on his shoulder.

(Q) The father of clubs is a phrase borrowed from the Arabs, signifying a man abounding with, or possessed of, any thing; as Abu'l Imam, the father of faith, or induced with faith; Altûn Babasî, the father of gold; that is, one abounding with money. Cant.

C H A P. XI.

The reign of Soleyman I. surnamed Kanûni.

S E C T. I.

Containing the taking of Rhodes, siege of Vienna, and wars of Hungary.

- a SOLEYMAN KANUNI (A) had scarce mounted his father's throne, when Gâzeli A. D. 1520.
Beg, made governor of Damaskus by Selim, revolts, with a design to render himself independent. With this view, raising forces, he suddenly besieges Hâlep; which was bravely defended by Koja Mostafa Pâshâ (B) till the arrival of Ferbâd Pâshâ. On this, Gâzeli Beg, too weak to oppose him, raises the siege, and encamps near Damaskus, in a place called Gazeli Beg Mustaba; which he strongly fortifies, in hopes the imperial army would be forced by the scarcity of corn, and season of the year, to march back: but Ferbâd, mindful of the emperor's order, follows him, and at length, contrary to the opinion of all, Sefer the 27th, 927, Hej. 927.
 attacks him in his fortified camp. There, after a fierce and doubtful fight for ten hours, all difficulties being surmounted, the whole rebel army, with their leader, is slain. After this the b conquering Pâshâ enters Damaskus, and appoints Ayâs Pâshâ Beglerbeg of the city.
 ASIA being now in peace, Soleyman resolves to turn his arms against the European princes, Belgrade in order to extend his dominions as far to the west of his capital, as it reached to the east: taken.
 and, that he might not be disturbed in the midst of his progress by commotions in other parts, he leaves to Ferbâd Pâshâ the care of Asia; sends one fleet into the Archipelago, and another into the Black Sea, consisting of 50 ships of war, with 400 transports to take care of the provisions for his intended expedition. These precautions being taken, he departs by land, with a great army, to subdue Hungary: but before he sets out, sends to Yabia Beg, son of Bali Beg, governor of Semendria, suddenly, with what forces he had, to besiege Belgrade, and hinder either provisions or a reinforcement to be thrown into the city. The Soltân, at length arriving, c encamps in the field called Zeknîn; from whence he detached Mostafa Pâshâ, and Ahmed Pâshâ, Beglerbeg of Rûm eli, or Thrace, with forces to assist Yabia Beg. These two generals, by battery and undermining, soon destroyed the walls, and so fatigued the besieged by hourly assaults, that at length they are forced to surrender, on the fifth of Ramazân (C), the bulwark of Hungary, which had often been attacked, but never taken before: and thus opened the way to Buda, capital of that kingdom.
 MEAN while Soleyman, with the rest of the army, took, partly by assault, partly by Ali Beg slain.
 capitulation, Burgaz (D) Burij, Tinuje, and Biugurdlen, over-running the adjacent country; which he made the seat of the future war. On his return to Constantinople, he receives advice, that Sheb Suvar Ogli, prince of Marâsh (E), was secretly preparing to shake off the Othmân
d yoke, when things were become ripe for rebellion. Hereupon he sends orders to Ferbâd Pâshâ to take off that prince's head. As it seemed dangerous to attempt this openly, the Pâshâ sends him a letter, telling him, he was by the Soltân appointed his assistant, and desiring he would come to consult with him about the public affairs. The prince, suspecting no deceit, falls into the snare; and, coming to Ferbâd's tent, is, with his two sons, put to death².

² CANT. p. 174, & seqq. & RICAUT, in Soleyman the Magnif.

(A) Kanûni is taken from the Greek word Kanonista, instituter of rules: for Soleyman instituted the written laws, which now subsist in the Othmân court and commonwealth; where affairs before were regulated almost intirely by custom, or rather the will of the Soltân. By reason of these institutions, he is, in the imperial library, painted with a book in his hand. He is by the Christian historians surnamed the Magnificent. Count Marfigli has published a translation, both in Italian and French, of the Kanûn Namch, so far as relates to the army and revenue, under the title of The Military State of the Othmân Empire. Printed at the Hague and Amsterdam, 1733, in folio, with cuts.

(B) That is, old Mostafa Pâshâ; though Koja, or Khoja, signifies also a person of gravity and wisdom.

(C) The Christian writers say, on the 20th of August, 1521.

(D) Formerly Pyrgos.

(E) A city near the Euphrates. This was Ali Beg, to whom Selim had given the country of Alaidulst, or Zulkad.r.

A. D. 1521.

Rhodes subdued:

Hejrah 928.

A. D. 1521.

SOLEYMAN having prepared a great fleet in 928, sends the Wazir Meslasi Pasha to Rhodes (or Rhodes), and follows himself in Ramazin. On his arrival, he closely presses the city, and surrounds it with strong works. In this siege were employed all the arts of assaulting and defending hitherto invented by the wit of man. Both parties fought for five months with such fury, as if the dispute had been for the empire of the world, rather than a single city. At length the Christians, exhausted with continual slaughters and watchings, are forced to surrender on the third of Safer the next year. This event was followed by the voluntary submission of the neighbouring islands Iskankioy (F) and Bairum ^a.

Forces there:

As the Christian historians have written copiously of this important place, we shall from them supply the deficiency of the Turkish. These authors tell us, that the damages committed by the galleys of Rhodes, within his dominions, determined Soleymân to reduce that place. With this view, he made great preparations; which alarming the grand master Philip de Villiers Lisle-adam, grand prior of France, he put himself into the best posture of defence he could: and, on a general muster, there were found to be at most between five and six thousand men in the city and villages able to bear arms. Among whom were 600 knights of the order, and 500 Candiots. ^b

ABOUT the middle of June a fire was made on the continent, and a galley sent to see what was the matter: but the captain refusing to land, one of the horse-men laid a letter on a stone by the water-side, and then rode away. It came from the Soltân, requiring Rhodes to be given up to him, with promises to grant them their religion and liberty in case they complied; and threatening destruction in case they refused. The Rhodians, now assured of Soleymân's designs, destroyed their suburbs and houses of pleasure, the grand master setting the example himself. The common people were also, by his order, brought into the town, with what provision they could get. ^c

The force of the Turks:

THE 26th, early, the Turkish fleet, to the number of 400 sail, great and small, with two hundred thousand men on board, sixty thousand of them pioneers, appearing in sight, the gates of the city were shut up. The vice-admiral bore directly towards the mouth of the port; but, seeing himself likely to be sunk by the guns from the bulwark on the left side, he passed on with the rest of the ships. While the Turks were landing, and making other preparations at Parambolin, a place about six miles from the town, the Rhodians sunk several deep sounds within the walls to discover the enemy's mines; and fortified their bulwarks with great ramparts. At the same time the grand master sent to Spain, Rome, and France, for assistance; but to no purpose, on account of the distractions at that time among the Christian princes. However, the brave Prejanes, governor of Khios, then under the power of the Rhodians, made a shift to get to the island; as did also Gabriel Martiningo, a famous engineer from Candia, by whose skill fifty-five mines were countermined during the siege ^d.

City described:

THE city of Rhodes lies to the north part of the island, by the sea-side, where it has two ports; one for galleys to the north, the other for ships to the east. It was inclosed with a very strong double wall; which had several fair gates, and was defended by five great bulwarks, thirteen fine towers, and very deep ditches. Without the walls, is a stony plain, not very broad, but of great length, bounded with hills, full of springs; which surround the city at some little distance, and were planted with olives, figs, and vines. ^e

THE city had not long been invested, before it was in danger of being fired by some Turkish women slaves; who being discovered, their ringleader was put to death. The enemy having possessed themselves of a hill directly over-against the place where the English knights were posted, began from thence to batter the place; and, under cover of their guns, opened their trenches, and fell to mining. But their pioneers, and those who guarded them, were so molested by the sallies of the garrison, that vast numbers of them being slain, they were forced to raise their mounts by night, and turn their artillery against the part from whence the Rhodians sallied.

Batteries
raised:

MEAN time, the Turkish soldiers being weary of the siege, as they were informed by some prisoners who were taken, Soleymân, at the request of Piri Pasha, on the 28th of August, came himself in person to the camp; and now they began to make their approach to the ditch by trenches; raising two vast mounts of earth, one opposite to the gate of Auvergne and Spain, the other against the gate of Italy. These were carried to the edge of the counterescarp, and advanced ten or twelve feet higher than the walls of the town. The trenches being finished, the several generals took their posts, each against a bulwark, and furiously battered the walls with their ordnance. Stones of a vast size were thrown into the city ^f

^a CANT. p. 177.^b History of the Siege in HAKLUYT. Collect. Voy. vol. ii. p. 72. Hist. Knights of St. John in THEVENOT's Trav. p. i. c. 72. RICAUT, in Soliman.(F) Or Ko, corruptly by the Greeks Eis ten Ko, as Isambol, from Eis ten polin. Cant. It is faultily printed in the text Iskankioy. It is in the maps called Stankio.

- a from twelve great mortars; and a battery of forty cannon, whereof twelve were basilisks, A. D. 1521. never ceased playing. But they did no great good with another planted against St. Nicholas's Tower, because much annoyed with the cannon of the city. However, Piri Pâshâ, after having had thirty two of his mines frustrated, on the fourth of August blew-up the English bul- English bul-bulwark, where several of that nation perished. The Turks attempted to enter by this breach, up: but were repulsed by the grand master and his party; when Mostafa Pâshâ coming on with fresh troops, renewed a most terrible fight. However, by the bravery of the women as well as men, the Turks were forced to retreat, with the loss of two thousand men: while the besieged had fifty knights of the order besides a few others, slain. The enemy had no better success in the second assault, which lasted three hours; wherein they lost as many men as in b the former, with three great officers. Piri Pâshâ also was beaten from a mount which he had taken, and from whence he battered the Italian bulwark, which was near to it, with seventeen pieces of cannon; whilst the mines formed against the French bulwark were all counter-mined^m.

- MOSTAFA*, to retrieve his credit with Soleyman, resolved on a third assault against the English bulwark, in concert with Abmed, a great officer, who was at the same time to attack Several the Spanish bulwark. But although many brave Englishmen lost their lives, and Prejanes was wounded in the furious conflict; yet Mostafa was baffled in his attempt. Abmed indeed won the top of the wall, and pitched the Turkish standard on it, yet he was quickly beaten out again. However, the enemy having, on the 23d of September, by their mines and battery c against the Auvergne bulwark, made a large breach, Soleyman resolved on another assault the next day: of which the grand master being informed by means of a Christian slave, he prepared his people to receive the enemy. The attack was made in five different places at once, with ten thousand Turks in each body: but they were opposed by the besieged of all ages and conditions, as well as of both sexes; who, with all kinds of destructive instruments, from the walls made great havock among them. The grand master was present every-where. After having taken all proper care of the Italian quarter, much distressed by Piri Pâshâ, he went to that of the English, hardly pressed by Mostafa. While he was there, a sudden cry was Spanish bul-heard, that the Spanish bulwark was lost; as in effect it was: for while the Spaniards, who wark lost, and guarded that bulwark, left it to assist the Spaniards posted to the right of it, who were briskly regained:
 d charged by Abmed, some Turks, who at the beginning of the assault, to avoid the shot, had hid themselves among the rubbish at the foot of the bulwark, took that opportunity to mount the wall, and quickly got possession of it. But they were scarcely warm in that post when the grand master, with a party of choice men, resolutely scaled it again; while Hugh Capon and Ménosius, both knights of the order, with a company of Candiots, broke into the bulwark by the gate, which the Turks had not yet bolted, and recovered it, after it had been two hours in the hands of the enemy. In short, the Turks being every-where put to the worst with great slaughter, Soleyman, after an assault of six hours, and the loss of 20,000 men, sounded a retreat: but was so enraged for this ill success, that he ordered Mostafa to be put to death, and Piri Pâshâ afterwards, for interceding for him. Both would have suffered, if the rest of e the great officers had not implored mercy for them. However, his admiral, because he could not hinder relief from coming to the city by sea, did not fare so well: for though by the mediation of Abmed he escaped death, yet he was removed, and whipped as a slave on board the admiral galley.

- SOLEYMAN*, discouraged with these losses, would have raised the siege, but that he was per- Soleyman suaded by his favourite Ibrahim to continue it. Being thus resolved, he began to build a stately discouraged.
 palace on Mount Philermus, in sight of the city; during which time, several letters were shot with arrows into the town, disclosing many of the Soltân's counsels; and intimating the designed revolt of a great man, supposed to have been Mostafa: but he having been soon after made governor of Egypt, in the room of Kayser Beg, deceased, they received no more letters from f the camp. Mean while, if the besieged had friends in the enemy's camp, the enemy did not want them in the town: for first a Jew physician, employed as a spy, gave them notice of the state of the place by letters; and then they were encouraged by the advice of Sir Andrea Treachery of De Amiral, a Portuguese, prior of Castile, chancellor of the order, and one of the principal Amiral:
 lords of the council. This traitor, disgusted that De Villiers should be preferred to the grand-mastery before him, betrayed the weak condition of the place to the Soltân; informing him that the besieged were quite spent, and promising him an easy conquest if he staid but a few days longer, and attacked the town in the place which he directed to. This notice was given by a letter or letters, tied to an arrow, and shot into the Turkish camp; in doing which, his servant was detected, and being examined, confessed the whole affairⁿ.

^m Hist. of the Siege in HAKLUYT. Collect. Voy. &c. ubi supr.

ⁿ Ibid.

A. D. 1522.

A great breach :

FOR all this, it being now the month of October, the bad weather which came on, so much a incommoded both the army and fleet, that Soleyman was at his wit's end, when Abmed encouraged him to continue the siege, by promising in a short time to open a way into the city. To accomplish this, he never left attacking the outer wall of the Auvergne quarter, till he had made himself master of it; after which he raised a strong pent-house against the town-wall, and fell to undermining it. This struck a great damp upon the spirits of the Rhodians, who yet destroyed many of the Turks at their work: however, the latter prevailing by numbers, at last beat down the wall; so that the besieged had no better shift left than to labour day and night in raising a new one.

General assault :

THESE advantages gained, Soleyman prepared for one general assault more on the last day of November. The Turks, with colours flying, and great shouts, hastened towards the breach, and b advanced to St. Ambrose Gate, while the fleet made a shew of attacking the city from the sea:
but the besieged, preferring death to the thoughts of captivity, behaved so gallantly, that the Turks, notwithstanding their fierce attacks, were forced to retreat. However, stung with the scoffs flung at them by the Rhodians on that occasion, and disdaining to be so treated by a handful of men, they returned to the charge with greater fury than before; yet at last were obliged to march back, after leaving five thousand more dead behind them.

Turks gain ground :

AFTER this defeat, they applied themselves to make trenches through the rubbish of the walls, in order that way to get into the city, and demolish the new-raised countermure, and other barricades. In effect, they made such progress with their mattocks and pickaxes, at the same time continually skirmishing with the besieged, that they soon obliged them to pull c down several houses, in order to erect new fortifications, and dig new trenches (G). Thus they found the city daily going from them, and themselves pent up into less room, the enemy having by this time gained within the town almost 200 paces in breadth, and 150 in length.

A parley required :

SOLEYMAN, though now assured of carrying the place, at the persuasion of Abmed and Kassi, sent Jerom Monelia, a Genoese, to parley with the Rhodians: but as his orders were to deliver this message in private to Mathias De Via, his countryman, Farnovius, one of the knights, ordered him forthwith to depart. Yet, soon after, the grand master, at the earnest solicitations of the people, was forced to send ambassadors to Soleyman, to know for what end he had sent to require a parley: but the Soltân in a great heat, as if he had known nothing of the matter, said there was no such thing; and sent them back with a letter to the grand d master and citizens, advising them to make trial of his clemency; with a promise of liberty and goods, in case they submitted. The grand master was for fighting it out to the last, in defence of their faith and honour. With him some others joined, out of distrust that the Turks would not keep their articles with them: but the majority were for putting it to a trial, rather than occasion the destruction of so many people.

The city surrendered :

HOWEVER, the grand master broke up the assembly without coming to a final resolution; only promising to take care of their welfare: but next morning, finding by Prejanes, that the enemy had so shaken and battered their works, that the city could not possibly be long defended, it was by general consent agreed to deliver the same up; and a truce was accordingly settled for four days. Mean time, a ship arrived from Candia, with wines, and one e hundred volunteers, unknown to the Venetians, then in league with the Turks; who, in great numbers approaching the walls of Rhodes, Favorinus ordered a whole tire of cannon to be fired against them. The enemy, justly offended at this breach of the truce, advanced through the ruins of the breaches into the city, as far as the rampiers and barricadoes, to revenge the injury; but were valiantly driven back. However, the Rhodian ambassadors, then in the Othmân camp, must have been torn in pieces by the enemy, had it not been for the Turkish hostages in the town: but on the arrival of two burgeses in the camp, with the terms of surrender, all was presently quiet.

Le Villiers honoured :

SOLEYMAN having agreed to all the articles (H), the grand master, by Abmed's advice, went in a mean habit to prostrate himself before the Soltân, attended with a few knights of the f order. Having waited at the tent door in the rain most part of the day, he was clothed with a rich robe, and then introduced. Soon after, he was admitted to kiss the hand of Soleyman, who would have had him to become his vassal: but Le Villiers declining it with a modest boldness, which pleased the Soltân, he was sent back to the city with honour. A few days after, when Soleyman visited the place, the grand master would have prostrated himself before him; but the Soltân took him up, and called him Father. Likewise, when he went to desire

(G) The Rhodians had 1500 Turkish slaves in the town; who, on this, and other occasions, did them great service.

(H) These were, that the churches should remain in the hands of the Christians: that no children should be taken from their parents: that none should be forced to change his religion: that such as would, might remain in the city without paying tribute for five years; and that the rest, with their goods, should be shipped for Candia, with as many cannon as they pleased, within a reasonable time.

leave

a leave to depart, he was received so very courteously, that Soleyman, turning to Ibrahim Pâshâ, A. D. 1522. said, Truly, I cannot but be troubled to see this unfortunate old man driven out of his own habitation, departing so heavily from hence. The Soltân entered the city in triumph on Christmas-day, 1522.

DURING the siege of Rhodes, Khair Beg, governor of Egypt, happening to die, Jumun-Kaishuf, (an Arab Shейkh, who had submitted to Selim), by his speeches and presents persuades all the people of Egypt unanimously to attempt to shake off the Othmân yoke. Soleyman hearing of these transactions, sends his Wazîr Mostafa Pâshâ, with five ships, into Egypt; who, arriving in a few days at Eskanderiya, surprises the rebels unprepared, and entirely routing them, restores the country to its former state. But as it took him up time to settle affairs, and collect Khair Beg's riches, which were very great, Soleyman, to whom the whole administration of the government seemed too great a burthen, made Ibrahim Aga, from a common Janizary, prime Wazîr.

MOSTAFA, who thought his late victory deserved rather an addition of honour, than an affront, was grieved at this promotion: but concealing his resentment, as if intirely ignorant of what had been done, sends an account of his proceedings to Rhodes, and requests the government of Egypt, as a reward for all his past services. Soleyman readily grants his petition, telling him, he reserved nothing to himself, but the royal name and coin. Mostafa, thus invested with so great power, and enriched with Khair Beg's treasures, as well as the effects of the proscribed rebels, resolves to subject all Egypt to his dominion. This design he imparts to Mehemmed Effendi, scribe of the Divân (I); and makes him Wazîr, as thinking him a man of sense, and his particular friend: but Mehemmed detesting his lord's treachery, endeavours, with some accomplices, to kill him when he was bathing; while Mostafa, informed of the danger by a trusty servant, escapes through a back-door, and flies with a few attendants to the Shейkh of the Arabs. By the Shейkh's assistance, he quickly assembles a large force, and wages war with the scribe; whom, for his want of experience, he despised. Mean time, Mehemmed having acquainted Soleyman with what had passed, obtained as a reward the government of Egypt; and encouraging the foldiers with a large sum of money, leads them against Mostafa, defeats him after a bloody battle, and cuts off his head.

SOLEYMAN, to make his new Wazîr Ibrahim Pâshâ more faithful, in the year 930, gives him his sister in marriage; and whilst he is gracing the nuptials with his presence, the joy is doubled by the Soltâna being delivered of a son, who was named Selim. Shortly after, the Wazîr departs, with some gallies, to settle the affairs of Egypt. Being driven by a storm into Rhodes, he there leaves his ships, and goes by land to Kayro: where, by his authority, dispersing the rebels, and seizing the ringleaders, the sons of Amar and Bekaar (K), he orders them to be hanged, and their estates confiscated. As among their effects was found a great quantity of gold, he coins dukats, like those of Venice, but less in value by thirty aspers; which still bear the name of Ibrahim. After this, delivering up the government to Soleyman Pâshâ (*), he returns to Constantinople.

THE next year, the Soltân resumes the war against Hungary; and with a great army, on the 30th of Rajeb, comes to Belgrade. Then crossing the Save, proceeds towards Buda, taking in his march Suliuk and Osek (L); whose bridge over the Drave he orders to be demolished. Soon after, the Hungarians coming thither with the same design, and seeing the work already done, they are seized with fear, as it convinced them that the Turks had passed the river, with a resolution to conquer or die. Their king Ladash (M), to prevent the devastation of his country, marching with incredible speed, incamps in sight of the Turkish army, in a place called Mohaj (N). Next day, being the first of Ziulkadeh, both armies engage, and contend the whole day with such fierceness, that it was difficult to perceive to which side victory would incline. At length, the king being slain in the battle, about sun-set, the Hungarians take to flight, and the rest, with their camp, become a prey to the Othmâns.

THIS is the Turkish account, which receives a good deal of light from that of the Christian historians. According to them, Soleyman was marched with 200,000 men as far as Sofia, before the Hungarians had any suspicion of his design. Being straitened for want of time, they were not able to raise above 25,000 forces; yet not only the generality of the foldiers were

° History of the Siege in HAKLUYT. Collect. Voy. &c. ubi supr. p. 177, & seqq.

P CANT. p. 180.

° Ibid.

(I) Divân Kyatibi. Every Pâshâ has such an officer, whose business is to read the complaints delivered in writing to his Divân. The prime Wazîr has two secretaries. Cant.

(K) Both mentioned in the life of Selim I.

(*) He was the admiral of the Egyptian fleet, who submitted to Selim.

(L) Osseck, or Eseck, where there is a famous bridge over a marsh three miles long.

(M) This was not Ladislâus, as prince Cantemir asserts; but Lewis II. king of Hungary.

(N) Or Mohatz. Prince Cantemir, in the note, calls it Mohatz.

A. D. 1525.  for fighting, but Tomoreus, archbishop of Colossa, their general, by vain arguments, insisted a on engaging the enemy, before the Vayvod of Transilvania had joined them with his horse. The wiser sort of the officers thought it madness to hazard a battle with such a handful of men, and dissuaded the young king Lewis from venturing his person : but nothing would do with the foldiers without his presence.

severely punished.

BEING arrived at Mobatz, Balibenes, who commanded the Turkish van, consisting of 20,000 horse, divided them into four bodies, and so continually skirmished with the Hungarians, that they could not get to the Danube for water. This laying Tomoreus under a necessity of fighting, he drew up his army in no bad order, and barricadoed his tents with waggons. But alas! the Hungarians were overthrown in the first encounter by the multitude of enemies ; who slew their general, with many other prelates and nobles. Then attacking b their camp, while the few body-guards were engaged to little purpose, king Lewis fled, and was unfortunately drowned in a filthy ditch, into which his horse had plunged him. Of all the Hungarian army only a few horsemen escaped ; the rest being slain in this fatal battle, fought the 29th of October, 1526. When the seven bloody heads of the bishops and nobility were presented to Soleymân, he much pitied the hard fate of the young king ; saying, he came not to take the kingdom from him, but to revenge former injuries received from the Hungarians ^c.

Buda taken.

AFTER this victory, Soleymân marches directly to Buda ; which, dispirited by the late slaughter, is easily taken, the third of Ziulbijeb ; and next Pestthe, opposite to it on the Danube, voluntarily surrenders. He then runs a bridge over that river, and sends his troops c in parties after the Hungarians escaped out of the late battle, who had killed several Turks, dispersed over the fields in search of prey ; and by this means clears the country of those enemies (O). Winter approaching, he returns ; taking in the way, by assault, Baj, on the Danube, with Seghedin and Titeli, on the Tisa.

Rebellion in Asia.

Hejrah, 933.
A. D. 1526.

MEAN time, a false report of his death being spread in Asia, many free-booters belonging to the country of Zuulkadîr (P), miserably harrassed all the neighbouring provinces. They were opposed indeed by Piri Pâshâ, governor of Adâna, who killed many, and put to death all he took : but for want of sufficient force, could not suppress the rebellion. Kalendar Beg, son of Haji Bektaşh (Q), rejected all offers that were made him : but the Wazîr, Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, being sent over with a good army, finds the arch-rebel at Kaysariya ; and after d a bloody conflict, defeats him, and kills above 30,000 of the plunderers.

Religious disturbance.

Hej. 934.
A. D. 1527.

NEXT year begins with religious disturbances : for one Kabîzi Agem, a man of great learning among the Turks, being well versed in the law and several sciences, publicly maintained, that the Christian religion stood on a firmer foundation than the Mohammedan. When he could not be brought by private admonitions to recant, they carried him before the Mûfti ; where, by arguments, he endeavoured to prove the gospel more excellent, for its precepts, than the Korân. On this, he was again admonished to abandon his opinions : but disregarding both admonitions and threats, he is at length, by the Soltân's command, punished with the loss of his head ; and an edict was published, that whoever should, even by way of dispute, prefer the doctrine of Christ before that of Mohammed, should undergo the same penalty. e

Unjust punishment.

ABOUT the same time, some Albanian thieves at Constantinople, breaking into a Christian merchant's house near Selim's temple (R), murder him, and carry away his goods as well as money. Next day, complaint is made to the Divân : but as the names of the persons were not discovered, and it appeared from Constantinople, that many were concerned in the fact, the Soltân ordered, that all the Albanians, whether inhabitants, or only sojourners on account of trade, should be seized, and to a man put to death (S). While this butchery was acting at Constantinople, a great quarrel arose at Halep, between the ecclesiastical judges (T) ; which

* RICAUT, in Soleymân.

(O) The Christian writers say, that he ravaged all the country between the rivers Raab and Theyse, destroying or carrying into slavery 150,000 people.

(P) It is falsely written by the Christian authors Dulkadir, by changing the Zal into Dal. Cant. [Rather the Arabic dhâl is pronounced by the Turks, after the Persians, like z : thus, for Ramadhân they pronounce, and thence sometimes write, Ramazân. Note, the dhâl, dh, sounds like the English th in these, that, &c.]

(Q) Who Haji Bektaşh was is unknown. But the Turks own, that his son Kalender brought the Othmân affairs to such extremities, that the empire seemed on the brink of destruction : for all Turky in Asia, being at once subdued by him, acknowledged him for sovereign. Cant.

(R) It stands on the mount, which hangs over the gate Fenar, and is a master-piece of elegance and art. The architect was a Greek ; who built a still more stately one at Adrianople. Cant.

(S) It is a law among the Turks, that if one thousand and one men tumultuously kill any person, and refuse to confess who gave the first blow, they shall all be put to death. Prince Cantemir saw an instance of this, in the case of eleven Janizaries, who having, when drunk, killed a great peasant, not far from the city, were, next day, all put to death for it.

(T) The Molla and Kaziler. The Molla are the judges of principal cities and towns ; the Kaziler, that is, the Kadis, are those of the lesser towns (and villages). The Molla also may be compared to an archbishop, the Kadi to a bishop. Cant. Oth. Hist. Note p. 31.

- a daily increasing, the citizens, to put an end to it, kill them all in the very Jâmi at morning prayers. Soleyman being informed of this, orders some Pâshâs to march thither with their forces, and put all the inhabitants, guilty or not guilty, to death: but, by the intercession of Ibrahim Pâshâ, the chief men and heads of the conspiracy only were executed, with various kinds of punishments; and the common people, as persons rather seduced than guilty, banished to Rhodes.

- LET us now return to the affairs of Hungary. John Sepurvias, Vayvod of Transilvania, arriving with his troops after the battle of Mohatz, so practised with the nobility, that at length they chose him their king. But Ferdinand, archduke of Austria, newly elected king of the Romans, in right of his wife Ann, sister to the late king Lewis, entering the country, first takes Buda (U), and then routs king John; who, not able to withstand so potent an enemy, flies into Poland. There, to retrieve his fortune, he resolves to apply to Soleyman, by the advice of Jerom Laskus, a person of great reputation and abilities; who, undertaking the embassy, by his arguments, joined to a promise of doing homage and paying tribute, so gained on the grand Wazîr Ibrahim, and the other Pâshâs, that the Soltân agreed to support John's interest. Accordingly, in the year 935, he marches with a great army, and incamps in a spacious plain near Filibeb (X): but all the warlike provisions being destroyed by long and lasting rains, which, swelling the torrents, endangered his whole army (Y), he is forced to defer his intended expedition. However, making fresh preparations, he, the next year, marches to Buda (Z); and having battered the walls with his engines, the garrison, weakened by continual assaults, surrender the city, on condition of having their lives and arms. But the Turks reviling them for cowardice as they were going out, one of the soldiers stabbed a Janizary, who was reproaching him. The rest cry out, the articles are violated (A); and against the Soltân's order, fell on the Germans, who were all put to the sword before the tumult could be appeased.

- THE Christian writers say, this was done by Soleyman's orders, on the following occasion. They tell us, that after the governor Thomas Nadaști, an Hungarian of great accomplishments, had done all that a man could do for defence of the place, the German garrison would no longer obey him: but seizing him, agreed to yield up the city, on condition that they might march away with their baggage. But, when they were, to the number of 700, ready to depart, and the Janizaries about to unbind the governor, in order to let him go likewise; Soleyman, being informed of the garrison's treachery, in detestation of their behaviour, commanded them all to be slain. At the same time, he offered the governor preferments, and on his declining to accept of any, courteously discharged him.

WHILE Soleyman staid a few days in the neighbourhood to refresh his army, Tutuk Lagottiță Moldavia (B) arrives in embassy from Bogdân (C), prince of Moldavia, and the people, to offer the Soltân both Moldavias (D), as a fief to the Othmân empire, on honourable conditions; particularly, that their religion should be preserved intire. Soleyman, readily accepting of the terms, confirms them with his own hand; and in his return from that year's expedition, is met near

* CANT. p. 180. & seqq.
& RICAUT, in Soleyman.

† LEUNCL. & RICAUT, in Soleyman.

‡ CANT. p. 185.

§ LEUNC.

(U) In the Turkish historian used by prince Cantemir, this city is said to have been taken by the emperor of Germany, who seems to be confounded with the king of the Romans. The emperor is in the text called Alaman Kîrali (that is, Krâl, or king of the Almains). On which occasion the author observes, that at present, the Turks honour the emperor with the title of Memche Karali, king of the Germans, and Khusar, which is, Cæsar: also Ruma Impera duri. Cant.

(X) Philippe i.

(Y) This is said, in the text, to have happened as a punishment for Soleyman's having that day, without cause, reproached and deposed the Mufti. On which occasion, prince Cantemir observes, that the Turks of all nations are most given to superstition, and pay the greatest veneration to ecclesiastics.

(Z) With an army of 115,000 men, according to the Christian writers.

(A) As the Turks cannot deny these frequent breaches of capitulations, they lay hold of any pretence to excuse themselves. Thus, if but an ax or knife be found on any soldier of a garrison, which is to march out without arms, they cry, the articles are violated, and use them with great severity. The like they do, when allowed their arms, in case they defer marching a little beyond the appointed hour: so that it is better for Christians to die within the walls, than trust to the Turks. Cant. This maxim will not hold, since, were it to be granted that the Turks have violated some capitulations, yet it must be confessed they have kept others; and Christians should not give them any occasion.

(B) Of the noblest Moldavian race, from which 500 families derive their original. He spoke several languages to perfection; was wise and learned. He built a palace at Constantinople; which is called Bogdân Saray, the Moldavian palace. Cant.

(C) This is a Sclawonic name, and answers to Deodatus. The Moldavians surnamed him Negrul, or Black. He was the son of Stephen the Great; who, after a reign of forty-seven years and five months, filled with glorious exploits, advised his only son Bogdân, and his nobles, to submit his kingdom as a fief to Soleyman, rather than contend with his power; which Bogdân did in the seventh year of his reign. Cant.

(D) The upper and the lower. To the latter formerly belonged Bessarabia, called by the Tatars, Bujâk. Jassi is the capital of the whole; whither the Despots removed their seat from Soczana, after the taking of Constantinople by the Turks. Cant.

A. D. 1529. Sofia, a city of Servia, by Bogdân, accompanied by some of his barons, by whom he was a presented with 4000 gold crowns, 40 bred mares, and 24 falcons, as a yearly present, in token of his feudal subjection. Hereupon, the Soltân again ratifies the agreement, gives him a larger Kukka (E), adorned with jewels, with a Khilaat Fabireh (F), and a horse with all the imperial trappings. Moreover, he orders four of his guard to attend (G) him ^y.

Vienna
besieged:

SOLEYMAN having refreshed his army, resolves to besiege Vienna, the capital of Austria. To this end, he sends before him Abmed, with the volunteer horse; who piercing as far as Lintz, destroy all the country, with innumerable inhabitants. The Soltân follows, and in his march takes the castle of Alconburg: but in vain attacks Neustadt seven times in one day. On the 26th of September, he arrives before Vienna; and with his huge army, encamps in five places round the city, so that it not being possible for Frederic, duke of Bavaria, who was general b of king Ferdinand's forces, to throw in any supplies, he staid at Chresme, about 12 miles distant. However, there were in the city 20,000 horse and foot, under the command of Philip, palgrave of the Rhine; and great need there was of such a force, the place was so badly fortified. In the second sally, seven officers being taken prisoners, Soleymân asked, whether those who had the command of the city intended to defend it against his mighty power? Zirlitz answered, that Ferdinand would certainly give him battle, as soon as the German forces, which he waited for at Lintz, were arrived: and that he knew the besieged were resolved to hold out to the last.

Affaulted in vain.

SOLEYMAN dissembling his concern, gave them their liberty, with a promise of great favour to the citizens, provided they submitted; and threatening ruin to them in case they did not. c Finding they did not comply, he began to batter the city with small field pieces, whilst the great guns were coming up the Danube: but they were happily sunk, with the vessels which brought them, by the brave Wolfgang Hoder. However, another part of the Turkish fleet reaching Vienna, broke up all its bridges, and blocked it up on that side also. Hereupon, the enemy fell to mining, which was carried on in fifteen different places; but they were all countermined, with the loss of 8000 Turks buried alive or slain. For all this, having had the good luck to bring one mine to perfection, they blew up a great part of the wall, near the gate of Carinthia; but were repulsed there with great loss, as well as in two other furious attacks at another breach made not far off by the springing of a mine.

The siege
raised

ABOUT the same time, the besieged, in a sally, cut off 5,300 of the enemy; yet, October d the 15th, they made a general assault with all their forces; in which succeeding no better than before, Soleymân, next day, sent some of his chief prisoners to acquaint the citizens, that he did not come to besiege Vienna, but to revenge the injuries done him by Ferdinand: and that, in case they would submit to him, he would not molest them, nor enter into their city. But finding that they disdained his proposal, he raised the siege, and barbarously slew all his prisoners. Besides this, the besieged suffered very little loss; while of the Turks were slain, as was computed, eighty thousand men. Soleymân, having drawn off with his army, restored the kingdom of Hungary to king John, to be held by him as his vassal ^z.

by German address.

THIS is the account given by the Christian historians: but the Turks ascribe their Soltân's ill success to the deceit of the Germans. They tell us, that after battering the city for 40 e days, and blowing-up part of the walls, he commanded his men to enter the breaches: but, as often as they attempted it, they were repulsed by the valour of the garrison. However, they must at length have yielded, if they had not by fraudulent promises deceived the politic Soleymân himself: for, by their ambassador, owning themselves exhausted, and promising to become his vassals, they desire a truce; but prolong it under various pretences, till the time of the autumnal rains; which fell suddenly in such abundance, that the Turks, after some faint assaults, were obliged to retire. His army being now, by their losses (H), inferior to that of the enemy, and incumbered with a great number of captives of both sexes, he ordered them all to be massacred in his presence; and then striking his tents, gets with his forces

^y CANT. p. 186.

^z RICAUT, ubi supr.

(E) A crest, or ornament for the head, made of ostrich feathers; with which only are adorned the Buluk Agalari, or Tribunes; the Segbân Basbi, who is next to the Aga of the Janizaries; and the princes of Moldavia and Walakhia. CANT. From hence possibly comes our word cockade.

(F) It is the first of the three sorts of robes of honour.

(G) This custom is still observed, whenever the prince of Moldavia goes to the Othmân court; neither Pâshâs nor Wazîrs in general being created with so much pomp. CANT.

(H) Other Turkish historians say, the Soltân lost 40,000 men in the siege; and therefore bound his successors by a curse, never to attack Vienna for the future. And the Turks do not scruple to affirm, that their defeat before Vienna, in the last century, was intirely owing to their treading the ground forbidden by Soleymân's curse. CANT.

a to Buda, before his retreat was known. There receiving of the Vayvod (I) of Transylvania A. D. 1529. the tenths of the tribute he had raised in Hungary, he confirms him in his principality.

In a few days after, he returns to Constantinople, and celebrates the circumcision of his three sons, Mostafa, Mohammed, and Selím; at which were present not only all the Wazírs, and Páshás of the empire, but also the ambassadors of Persia and the Christian princes. It was followed by a splendid entertainment. At the Soltán's table sat the Mústí and Kazío' laşker on his right hand (K); and on his left his Hoja; at a second table were the Wazírs; at a third the Páshás, and at a fourth sat the Ulema, or learned in the law. There was a separate table for the foreign ambassadors, among whom the Persian and German (L) had the precedence. But his mirth was disturbed by a sudden message, that Firandos (M) king of the Chekki (N), thinking him taken up with those affairs, had besieged Buda, and for twenty-seven days attacked it with all his forces. The Janízaries making a brave defence, gave Mehemmed Beg, son of Yabia Páshá, governor of Semendria, time to come to their relief with the forces of his Sanják: but as he found himself too weak, he spread a report among some prisoners, that he was Ibrahim Páshá, the prime Wazír, and that the Soltán with the rest of the army, would arrive in three days. The captives being suffered to escape, as was designed, repaired to the camp of the Christians with the news; which struck them with such terror, that they fled (O), leaving their cannon and other warlike provisions behind them.

SOLEYMAN, to be revenged for this affront, in 938, invades the king of the Chekki, with a great army, destroying the country before him with fire and sword. Firandos meets him with no inconsiderable army, and bravely maintains the fight for some time: but he is at last routed, and obliged to fly to Gradiska, the place of his residence (P). This victory not only added above 20 cities and towns to the Othmán empire, but so terrified the petty princes of the Sclavi and Hirvati (Q), that they voluntarily submitted to *Soleyman*².

THE whole transactions of this expedition are so very differently related by the Christian writers, that they seem to be treating of quite another affair. According to them, Soleyman, not being able to digest his disgrace before Vienna, and being withal continually solicited by John, king of Hungary, quickly after the circumcision of his sons, raises a vast army. Mean time, king Ferdinand, apprehensive that it was designed against him, sent ambassadors to Soleyman, who was then in Servia, to treat of peace; but could receive no answer. However, the emperor Charles V. who was now in Germany, beginning to take the matter upon himself, prepared to raise all the forces he could in Germany, Spain, and Italy. Mean time, king John, upon the approach of the Turkish army towards Semendria, thought it a fit time to besiege Gran. But although Aloysio Gritti destroyed most of the fleet sent by Ferdinand down the Danube to its relief, yet he could not take the city.

SOLEYMAN arriving in fifty-six days march at Belgrade, sent a great number of horse over the Sava, into Hungary, and marched himself directly for Stiria. Being come to the little town of Gunz, where Nicholas Jurischitz was governor; the prime Wazír Ibrahim, desirous to save so brave a man, and formerly his intimate acquaintance, when ambassador at Constantinople,

² CANT. p. 192, & seqq.

(I) He is called by the Transilvanians their Bah. Vayvod (or Waywood) is a Sclavonic word, signifying the general of an army; but by the Poles is given to governors of provinces, as Vayvod Kioveski, &c. The Turks call by the same name the Christian princes of Moldavia and Walakhia, who are tributary to them; although formerly the princes of Moldavia had the title of Tekkiur, or king. Sometimes the governors of large cities, who are not Páshás, are called Vayvodes: as Pera Vayvodesi, Galata Vayvodesi, &c. Cant.

(K) Kiemal Pascha Zade was Mústí, and Kadri Chelebi Kazio' laşker, Muhi illo'ddin Chelebi, his preceptor. This custom of sitting at table with the Soltán began to be disused under this Soleyman; and at present he suffers no man to sit at table with him. Cant.

(L) The diversions on this occasion are described in a letter to Dav. Chytrens; particularly the fight between a lion and hog. "Wild beasts," says the writer, "also fought. Among the rest, a hog, brought from the German ambassador's house, so battled it with three lions, one after the other, that if he had not been tied by one leg, he would perhaps have gotten the better, and put them to flight. It is certain, he received the last in so rough a manner with his snout, that he tumbled him over and over, and made him shamefully run away, to the great confusion of the "Turks, who compare themselves to lions, and the Christians, especially the Germans, to hogs." See Lonic. Chron. Tusc. tom. ii. at the end.

(M) Ferdinand, at that time king of Hungary and Bohemia.

(N) So the Turks call the Bohemians.

(O) Some Turkish historians, of little authority, say, the city was relieved after another manner. The Germans having beaten the Turks from a bulwark, and entered the gate, a Jewish woman tears off the sleeve of her shift, and lighting it, fires off a great gun; which so astonished the enemy, and made such a slaughter, that the Turks had time to recover themselves, and repulse the Germans. The gun was afterwards, by Soleyman, bound with a silver circle like a crown, and the woman, with her whole family, declared free from tribute. Cant.

(P) Gradiska, which is a noted town of Sclavonia, seems erroneously to be made the seat of Ferdinand; since no Christian writer mentions his having resided there any time. Cant.

(Q) These are one and the same nation. However, the Turks call them Hirvati, who are under the dominion of the Christians; while those who are Mohammedans, or obey the Othmán power, are named Serbadi, that is, people of the borders. Cant.

A. D. 1532. did all he could to induce him to surrender the place. On his refusal, the Turks fell to mining, and overthrew the walls in three places; but in spite of their fierce assaults, cannon, and huge mounts, the besieged repaired the breaches, as strong as ever they were. Ibrahim, finding all their efforts baffled, after a siege of 28 days, to save the Soltân's reputation, advised him to send for the governor, and, as it were of his own bounty, to bestow the town upon him. Jurischitz being much wounded, and having but one third part of 800 soldiers left, gladly got quit of the enemy, by setting up one of Soleymân's banners on the chief tower of the city, and admitting a captain, with ten Janizaries; who, after a short visit, returned to the camp.

Carinthia
invaded.

SOLEYMAN leaving Gunz, with an army of 500,000 men (as appeared from the report of some prisoners, and Ferdinand's ambassadors), and 300 small field pieces, but no cannon, marched towards Carinthia, with a design only to ravage the country, and avoid fighting the enemy. Kassan had been detached before that with 15,000 horse on the like occasion, and did incredible mischief: but on his return, finding himself beset on all sides, slew 4000 of his prisoners; and then, dividing his forces into two bodies, endeavoured to escape by night. The party under Ferises, cutting their way with incredible labour through thick woods, got safe to the grand army then in Stiria: but Kassan being met near the valley of Staramberg by the general of the German princes, with 12,000 men, two of them horse, and some field pieces, was slain, with a great number of his soldiers. Those who remained, falling afterwards in the way of other troops, were all cut off, to the number of 8000.

Soleymân
retreats.

THE emperor, who was now at Lintz, being able to get no intelligence of the motions of the Turks, marched to Vienna; where, on a general review, he found his army to consist of 260,000 men, of which near one half were veteran troops. There in a field, with king Ferdinand his brother, he waited in expectation of the mighty host of the Othmâns: but Soleymân, being informed of their strength, and manner of encampment, thought it not fit to hazard a battle; but returned the same day to Belgrade, with 30,000 captives, besides what had been slain. The emperor, instead of pursuing his advantage against king John, as his brother desired, returned to Italy; leaving behind, however, all the Italians, who returned soon after^b.

Koron taken,

WHILE the emperor Charles was thus employed by land, his admiral Andrea Doria, with a fleet of 35 tall ships and 48 galleys, on board of which were 25,000 old soldiers, sailed with a design to annoy the Turks in the Peloponnesus or Morea: but the Venetian fleet refusing to join him, because the league had been renewed between Soleymân and the republic, it gave the Turkish fleet an opportunity to get out of the bay of Ambracia, and retire to the strong port of Kalcide. Upon this, Doria sailing for Koron, besieged it both by sea and land. Soon after there arrived some Turkish forces to relieve the place: but being defeated by count Sarne, and their general slain, the enemy, wearied with assaults, and falling in want of necessaries, surrendered the city, on condition of liberty to depart with their baggage.

and Patras.

FROM Koron, Doria sailed to Patras; which he easily took, and pillaged: for the Turks, distrusting the strength of it, had intrenched themselves near the castle; which they also surrendered on the like terms. After this, he took the castles Rhium and Malykreum, opposite each other, in the gulph of Lepanto. The artillery taken in the first, some of them vastly big, were valued at 70,000 ducats. Doria having performed these exploits, returned towards

A. D. 1533.

Genoa. But in the beginning of the year 1533, Koron being besieged both by sea and land by the Turks, Doria hastened thither again. At his approach they retired, the fleet sailing to Modon, whither Doria followed, to provoke them to fight; which they not thinking fit to do, he retired to Messina in Sicily.

Koron abandoned.

THE winter following, the Spaniards and Greeks in Koron, beginning to want provisions, desired their governor to lead them out against the enemy; chusing rather to die in battle than by hunger. Hereupon Macikaus, much against his will, went with them to surprise the city of Andrussa: but the Turks being 5000 strong, made such resistance, that Macikaus, endeavouring to break in at a postern, was slain, with several of his men. The rest retreated to Koron, where the plague beginning to rage not long after, the Spaniards, with some Greeks, embarked with their cannon, and left the town to be repossessed by the enemy^c.

The Morea ravaged.

WHAT the Christian historians relate concerning Koron is applied to Modon by the Turkish writers; who, passing over this transaction lightly, only tell us in a few words, that the Ifrenj (or Italians), assisted by other princes, having with a great fleet miserably laid waste the Morea, and taken Modon, Mehemmed Beg, who, from being governor of Semendria, was made Begler Beg of that province, hastens thither with his forces; and besieging the city, on a sudden a presses it so closely, that the enemy, despairing of relief, surrender it, on condition to be allowed A. D. 1536. to march off^d.

^b LEUNCL. & RICAUT. ubi supr.

^c Ibid.

MEAN time, king John being solicited by his subjects to let Hungary, for sake of peace, devolve to king Ferdinand and his heirs, Soleymân sent Gritti, son of the doge of Venice, in Transilvania a very magnificent manner, to be his lieutenant in that kingdom, and see that his vassal king John did nothing without his consent. Gritti entered Transilvania, then a province of Hungary, attended by 7000 persons; among whom were Urbanus Bathiani and John Docia, two famous Hungarian commanders, with their troops, and a good number of Janizaries. Being proud of his authority, he took it very ill, that the Vayvod Americus Gibach, bishop of Veradium, a person of great rank and power, was not over-hasty to welcome him. At length the Vayvod b came with a great train, and pitching his tents, received Gritti with so little condescension, that coming out from dinner, he took the cap off his head, and opening it, said, This cap will not hold two heads, and therefore it must be fitted to one.

THIS being heard by Docia, whom the bishop had struck for some bold words spoken in a public assembly, he aggravated the matter to such a pitch, that Gritti desired him, if possible, to seize the Vayvod, in order to send him to Constantinople. Docia sets out from Baxovia, with a strong party, towards the bishop's quarters; and understanding by his spies that he lay in the fields, by reason of the hot weather, while his retinue were dispersed in the country villages, he broke into his tent when a-bed, and cut off his head, which he brought in his hand by the ear to Gritti; who asked Laskus, then present, if he knew that shaven pate? adding, that it c was the head of a very rebellious proud man. Laskus, who had quitted king John's party, because he had not given him the vayvodship, and therefore did not love the bishop, yet was shocked at the sight, and by his answer seemed to condemn the action; which made Gritti himself relent.

As soon as this horrid fact was known, the bishop's kindred and friends, to revenge his death, in a few days got together 40,000 men; who, under the command of Stephen Maylat, d besieged Gritti in the strong town of Mege, whither he had retired for his security. Gritti finding no assistance come to him from king John, or the Turkish Sanjaks on the frontiers, and being withal unprovided with victuals, endeavoured to escape thro' the camp of the blockaders: but missing his way, and lighting on Maylat, instead of the governor of Moldavia, his friend, who was to have met him with a party of horse, his Turks were slain, and himself taken without any resistance. Being delivered to the bishop's kinsman, he ordered him forthwith to be beheaded. The executioner, in stripping the body, found about it in jewels to the value of forty thousand ducats. He was the greatest Christian favourite that any of the Turkish emperors ever had^e.

^d CANT. p. 195, & seqq.

^e LEUNCL. & RICAUT, ubi supr.

S E C T. II.

Exploits of Barbarossa and Doria. Conquest of Tunis by Charles V. Affairs of Hungary.

e TWO years after, Olama, prince of Azerbejân, hitherto subject to the Persians, flies for Bâghdâd at refuge to Soleymân, and suggests the means of taking Bâghdâd. With this view, Ibrâhîm ^{tempted.} Pâshâ is sent into Asia: but finding more difficulty in executing his design than was expected, he turns off to Vân (R), and takes it in the first assault (S). Mean time, Kbairo'ddîn (T) Pâshâ, who had hitherto exercised piracy in the White Sea (U), offers his service to Soleymân, and petitions to be admiral of a fleet, that he might reduce the kingdoms of Tunez and Jezaîr (X). This affair being referred to the Wazîr (Y), who was then at Hâlep, Kbairo'ddîn repairs

(R) Or Wân, a famous city on a lake of the same name, in the Gr. ater Armenia.

(S) The Christian historians say, that Ulama (or Ulemas, as they call him) was brother-in-law to Tâhmaşp.

(T) That is, the goodness and grace of faith. He was afterwards made Kapudan Pâshâ, or high admiral, of the Othmân empire. He was the terror of Christians, by whom he was called Barbarossa. Cant.

(U) Or Propontis.

(X) That is Algiers, as we call it.

(Y) The Soltâns never transact any thing without the Wazîr's privity, once they have granted him full power to administer the affairs of the empire: whenever they do, that minister's authority is believed to be sinking. Cant.

A. D. 1553.

Rise of Barbarossa :

thither ; and having made it appear to Ibrahim, that the conquest was both easy and advantageous, he is appointed admiral^f.

ACCORDING to the Christian writers, Khairo'ddin (whom they call Hariadenus), surnamed Barbarossa from his red beard, was the son of a Greek renegado of Mitylene, in the island of Lesbos ; who, in company with his elder brother Horrukkius (Z), at first practised little piracies : but at length, joining with Corfairs of better account, Horrukkius in time became their chief. While these rovers were scouring the seas about Morokko, Selim, king of Algiers, hired them to oppose his brother Mohammed, who laid claim to his kingdom ; and they had the good luck to secure him in the throne. This having brought Horrukkius into credit, he afterwards slew the king, and got himself advanced in his room : but making war on the king of Tremissen, he was slain by the Spaniards who came to that king's assistance. Horrukkius was succeeded by his brother Hariadenus, surnamed Barbarossa, from his red beard, who performed many gallant actions ; and on his departure for Constantinople, where he arrived in 1533 (+), left a son behind him eighteen years old, under the care of a trusty friend.

Ravages Italy

BARBAROSSA used all the arguments he could to persuade Soleymân to the African war ; and had brought with him Rashîd, elder brother of Muley Aziz, king of Tunis, as a fit instrument of subduing that country : so that he was soon after made fourth Pâshâ and high admiral : on which occasion the Soltân delivered to him a scepter and a sword, with eight hundred thousand ducats for the expences of the war. Hereupon quickly putting to sea with a fleet of eighty galleys and some galliots, he steered his course for Italy, where he plundered the towns of Lucidius and Citaro, Prochita and Spelunca : while two thousand of his land forces crossing the mountains in the night, surprised the city of Fundi, and were within a small matter of taking Julia Gonzaga, the beauty of Italy ; whom Barbarossa designed to make a present of to Soleymân. Coming at length to the isle of Capri, in sight of Naples, he filled that city, and all the coast, with terror. Another part of his fleet landed at Terracia, which they found deserted by all but a few unable to get off, whom they put to the sword ; as they did all whom they did not think fit to carry away.

Sails to Africa :

AFTER he had ravaged the coasts, and frightened Rome itself, he passed over swiftly to attack the king of Tunis, against whom the expedition was designed. Muley Hassan, who at that time reigned there, being by his father Mohammed, at the instance of his wife, declared his successor, in prejudice to his elder brothers Machin and Rachîd ; he no sooner mounted the throne, than he put Machin, with seventeen more of his brethren, to death, and the eyes of three others out. Rachîd and Abdo'lmâlek made their escape to Abdo'llah, prince of Biskaris ; where the latter turning monk, the first, by the assistance of the inhabitants, endeavoured to recover his right : but failing in his attempts, he fled to Barbarossa ; who carried him to Constantinople, where he was detained, though the captor gave out that he was with him in the fleet, in order to be restored to his father's kingdom.

Takes Biserta and Tunis.

MEAN while, the Turkish admiral landing at Biserta (A), had the place quickly delivered up to him. From thence he sailed for the Goletta, a strong castle, commanding the bay of Tunis ; and in token of friendship, saluted it with all his great guns, which the castle answered in the same manner : but the governor being required to deliver it up to Rashîd, he answered, that it should always be at the command of him who governed in Tunis. The citizens, hearing that Rashîd was arrived, were presently all in an uproar ; whereupon Muley Aziz, who was hated by them for his cruelty, by the advice of Abdabar, the Messuar (or next in authority), fled, leaving all his treasures behind him. As soon as he was gone, Barbarossa, at the invitation of the people, hastened to the city with 5000 Turks, and was joyfully received : but they, not finding Rashîd among them, and having an aversion to the Turks, under the conduct of Abdabar, fell upon them as they were entering the castle, and quickly, though with much bloodshed, gained one of the bulwarks. Then sending for Muley Hassan, they, by their repeated assaults, distressed Barbarossa, till falling out at two gates upon the Moors, 3000 of them were slain, with the Messuar. On this, Muley Hassan fled, and with difficulty escaped to Konstantina, the antient Cyrtba, in company with his brother Dorakt, to whom that city belonged. The citizens next day, discouraged by their losses, and having no king to fight for, begged pardon of Barbarossa, and submitted to Soleymân. After the affairs of Tunis were settled, he, by proper methods, gained the Numidian princes to his interest. This done,

^f CANT. p. 196.

(Z) By the Turks called Orûch. See D'Herb. Bibl. Orient. art. Khair Aldin.

(+) The Christian historians say, that the Wazîr Ibrahim, hearing of his great exploits, and thinking him a proper match for Doria, advised Soleymân to invite him over, with a promise of making him admiral : that Hariadenus, full of his design to conquer Barbary, gladly embraces the offer. But that being traduced by the envious Pâshâs, Soleymân, to put him off, referred him to Ibrahim, who was then at Hâlep : that Hariadenus, resolving to push the affair to the utmost, repaired to Ibrahim ; and, being recommended back to the Soltân by that minister, was forthwith made admiral.

(A) Or Bizerta, the antient Hippoazaritus.

a he quickly reduced the other cities of that kingdom, excepting Kayrwân (B), which held out for a while, and then surrendered ². Let us now return to the affairs of Persia. A. D. 1536.

NEXT year, Soleymán marches to the assistance of the Wazîr Ibrâhîm, who was then about Vân; and advancing to Tigris (C), Soltân Mozaffer, king of Ghilân (D), with 10,000 men, and Mehemmed Khân, join him against Persia, promising for the future to be his vassals. Thence he proceeds to Soltanîya, and after a short stay (E), about winter, marches to Bâghdâd. The governor Tekkielû Mehemmed Khân (F), finding himself too weak to withstand the Othmân forces, retires farther into Persia, and gives the Soltân an opportunity of entering the city without opposition. While Soleymán was one day viewing the monuments of the antient heroes, he takes notice of a place dedicated to Imâm Azem (G); and as from thence the city could be defended, and the inhabitants bridled, he orders it to be strongly fortified, and garrisoned with Janizaries. After this, he examines the Defterdâr's (or treasurer's) accounts; and finding that he had not only embezzled some bags of money, but also betrayed his designs to the Persians, orders him to be hanged. The Defterdâr being brought to the gallows, asks for pen, ink, and paper; saying, he had some matters to impart to the emperor before he died. Pen and paper being brought him, he writes a letter to Soleymán; acquainting him, that Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, the prime Wazîr, was also guilty, and bribed by the Persians to make an attempt on the emperor's life. Which letter, though at first suppressed (H) by the Soltân, was the cause (I) of that famous and prudent minister's losing his life. Bâghdâd taken: Hejrah, 941. A. D. 1534.

News being brought whilst he staid at Bâghdâd, that the Shâh of Persia was marching with a great army to besiege Vân, he returns speedily to Tibrîs, and next day incamps at Derghe-jineh: by which means the Shâh, disappointed and terrified, sues for peace by his ambassadors, whom Soleymán dismissed without an answer. Next year, seeing nothing to be feared from the Persians, he returns, through Khavîr, towards Derjîshâh, where the Khân of Bitlis (K) surrenders all his towns to him (L). From thence the Soltân marched through Amza to Halep; and in Rajeb, entered Constantinople in triumph: three days after which, he ordered his formerly beloved and brave general Ibrâhîm Pâshâ to be put to death ^a. Bitlis surrenders Hej. 942. A. D. 1535.

In 943, a fresh expedition into Persia being necessary to preserve his late conquest, and being unwilling to undergo the fatigue himself, he sends Mehemmed Khân, who had lately submitted to him, with an army into Gurjîstan, or Georgia; which, after many bloody battles, submits on certain conditions. Georgia submits. Hej. 943. A. D. 1536.

ABOUT the same time an army of Moldavians, Poles, Bohemians, Germans, and Spaniards (M), voluntarily assembling, invade Bosnia, and besiege Sulien. But being suddenly attacked by

² RICAUT, ubi supr.

^a CANT. p. 197, & RICAUT, ubi supr.

(B) A city about 70 miles south of Tunis, now ruinous, but once very famous; having been the seat of the Khalifah of the west, before he removed to Egypt, as well as of several races of kings.

(C) A mistake for Tibrîs, or Tevrîz; which is Tauris, in Persia.

(D) Or Khilân, a province of Persia, on the south-west side of the Caspian sea; supposed to be the antient Hyrcania.

(E) The Christian writers say, that Soleymán hearing nothing of Damas (as they call Thamas, or Tahmasp), and his army being in danger of perishing in the plains of Soltania by a dreadful storm of rain which fell, he marched from thence towards Baghdâd.

(F) A famous Persian general, by whose management the Wazîr and Defterdâr are said to have been corrupted; which danger Soleymán escaped merely by the favour of blind fortune. CANT.

(G) Founder of the Mohammedan ceremonies, and more followed by the Turks than his successor Shafi. CANT.

(H) It is universally known how well the Othmâns can dissemble in such cases. Hence it is a common saying among them, We should kiss the hand we cannot cut off. CANT.

(I) No wonder Soleymán should put his Wazîr to death upon this single-evidence, since the Turks look on the confession of a dying man not only to exceed the evidence of forty witnesses, but even to remove all doubt, though the whole world should be of a contrary opinion. CANT.

(K) The river of Bitlis (or Bedlis) abounds with the fish Moruna, the largest of the river-kind, and found no where else, except in the Danube and Volga. As they pass out of this last river into the Caspian Sea in spring, the Russians stop up the passes with reeds, and so catch infinite quantities of them. The people of Bitlis, finding their yearly prey to be thus kept from them, agreed with the Russians, that, for the benefit of the Christians in that city, one fence at least should be opened, the day before Palm Sunday, and so left for three days: by which means, even on the second day, great plenty of Morunas are taken in the river Bitlis. If these things, which were told me by a Turk, who was an eye-witness, be true, the swiftness of this fish is very wonderful, since it can swim over the whole Caspian Sea in twenty-four hours. CANT. Nay, what is more, if this be fact, they must also, in the same time, travel 360 miles by land; Bitlis being so far distant from the Caspian Sea. If prince Cantemir had understood the geography of the country, he could not have been so duped by the Turks, who are apt to impose on the credulous.

(L) The Christian historians, on the contrary, say, that 5000 Persian horse, on the 13th of September, surprising the rear of Soleymán's army, consisting of 18,000 cavalry, in the valley near Bitlis, broke into their camp in the night; while the governor of that fortress sallied on the other side, and made so great a slaughter, that the Pâshâs of Kayro and Syria, with Ulema, who commanded in chief, had much ado to escape. Three great Sanjâks out of five were killed, and one taken. Eight hundred Janizaries submitted, and the mountain people took all their baggage; so that the Turks account it among the greatest of their losses.

(M) The Turks here give the name of Spaniards to the Germans; which was probably occasioned from the emperor Charles V. being also king of Spain. CANT.

Hafrûd

A. D. 1536 Hasrad Bey, governor of that country, with a small force, fly for fear; and being pursued, are overtaken and routed near Kilis, which Hasrad, after a few days siege, takes: and thus adds a whole Sanjak to the Ottoman empire¹.

Emperor
Charles V. joins for Africa:

WHILST Soleyman was engaged in his Persian expedition, the emperor Charles V. fearing, by Barbarossa's late successes, that in time his own dominions, especially Sicily, would be endangered by him, he resolved to pass over to Africa, with a puissant army of Spaniards, Germans, and Italians. His fleet was very numerous. Besides the ships, galleys, and galleasses, commanded by his famous admiral Doria, Lewis, the king of Portugal's brother, joined him with 25 caravels and an huge galleon: he had sixty sail of tall vessels out of the Netherlands, besides ten of the pope's galleys, and the Maltese ships. With this fleet, computed at 700 sail, whereof 80 were capital ships, and on which were embarked a suitable number of troops from several countries, Charles set sail from Barcelona, on board the admiral galley; which struck upon the bar of Utika (N), but getting off, doubled the cape of Carthage, and came to an anchor before the castle of Aquaria.

Takes the Gulletta:

BARBAROSSA on this news prepared for defence of the Gulletta (O), as the only bulwark of Tunis and his naval power. This castle stands in the bottom of the bay of Carthage, on a point of land, where the sea, by a narrow strait on the east side of it, runs into the lake of Tunis. But since then, the castle has been separated from the land on the west side also (P). Near this place, the emperor's forces landing, with but little opposition, Vasti, his general, besieged the castle in form: but Charles, dissatisfied with the behaviour of the Spaniards, (who, after suffering the brave count Carue, with his Italians, to be cut off before their faces, suffered greatly themselves by their negligence in another sally), to make short work, resolved on a general assault. Accordingly, the batteries on land, as well as the guns of the fleet, having made a large breach, a fierce attack was made at it; while others scaled the walls, with such resolution, that they entered the place in spite of the enemy, most of whom were killed or drowned: but Sinan, their commander, a valiant Jew, with others, escaped. By this means, Barbarossa's great naval force, which but a while before struck such a terror through the Mediterranean, fell into the emperor's hands^k.

Marches to Tunis.

MEAN time, Muley Hassan having repaired to the camp, and intreated Charles to restore him to his kingdom, received a favourable answer. After this, he acquainted the emperor with the state of Tunis; and assured him, that Barbarossa would never stand an assault, or venture a battle with his Turks. Just then an accident had like to have drawn on a general engagement: for the Moors having annoyed the camp with some field pieces from an olive-yard, the army drew out; and Montejo, general of the Spanish cavalry, was sent before with some raw troops: but being attacked and wounded by the enemy, his men shamefully fled; which the emperor observing, bravely advanced himself to the charge; and routing the Turks and Moors, took the before-mentioned cannon. Presently after, thirty thousand Moors, with a priest at their head, attempting to surprise a small tower on a hill, near the ruins of Karthage (Q), Charles came timely enough to relieve it, and slew the priest with many others.

Barbarossa
retires.

THE defeat of the Spanish horse induced many to advise the emperor to abandon the design, and return. But, being resolved to proceed, he marched towards Barbarossa; who, with a great body of horse and foot, met him, three miles from Tunis. His general Vasti advising him to give the enemy battle without waiting for his great cannon, the engagement began; but although fierce, lasted not long; for the Moors, after losing about three hundred men, fled, and Barbarossa retired into the city; where, distracted with the bad state of his affairs, he would have put to death all the Christian prisoners who were in the castle, but for the persuasions of Sinan the Jew.

The castle surprised.

THOSE captives, to the number of six thousand, being informed of this barbarous design by some renegadoes, by their help, knocked off their chains, and seizing what arms they could, fell upon and mastered the Turks in garrison. This strange turn quite confounded Barbarossa; who, now seeing it dangerous to stay longer in Tunis, fled to Hippo (R), where he had sunk fifteen galleys in the lake, to serve him on occasion. Mean time the citizens of Tunis went and delivered the keys of it to the emperor; only requesting, that he would not suffer his army to enter and plunder it: but, moved by the murmurs of his troops, as well as other reasons, he refused to grant their petition. The place being thus left at the mercy of the

¹ CANT. p. 199.

^k PAULUS JOVIUS. RICAUT, ubi supr.

(N) Now called Bushatter, near the mouth of the river Mejerdab, the ancient Bagrada, about 24 miles to the north of Tunis. Shaw's Trav. p. 148.

(O) So called by the Italians, as being at the entrance of the gullet, or strait, leading from the sea into the lake of Tunis; which stands on the west side of the lake.

(P) This work was begun by Barbarossa; but given over again, for fear the sea should fill the lake of Tunis with sand; though afterwards it was completed by others.

(Q) Twelve miles to the north-east of Tunis.

(R) This is to be understood of Hippo Zaritus, now Bizerta.

soldiers.

a soldiers, the Spaniards applied themselves most to plunder : but the Germans, thirsting after Mohammedan blood, made a horrid slaughter of the inhabitants, sparing neither age nor sex : till the emperor, by the intreaties of Muley Hassan, put out a proclamation, that no man, upon pain of death, should hurt or seize any citizen. For all this, a great number of young people were carried on board the fleet by the seamen ; many of whom were ransomed, for a small matter, by their old king ; and among the rest, one of his own wives for two ducats. The emperor liberally rewarded the captives in the castle ; where great treasures were found, besides thirty thousand ducats hidden in a well by Barbarossa, which were given to Vashti, at his own request. Among other Arabic books destroyed, was the history of the kings of Tunis ; the loss of which Muley Aziz much regretted.

b MEAN while, Barbarossa having weighed and fitted up his sunk galleys at Hippo (or Bizerta), raised some batteries on the lake side, to defend the harbour against the Christians : so that, when Adam, a Genoese, sent by Doria, to take the place, saw the preparations which had been made, he returned back to the fleet, for a reinforcement. During his absence, the Turkish admiral, sailing along the coast, gets safe to Algiers. Doria, on this advice, angry with himself as well as Adam, for letting the prey slip out of his hands, with his own galleys and some of the best ships, repairs to Hippo, takes the city, and razes the walls : then, putting a strong garrison into the castle, returned to Tunis. But the emperor, to save charges, caused the castle also to be demolished ; and then restored Muley Hassan to his kingdom, on condition that he paid a yearly tribute of falcons, with as many Numidian horses, and defrayed the expence of one thousand Spaniards, to be left in garrison at the Gulletta. Affairs being thus settled in Africa, the emperor returned to Italy^b. Thus far the Christian historians.

THIS expedition of Charles V. to Tunis, and defeat of Khairo'ddin, though mentioned in the Turkish annals translated by Gaudier, is suppressed by the authors made use of by prince Cantemir. On the contrary, they make that Pâshâ victorious, affirming, that he laid waste all the African coasts in the Mediterranean, and took the towns which refused to submit. In his return (continue they) he lands in Apulia, takes Kustube, and, over-running the adjacent country, carries away a great number of captives. About the end of the year the Soltân equips another fleet, and sends it into the Adriatic, under the command of Lusti Pâshâ (Ibrahim's successor in the Wazirship), and Khairo'ddin, now Kapudân Pâshâ, or high admiral, to take Kiorfes (or Korfu) from the Venetians.

HE himself, accompanied by his sons Mostâfa and Mohammed, leads the land forces through Albania sub- Aulonia (B), in order to chastise the Arnaudi, who had raised disturbances : but they would have rendered Soleyman's passage very difficult, if they had not, by the persuasions of their countryman Ayâs Pâshâ, submitted to the Soltân. Arnaud (or Albania) being thus subdued without bloodshed, after a month's stay there, to settle the affairs of the country, he passes into the island of Kiofres ; and commanding all the towns and villages to be burned, closely besieges the city : but at length, after much slaughter on both sides, it is relieved by the approach of winter, the Soltân being forced to retreat, and sail back to Constantinople^c.

THIS is all we find in prince Cantemir's Othman history relating to those transactions ; which deserve a more particular account from the Christian writers. According to them, Soleyman, to revenge the disgraces he had received in Africa, postpones the war of Persia, with a design to turn all his forces against Italy. To this expedition he was much solicited by De Forrest, the French ambassador, and Troylo Pignatelli, formerly a commander in the emperor's army : but being disgusted with the viceroy of Naples, who had executed his brother Andrew, a knight of Rhodes, he fled to the Soltân, and was made one of his Mutefaraka's (C). Soleyman set out with two hundred thousand men ; and being met at Aulona, in Macedonia, by his high admiral Lutzi (D), and Barbarossa, with their fleets, he ordered them to sail over to Italy, to try the pulses of the people. By Pignatelli's direction they put into the town of Castro (E) ; and the same, with the adjacent castle, was delivered by his persuasion upon articles, which the Turks, to the great vexation of the admiral, violated.

ITALY was now ready to be overwhelmed with the mighty power of Soleyman, when the rashness of a Venetian captain diverted the storm upon his own republic. This was Alessandro Contareni, who meeting with some Turkish galleys, attacked and sunk two, because they refused to make the signals of friendship. Likewise Soleyman's chief interpreter, sent with two galleys on a message to Lutzi Pâshâ, offering to pass by the Venetian fleet at Korfu, without saluting

^b PAULUS JOVIUS. RICAUT, ubi supr.

^c CANT. p. 199. & seqq.

(B) A country and city of Albania ; which last, with Epirus, is called by the Turks Arnaud. Cant.

(C) They are a body of horse, of all nations and religions, who are obliged to attend the Soltân when he goes to war.

(D) So he is called in the Turkish annals, but in Cantemir, Lusti.

(E) Called Kustube in Cantemir's history. It is about ten miles south of Otranto.

A. D. 1536. the admiral, some of his ships drove them on the rocks, where they were taken by the a mountain people; from whom the interpreter had much ado to redeem himself. About the same time Doria, the imperial admiral, cruising in the Ionian Sea, met in the night, near Korsû, with twelve of Soleymân's great gallies full of Janizaries; who, after an obstinate fight against thirty gallies, were most of them slain, and their vessels taken: but Doria, finding himself too weak to encounter Barbarossa with his eighty gallies, returned to Messina to refit.

Besiege Korfu, THE Soltân, chafed with this loss, but more at the double injury done him by the Venetians; and pretending that they had entered into a private league with the emperor Charles V. changed his resolution of invading Italy, and proclaimed war against them. Hereupon, marching from Aulona, he encamped near the mountains over-against Korsû, where the people of Khimera, by the instigation of Damianus, a famous robber, undertook by night to break into Soleymân's b camp, and kill him in his tent. But as Damianus, who had approached with them through bye-ways, was, from a tree, spying out the Soltân's tent, and the order of his guards, the bough on which he stood breaking, he was discovered by a Janizary. Being thus taken and tortured, he confessed the whole design; which the Turks revenged on the mountaineers, and then prepared to invade Korsû.

without succ. ss. As soon as Pisaurio, the Venetian admiral, discovered their intention, he supplied the place with men and other necessaries. Then retiring, left the farther defence to the governors Aloysia Ripa and Simon Leoni, two senators of Venice; who caused the fair suburbs to be pulled down, and turned all the useless people out of the city. By this means great numbers perished in the town ditches, for fear of the enemy, while others up and down the island were destroyed c or made captives (F); only three thousand poor inhabitants valiantly defended themselves in the castle of St. Angelo, fifteen miles from the capital.

Soleymân retires. MEAN time the Turks annoyed the city with their cannon from the rock Maripetrus, and from the ruins of the suburbs with their small shot, while the gallies battered the walls with theirs from the sea. But Soleymân, perceiving after all that there was no likelihood of taking the place, left the island in September 1537: yet first did a remarkable piece of justice, in ordering those who violated the articles of Castro, in Italy, to be put to death, and the prisoners who could be found, after a diligent search, to be set at liberty.

Island Ægina subdued. DURING these transactions, Lutzi, the Turkish high-admiral, subdued, after an obstinate resistance, the rich and famous island of Ægina. The city of Ægeum was first given up to d the mercy of the soldiers; then burned; and after a great slaughter of the inhabitants, the rest were carried away into slavery. The like spoil and cruelty were committed at Paros:
 but the duke of Naxos, to avoid the calamities of war, submitted to pay a tribute of five thousand ducats. This done, Lutzi returned, laden with spoil, to Constantinople; from whence, soon after, he was banished, for striking and confining (G) his wife, who was Soleymân's sister d.

Ferdinand's forces IN the year 944, an army of twenty thousand men of different nations, under one Kobpan, enters through Serem (H) the Othmân borders, with design to besiege Semendria: but, being suddenly attacked in their way by Mehemmed Beg, governor of that city, they are totally routed e. This is all the light the Turkish historians give us into an affair, which, according c to the Christian writers, much redounded both to their honour and advantage. These latter inform us, that the same autumn in which Soleymân had ravaged Korsû, king Ferdinand's troops received a great overthrow by the Turks, at Essek. There was indeed a kind of truce between those two powers: but as their respective troops, in small parties, ravaged each other's dominions, and the Turkish nimble horse had generally the better of the great and heavy armed Germans, Ferdinand was so nettled at it, that he resolved to drive the Othmâns out of the country of Possëga. To this end he raised out of all countries eight thousand horse and sixteen thousand foot; over whom he made John Cazzinaer, a noble Kroatian, his general.
 On this advice, Mohammed, the valiant governor of Belgrade, to support king John, gathered forces out of Bosnia, and other provinces; which, with the Hungarians who joined him, formed f an army equal to that of the German.

besiege Essek; WITH these he marched to Essek, where he resolved to wait for the enemy, who advanced towards him: but by the time they got thither their foot was diminished by one half, although their horse had an increase of two thousand. They were joined next day by the bishop of Zagabria, with his horse; and some provision came into their camp. From a hill, which they

d PAUL JOVIUS. LEUNCL. RICAUT, ubi supr.

e CANT. p. 201.

(F) Barbarossa had 16,000 slaves to his own share; whom he sold afterwards at his house on the Bosphorus, four miles beyond Pera.

(H) A large plain beyond the Sava, lying between Alba Græcia (or Belgrade) and Peterwaradin, whose inhabitants are called Serin Ogli. CANT.

(G) On her expostulating with him for committing sodomy with a youth he kept for the purpose.

a took from the Turks, they perceived a rising ground on the other side of the city, fit for erecting batteries; to which they made their way through a troublesome forest, without much loss. There encamping, they offered the enemy battle: but Mohammed, who was ordered by Soleyman to defend the city to the last, and knew the scarcity of provisions in the Christian camp, declined an engagement. Being reduced by this means to great distress, they quitted Essek in the night, and went to besiege Hermaude; where they expected to meet with store of provisions, but found scarce enough to serve the army two days.

FROM thence, marching through Possaga for Juvancka, they in the way met with great refreshment: but the Turks getting at the same time to the last place, had several skirmishes with them. They likewise so distressed them in their retreat afterwards, that at length the commanders of the cavalry, seized with a panic, suddenly took to flight, some one way, some another, so that the dismayed general at last fled also: however, many of the troops joined the infantry; who still kept their posts, commanded by the brave Ladronius. At the same time, the Turks charging them, were valiantly opposed by the horse, who yet suffered much, especially the Bobemians. The foot also, being sore galled in their march, near a marsh, were at last broken, and all cut to pieces or taken. Ladronius, who was driven into the marsh, and sorely wounded, was persuaded by the Turks to yield himself, with three companies who were with him: but, being judged unable to travel by his keepers, they slew him, and carried his head to Constantinople. Mean time the general Kazzinaer fled to his own castle; and, fearing to appear before Ferdinand, broke the prison, and fled to the Turks. Soon after he had a promise of the government of Kroatia: but, tampering with Nicholas Serini to revolt, he was deluded by him, and slain in his house^f.

NEXT year, 945, the Soltân sends his admiral Khairo'ddin, and Soleyman Pâshâ (I), general of the foot, with a considerable army into India (K); where they diligently execute his orders, and annex the whole kingdom of Yamman (L), with the adjacent provinces, to the Othmân empire^g.

IT has been already related, in the reign of Selim I. that Kansu Gauri had fitted out a fleet at Swîz, or Sues, at the end of the Red Sea, against the Portugueses in India, who had ruined the trade of Egypt: but that expedition being laid aside, on account of the troubles which ensued in the country, as hath been already mentioned^h, the design lay dormant, till now Soleyman revives it, by the advice of Soleyman Pâshâ, the eunuch (M). For this purpose the Pâshâ, with great dispatch, having built a fleet of eighty tall ships and gallies, at the above-mentioned port, the command of it was given to him, in conjunction with Hassan Beg (N), the famous Moor of Alexandria. At their setting out, the Pâshâ, having seized the effects of the Venetians at Kayro and Alexandria, distributed their seamen on board his fleet.

HAVING sailed through the Red Sea, he came to Aden, a strong city and port of Arabia, not far from the mouth of it; where, sending for the king on board, after many caresses, hanged him, with four of his courtiers, at the yard-arm of his galley, and seized the city. From thence he crossed the Indian sea, and, on the fourth of September 1538, came to Diu, a very strong fortress of the Portugueses, on the coast of Kambaya, which he vigorously attacked, and battered with prodigious cannon: but the Turks, after taking a bulwark, having been repulsed in all their other assaults, with great loss, he raised the siege; and, on the appearance of the Portuguese fleet, sheered off with his own. In his return through the Red Sea, the king of Zibîd (or Zabîd), refusing to come to him, he landed and marched to that city. The unfortunate prince, not able to defend himself, thought it best to go out to him; but, on his approach, Soleyman ordered his head to be struck off. After this, he landed at Joddâb, the port of Mekka, to perform the pilgrimage to that city (O), and sent Hassan Beg with the fleet back to *Swîz*ⁱ.

WHILST

^f LEUNCL. RICAUT, ubi supr.

Gen. Collect. Voy. 4to, vol. i. p. 88.

^g CANT. p. 201.^h See before, p. 255, 256.ⁱ RICAUT, &

(I) This was the governor of Egypt, before-mentioned.

(K) This must be the borders of Arabia Felix: for I have not read that a Turkish army was ever in India. Cant. For all this it appears from what follows, that there was a Turkish army there the same year.

(L) A large country extending between the Red Sea and Persian gulf; which both antient and modern geographers (of Europe) make part of Arabia, by the name of Arabia Felix. But no Turkish or Arabian historian ever reckoned the inhabitants of Yeman among the Arabs; and their name of Saribindi, or yellow Indians, given them all over the east, shews them to be of Indian extraction: hence Yeman, properly, is not a part of Arabia, but of India. Cant. Our author's error in the former note, seems to have led him into another here: for, that Yeman, or Yamman, is part of Arabia, and its inhabitants Arabs, appears from Abu' fida, and many other Arab and Persian geographers. See Abu'lf. Descript. Arabiæ in Hudson. Geogr. Veter. Græc. Min. Pocock. Spec. Hist. Arab. Golius's Notes on Alfragani's Astron. D'Herbelot, art. Yaman, &c.

(M) Perhaps the same who was made governor of Kayro by Selim.

(N) From hence and other circumstances it appears, that Khairo'ddin, or Barbarossa, is, by mistake, mentioned by prince Cantemir's Turkish authors, as performing this voyage.

(O) There is a large account of this expedition from two different authors in the New Collection of Voyages

A. D. 1538.

Moldavia invaded, and reduced.

WHILST these things were performing by his generals, Soleymân, with numerous forces, as a friend (P), enters Moldavia: but, contrary to the expectation of the inhabitants, destroys all with fire and sword from the Danube to Soczava, then the metropolis; near which pitching his tents, he demands the yearly tribute. The Moldavians, seeing no way to withstand so great a storm, humbly sue for peace; and promise the payment of the annual sum: only they petition, that the choice of a prince may remain in the state (Q), and that he might be invested with regal authority. Soleymân grants their requests, confirms the prince (R) chosen by them, and restores their captives. Next day he assembles the nobles, and severely reprimands them; saying, "That, unmindful of the favours received from his predecessors, they had dared to draw the sword against so powerful an empire, and not only burned the town of Kili (S), but slain many Musulmans: that though, for this proceeding, all by the Mohammedan law were guilty of death, he, as a demonstration of his clemency, was ready to give them life and liberty, on condition they would deliver up the treasures of their late prince." As the wretched Moldavians could refuse nothing, the Defterdâr, with a company of Janizaries, went into the town, and plundered both the public and the prince's treasury; where were found, besides a great quantity of money, the diadems of the princes, crosses, and holy images (T), adorned with precious jewels. These Soleymân abuses as he pleased, and then leads back his forces. In his return, he orders Kili, destroyed by the Moldavians, to be rebuilt; and, because there were no woods in those parts, he gives them the timber of a bridge he had run over the Danube.

Christian fleet defeated.

In the interim, Khairo'ddîn (U), unexpectedly near Kandia, meets with the enemy's fleet, consisting of 300 sail; and, after an obstinate battle, takes many, and sinks most of the rest. Next day he attacks another fleet, commanded by Andrevirius (X), in the port of Prevesa; where the enemy, aided by the advantage of the place, behave with great bravery, and render the victory long doubtful: but at length the Christians, perceiving themselves overpowered, make off in the night, leaving some of their ships as a prey to the Turkish admiral. He had no sooner turned his back, than Andrevirius besieges Nova; and taking it, puts all the inhabitants to the sword: but, next year, Khairo'ddîn, returning with a fresh fleet, attacks the town; and, recovering it, kills, in revenge, all the Christians whom he found there, without distinction of age or sex ^k.

Barbarossa attacks Kanea;

A. D. 1538.

THIS is the Turkish account. Let us now see what the Christians say. The senate of Venice, finding themselves hard put to it by the Turks, entered into a confederacy against them with the emperor Charles V. and pope Paul III. The emperor's fleet, of eighty-two gallies, was commanded by Doria; the Venetians, of the like number, by Capello; and the pope's gallies by Grimani, patriarch of Aquileja. The land forces were under the conduct of Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicily: and the agreement was, that whatever might be taken from the enemy, in either Greece, the islands, or Dalmatia, should be delivered up to the Venetians. To oppose this power, Barbarossa, with one hundred and thirty-eight gallies, early in the spring, sailed to Kandia, with a design to surprise Kanea: but Gritti, the governor, so plied the Turks with great and small shot from the walls, that their admiral was forced to retire, after the loss of many men, and leave one thousand more behind him, who were likewise all slain. All he did was to reduce the little town of Cecilia, and then sail to the bay of Ambracia; which he fortified, for fear of the Christian fleet, by this time arrived at Korfû. The general Gonzaga was for landing, and attacking Prevesa; which, if taken, would bring their ordnance to bear upon the enemy's fleet, and shut up the bay. But Doria retires to Ambracia;

^k CANT. p. 202.

Voyages and Travels, 4to. vol. i. p. 88, & seqq. Where, as to the end of Soleymân Pâshâ, we are told, that, after his return, he went to Constantinople; and that, not agreeing with one who aspired to his post, he was reduced to the necessity of killing himself.

(P) The Moldavian annals say, that the Turks, on pretence of a Polish expedition, only desired a passage through Moldavia, and afterwards turned their arms against the country, laying it all waste. Cant.

(Q) So it continued for almost a century, and then the Soltâns began to appoint them princes. Cant.

(R) The Moldavian historians call him Stephanus junior, natural son of Bogdân. Cant.

(S) The occasion was this. A dispute arising between the Buják Tatars, in conjunction with some new colonies of Turks, and the inhabitants of Kiegeczy, these last drove the Turks out of the woods; and, on their making a second attempt, pursuing them to Kili, set the town on fire: but this was the act of private persons, and without the consent of the state. Kili, called Cilia by the Moldavians, and formerly Lycostemon, is situate on the north side of the largest or northern mouth of the Danube. Cant.

(T) Surely this paragraph must have been taken out of some Moldavian author, not a Turkish; at least words must be added, and the turn of expression altered in the translation.

(U) In his return from the kingdom of Yamman. So it follows in the original. But how then, as prince Cantemir himself observes, could he have gotten into the Mediterranean sea, without sailing round Africa? This is a farther proof that he was not in the Indian expedition with Soleymân Pâshâ.

(X) This seems to be some Christian general, whose name is corrupted by the Turks; but who he was I have not been able to find. Cant. — He was the famous Andreas Doria (called by Jovius, Auria), a Genoese; and, at the time here mentioned, in the service of the emperor of Germany. Tindal.

advised

^a advised rather, that, in case Barbarossa could not be brought to an engagement, they should fail for Lepanto; and, taking it, ravage all the towns in the bay of Korinth: which counsel was mostly approved of. On the appearance of the Christian fleet before the bay of Ambracia, Barbarossa, being irresolute what course to take, was sharply reprov'd by an eunuch of the court, as if guilty of cowardice; and in the close of his discourse, bid him beware, lest in avoiding an uncertain honourable death, he did not incur a shameful one by the Soltân's displeasure. Upon this, Barbarossa, turning to Salek, one of the chief pirates, said: We must, for aught I can see, venture a battle, though at too much disadvantage, lest we perish by the complaints of this barking half-man. A. D. 1538.

THEN, weighing anchor, he stood out of the bay, to fight the Christians; who, thinking he durst not venture, were steering towards Leucade. Doria on this advice tacked about, and prepared for battle. The enemy's fleet being preceded by twenty nimble gallies, under the conduct of Dragut, a famous pirate, the foremost of them bore down upon the great galleon of Bondelmero: but that commander poured such a quantity of great and small shot into them, that they were glad to sheer off. Mean time Doria resolved not to engage with-out the men of war, which were held back by a calm, steered his course accordingly, which made the crafty Turk change his also, and lie still, for fear of being circumvented. However, a little before sun-set, both his wings began in divers places to engage the Christians, from whom they took two gallies and a Spanish man of war, besides sinking two ships more, with some other damage: but, a sudden storm arising, Doria sailed back for Korfu, in such haste as seemed rather a flight than a retreat, for which he was much censured; and because, through fear, the lights in the poops of the ships were put out, Barbarossa laughed heartily at it, and used to say, Doria did it to conceal his flight.

SOON after he came with the Turkish fleet to Paxos, an isle four leagues to the east of Korfu, braving the Christians to fight. At length, returning to Ambracia for fear of tempestuous weather, they besieged and took Castello Nuovo; which, contrary to articles, was garrisoned by four thousand Spaniards, for the use of the emperor. This so discontented the Venetians, that they sued to Soleyman for peace; which, soon after, was concluded. In the interim Barbarossa, putting to sea, to relieve that place, many of his gallies were wrecked on the Acroceraunian rocks, and, it was said, twenty thousand men lost. Yet Doria refused to pursue him on this advantage; and, returning to Italy, gave occasion to Ursino, a noble Venetian, then in the service, merrily to say, that Doria had done nothing more politicly, and for the emperor's interest, than in thus setting the Venetians and Turks together by the ears, without the loss of a galley. Nuovo taken, SOLEYMAN, to recover Castello Nuovo, sent Barbarossa next spring to besiege it both by sea and land. The Turks lost a thousand men at first; but, having made a breach in the town-wall, they stormed it, and, after a very bloody fight, slew almost the whole garrison, with Sermiento, who commanded them; but those in the castle had quarter given them. Barbarossa then appeared before Cattaro; but, finding the governor Bembo did not regard his threats, he accepted of some presents and withdrew. and recovered. A. D. 1539.

^e ABOUT this time, peace being concluded between the emperor Charles V. and Francis I. of France, they both sent to invite the Venetians to join them against the Turks. The senate, after several debates, sent ambassadors to those princes, to dive into their designs; and a third to Soleyman, to avoid giving-up, if possible, the cities of Napoli di Romania and Malmasia, without which the Soltân refused to grant them peace. While the ambassador offered a large sum, in lieu of those towns, Soleyman took him up sharply as a base dissembler, and recounted to him all his private instructions, in such terms as frightened him to yield up not only those cities, but also two castles in Dalmatia (Y). For this he had like to have been banished by the senate; and the traitors being discovered were executed ¹. Peace with the Venetians. A. D. 1540.

^f THIS year a new war is kindled in Hungary. John De Zapol (Z), who, under Soleyman's protection, had managed affairs with good success, left Istifan (or Stephen), an infant, heir to the kingdom. The king of Germany (A), thinking it easy to dethrone a child, with an army of 8,000 choice men besieges Buda (B). Soleyman, who was made the young prince's guardian, Buda besieged: Hejrah, 947. A. D. 1540.

¹ P. Jovius. RICAUT, ubi supr.

(Y) Ever since this time, the Turks delay the Christian ambassadors, in order to know their utmost instructions, believing they have full powers to act.

(Z) Or Sapuvius, as the Christian writers call him. He died in 1540.

(A) This was Ferdinand, king of the Romans and Bohemians, brother to the emperor Charles Vth; who, on the score of affinity, thought he had a title to the kingdom.

dom of Hungary: but, when he saw he could do nothing by force, he agreed with John de Zapol to succeed him after his death. Cant.

(B) Ferdinand was advised by Laskus, the Polander, to crave Hungary of Soleyman, and become his tributary for it, before he had recourse to arms. Laskus himself was accordingly sent to Constantinople on the errand. In the mean time Ferdinand sent count Salm to shew queen

A. D. 1540. dian, being informed of this by Joln's widow, sends his Wazîr, Sofi Mehemmed Pâshâ, with a good army, and a letter to the queen; promising to come to her aid with all his forces. The Wazîr, being arrived at Buda, commands his men to attack the Germans, though strongly intrenched. The enemy, finding that the Turks were not very numerous, divides his army into two bodies, and with one carries on the siege, while with the other he opposes the Othmâns: and thus for thirty days there were continual skirmishes. Mean time the besieging party having destroyed the fortifications, Soleymân, to prevent the place being taken, advances in spring to his Wazîr's assistance. As soon as the Germans heard he was within four days march of their camp, they retired in the night, leaving their artillery behind them. Mechemmed Pâshâ vigorously pursues them, and getting before to the place where they were to embark, takes some, and kills others; while a few, throwing away their arms, save themselves by flight. Soleymân, being arrived, enters Buda; and, judging Istifân and his mother incapable of defending the kingdom, the one on account of his youth, the other of her sex, sends them into Transilvania (C), and assigns them a Sanjâk for their subsistence. After this he converts the churches into Jâmi, and appoints a Kadi (or judge). Then, leaving a strong garrison of Janizaries in the city, under the command of one Soleymân Pâshâ, returns to his capital^m.

Rogendorf's
plot:

THE Christian historians represent this transaction much more to the advantage of the Othmâns, and the dishonour of their enemies, than do the Turkish. They tell us, that Ustref and Mohammed, who commanded on the frontiers, having joined Valentine, queen Isabella's general, they recovered Vachia; but, being baffled before Pest, returned home, not without some loss in their retreat. This reviving Ferdinand's hopes, he sent more troops under the lord Rogendorf; who joining the old army, marched and besieged Buda. One part of the wall they battered down, and another part fell, with the weight of earth thrown up within to strengthen it: so that if the general, who was naturally slow, had attacked it immediately, the city must have been taken: but, neglecting this opportunity, the besieged, in the night, raised a new rampart; so that, next morning, the Germans, when they came to the attack, were beaten off, with the loss of sixteen hundred men. Their mines likewise were all countermined. For all this, treachery had like to have done what force could not: for one Borne-missa, a lawyer, promised to let in a body of Hungarians in the night at a postern: but Rogendorf having appointed Germans in their stead, as soon as they were admitted, the lawyer, who perceived the fraud, dropped them; and they not knowing the way in the dark, fled out again through the postern, except such as on the alarm were slain or taken.

continues the siege;

A. D. 1541.

IN June 1541, Mechemmed Pâshâ entering Hungary with his army, Rogendorf, instead of marching to fight him, as was advised, continued the siege, posting himself at the foot of St. Gerrard's Mount, between a steep hill and the river. From his camp he made a bridge to a little island, and with a fort commanded both the river and the plain. The fleet also of the Christians was much stronger than that of the Turks; but, as he had neglected to possess himself of the island Capella, the Turks soon took the little isle; and though quickly driven out again, yet they became so troublesome to the German camp, that they began to be dismayed. At the same time Perenus, the general of the Hungarians, being secretly advised by Valentine, queen Isabella's commander, to provide for his safety, because a great beast was coming, who would at one mouthful devour them; Perenus, judging by this that Soleymân was near at hand, acquainted Rogendorf, that, unless the siege was raised immediately, he would march off with his troops.

flies too late.

ALTHOUGH Rogendorf refused then to stir, yet fear obliged them next night to pass the river, in four convoys, to Pest. The two first did well enough; but the Turks fell upon the rest before they could get out of their camp. Mohammed, governor of Belgrade, and Valentine, took the upper tents where Perenus lay, and chased the Germans over St. Gerard's Mount. The garrison of Buda sallied out at the same time upon them, and the bishop caused a great stack of straw, near the river, to be set on fire, that the enemies of the Christian name might have light to destroy the Christians; on whom the cannon was played from all quarters. To increase the misfortune, Kasan, the Turkish admiral, went up the stream with light boats, and set upon the ships crossing the river to Pest. Of these he took some, and sunk many others; while the rest of the Germans, flying over the bridge into the little island, were there slain, or perished in the riverⁿ.

^m CANT. p. 204. & seq.

ⁿ RICAUT, ubi sup.

Isabella the articles of agreement between him and her late husband: but she proposing first to consult her father Sigismund, king of Poland, Ferdinand without more ado invades Hungary, and takes Vicgrade, Pest, Vachia, and Aiba Regalis. Hereupon Laskus, on his arrival at Constantinople, is imprisoned.

(C) The Turks are naturally so fruitful of good sayings, but withal so barren of good actions, that it is a common saying among them, the Othmâns say well, but do ill. This is verified in Soleymân's conduct. When he had, under the shew of virtue, acquired the good-will of all the Hungarian nobility, having now found an opportunity, he shews his cloven foot, and swallows up the kingdom belonging to an orphan.

Cant.

a THE Christian fleet, seeing all lost, cleared the way with their cannon as well as they could, and got up the river to Komorra. The rest of the land troops endured the same fortune in the camp; of whom the Bohemians died valiantly fighting. About three thousand men, who had gotten to a little hill by St. Gerrard's Church, there defended themselves; till two parts of them being slain, the rest threw down their arms, and were afterwards killed by Soleyman's order. At the same time, Kasan, coming with his fleet before Pest, frightened the horse out of it; and the rest were so dispirited that they made but little defence: so that the Turks, quickly breaking in, exercised on them the utmost cruelty, and plundered that wealthy city. In short, the Christians, by the report of some, lost in this war twenty thousand men, besides thirty-six great cannon, and one hundred and fifty smaller pieces. As for their unfortunate general Rogendorf, he died soon after, near Komorra, of his wounds and grief.

b SOLEYMAN, after this victory, comes with a great power to Buda; and, by his ambassadors, charged with rich presents, required the queen to send the young king to his camp. Isabella, by the bishop's advice, to avoid suspicion, sent the child; who, though but in swaddling clouts, was received with all military honours. The Soltán talked familiarly with the nurse, and ordered his sons Salim and Ba-yezid to take the royal babe in their arms and kiss him. But while the nobles of Hungary were merry at dinner with the Pásbás, some troops, under pretence of going to see the city, seized it; but so dexterously, and with so little noise, that it was not perceived till it was effected. Presently after, proclamation was made for the citizens to fear nothing, but give up their arms; and such exact discipline was kept, that not one person was injured by the soldiery.

c As soon as this was known to Soleyman, he sent back the young prince to his mother, but detained the nobles, to the great surprize both of them and her. Hereupon, the queen, by submissive letters, put him in mind of his promises, and intreated their release: but the Soltán, not regarding her remonstrances, consulted with his Pásbás about disposing of the kingdom of Hungary. Mohammed (the prime Wazir) was for carrying the young king and all the nobility to Constantinople, and leaving a governor, who by his moderation might remove from the people any apprehension of servitude. Rustan Pásbá, who had been gained by the queen's presents, stood altogether upon terms of honour; alleging, that nothing could be more inglorious, than for a great monarch to break his faith at once with a weak woman and poor infant, whom he had taken into his protection. But Mohammed, governor of Belgrade, disliking both opinions, as too full of lenity, declared the best way would be to reduce Hungary to the form of a province; to send the queen to her father, and bring up her son at court in the Mohammedan religion. He farther advised to put all the nobility to death; to raze their castles, and transport the principal families into Asia.

SOLEYMAN, having entered Buda the 30th of August, took a middle method; and, by a public decree, ordered that Buda should be kept with a Turkish garrison; that the kingdom should be converted into a province of the empire; and that the queen, with her young son, should presently leave the city, and reside at Lippa. This she quickly performed, though sorrowfully, attended by the nobility, who were all set at liberty, excepting Valentine.

e MEAN time king Ferdinand, being informed of the fatal disaster which had befallen his army, sends ambassadors to Soleyman with terms of peace, accompanied with curious presents (D). Being admitted to audience, they humbly desired, that the Soltán would bestow Hungary on their master; who, on his part, would pay him the same yearly tribute as king John had done, and undertake to draw the emperor Charles into the league: so that the Turks might be at liberty to turn their forces against the Persians. But, instead of granting Ferdinand's request, Soleyman required, that he should restore all the places formerly belonging to king Lewis, and never after meddle with Hungary. He likewise demanded, that Austria should pay him a small tribute on account of the charges of the war; and even refused to grant a truce, till such time as the two princes should be acquainted with his answer. However, the ambassadors had liberty to see the camp, where the most exact discipline and profound silence was observed: and, in his return to Constantinople, he set Laskus at liberty.

f At the same time that Mohammed Pásbá was sent into Hungary, Abmed, governor of Nissa Transilvania (E), was ordered to invade Transilvania, in conjunction with Peter, prince of Moldavia and restored. Walakhia. Stephen Maylat, who had been made Vayvod, not being able to withstand the enemy, fled to Togaras. Abmed, who found that town too strong to be taken by force, decoyed Maylat to his camp, under pretence of peace: but when he had gotten him there, he secured him; and soon after Togaras surrendered. Hereupon almost all the country of Trans-

^o RICAUT, ubi supr.

(D) Among the rest there was a globe, shewing the hour of the day, motion of the planets, change of the moon, and other phenomena.

(E) Others say, Nicopolis.

A. D. 1541. silvania was, by Soleymin's consent, given to the young king Stephen; to whom the people readily swore allegiance ^P.

DURING these transactions, the emperor Charles V. made his unfortunate expedition to Algiers: but as this was a war rather against the Moors of Barbary (who, being driven out of Spain, turned pirates, and infested the whole Mediterranean), than against the Turks, we shall say no further of it here; but return to the Turkish historians.

French off-
ed.

Hejrah 949
A. D. 1542.

Hungary invaded.

THIS rapid course of victories, which terrified some Christian princes, induced others to implore Soleyman's aid against the unjust oppressions of their neighbours. Accordingly, in the year 949, Firanche Pâdishibi, no longer able to withstand the Spaniards, sends an ambassador extraordinary to make an alliance with the Soltân, and intreat his succour. The alliance being made, he sends Khairo'ddin Pâshâ with a numerous fleet to Spain, and, early next spring, entering Hungary with a great army, presently takes Liposa, Beczovi, and Shoklovas, which had been, two years before, recovered by the Germans. Then, penetrating farther into the country, he reduces Ustargan, Beligrad (F), Tatar Hissari, and Ustuni Beligrad (G). After this, having converted the best churches into Jâmi, and strengthened the places with strong garrisons, he returns to Constantinople: but as he drew near the city, he receives the news of his son Mohammed's sudden death; which so affected him, that, laying aside his intended triumph, he made his entry mournfully, like one who had been vanquished. He afterwards, in remembrance of his son, and for his soul's health, built in the way to the gate called Erghi Kapu (H) a large Jâmi, adorned with a college and hospital, called Shehzâde Jâmi ⁹.

The Turkish
fleet

THE foregoing transaction, so briefly touched on by the Turkish authors, requires farther enlargement from the Christian historians; especially those relating to Soleyman's sending a fleet to assist the French, and his war in Hungary. With regard to the first article; new differences arising between the emperor and Francis king of France, the latter sent Rinco, as his ambassador, into Turky, to solicit Soleyman to make war upon Charles: but in his way through Italy he was murdered by some Spaniards. This assassination inflaming the resentment of Francis, he sent Polinus on the same errand. Polinus arriving at Constantinople received no very agreeable reception from Soleyman the eunuch, grand Wazîr: but having, by means of the Kapi Aga, or chief porter, obtained an audience of the Soltân himself, that prince promised to send his master, the following spring, as large a fleet as he desired. Spring being come, the execution of this affair was, out of envy to Barbarossa, much opposed in council by the Wazîr; who said, he saw no reason why the state was put to such an expence, but to serve the admiral's turn. However, Barbarossa having with incredible diligence fitted up one hundred and ten gallies and forty galleons, by Soleyman's order, he departed from Constantinople with the French ambassador.

A. D. 1543.

takes Rhegio;

As soon he arrived in the Fare of Messina, the Turkish pirates, being come with their galliots in sight of Rhegio, began to land their men. This made the people leave the city: but Gaictano, a Spaniard, who kept the castle, with his guns killed some Turks; whereupon the rest breaking into the town, fired it, to the great displeasure of Barbarossa as well as the French ambassador. After this, the Turks landing some cannon, with a few shot so terrified the commander, that he presently gave up the place. However, he was set at liberty, with his wife and children; excepting one daughter, of exceeding beauty, with whom Barbarossa was so enamoured that he took her to wife. The place was plundered by the soldiers; and seventy Spaniards, of whom the garrison consisted, with many more citizens, were made captives. The Turkish admiral after this, sailing along the coast of Italy, came to Ostia, at the mouth of the Tiber; which so terrified the Romans, that the ambassador's letter to cardinal Rudolpho, the pope's legate, to assure them of their safety, could scarce keep them from forsaking the city ^r.

besieges Nice;

BARBAROSSA being arrived at Marseilles, lay there a long time, fretting to see that the French let the season slip without entering upon action. At last, being joined by several French ships and 8000 land forces, he had orders to besiege Nice, in Provence, then under the duke of Savoy; which after repulsing the Turks at one breach, was so terrified with a fresh battery, raised by the Turkish admiral, that the citizens agreed to surrender to the French; by which means the Janizaries, being disappointed of the plunder, would have slain the ambassador, as the occasion of it, could they done it conveniently. They had presently after a new cause of resentment: for they had not sat down long before the castle, when the French sent to borrow powder and shot, their own being all out. This so enraged Barbarossa, that

^P RICAUT, ubi supr.

⁹ CANT. p. 206, & seq.

^r RICAUT, ubi supr.

(F) Strigonium, or Gron.

(G) Alba Regalis, called by the Germans Stul Weis- senburg. Cant.

(H) One of the twenty-eight gates of Constantinople, looking towards Sylvria. Cant.

a he threatened to lay hands on Polinus, and was in the mind to have returned home: but he was A. D. 1543. scarce pacified when a letter from Kasti to Paul, the governor, being intercepted, promising relief within two days, they raised the siege: however, the Turks first broke into the city, plundered it, and then set it on fire.

BARBAROSSA being come to an anchor at the the isle of Lerina, or Margarita, news was from Doria; brought that Doria with his fleet lay at Vila Franca; and as he had lost four gallies in the storm, Polinus sent to advise the Turkish admiral to fall on him. The latter making no great haste nither, his officers, by way of incer, said, he had reason to deal kindly with his brother Doria, in return for letting him escape at Hippo: but Barbarossa's answer always was, that he being an old commander, and half blind, saw more into the matter than all those green captains with their sharp sight. Not long after, sailing to Thoulon, he sent out twenty-five gallies under Salek and Hassan, his kintinen; who, after pillaging some maritime towns of Spain, went and wintered at Algiers. While Barbarossa reitted his fleet at Thoulon for the service of the following spring, Doria, under pretence of redeeming prisoners, supplied him with some necessaries, although his enemy, for fear he should commit any hostilities against the territories of Genoa.

BARBAROSSA, weary of lying so long idle in Provence, requested of the king of France, ravages the that he might have leave either to depart or ravage the coasts of Spain: but France, unwill- coasts, ing to grant the latter request, bestowed on him, in lieu of the Turks who were dead, all the Mohammedan slaves in his gallies, amounting to four hundred, with store of provision and other presents. After this the Turkish admiral departed from Thoulon; and, coming to the c isle of Elba, belonging to the duke of Florence, demanded of the governor Appiano the son of his old friend Sinán the Jew, who was kept a prisoner there. The governor answered, that the young man being turned Christian, he could by no means do it; but that, for his sake, he would use him as his own son. Barbarossa, not satisfied with this apology, landed his men, and committing great spoil, had the captive delivered up. But the son's liberty proved his father's death: for, overcome with joy at the unexpected sight of him, he fainted away in embracing him, and died.

THE admiral, sailing from Elba, landed first at Telaman, then at Porto Hercule; which and returns, city he burnt. He afterwards ravaged the isles of Gigio and Ischia; burnt the three chief d towns of the latter, and carried away abundance of people from both. Then he endeavoured to take Puteoli: but was prevented by the approach of succours from Naples. He had better success at the isle of Lipari, which he laid waste; then burnt the town, and carried off about seven thousand prisoners to Constantinople; where he was honourably received, and applauded by Solymán. He performed no other expedition after this to his death (I), which happened in 1547.

LET us now, in the second place, take a review of the war in Hungary. As king Ferdi- Ferdinand's nand could not chuse but be much alarmed at the answer given his ambassador at the Porte, as forces enter before-mentioned, the princes and states of Germany, at his request, unanimously resolved to Hungary; take up arms, for recovering Buda, and other places of Hungary, from the turks. To this e end they raised thirty thousand foot and seven thousand horse, under the command of Joachim, marquis of Brandenburgh. They were joined at Vienna by Ferdinand's forces, ten thousand horse out of Stiria, fifteen thousand Hungarian horse, and three thousand choice Italian foot, sent by pope Paul III. and conducted by Alessandro Vitellio. The marquis setting out, marched so slowly along the Danube, that his officers said, the summer would be spent before he could enter upon action. At length, being come to Gran, it was reported, that Solymán was on his march with a great army towards Hungary: but this report being contradicted by his spies sent to Sementria, who brought word that not above three thousand Turks were arrived at Buda, and that the enemy's fleet was not much inferior to the king's, they were encouraged to march on to that city: but the general, contrary to the opinion of his officers, would needs pass the Danube, and take Pest first, which would facilitate the reduction of Buda. At the same time Medicis, an Italian, admiral of the fleet, came down the river, and forced the Turks out of the isle of St. Margaret's, lying a little above that city.

THE marquis being set down before Pest, the Turks made several sallies; in one of which besiege Pest: Vitellio, being to retreat, drew the Turks after him; while Perenus, getting between them and the city with his light horse, five hundred of them were slain. The Christians, elated with this little victory, presently raised their batteries; and, having made a breach, four Italian companies, led by Vitellio, ran bravely to attack it; but, not being assisted by either the Germans or Hungarians, they were forced to make a disorderly retreat, after the loss of seven hundred men. No less dejected with this ill success, it was debated whether they should

* RICAUT. ubi sup.

(I) He was buried at his house called Beysiktesk, and, to render his burying-place famous, he built there near the elevation Bozbas, about four miles from Pera: a mosk at his own charge.

A. D. 1543. { raise the siege or not: but while they stood divided in their opinions, a false report, that Abmed was advancing against them with the European horse, determined them to march off. But before they put this resolution in execution, the enemy sallied, and skirmished with the Hungarians. Here it happened that a remarkable commander among the Turks desired to see Vitellio; who being shewed to him, he ran and embraced him out of respect, and then went off again¹.

obliged to retreat.

THE night following, the Turks perceiving the army moving off towards the fleet, they sallied on every side out of the city, and, upbraiding them with cowardice, closely pursued their rear. Nay, Ulemas, governor of Buda, passing the river, so eagerly followed them, that they must have suffered much, had not Vitellio with his Italians made a bold stand, and prevailed on the German as well as Hungarian horse to turn upon the enemy; who by that means were routed, and in the pursuit many of them slain. After this the army retreated without molestation; but seven hundred Germans, who were sick, and straggled behind, were slain in their sight by the Turkish horse. When they arrived at Vienna they were disbanded: but, to cover the shame of this unfortunate expedition, and divert the discourse of people another way, the noble Peter Perenus, one of the greatest lords of Hungary, was, upon a pretended suspicion of aspiring to the crown of Hungary, seized for a traitor by Ferdinand's order, and doomed to a perpetual prison.

Gran besieged; bravely surrendered.

SOLEYMAN being by this time arrived in the country, sent Morád, governor of Dalmatia, and Ulemas, the Persian, to besiege Walpo; which was delivered up by the garrison; who, as a reward of their treachery, were all put to the sword, while the general was treated with much courtesy by the Turks. Pecz, or the five churches, also, and Siclos were quickly yielded; the garrison of which last place were all put to death, because they did not submit sooner. The Soltán, informed of these successes, marched from Buda to besiege Gran, then governed by two proud Spaniards, Liscanus and Salamanca; who, being summoned, boasted of their courage and fidelity. Mean time the Turks planted their batteries against the weakest parts of the wall, which had been shewed them, and made a large breach; but were bravely repulsed in three assaults. However the two Spanish commanders, fearing the event of the siege, it was resolved to surrender the city. To this end Salamanca, with the approbation of the officers, although the soldiers were against it, went to the Turkish camp, and in his way commanded those who defended the water-tower to withdraw for their safety into the city. The soldiers, frightened at this order, retired with such precipitation, that the vigilant Turks broke in before they had all gotten out, slew those whom they found there, and possessed the castle. Salamanca, being brought before Abmed, insisted on high terms; but could obtain no better than to surrender at discretion. This being signified by letter to Liscanus, he delivered up the city, and the Turks entered peaceably. But when the garrison was come to Presburgh, the two governors, with some other officers, were arrested, on suspicion of treason.

Siege of Alba Regalis.

SOLEYMAN entered Gran on the 10th of August, and converted the Christian churches into Mohammedan temples. Then, fortifying the city, he went and razed the castle of Tatta, which surrendered to him. From hence he proceeded to Alba Regalis, so called, because there the antient kings of Hungary were crowned and buried. This city is seated in the middle of a lake or marsh, and approached by three very broad causeys, with fair houses and gardens on each side. It is surrounded also with strong walls, and a deep ditch filled with water, which makes it difficult to be besieged. On the enemy's approach, Barcotius, the chief commander, would have had the suburbs destroyed; but the citizens would not consent, as thinking them defensible. As soon as the Turks, with their multitudes, began to surround the place, five hundred Hussars (K), who were in garrison, not used to be cooped-up, departed out of the town in the night. Mean time the Turks, by the continual firing of their cannon, battered down the planks and timber which kept in the sandy mold, whereof the fortress was built; afterwards, having, with incredible labour, in twelve days time, filled up the ditches and lake, they assaulted the bulwark of the suburbs towards Buda; and, being continually relieved, at last gained it.

The city yielded.

On this occasion the very women and religious gave a helping hand. Among the rest, a tall Hungarian amazon, thrusting among the soldiers to the top of the Italian fort, which still held out, with a great scythe, at one blow, struck off the heads of two Turks, who were climbing up the rampiers. That day, being the 25th of August, the Turks could penetrate no farther; but soon after, making another assault, they, by favour of a mist, got to the top of the rampiers before they were perceived by the besieged. In fine, they won the suburbs,

¹ RICAUT, ubi supr.

(K) These were Hungarian horse, who, our author says, lived by robbing, and were called by the infamous name of Hussars.

- a and the people fled ; but the draw-bridge being pulled-up, and the gate exceeding small which led into the city, great numbers of them were slain, and among them the general Borcatius, whose head and hand, being cut off, were shewed about by the enemy on the point of a spear. Hereupon the magistrates surrendered the place upon articles, and the soldiers in garrison retired to Vienna. Soleyman after this entered into Alba Regalis : and, notwithstanding his proclamation, that the Hungarians had nothing to fear, within three days, ordered the principal citizens to be slain : although some will have it, that he only put to death those who bore offices at the time when they revolted from the young king to Ferdinand. However that be, he soon after returned to his capital, leaving the Tartars to ravage the country. At length, in 1547, a peace was made between the emperor Charles V. and Soleyman, for five years, wherein king Ferdinand was likewise included ". Thus far the Christian historians.

" RICAUT, ubi sup.

S E C T. III.

Expedition to Persia, India, and Africa, with the siege of Malta.

- c IN 954, Alkasib Mirza (A), being greatly injured by the Persians (B), flies to the Soltân, and shews how he might subdue all Persia, offering to conduct the forces himself. Soleyman, persuaded by his discourses, supplies him with a large sum of money, to raise an army for recovering his dominions (C); and, early in the spring, moves himself towards Persia with numerous forces. In this march he is met by his sons Bâ-yezîd, governor of Ikonium, and Mostafa, governor of Amasia; who, having kissed their father's hand, are sent back (D) to their governments. Being entered into Azerbejan, Soltân Burbân (E), descended from the ancient kings of Shirwan, surrenders both himself and territories to him. Presently after he commits the custody of Tibris to Alkasib Mirza: who, seeing himself neither able to do any thing, nor safe from the attacks of the Persians, demolishes the palaces of the Shâb, and retires with his forces to the imperial camp, which was now before Vân. Soleyman with this additional strength makes a vigorous assault; whereupon the besieged, on the 19th of Rajeb, on condition of having their lives, surrender this strong and noble city. Hence he leads his forces to Amzeh, where he surprises and routs part of the Persian army.
- d MEAN time, being informed by his spies, that the Shâb's immense treasures lay weakly guarded in the cities of Ispâhân, Kashân, and Kamid (F), he sends Alkasib Mirza, with some light-armed troops, to seize them. The Mirza executed his orders so well, that routing the guards, little expecting his coming, he got possession of the riches; and, after destroying the adjacent country, returns laden with spoil. With part of the prey he obtains of the covetous Wazîr Azîz Allah, to be made associate with the governor of Bâghdâd. When he comes there, he repents of having deserted the Persians, and sends private letters to the Shâb; in which he begs pardon, promising for the future to be faithful to him, and a diligent spy upon the motions of the Turks. His colleague Mehemed Pâshâ, no less watchful of his actions, quickly accuses him to Soleyman, and receives orders to send him in irons to the Porte.
- e BUT before the order arrived, he was informed of what was transacting by some friends, made with Persian money; and, as there was no other way to escape, flies into Gurjistân (G). The Georgians about a year before had surprised Mostafa Pâshâ, governor of those parts, when little suspecting such perfidiousness, and cut his whole army in pieces. To revenge these deeds, Mehemed Pâshâ is sent with a good body of troops into Gurjistân; where, after several battles fought with various success, he at last entirely routs all the enemy's forces.

(A) In the annals of the Soltâns he is called Erkasîs Imîza, by some mistake; and is said to be the Shâb's brother, as well as king of Shirwan.

(B) They say his wife was ravished by the king of Persia. Cant.

(C) The name of which is not mentioned by the Turks; nor can we find it elsewhere. Cant.

(D) Some Turkish chronographers say, that Soleyman was told, his sons were come to dethrone him: but that as for his reputation sake, he did not care to stain his hands with his own blood, he commanded them to return home: yet, afterwards, on a fuller discovery, he put Mostafa to death, as will appear by the sequel. Cant.

(E) It signifies demonstrative; but turned into a proper name, it denotes something strong, and, as it were, invincible. Such names, once frequent among the Turks, are now almost quite disused. Cant.

(F) It may be the city called Kom. Cant.

(G) The Turkish annals say, that Tabmasp having ordered his subjects to retire with their effects into the mountains, the Turks were so incensed against the Mirza, for being baulked of spoil, that filling his head with apprehensions of danger from Soleyman, he fled to one of the princes of Kaldea (or Irâk Arabi), who having delivered him up to Tabmasp, he was put to death by his order.

This

A. D. 1549 { This done, he takes and razes seven of their strongest castles: after which he withdraws to a winter in Diyârbekr. Early in the spring he re-enters the country, and, meeting no opposition, reduces above twenty cities; then placing garrisons in the fortresses, and establishing the provinces in the Soltân's obedience, he returns to Constantinople ^a.

Revolution in Tunis. { We are now called to see what is doing in Africa. When Barbarossa was sent with a fleet to assist the king of France, Muley Hassan, king of Tunis, fearing that fleet was prepared against him, passed over to Naples, with a design to go meet the emperor at Genoa, and crave his farther protection. But while he staid there, advice coming that his son Amîd, who had been left to defend the coast with the men of war, had usurped the kingdom, he, with 1800 Italians, the refuse of jails, headed by one Giovanni Battista Losfridi, immediately put to sea; and landing at the Guletta, by the persuasion of some traitors, marched to Tunis, with his small forces, which, with their leader, were all slain, excepting 500, and Muley Hassan taken, whose eyes were put out. Tonarres, governor of the Guletta, judging the emperor injured, by Amîd's seizing the throne without his consent, sent for Abdo'l Mâlek, a natural son of Muley Hassan, who, reparing to Tunis in the absence of Amîd, was, by favour of his veil, mistaken for him, and admitted into the castle by the governor. But this new king dying when he had scarce reigned one month, Mohammed his son, but twelve years old, was advanced in his room, under the direction of three governors, who ruled at pleasure. Of them Muley Hassan obtained leave to retire to the Guletta; and thus very luckily escaped the bloody hands of his son Amîd; who, soon after, was invited by the citizens, weary of the evil government of the triumvirs; and entering into Tunis without opposition, put all his enemies to death with the utmost cruelty.

Dragut's success. { Thus things remained till the year 1550; when Dragut Rais, a notable Turkish pirate, having surprized the cities of Africa and Mohammedia, in the kingdom of Tunis, from thence much infested the Christians both by sea and land. Of this daily complaints being made to the emperor Charles, he sent Deria, assisted by the knights of Mâlta, with a strong fleet and army, to besiege the city of Africa, which they took by storm the 10th of September; and having razed it to the ground, ravaged the neighbouring coasts, and returned. Dragut, provoked with this loss, excited Soleyman to make war on the emperor and king Ferdinand, although the five years truce was not yet expired. Accordingly in the following spring, the Soltân furnished Dragut with 140 sail, commanded in chief by Sinân Pâshâ, who suddenly took and sacked the castle of Augusta in Sicily. They then landed in Mâlta; where having battered the castles of Manet and St. Paul to no purpose, they sailed to the little isle of Goza, five miles distant; which they ravaged, and carried off 6,300 people into slavery ^b.

Tripoli taken by the Turks. { This done, they passed over for Tripoli in Barbary, bestowed also on the knights of Mâlta by the emperor; and in August closely besieged that city. They carried on their approaches so expeditiously, that they planted a battery within 150 paces of the wall; in which they made a large breach even with the ditch: but the besieged repaired it so well in the night, that there was no assaulting it. At length having, by the direction of a French deserter, battered a place which could not well be repaired, the soldiers were so terrified, that they obliged the governor Vallier to capitulate; and all that two knights sent for this purpose could obtain from the Pâshâ, was a promise of liberty. Upon this the place surrendered on the 15th of the same month, and the castle next day: but Sinân, instead of keeping the articles, though he twice swore to them, took from the garrison both their effects and liberty. Nor could Arramont the French ambassador prevail on him to release more than 230 of the least useful. He also insisted, for a while, on being paid the charges of the war. They dealt barbarously by poor John de Chabas, gunner of the castle, who, during the siege, happened to shoot off the hand of the chief clerk of the army; for after cutting off his hands and nose, they set him into a hole up to the middle, and then shooting at him with arrows, at last cut his throat ^c.

Temeswar reduced. { THE affairs of the east being thus settled, Soleyman thinks of enlarging his dominions to the west. To this end Mehemed Pâshâ, Beglerbeg of Rûm-eli, is sent with the European army to take Temisbwar (or Temeswar), the strongest city in all Hungary. The Pâshâ having made himself master of the neighbouring towns Bachi, Buchbergi, Katzu, and Chenad (H), lays close siege to the city: but an army coming to its relief superior to his own, he sends to court for a speedy supply. Hereupon the prime Wazîr, Mahmûd Pâshâ, hastens, with the rest of the Othmân forces, to his assistance. Thus strengthened, he routs the enemy; and

^a CANT. p. 207, & seqq.^b RICAUT, in Soleyman.^c Ibid.

(H) Cities, as it seems, lying between the Danube and Saxe; which country is called by the Turks, Bacha Orda. CANT.

- a then taking the city by storm, annexes to the empire the whole territory of Temeswar, almost as large as a Beglerbeglik; the custody of which he commits to Kâsım Pâshâ (I), with a good garrison ^d. A. D. 1553.

THE Christian historians say that this city was taken by Abmed before-mentioned, and Ali Zolnuk Pâshâ of Buda; and that, contrary to their faith, they put the garrison to the sword. They ^{yielded} tell us also that the same generals took the castle of Zolnuk, but failed in their attempt upon Ersam; as Ali did next year in the siege of Agria, having been obliged to raise it, with the aids of 6,000 men: but that Soleyman, at the solicitation of Arramont, ambassador from Henry II. of France, in 1553 sent a fleet into the Tyrrhenian sea, which did great harm upon the coast of Italy, and the islands of the Mediterranean. To this let us add, that the same year Isabella, not being able to defend herself against the incroachments of the Turks in Transylvania, surrendered that province to Ferdinand, and so retired into Poland ^e.

MEAN time the Othmân affairs are not so prosperous in Asia. Shâh Ismaël, son of Toma-sib (K), after the departure of the Musulman army (L), enters the Soltân's dominions, and suddenly takes Ardish and Agdash (M), putting to the sword all the Turks he could find in those cities. Hereupon Iskander Pâshâ is sent, with good part of the Asiatic forces, to oppose the Shâh; but being met by him, is routed, with the slaughter of the greater part of his men. Thus fortune smiled on the Persians in lesser battles, only to shew them her sting in greater: for Soleyman having ordered the prime Wazîr Mehemed Pâshâ, with what army he had ready, to winter about Tokâd (N), in Ramazân 960, joins him near a place called Arkileh (O) with the rest of his forces. Here he receives certain information, that his son Mostafa (P), who, on suspicion, had been confined the year before, was engaged in a plot against his life; and, after finding the thing to be true, orders him to be strangled. When he was come to Hâlep, Jehân Ghîr (Q), another of his sons, departed this life: after which he commanded his eldest son Selîm to winter with his forces in Marâsh ^f. The Shâh takes Arjis. Hejrah, 960.

THE Christian historians speak of this Mostafâ as a young prince of great endowments, and ascribe his death to the intrigues of a lady of the seray, or seraglio, whom they call Roxolana. They say, that in order to procure the succession for one of her four sons, she first, by artifice, prevailed on the Soltân to marry her, and then attempted to make Mostafa away by poison: but that, failing in her design, she began to accuse him to Soleyman of rebellious practices; shewing letters sent from her creatures, who watched his motions, and among the rest one from the Pâshâ who had the government of the prince, and the province of Amasia, with intimations of a report, that he was contracted to the king of Persia's daughter: that these suspicions being confirmed by the subtlety of the grand Wazîr Rustân, Roxolana's son-in-law, Soleyman at length gave into them; and with an intent to put him to death, sent for him to attend him in the camp: that Mostafa, depending on his innocence, went; but on entering his father's tent, was seized by seven mutes, who strangled him, while Soleyman, from behind a curtain, with frowns and other threatening signs, urged them to dispatch him. The same authors add, that his dead body being shewed to his brother Jehân Ghîr, who was very crooked, that prince, who loved Mostafa extremely, after reproaching his father with cruelty, stabbed himself, and died on the spot: that this execution was succeeded by a mutiny of the soldiers who accompanied Mostafa, in which 2,000 men were slain: and that the Janizaries, when they came to know of his death, with a great noise, and their swords drawn,

^d CANT. p. 209.^e RICAUT, ubi supr.^f CANT. p. 210.

(I) A famous Turkish general, afterwards Wazîr, who founded, or enlarged, the new colony at Galata, where are now the magazines, and called it after his own name. Cant.

(K) It ought to be Shâh Tomafib (rather Tahmâsh, or Tahmâshp, as the Persians write and pronounce it), son of Ismaïl: for Tahmâshp reigned fifty-three years, dying in 1576.

(L) As if the Persians were not Musulmans, or true believers, on account of their differing from them in a few circumstantial matters.

(M) A town on the borders of Shîrwân, in maps corruptly called Ergish and Elata. Cant. They are rightly called Arjish and Aklat, or Khalât, as written in some maps, and lie above 300 miles from Shîrwân, to the north of the lake of Wân.

(N) A city of Anatolia, not far from Amasia; according to some, the ancient Eudocia. Cant.

(O) Or Eregli, in the road from Koniya, or Ikoniun, to Hâlep.

(P) A fourth son of Soleyman, who was said to have excited all his brothers against their father. The Turks say, the Soltân suffered them to go unpunished for a year, in hopes of their repentance; but perceiving their obstinacy, caused only Mostafa to be strangled, as author of the rebellion. Jehân Ghîr also, by some, is thought to have been poisoned by his order. After these rebellions, Soleyman made a law, that the sons of the emperors should not have any government, but be detained in the royal city; and though since this law some are reported to have had Sanjâks, yet it is never so now. Cant.

(Q) That is, bearer of the world; so called by his father, as being so humped, that a globe seemed to be placed on his back. Cant.

A. D. 1554. broke into the tent of Soleymân, who had much ado to appease them, by depriving Rustân of his employments. But to return to the Persian war ².

Persia invaded.
Hej. 961.

At length, in the year 961, Soleymân, entering Shîrwân, sends a herald to the Shâh (R), to tell him he is ready for battle, and challenges him into the field. But the Persian answering neither by words nor deeds, he besieges Revân (S), his regal seat; and, taking it in a few days, destroys the royal gardens, palaces, and country-houses; then sets fire to the city itself, the glory of all Persia. After this, he leads his forces to Nahjivân (T), and, by the conduct of Soltân Husseyn (U), lays waste all the province between Tibris and Marâghé (X), utterly destroying the cities, towns, and villages, with fire and sword. Having taken this severe revenge of the Persians, he, at the approach of winter, sends his forces into quarters about Amasia. Next spring Shâh Kuli Soltân (Y) comes to him near Arzerûm (Z), imploring his protection. From thence he marched to Baghdâd, where he received ambassadors from the Persian king, humbly suing for peace; which at length is concluded: and in virtue thereof, the cities of Van, Marâsh, and Mosul, are made the boundaries of the Othmân empire.

Peace concluded.

A pretender taken.

While Soleymân was thus employed in Asia, a certain impostor appeared in Dobrujeh (A), under the name of Soltân Mostafa (B); who, getting together forty dissolute men, had cruelly laid waste not only this, but all the neighbouring provinces. But before this pretender, by reason of the distance, could be restrained by the Soltân, Bâ-yezîd, his sixth son, by an admirable stratagem, drew him into a snare, and sent him in chains to his father, who was about to dispatch Mostafa Pashâ with an army to oppose him (C).

False Mostafa. THE Christian writers give a very different account of this affair. They tell us, that this false Mostafa was set up by Bâ-yezîd himself, to try his strength against his brother Selâm; from whom, by his mother's liking, he wanted to wrest the succession to the empire: that Portân Pashâ being sent with forces against the impostor, he was deserted by his followers, and taken with some others; and that, having on the rack confessed the designs of Bâ-yezîd, they were all drowned in the sea: but that Bâ-yezîd was pardoned by the intreaties of Roxolana.

France assisted.

ABOUT this time a war being kindled between the kings of Spain and France, the latter, much pressed by his enemies, desired the aid of a second fleet, which Soleymân sends under the command of Karli Ali Beg (D); who, finding no opposition at sea, ravages the coasts of Spain (E), and carries off the inhabitants. The Spaniards, to put a stop to his progress, recall their troops; by which means the French, commanded by Korban (F), gain a complete victory, slaying 40,000 of the enemy on the spot.

Ormûz invaded by the Turks.

SOLEYMAN, encouraged by this success, sends another fleet to Hurmiuz (G), under the conduct of Peri Râis; who, having plundered all the maritime provinces of that kingdom, returns,

2 BUSBEQUIUS'S Embassy, l. 3. RICAUT.

(R) The Turks are forbidden by their law to wage war without acquainting the enemy of their coming. If this does not bring them to reason, they think themselves innocent of the blood that may be shed—but they do not always observe this rule. Cant.

(S) A famous city of Persia, corruptly written in the maps Erwan. Cant. The author mistakes; Erwân, or Irvân, is no corruption. It may also be written Revân, or Rivân, and Irivân.

(T) Corruptly in the maps Nah Schuan. Cant. This is indeed a corruption; but we know of no maps which have it. It is written in maps Naksivân and Nakchuan. The Arabs write Nakhjowân.

(U) He seems to have been one of the Persian princes who frequently at that time submitted to the Othmân dominion. Cant.

(X) Corruptly in maps Marraga. Cant. Marâgha is the true name. They are his Turkish authors who have made the corruptions: for the Turks are not near so correct in writing proper names as the Arabs and Persians.

(Y) One of the Persian revoltors, famous only for music. There are still extant most elegant airs of his. Cant.

(Z) That is, Grecian, or European land: for the Turks call whatever lies west of Arzerûm, with all Anadol, or Asia Minor, parts of Europe. It is the capital of Armenia Major. Cant. Arzerûm signifies Grecian, or rather Roman land, not European; nor do the Turks call the country to the west of that city part of Europe, but part of Rûm, or rather the country of Româns, whose empire extended in Asia as well as Europe.

(A) A plain country on this side Mount Hæmus, extending along the Danube from Drista in Walakhia to the mouth of that river. The inhabitants, called Chitaki, originally Turks, entertain travellers with almost unparalleled hospitality. Cant.

(B) Doubtless the son of Soleymân, lately strangled.

(C) Surely from this and other circumstances, this pretender must have had some thousand men instead of forty.

(D) From the name of Karli, he seems to have been some renegade Christian.

(E) The Christian historians say, that the Turkish fleet this year did great harm on the coast of Calabria and Sicily: that the Venetian admiral ravaged it in revenge for rifling some of the republic's merchant ships; and, having done them much damage, ransacked Durazzo, then in the hands of the Turks.

(F) He seems to have been Charles duke of Bourbon, general of the emperor's army, to whom he revolted from the French. But as neither the German nor French annals mention this battle, I take it to be a fiction of the French, to induce Soleymân the more easily to assist them; an artifice I have known them use at Constantinople in my time. Cant.

(G) The name of Hurmuiz (rather Harmiuz) is by the Turks given to the island of Ormûz and Portugal, with the seas belonging to those countries, because pearls are found there, called by the Turks Hurmiuz.—I should think a returns, laden with spoils, to Constantinople: but being pursued and attacked by the enemy's fleet, while he negligently sailed along the Egyptian sea, his scattered ships were partly sunk, and partly taken, especially those laden with the plunder. Some of the lightest vessels escaped, in one of which was Seyd Ali Kapudán, who, gathering his dispersed ships, re-attacks the enemy's fleet sailing back in disorder, and, by a strange turn of fortune, gets the advantage, sinking several of their vessels. At the same time Toygun Páshá, Beglerbeg of Buda, with his forces, took three cities (H) from the Christians, and carried away numberless captives. On the other hand, the governor of Jezayr (I), Salib Páshá, subdued Bijaneb (K), and three other castles in Spain. A. D. 1555.

FRANCHA PADISHAHÍ, not succeeding against the Spaniards according to his wish, desires a third fleet to be sent to his assistance. Soleyman rejoicing that he could break one egg with another, without hurting his own hands, readily grants his request, and sends Kapudan Páshá (L), with a great fleet to join the French, who take Misina, Rija, and Marioka (M), with three lesser neighbouring isles (N); and laying waste all the coasts of Apulia (O), returns in autumn with great spoils. France assisted. Hej. 953.

THE Othmán empire being thus strengthened on every side, Soleyman gives his army respite, and spends almost ten years in regulating civil affairs. His first care was to finish the Jámi founded by him three years before; which he does in so beautiful a manner, that, excepting Sant'a Sophia, there is not, it is thought, the like in the world, and calls it by his own name Soleymaniye (P). After this, perceiving many things to be performed irregularly, as well in the court as out of it, and that the confused degrees of offices begat contention among his officers, he makes new regulations both civil and military (Q), assigning to every one his rank at court, in the city, and in the army. System of laws.

THIS new system of laws prepared the way to greater designs. Soleyman had discovered by his former expeditions that the German empire was too powerful, and its barriers too strong to be thrown down, without greater preparations, and longer time to effect it. He therefore makes the greatest warlike preparations, and replenishes his exhausted treasures ^a. Great preparations.

THIS is all which the Turkish authors, made use of by prince Cantemir (R), have given us to fill up the space of ten years in the history of Soleyman's reign; during which time, however, there happened, according to the Christian writers, several transactions; some of equal moment with any before related under this Soltán. A. D. 1557.

MUCH about the same time that the Turkish admiral seized the isles of Blambis and Elba, as hath been already set forth, Ali, Páshá of Buda, surprised the strong castle of Buboza, in Hungary: but failing to do the like by Sigeth, he sat down before it next year, on the 30th of June, with a great army; who, on the 20th, won the out-walls; but, in storming the castle, were repulsed with the loss of 800 men. Then they endeavoured to fill up the marsh and ditch about the town, but to no purpose; yet, July the 12th, the Páshá made another assault, which continued for five days together, though without success. Hereupon he raised the siege on the 21st; yet returned six days after, and gave another assault as fruitless as the former, having in all lost 2,000 men, and spent 10,000 shot. Nor was he more fortunate the next year in the siege of this place, which he was forced to raise on the approach of Ferdinand's Siege of Sigeth raised with loss. A. D. 1555, 1556.

^a CANT. p. 211—215.

think the Persian gulf was here meant, if it was not said, that the fleet returned towards Constantinople; which could not be done but by sailing all round Africa, a thing never yet performed by the Turks. Cant. This passage is to be understood of the island Harmúz, and perhaps the adjacent country of Persia (formerly part of the kingdom of Harmúz), rather than the sea of Harmúz. As for the fleet being said to return towards Constantinople, so it did, in passing up the Red Sea to Suez, or Sues. But pearls are called Harmúz from the island, not the island from pearls.

(H) Of these three towns the names do not occur. Cant. Perhaps the passage in the text has reference to the taking of Buboza hereafter-mentioned.

(I) Or with the article Al Jezair (that is, the island or peninsula), called in maps Algiers. Cant.

(K) Perhaps Nizza, a castle in Piedmont, which the French, aided by the Turkish forces, took about that time.

(L) A famous Turkish high-admiral, whose marketplace and Jami still exist in Constantinople. Cant.

(M) That is Messina, Regium Julium (or Reggio), in Calabria, and Mazjerka: the two first are, by a common mistake of the Turks, placed by them in Spain. Cant.

(N) Perhaps Minorca, Twica, and Formentera (or Fromentera). Cant.

(O) The Christian historians only say, that in the year 1555, the admiral Páshá having recovered his strength after the damage received the year before, surprised the isles of Blambis and Elba, belonging to the duke of Florence; but mention nothing of the loss of Messina, &c.

(P) This temple stands on a high hill, looking towards the harbour, and built with so much art and elegance, that no structure deserves to be compared to it, as I have heard affirmed, not only by Turks, but foreigners of several nations. Cant.

(Q) The book of laws is intitled, Kanún Námih; that is, The book of rules, or regulations; containing the expences of the Turkish government, and may be called The state of the Othmán empire.

(R) The Tarikh al Othmán, translated by Gaudier, under the title of Annales Sultanorum Oshmanidorum, ends at the year 1550.

army,

A. D. 1556. army, under Polcerber and Sirini, who routed his army near Boboza. This, with the coming a down of new supplies under young Ferdinand archduke of Austria, the king's son, so terrified the Turks, that they quitted Boboza, Sammartin, San Laurence, with several other small places, and fled to Five Churches, not without the loss of many in their retreat; and the governor of Raab burned the suburbs of Alba Regalis, carrying off several thousands of the enemy's cattle.

Bâ-yezîd's at- BA-YEZID, the younger of Soleymân's two sons who were then alive, having been pardoned tempt against Selim. by the intercession of Roxolana, as before related, behaved very dutifully so long as his mo-
 A. D. 1557. ther lived. But she dying in 1557, he began to tamper with the soldiery; which the Soltân being informed of, he sent to put him in mind of his duty: and to place his sons more at a distance both from himself and each other, ordered him to remove from Kutayeh to Amasia, b and Selim from Magnesia to Ikonium. But Bâ-yezîd, instead of removing, sought delays, and petitioned either to remain where he was, or have some province less distant than Amasia assigned him; especially as his brother was, by a new order, allowed to reside at Prusa, where he was daily contriving mischief against him. Upon this Soleymân sent over two Pâshâs to see his sons settled in their respective provinces: but Bâ-yezîd still declining to obey, his father prepared to oblige him by force; and finding the Janizaries favoured his party, applied to the Mufti for his opinion in the case; which was, that both the man (for no person was named), and his accomplice, deserved death. This sentence was published, and sent to Bâyezîd; who, in answer, desired his father not to meddle in the quarrel between him and his brother; intimating, by the same hand, that if he did, he knew how to destroy the country, c and provide for his own safety.

Defeated by him, flies into Persia. FOR all this he set out towards Amasia; and being gotten as far as Ancyra, Selim thought he
 A. D. 1559. might, without danger, repair to Ikonium, which opening a passage to Syria, Soleymân took care should not fall into Bâ-yezîd's hands. But that prince, having gathered a good force, by the resort of vagabonds, and some troops of Kiurds, resolving, if possible, to be master of that city, marched thither to attack Selim, who was then joined by all his father's forces. The battle was very fierce; and though after 40,000 had fallen on both sides, Bâyezîd was forced to retreat, yet he did it leisurely, and in good order. This action, wherein a handful of men were engaged against a well-disciplined army, supported by great artillery, procured Bâ-yezîd much reputation, and made Soleymân, in June 1559, haste over into Asia: d however he resolved not to remove far from the coast, fearing the Janizaries might revolt.
 Mean time Bâ-yezîd, by letters, desired a reconciliation with his father; who, dissembling resentment, seemed inclined to pardon him: but at the same time resolved to have him seized; and ordered the governors on the borders of Persia to prevent his escape. Bâ-yezîd, being informed of this design by his friends, set out from Amasia with twenty followers; and so well deceived the governors of Siwâz and Arzerûm, by setting them upon a false pursuit, that he got safely out of Turky, and was kindly entertained by Shâh Tabmasp, who promised to reconcile him, if possible, with his father¹.

Put to death. FOR all this, in some time, the Shâh, whether with or without grounds is uncertain, grew jealous of him; and having dispersed his men in the villages about Kasvîn, clapped him and c his three sons up in prison. Of this an account being sent to Soleymân, continual messages
 A. D. 1560. passed between him and Tabmasp about delivering him up: but finding the Shâh could not be brought to that condition, he resolved to try if he could get him made away with, by proposing to pay the charges which Tabmasp demanded for maintaining Bâ-yezîd and his men.
 To this end Hassan Aga and the Pâshâ of Marasb were sent to Persia; where, after they had gone to prison to see the prince (whom they found in a miserable plight), that they might be sure of their prey, they struck the bargain; upon which, Hassan being admitted a second time, strangled him, and three of his children, with his own hands. Mohammed the youngest, an infant, suffered the same fate at Prusa.

Zerbi in- waded. THE knights of Mâlta having for some years solicited the pope, the Spaniards, and other f powers, to assist them in recovering Tripoli in Barbary, taken from them nine years before by the Turks, they at length obtained the desired succours, and in February 1560 failed for the isle of Zerbi (or Ferbi); and although Drâgut governor of Tripoli had landed before with 800 Janizaries, and provided for defence of the city, yet having laid siege to the strongest castle in the island with 8,000 men, it was presently surrendered to them. But while Karawân, a poor king of the Moors, from whom that isle had been taken, was gravely discouraging with the generals about the methods for driving the Turks out of Africa, advice came that Piala Pâshâ, the Turkish admiral, was at hand with a fleet of eighty five gallies, and was daily reinforced from divers parts. Hereupon they obliged the chief of the Moors to pay the king of Spain the same tribute which was paid to Drâgut, and began to fortify the castle. But g

¹ RICAUT, ubi supr.

- a the soldiers were so long about it, that the Turkish fleet came in May, and surprised them before they could get on board. It happened luckily, however, that the greater part of the ships, and fourteen gallies, had set sail the night before; and the grand master had recalled his gallies in April. Of the rest ten gallies were immediately taken, as were afterwards some others which ran aground. Only some few escaped: but the viceroy, and the admiral Giovanni Andrea Doria, got off the night following, in two small frigates, to Málta. A. D. 1560.
Doria defeated.

- THE Turks, flushed with this success, laid siege to the castle, which, notwithstanding the reinforcements brought by Drágut, held out three months; and would have done so much longer but for want of water, there being only one large cistern to supply the garrison; so that many died of thirst. Hereupon Don Alvares the governor, with the admirals of the Neapolitan and Sicilian gallies, endeavoured to escape in the night aboard a vessel which lay under the castle: but being discovered by the Turks, they were all taken; on which the soldiers gave up the place, on condition of having their lives (S). Thus ended this unfortunate expedition, in which the Christians, one way or other, lost 18,000 men, besides a great part of their fleet. The following year also they, with their gallies, spoiled several places on the coasts of Italy, Sicily, and Málta. Philip II. king of Spain sent indeed a fleet against them; but lost twenty-five of his gallies, with Mendoza the admiral, in a dreadful storm, which happened on the 18th of September ^k. The castle taken.
Losses of the Christians.
A. D. 1561.

- Not long after this, Ferdinand (to whom Charles his brother had resigned the empire in 1559), having, with much difficulty, obtained a peace of Soleyman, he, in a dyet held at Frankfort, November the 24th 1562, got his son Maximilian elected king of the Romans. Thither came Ibrahim Pashá with presents, and a letter written to the emperor in a haughty stile, containing the conditions of an eight years truce; the most material of which was, that Ferdinand should pay to Soleyman a yearly tribute of 30,000 ducats for Hungary, and the arrears of two years. The truce held till 1564; when that prince dying, and Maximilian succeeding to the empire, Melchior Balas, the emperor's lieutenant in Hungary towards Transylvania, first violating it, surprised several towns on those frontiers. This was revenged by the Waywood of that country, who took Sakma, with the wife and children of Balas in it: then being aided by 4,000 Turks, and 300 Moldavians, he ravaged the emperor's territories, reducing Haden, and laying siege to Ungar. Hereupon Maximilian sends Lazarus Suendi, a valiant commander, with 8,000 men, to besiege Tokay, which he took in February 1565, and then the rich town of Erden. Peace concluded.
German's
break it.

- MEAN time Soleyman, to facilitate his intended revenge, dispatches an ambassador to the emperor, to put him in mind of the league between them, while the Pashá of Temeswar besieged Giula with 6,000 men, as the Transilvanians, in June, did Erden. Chernovich, the emperor's ambassador, returning from Constantinople about this time, assured his master, that the Turks meant nothing but war, for all their pretences to the contrary. Hereupon he made all necessary preparations for it, although the Turkish ambassador was still dissemblingly treating of peace, notwithstanding the archduke Charles had cut off 8000 Turks at one time, who were ravaging the borders of Stiria. In short, Maximilian being confirmed on all hands, that Soleyman had projected grand designs against him, not only fortified his frontier garrisons, but resolved to call a general dyet of the empire next spring at Ratisbon, to provide against the attempts of the common enemy; where we shall at present leave this matter, to relate the proceedings of the Turks in the Mediterranean against the knights of Málta ^l. Prepare for war.

- THE continual damages done to the subjects of the Othmán empire at sea by those knights, determined Soleyman to take a severe revenge upon them; to which he was particularly solicited by Kossum, son of Barbarossa king of Algiers, and Drágut governor of Tripoli. Having fitted out a fleet for that purpose, and exhorted his commanders to destroy the Máltese pirates, as he called them, the better to effect it, he gave them a map of the island, with draughts of the several fortifications on it. The grand master of the order, John Valetté, otherwise Parisot, a Frenchman, being informed of these preparations, immediately went to work; and while he laboured for his defence at home (by pulling down the suburbs and trees, which were injurious to the fortified places, strengthened the garrison, and laid in necessaries of all kinds), he sent abroad to the pope and other Christian princes, to demand their aid against the common enemy of the cross. Málta invaded.

^k RICAUT, ubi supr.^l RICAUT, ubi supr.

(S) Among the prisoners the chief were don Alvares Sandes, don John of Cordova, and a son of the duke of Medina: the two first were ransomed, but the last was never heard of; being (as was conjectured) made away with by Piála the admiral, to disguise his concealment from Soleyman, who made great enquiry after him.

A. D. 1565.

The Turkish
forces.

MEAN time the Turkish fleet, commanded by Piâla Pashâ, set sail, consisting of 142 gal-lies, 17 galliots, and 22 ships of burden (T), with other small vessels. They had on board above 30,000 soldiers, among whom were 7,900 Spahis, or horsemen, and 4,500 Janizaries, all under the conduct of Mostafa Pashâ, a man seventy-five years of age. These forces arriving at Mâlta on the 18th of May, put into Porto Maggiore on the north-west side of the island, which is about twenty miles long from north-west to south-east, and twelve broad. On the east side of the isle are two harbours, divided by a high bridge, or tongue of land, which shoots out north-eastward. That to the north is called Marza Musbet; the other to the south

City described.

Port Maggiore. Within this last, on the left hand, are four promontories; on the second of which, at the very point, on a rough high rock, stands the strong castle of St.
Angelo; and adjoining to it the town, by some called the New City, separated from it only by a wall and ditch, and situate in a hollow cut out of the main rock, strengthened also by the sea and human industry. Upon the third head of land stands a castle called St. Michael, with a town also (U); and at the point of the tongue of land another castle called St. Elmo, very strong both by nature and art.

Forces there.

For the defence of this important place there were in the island about 1,300 Messinars, French, Spaniards, and Italians; 1,000 seamen of the knights fleet; 500 men in St. Angelo castle; 5,000 country people fled into the fortified places; 500 knights, besides esquires and priests. In the city of Mâlta itself, called the Old City, which stood in the middle of the island, there were 200 soldiers, as many citizens, and 300 country horse^m.

St. Elmo besieged.

THE Turks landed 20,000 men at Marza Siroco, on the south-east side of the isle (X), while Piâla Pashâ, with 7,000, went to view the castle of St. Michael: but at length, having resolved to besiege that of St. Elmo, they cast up a mount (Y), in order to batter it, and play upon the gallies in the haven, that so they might open a way for their fleet to enter:
but being beaten from that post by the cannon of the castle, they raised another mount upon higher ground, and ran their trench nearer to St. Elmo, from whence they annoyed not only the harbour, but also the castles of St. Angelo and St. Michael. At length Drâgut arriving with thirteen gallies and 1,600 soldiers, followed by ten galliots with two companies from Bona, the Turks of a sudden, on the 3d of June, assaulted St. Elmo, with an intent to scale the ramparts which were highest the bulwark; but the besieged, from a strong flanker made in the ditch of earth and faggots, repulsed them with great loss. However, returning to the attack, they, by their multitudes, at length gained the flanker; whereby they commanded all that part of the ditch towards Marza Musbet, and there, with amazing celerity, so fortified themselves, that the besieged could not hurt them. In the night they filled the ditch under the bulwark; but lost 800 men in a fresh assault, to forty-five only of the Christians.
However, knowing that the besieged expected supplies every hour, and that, provided St.
Elmo was in their hands, they might secure their fleet in Marza Musbet, as well as more easily carry the rest, they battered the castle anew for four days without intermission, and the night following gave an assault: but the place having been reinforced a little before with 200 knights, and several other soldiers, when the enemy, with their ladders, had almost gained the top of the walls, they were beaten down with such violence by the besieged, that they durst not attempt scaling afterwards till the last attack.

Fiercely assaulted.Gallantly defended.

THE Turks, more enraged, continued their batteries with greater fury than before, for eighteen days together, with 13,000 shot. During this time also they made a bridge over the ditch broad enough for ten men to march a-breast, placed 4,000 musketeers about the ditch, and brought their fleet to St. George's Shore, not far from the castle. When they began the assault, for which these preparations were made, a body of valiant knights and soldiers ran to the bridge, and there resolutely encountered the multitude hand to hand. Mean time some thrust barrels of powder under the bridge, others threw down stones and wildfire upon the enemy, while others galled them at a distance with their fire-arms. At length, the bridge blowing up, 800 Turks were destroyed, and many wounded; which obliged them to retire, after they had lost 2,000 of their best men, and the Christians near one hundred.

RICAUT. THEVENOT. Trav. part i. ch. 5.

(T) Besides one cast away near Modon, wherein were lost 6,000 barrels of powder, 13,000 cannon-balls, and 400 Spahis.

(U) This town is now called La Sangle; and by The- venot's account there is no castle there at present.

(X) Others say, at Mount Pelegrino, on the west side of Porto Maggiore.

(Y) In the place where the city of Valetta (built afterwards by the grand master), called also the New Town, now stands.

a THE same day the grand master caused a brigantine to be carried from Marza Musbet over land to Marfia Scala (Z), which he sent with letters to the viceroy of Sicily, requiring the most speedy relief. In the interim, the enemy, after battering the castle for twenty-fours, gave a most dreadful assault on the breaches, which lasted five: but they were at length repulsed, after they had lost a vast number of men, with the famous Drâgut, and the besieged two hundred. The grand master, perceiving the Turks determined to take St. Elmo, and preparing for the last assault, sent three knights to bring off the defendants in pinnaces: but they resolving to maintain the place or perish, on the 13th of June the Turks, with all their power, both by sea and land, surrounding the castle in the dead of night, set up their ladders, made bridges, worked at their mines, and with their artillery battered down the rest of the walls to the very rock. So that although the besieged did wonders in its defence, yet having already lost 400 men, the Turks, about noon, prevailed over the small remainder, and slew every man. Then, beheading the dead knights, and cutting out their hearts, hanged them up by the heels in their red cloaks and red crosses, in sight of the other castles; which so enraged the grand master, that he ordered all the Turkish prisoners to be slain, and his men to give no quarter^a.

b UPON this loss, La Valette sent again for succours to the viceroy of Sicily; who was yet so cold on the matter, that he only let the knights residing there depart with two gallies. Mean while he rejected proposals of surrendry from Mostafa, whose designs were discovered by Philip Leskeris, a Greek of Patras, who swam from St. Michael to the Turkish fleet. At the same time a Greek, being by a boy from a window discovered making off to the enemy's camp, was taken and cut in four pieces. The new supplies having in a sally slain 200 Turks, Mostafa blocked up the harbour of Marza Musbet with his chained gallies, and sent to acquaint Soleyman that the place was much stronger than he expected; requiring more supplies, in case the siege was to be continued. Presently after he fell to batter the towns and castles of St. Michael and St. Angelo with the greatest fury.

c WHILE three gallies from Messina, with 900 soldiers on board; besides the knights of the order, were obliged to return, as not being able to land in safety, Kossum king of Algiers, with 2,000 soldiers, seven gallies, and ten galliots, came to reinforce Mostafa, who, at his request, permitted him to carry on the siege of St. Michael, and joined 2,000 of his own best soldiers to Kossum's troops. Hereupon he ordered ninety small vessels to be carried from the port of Marza Musbet, over land, to Aqua Martia, designing to besiege the castle on that side by water. Of which the grand master being informed by a Christian fugitive, he ordered a chain to be drawn from the castle of St. Angelo to the place where the enemy designed to land: but while the Turks stood nonplused at this baulk, a deserter undertook with hatchets to cut the chain; which being perceived by the besieged, five or six swam thither with their swords, and having killed two of the workmen, the rest fled. However, July the 15th, the king began the siege both by land and water: but during the assault by sea, which lasted three hours, the besieged, with their cannon, slew him 2,000 men, and sunk twelve gallies; while the rest of them, unable to land their men for the chain, were forced to retire. The attack by land endured five hours; wherein many of the enemy were slain, and 200 of the besieged.

d FOR all this the Turks battered the castle so violently, that they beat down in the day the repairs which were made by night. On the 20th they threw a bridge over the ditch, and the 28th gave desperate assaults in three places; but being forced to retire, went to work at a mine, which, when just finished, was countermined. August 1, the besieged, in a sally, burned the bridge, and next day slew 300 of the enemy; but lost their captain Rufus. However the Turks filled up the ditch at the castle bulwark; and having by this time made breaches both in the walls of the New City and the castle of St. Michael wide enough for carts to enter, on the 17th they assaulted both places at once with incredible fury and noise: but being heard by the knights in the city of Mâlta, they sallied with their horse, and fell on those at Aqua Martia by surprise, with so much vigour, that they fled to their companions; who, being discouraged, gave over the assault, with the loss of more than 1,500 men, to not above 100 of the besieged.

f MOSTAFA PASHA, finding neither this, nor a subsequent attack had any effect, wrote to St. Angelo acquaint Soleyman with the small hopes there were of subduing the place. At the same time, the viceroy being informed by one Salazar, who ventured to Mâlta in a boat, as well as by others, how much the Turkish forces were diminished, he began to think of going to their relief. Mean while old Mostafa continued the siege by battering, mining, filling up the ditch,

^a RICAUT, &c. ubi supr.

(Z) The bottom of all the Marza, or haven.

A. D. 1565.

New City in danger.

Succours arrive.

The Turks retire.

Take Scio.

A. D. 1566.

Affairs of Hungary.

The empire threatened.

casting up mounds, and the like. But all his attempts being frustrated by the valour and address of the besieged, the admiral Pâshâ, at last fearing to be surprised by the Christian fleet, which he heard was preparing against him, ordered 110 galleys to be in readiness, and took his soldiers on board. However, after long expectation, finding no appearance of the enemy's fleet, he landed them a second time. Hereupon the Turks, with greater fury than ever, battered the walls, which had been repaired; and having made new breaches, on the 18th of August attacked both St. Angelo and St. Michael, at noon-day with all their power, and, after three repulses, came on again; but were at last glad to retreat to their trenches. The great master did wonders during this cruel fight, which lasted five hours: yet the obstinate Turks renewed the assault next day at the same places, as they did the day following no fewer than seven times, but without success. They were repulsed also at the Spur, when they attempted to enter St. Michael's castle, with great loss, to only 100 of the besieged; but among them many brave knights. For all this, the Pâshâ assaulted the same breaches next morning early, with such success, that three or four ensigns broke into the New Town. On which the grand master, hastening with all his soldiers and citizens, both men and women, old and young, against the enemy, with much difficulty, and incredible bravery, forced them at sun-set to retire, with the loss of 2,000 men, and only 200 of his own ^o.

THE knights having repaired the breaches, and raised other works for their defence, with great application, Mostafa resolved once more, with all his troops, to storm the breach in the wall in St. Michael's town, where there ensued a most terrible fight; and though the Turks were driven back, their general obliged them to renew it; yet to as little purpose. The besieged also in a sally at night drove them from their mount, and blew up one of their mines, which destroyed threescore men. The enemy was now preparing to make a last effort, when, September 7th, the Christian fleet of seventy-two galleys, with 10,000 soldiers, and Don Garcias the viceroy of Sicily, on board, put into Mâlta, and landed the forces. After which the viceroy returned for Sicily, to bring over more forces, in order to attend the Turkish fleet. On this news the Turks hastened on board their ships, which passed out of the haven of Marza Musbet on the 11th, in order to be gone. Yet Mostafa being informed that the Christian succours did not exceed 3,000 men, he landed 7,000 Turks at Port St. Paul (seven miles north-west of the city), towards which they marched: but being met by the Christians, they were quickly routed, and pursued to their galleys, with the loss of 1,800 slain, and 400 drowned. During this siege, which lasted five months, they lost in all 24,000 men, with twenty-four great cannon, and the Christians five thousand.

ALTHOUGH the Turks were scarcely ever more baffled in any enterprize than this, yet we do not find that Soleymân resented it in the commanders, as was customary; but after the return of his fleet, he sent Piâla Pâshâ with it to subdue Scio; whose governor, being his tributary, had held intelligence with the Mâltese during the siege. The admiral, having arrived there in the middle of April 1566, possessed himself of the haven, and then sends for the governor, with twelve of the principal citizens, whom he lays in irons. Then seizing the town, he appoints a Turkish governor, and leaving a strong garrison in the place, sails for the coast of Apulia in Italy, where he destroyed many villages, and carried away many into captivity.

IT is time now to return to the affairs of Hungary. Maximilian having in the dyet called at Frankfort, as before-mentioned, obtained aid from the empire, he drew together a great army out of Germany, Italy, and other countries. These, under the command of Suendi, laid siege to the town of Husth, on the borders of Transilvania; whose Vayvod aspiring to be king of Hungary, upon the same terms as John had been, much inflamed this rupture between the two empires. At the same time the Pâshâ of Buda attacked Palotta, about eight miles from Raab, with greater fury than success, having been forced to rise from before it with the loss of some cannon and baggage, by the count of Hoffenstein, who also took Wrisboun. Soon after count Salm reduced Tatta, or Dotis; and the castles of Gestes, Witba, Ischolika, and Samboc, were abandoned by the enemy. Mean time count Serini, governor of Raab, understanding that Soleymân approached, detached 1,500 horse and foot to lie in ambush for the forlorn of the Turkish army; who, being met with near Five Churches, were routed, and most of them slain or wounded ^p.

IN this place, after a long chasm, the Turkish historians coincide with the Christian writers. According to these latter, the Germans began the war. But the former speak as if Soleymân first entered on it without any provocation, pursuant to a project he had long meditated of overthrowing the German empire. They tell us, that when he had made vast preparations, as before-mentioned, he assembled his troops from all parts, in order to execute the a design, in which only Mohammed Fatih had gone before him, and which he himself had already attempted in vain. A. D. 1566.

^o RICAUT, &c. ubi supr.^p RICAUT, &c. ubi supr.

To this end, in the year 974 he leads a mighty army to Adrianople; from whence dispatching the prime Wazir Pertu Pâshâ with some troops to seize Giula (A), he follows more slowly with the rest. Though every thing else was ready, youth was wanting, and old age refused to execute his purposes. Worn out with years, and fatigued with labours, when he came to Segetwar (B), he was seized with a slow fever, which, increasing by degrees, turned to a malignant one. Though grievously tortured, and almost past hopes of recovery, yet invincible in mind, he orders the city to be invested and assaulted. But the governor making a brave defence, it increased his illness, and, while he prayed the God of all the worlds to grant that his army of the faithful might conquer the place, he expired on the 13th of Sefer (C). Soleyman dies. Rejrah 974. A. D. 1566

THE prime Wazir having sent notice to Selim, then at Magnesia, of his father's death, which he concealed from the soldiers, he, on the 18th of that month, takes the city by a general assault, assisted by an accidental fire (D): and at the same time news came of the reduction of Giule ¹.

THUS ended, in the taking of two towns, all Soleyman's vast preparations, and vaster design, against the German empire, which the Turkish historians boast of. Let us now supply their account of the siege of Sigeth, or Ziget, from the Christian writers. The Soltân being come to the Drave, ordered a bridge to be made over that river and the morafs beyond it, a mile in length. This proved a work of almost insuperable difficulty, but was at last accomplished; and the army passing over, sat down before Sigeth. This city is strongly situated in a marsh, about fifteen miles to the north of the Drave, on the frontiers of Sclavonia; and was then a bulwark to prevent the Turks entering into Stiria. It had a garrison of two thousand three hundred men, under the command of the valiant count Nicholas Serini. The Turks, having raised a great mount, and planted a battery, August 8th fired terribly upon the new town from three several places. They next, with incredible labour, cast up a mountain in the midst of the marsh, and from thence so cruelly annoyed the inner castle of the town, that the count thought fit to withdraw the garrison, and set it on fire. On the 10th, they furiously battered the old town in three places, and set all hands at work to make two ways or bridges thither over the marsh, from whence the Janizaries, covered with sacks and the like, mightily annoyed the besieged.

AT length on the 19th they entered the town with so much fury and celerity, that many of the garrison were slain before they could recover the castle. Against this next day they planted four batteries; and having also made two plain ways to it over the marsh, they fiercely assaulted the breaches on the 29th; but were beaten back, with the loss of many men, and one of their Pâshâs. The Turks having, by the 5th of September, undermined and blown up the greatest bulwark of the castle, at length took that also near the gate. This made the brave Serini retire into the inner castle, which on the 7th was set on fire by them also (E). So that the distressed general, putting on a new suit of cloaths, and encouraging his soldiers to sell their lives as dear as they could, sallied out at the head of them, with his sword and target in hand, into the midst of his enemy, by whom he and his followers were all slain, excepting a few. And taken.

BUT this siege cost the Turks very dear; for, by their own confession, they lost 7,000 Janizaries, and 28,000 other soldiers, besides volunteers, and three great Pâshâs. Serini's head was cut off, and set on a pole for the army to gaze at; after which it was sent by the Wazir as a present to count Saim (F), then at Raab. Goila (or Giule) also was delivered to the Turks by the governor Keretschen, for a great sum of money, and most of the garrison put to the sword, contrary to articles. But they were not so successful near Alba Regalis, where several of them were slain, and the governor of that place taken by George Thuriger; for which he received knighthood, with a gold chain ².

¹ CANT. p. 215, & seq.

² RICAUT in Soliman.

(A) So called in the map. Cant. It is a strong city, towards Transylvania, and near Great Waradin.

(B) By the Christians called Sigeth. Cant.

(C) The Christian historians say, that Soleyman fell sick towards the end of August, when the siege was at the height, being taken with a looseness; and that hereupon he withdrew to Five Churches (about twelve miles to the south east), where he died on the 14th of September; which, according to their account, was some days after the place was taken.

(D) The Turks ascribe intirely to Soleyman's prayers this fire, by means of which the city was taken, and not by force of arms. Cant.

(E) It is hard to say whether this or the former was the accidental fire spoken of by the Turkish historians.

(F) With this short letter: In token of my love, I send thee the head of a most resolute and valiant commander, thy friend. His body I have decently buried, as became such a man. Sigeth bids thee farewell for ever.

A. D. 1566. SOLEYMAN reigned one-and-forty years, and lived seventy-four (G). He had seven sons : a Age and sons. Morâd, Abdollab, Mehamed, Mostafa, Selim, Ba-yezîd, and Jêhân Gbîr ; who all but Selim died before their father.

His character. SOLEYMAN was a prince of an heroic and invincible mind ; of great valour and wisdom. He endured the hardships of war with surprising patience. Besides the Turkish language he spoke also the Persian and Arabic. In that kind of poetry by the Persians called Nazm (H), he excelled all for elegance and wit. His Persian, Hungarian, and naval victories, gained him a great name ; but his reformation of the courts of justice, and his excellent laws, by which the Othmân empire still flourishes, acquired him greater. On this account the title of Kanûni was ascribed to him by the Turks *. According to the Christian writers, this Soltân was tall, and of a slender make ; his neck long, his face pale and wan, his nose long and hooked ; by nature ambitious and magnificent ; more faithful to his promise than most of his predecessors : in a word, he wanted scarce any thing worthy of a prince. The same authors add, that Mohammed the prime Wazîr, for fear of the insolence of the Janizaries, to conceal his death till Selim's arrival, ordered his physicians and apothecaries to be secretly strangled. However, the Janizaries beginning to mistrust the matter, he caused the dead body, in the Soltân's usual dress, to be brought into his tent, sitting upright in his litter, as if he had been ill of the gout ; which dissipated all their suspicions †.

Death concealed.

* CANT. p. 127.

† RICAUT, ubi supr.

(G) The Christian writers make his age seventy-six years, and his reign forty-six.

(H) A poetical metre often occurring, particularly in the Korân, and for that reason accounted more elegant than the rest. Cant.

C H A P. XII.

The Reign of Selim II. Surnamed Mest (A).

S E C T. I.

11 Soltân Selim. Hejrah 974. A. D. 1566.

SELIM, upon notice of his father's death, leaves Magnesia, in the year 974, and, on the 9th of Rabio'lawel, which day the planet Merikh (or Mars) ruled in the firmament, he entered Constantinople, and mounted his father's throne. Next day all the great men of the empire, according to custom, appeared in mourning at court, to adore the new emperor, and comfort him on the occasion with excellent speeches. Three days after he sets out with a few attendants towards Segetwar (or Ziget). But at Belgrade finds Mehemed Pâshâ, who had sent the army into winter quarters. As Soleyman's demise was still a secret, the soldiers were troubled at Selim's unexpected arrival in the camp ; and fearing he might, after the example of his grandfather of the same name, do some injury to his father, ran to their arms : but the long-concealed death (B) being divulged, they paid obedience to him as their sovereign.

Soleyman's funeral.

AFTER this, Soleyman's body being laid in a gilt chariot, is conducted by the whole army to Constantinople, and deposited in the court of the Jâmi built by him ; where all the ecclesiastics of that metropolis were ordered to finish the Telaveti Korân (C) forty times a day for forty days, and by their prayers obtain peace for his soul. Moreover Selim caused a Mirab (D) to be erected before the Jâmi, and over his grave a large marble Turba (E), which is religiously visited by the Turks ; for they are persuaded that he was a great favourite of heaven, because he not only lost his life at the siege of Segetwar, and so became a Shahîd (or martyr),

(A) That is drunken, because he was extremely given to wine ; yet he never omitted the usual prayers. There are other historians (besides Saadi Effendi, we suppose he means) who pretend that he was seized with a sort of divine enthusiasm, which, lest people should suspect to be hypocrisy, he declared to be drunkenness. But such colourings are for the vulgar. Cant.

(B) In all forty-one days, as both Turks and Christians agree. This, to a person ignorant of the Turkish customs, may be deemed impossible to be done among so many thousand soldiers ; but will not be doubted by those who know the more than Pythagoric silence of the Othmân inner court, where no man speaks, unless ordered, nor dares so much as sneeze or cough. Cant.

(C) The reading of the whole Korân, which is usually done over the grave of the deceased. Cant.

(D) It signifies both an altar and the southern part of a Jâmi. Cant.

(E) Or monument.

a but was also Gâzi (or conqueror), two cities having been taken under the conduct of his relicks. A. D. 1566.

WHEN the funeral ceremonies were over (F), Selîm, after being again confirmed in the throne by all orders and degrees of people, celebrates his father's victories with a splendid triumph. Then he distributes to the Janizaries and Spahi the usual Bakshish (G), or donative; and presents the Ulema (H), with the rest of the ecclesiastics, who officiated at the funeral, with silk robes and money ^a.

THINGS being thus settled at home, Selîm was desirous of peace abroad, particularly in Hungary, as Maximilian himself, that he might be more at leisure to suppress a dangerous rebellion in Arabia, and oppose the Persians in case they attacked his dominions, which Peace with Germany. A. D. 1568.
b stood in some danger from that quarter. At last it was agreed on, that if the emperor would send ambassadors with the arrear of tribute-money, they should have a safe conduct, in order to treat of peace. They arrived at Constantinople August 22^d, and six days after visited the prime Wazîr Mosâfa Pâshâ, with Parteu and Terhad Pâshâs; but could not obtain audience of the Soltân himself till September 21st, when they were honourably received, and made rich presents. At length the peace was concluded at Adrianople, in January 1568, for eight years, on these conditions; that each prince should hold what he had: that the emperor should pay 30,000 ducats, as a yearly tribute, for Hungary: that the subjects on neither side should pay any thing to those of the other prince: and lastly, that the Vayvod of Transilvania should be included in the treaty ^b.

c MEAN while Ulian Oglî (I), the Arab, hearing of Soleyman's death, throws off the Othmân Arab tribe yoke; and persuading his neighbours to join in the rebellion, cruelly lays waste the territories of Baghdâd: but they are quickly routed and dispersed by the governor of that city, in conjunction with those of Bâsrah (K) and Shebresul (L). The same year Selîm finished a bridge (M), subdued. Hej. 975. A. D. 1567.
began five years before by his father, not far from Constantinople.

A PEACE having been concluded with Germany, Selîm had now leisure to turn his thoughts towards the Persians, who, by their continual incursions into the Othmân dominions, had justly given occasion for a war: but he was deterred from this by the difficulty of the passages, which fatigued his troops, as well as rendered the carriage of warlike stores and provisions impracticable; for want of which, numerous armies of his ancestors had miscarried. To Attempt to join the Don and Wolga. Hej. 976. A. D. 1568.
d remove this obstacle, he sends a body of soldiers over the Euxine Sea to Kiese (or Kaffa), and orders the Khân of Krîm, with labourers hired out of all the tribes of Tatars, to encamp near the river Ezel (N), in that place where it is but six Italian miles distant from the Teri (O), and by a canal to join the two rivers. By this means he hoped to penetrate with ease out of the Euxine, through Maille (P), and those rivers, into the Caspian Sea; and, as the Persians had no fleet there, so, by transporting an army into Shîrwân, without much difficulty, subdue all Persia, the Khân immediately repaired to the place appointed, by ^a CANTEMIR Othman Hist. p. 218, & seq.

^b KNOWLES edit. Ricaut in Selymis.

(F) Formerly they used the greatest solemnities, and chose the colours at the emperor's death; but at present they only mourn three days in red, and that not very strictly. Cant.

(G) Each Janizary, of whom there are 40,000, receives twenty dollars; and every Spahi, whose number is 15,000, twenty-five. Cant.

(H) This is the name used to denote all those who are distinguished with any ecclesiastical degree. They have very great authority with the people. If they join with the army to oppose any measure, you may be sure it will never be carried into execution. Cant.—The Ulema may be called the body of the Turkish clergy.

(I) Of the tribe of Bani Omer, or the sons of Omer, who live in the deserts towards Baghdâd. They were very powerful; and in Soltân Mosâfa's reign were masters of the city of Basrah for two years. But Daltaban Mosâfa Pâshâ of Baghdâd expelled them, and crushed the whole tribe, by killing 30,000 of them. Cant.

(K) Corruptly called Bassora and Balsora. Prince Cantemir commits several mistakes about this place. He says, 1. That it was formerly called Bosra; whereas Bosra stood in Syria, to the south of Damaskus. 2. That it lies six days journey from the mouth of the Euphrates; yet is but one days journey and half from thence. 3. That Kurma, the most noted mart in the east, tho' unknown to all the geographers, is situated at the mouth of that river: whereas M. Otter, who was at Basrah in 1743, and mentions all the places from thence to the mouth of the river in the Persian gulf, mentions no such place, any more than Thevenot, Tavernier, and others, who were there before him. Without doubt, by Kurma is to be understood Kurna, or Kernâ, a castle at the confluence of the Euphrates with the Tigris, two days journey above Basrah; but mentioned by many travellers, and a place of no considerable trade.

(L) A city of Kiurdistân, towards Persian Irâk. Though a Pâshalik of three horse-tails, yet the promotion is looked on as a kind of banishment.

(M) Built over the lake Buyuk Chekmejah, where it runs into the Propontis, at a village of the same name, about two hours distance from Constantinople. It is all built of square stones, and 2,000 paces long; a truly imperial work. Cant.

(N) Or Edel: hence Edilla and Atilla: so the Tatars call the river named by us Volga, and the ancients Rha.

(O) The Don, Dona, or Tana, the ancient Tanais.

(P) This, from the context, must be the Palus Meotis; but at present the Turks give that name to the gulf of the Black Sea, which washes Ochakowa, the Oibiopolis of the ancients. The Palus is now called by the Turks Azak D. nizi (or Dengbizi); that is, the Sea of Azak (as they term Azof), and its mouth Ghierch Tama Bogasi. Cant.

A. D. 1568

way of Aizderkhin (Q): but scarce one third part of the canal was finished, when the labourers were so infested with continual rains, cold storms, and want of provision, that many perishing, the rest were forced to abandon the work. This expedition was, however, attended with one advantage; namely, the submission of thirty thousand Nigayan Tatars (R); who having thrown off the Russian yoke to receive the Othmân, departed with their families to settle in the Krim ^c.

Peace with Persia.

WHILE these matters were in agitation, an ambassador arrives from Shâh Tâbmasp, king of Persia, to treat of peace. The ambassador was honourably entertained at Adrianople but had not been there long, when going to visit Mohammed the prime Wazîr, a Jamoglan shot at him with a musket. Although the ball missed the ambassador, he was very much startled: and the assassin being seized, boldly answered in his presence, before the prime Wazîr, that his reason for shooting at the ambassador was, that he was an heretic, and sent from an heretical king; who, being an enemy to their religion, was not worthy of a peace. But this zeal for orthodoxy did not save him from punishment; for, after being dragged at a horse's tail through the city, he had first his right hand and then his head cut off. In December, Selîm allowed the Persian, for him and his retinue, five hundred ducats a day; but having delivered his presents, carried on forty-four camels, in December, the peace was soon after concluded, and he returned home.

Yamnen revolts. Hejrah, 977. A. D. 1569.

THE Venetians renewed their league with Selîm this year; but he broke it the next, without any just provocation, as the reader will see presently ^d. About the same time Muttahir Sharîf, of the kingdom of Yamnen, with some Arabs gained to his party, suddenly attacks Morâd Pâshâ, Begler Beg of that province; and having slain him with his whole army, frees the country from the Turkish yoke. But Sinân Pâshâ, governor of Egypt, in conjunction with Ozdemîr Oglî (S), being sent against the rebels, comes on them by surprize, routs, and having dispersed them, reduces the whole country once more to the Othmân obedience. But the joy for this success was interrupted next year, by a sudden fire breaking out at Constantinople, which raged with such violence for seven days together, that almost the whole city was laid in ashes.

Moors in Spain. Hejrah, 978. A. D. 1570.

IN 978, the remains of the Spanish Saracens (T), who had hitherto been ill treated under the dominion of the Christians, rise in arms, seize Garbia (U), and make Mansûr, of the race of the Bani Akhmer (X), their king; then vigorously attacking the Spaniards, vanquished them, with great slaughter. But, perceiving themselves too weak to withstand their power long, they send ambassadors to implore Selîm's assistance. The Soltân, whose thoughts were bent on the conquest of Cyprus (Y), promises aid, but not till that island was taken. In the mean time he exhorts them to keep as close as possible, and only stand on the defensive.

Cyprus invaded by the Turks.

SELIM had now sent numerous forces to subdue Kîbris (Z), under the conduct of the prime Wazîr, while Kapudân Ali Pâshâ kept off succours by sea. The Wazîr begins with the siege of Nikosia (A), and vigorously assaults it: but his attempts being baffled by the strong situation of the place, as well as obstinacy of the garrison, he is obliged to turn the siege into a blockade, and put his soldiers into winter-quarters. However, the following year, Kapudân Ali Pâshâ, with a fresh supply of ships, stores, and forces, under the command of Partu Pâshâ, arriving in Cyprus, renews the siege; and having made breaches in the walls, both by battering and

^c CANT. ubi supr. p. 220, & seqq.^d RICAUT, ubi supr.

(Q) The Tartarian kingdom now subject to the Russians called Astrakan. The name in Persian signifies the habitation of dragons, or the lord of dragons, given to the inhabitants for their fierce and wild nature; which is now so tamed, that when they have an opportunity, they do not attempt to recover their liberty. Cant.

(R) These had habitations assigned them with the Bujâk Tatars in Bessarabia (now Bujâk); among whom, even at this day, are reckoned above 18,000 Tatars of Kazan, exactly resembling their brethren in the Russian empire, in language, looks, and manners. Cant.—These are commonly called Nagay and Nogay.

(S) Ozdemîr signifies, all of iron. He was the Turkish Sampson; and of so great strength, that they believe he never had or will have his fellow. Cant.

(T) It is scarce possible that the word Saracens, which is unknown to the Orientals, should be in the original Turkish historian. And indeed prince Cantemir is not uniform in giving the proper names, sometimes using the Turkish, at other times those of his own fancy.

(U) Or with the article Al Garbiya; that is the western coast; a noted kingdom, now subject to the king of Portugal, and called by the Christians Algarva. Cant.

(X) A descendant of the antient Saracen kings, driven out of Spain by Ferdinand the catholic. Cant.

(Y) The Christian historians tell us, that Selîm being about to build a magnificent temple at Adrianople, with a monastery, college, and alms-house, but wanting lands wherewith to endow them, some of his courtiers put him upon conquering Cyprus; and this they say, was the cause of his breaking the peace.

(Z) That is, Cyprus.

(A) Called by the Turks, Kibris. To which city they seem to have given the name of the whole island: because it was the first which they subdued there. Cant.

a. mining, carries the city by assault. The island seeing itself destitute of relief, Magnûsa (B) A. D. 1571. first, and then the rest of the towns, strive to gain the conqueror's clemency by a surrender^c.

We have the less reason to find fault with the Turkish historians made use of by prince Cantemir, for giving an imperfect account of the Christian victories, since they give such a scanty relation of their own. To make an estimate therefore of the glory due to either side in this important war of Cyprus, we must have recourse, as on many occasions before, to the Christian writers. According to them, when this war was proposed by Selim in council, Mohammed Pâshâ, the prime Wazîr, was against it, both on account of the dishonour in violating the peace, and danger of the enterprize: but the arguments of Mostafa Pâshâ, and the admiral Piala Pâshâ prevailing, preparations were set on foot both by sea and land. These motions b being observed by the Venetian merchants, whom now the Turks began to obstruct in their trade, Antonio Barbaro, ambassador from the republic, complained to the prime Wazîr of the injustice they were going to do his nation; and, more to gain time to prepare against the storm, than in hopes to divert it, pressed the sending an ambassador to Venice, in order to prevent hostilities by a friendly accommodation.

At length one Kobad was sent from the Porte, with letters from Selim, mentioning several pretended injuries done to his subjects by the Venetians; and requiring the surrender of the island of Cyprus by way of satisfaction; otherwise he threatened to take it from them by force. The senate answered, that they had always kept their leagues with the Othmâns, even when they might have broken them to advantage: that they had put up with many injuries received c from the Turks; and that Selim, for all he complained, was himself the aggressor. In short, that since the Othmân faith was no defence to them, they would by force defend themselves. The ambassador being sent away privately, for fear of the people, the republic made all the necessary preparations for defence of the island: they sent also for succours to the Christian powers; but could obtain none, except from the pope, the king of Spain, and some Italian princes.

CYPRUS lies at the farther end of the Mediterranean Sea, on the coast of Anatolia to the north, and that of Syria to the east. It is shaped like a spread bat, with its head pointing north-east towards the bay of Alexandretta, or Skanderûn. It is 150 miles long, and sixty broad. It has undergone many vicissitudes of fortune. It was given or exchanged by Richard I. d king of England, to Guy of Lusignan, king of Jerusalem; and continued in his line by many descents till it came to Janus. This prince, in 1423, was taken prisoner by Mâlek Al Asbrâf Barséy-bay, eighth Soltân of the Cberkassian Mamlûks in Egypt; but was ransomed, on paying a yearly tribute of forty thousand crowns. John the son of Janus had a natural son called James, who during the broils which arose in his weak father's reign, usurped the kingdom; and was therein protected by the Egyptian Soltân, against Lewis son to the duke of Savoy, who had married Charlotta, the daughter of John, by Helena, of the family of the Paleologi. Afterwards James, to strengthen himself the more, joined in league with the Venetians; and having married Katarina Cornelia, daughter of a noble Venetian, died not long after, in 1470, and left her big with child: but the posthumous son dying soon after he was born, queen e Katarina was persuaded by her brother to make a resignation of the kingdom of Cyprus to the republic, who held it till it was taken from them in this war by Turks^f.

As soon as their ambassador was returned to Constantinople, Selim confined the Venetian ambassador Barbaro, and imprisoned all the Christian merchants of the west throughout his dominions. Then having made all things ready for the expedition, to divert the Venetians near home, he, in the beginning of February, sends a good body of horse and foot to infect the borders of Dalmatia; while Piala Pâshâ set sail with the fleet, consisting of two hundred gallies, galliots, and small men of war, with many transport ships. In the way he furiously attacked Tenos, one of the Cyclades; but in vain. At Rhodes he took up Mostafa, the general, and Ali Pâshâ; from whence the former sent a letter, requiring the Venetians, with threats, to f give up Cyprus: for they reckon their military expeditions unlawful, unless they give notice of their design to the nation whom they intend to attack.

Being arrived at Cyprus, they landed their forces; and after considering the country very well, resolved to begin with besieging Nikofia, the capital of the island; which had about eight hundred horse and foot in garrison, but most of them natives and raw soldiers. The city stands towards the middle of the island, in an open country, inclosed with a wall eight miles in circumference: but the Venetians had latterly fortified it with new walls, thick rampiers, and eleven strong bulwarks. They had likewise raised three great fortresses, for defence of the place, provided with store of cannon, and other necessaries of war.

^c CANT. p. 221, & seqq.

^f RICAUT, in Selymus II.

(B) That is, Famagusta.

A. D. 1571.
and assaulted.

MOSTAFA PASHA having, on July 22d, incamped within a mile and half of the city, a planted and played his batteries with such wonderful celerity, that the Turks soon ran their trenches to the very brink of the ditch; and then battered the walls so furiously, that in a few days all the curtains between three of the bulwarks were beaten down. At these breaches, however, the besieged made a desperate resistance: but after long fighting, the Turks entered the ditch, which had not been well scoured by the besieged, and made two ways to the walls; which they fortified on the sides with waggons and earth. Then they fell to fixing their ladders, to fill the ditch, and undermine two bulwarks: however, the Christians repulled them in the assault with great loss.

The Turks
repulsed.

AFTER this, Mostafa dividing his army into four parts, attacked four bulwarks of the city with greater fury than ever. For all this, the enemy was bravely forced back, although b the besieged were much diminished by these encounters. Yet, to put the best face on it, a company of Italians, contrary to the opinion of Dandalo, the governor, made a sally to the very trenches of the unwary Turks; but were compelled at last to retire with the loss of many men, and their two commanders. Mean time, Mostafa endeavoured to persuade the inhabitants to surrender, by shooting letters into the city, and desiring a conference with one Constantius: but finding these methods ineffectual, encouraged his men to another assault. However, the besieged still valiantly endured the storm, in hopes of being relieved by the Christian fleet, which now was approaching to their relief.

The city taken.

AT length, the general knowing in what distress the besieged were, artfully caused the army to retire, in order to amuse them into a security; which succeeded so well, that two hundred of his choicest soldiers secretly mounted the four bulwarks, and slaying the negligent guards, took them. These being seconded on all hands by fresh troops, quickly cleared the walls with great slaughter; whilst the governor, bishop, and better sort of citizens, retired to the town-hall; where the Turks, breaking in upon them, put all to the sword. Great barbarity was used by the victors, who slew in all 14,000 people, and took an immense booty (C), with 250 pieces of cannon. This happened on the 9th of September, 1570; and soon after Gyrina (D) was delivered up by Palaccio, the cowardly governor, on condition that he might march off with his garrison.

FROM Nikofia, Mostafa Pâshâ went and laid siege to Famagusta; but finding winter approach, and the place too strong to be soon reduced, thought fit quickly to raise it, and d leave the work for another year.

The Venetian fleet takes several places.

LET us now see what became of the great naval preparations made for the relief of Cyprus. Summer was near half spent, when the Venetian fleet, which had been infected with the plague, sailed for Korsû, in expectation of being joined there by Doria, the Spanish admiral. He not coming quickly, they sailed to Kandia; and on the 12th of August, landed at Suda; where, in the end of the month, Doria and Colonna, the pope's admiral, arrived. The whole fleet, consisting of one hundred and ninety-two galleys, and twelve galleasses, besides victuallers and tenders, about the middle of September, sailed to the relief of Nikofia: yet, hearing by the way, that the city was lost, Doria, in spite of all the arguments used by the admirals of the pope and Venice, would not proceed to succour the rest of the island: but e returned to Messina, as the others did to Korsû: from whence Zani, the Venetian admiral, was, by order of the senate, carried prisoner to Venice, and Venieri appointed in his room.

WHILE the new admiral lay at Korsû, the Venetians, by the advice and assistance of the rude Acroceraunian people, quickly took the strong castle of Khimera; and soon after their vice-admiral Quirini, landing near the bay of Mayna, in the Morea, stormed a strong castle built by the Turks two years before, and put all the garrison to the sword: then razing it, A. D. 1571. carried twenty-four pieces of cannon to Zant. Early next year he reinforced the garrison of Famagusta, with seventeen hundred men, besides store of ammunition and provision, after he had gallantly beaten some Turkish galleys and run them a-ground. For suffering this supply f to get into that place, the governor of Scio lost his head: he of Rhodes, who had guard of those seas, was disgraced, and Parteu Pâshâ made admiral in room of Piâla.

League among some Christian powers.

FROM the beginning of this war, the Venetians, pope, and king of Spain, had been deliberating about a perpetual league against the Turks, without coming to any resolution; when an accident happened which quickly brought them to an agreement: for now Mohammed, the prime Wazir, giving the republic hopes of peace, they sent an ambassador to Constantinople, to see to procure one. This coming to the knowledge of the other two powers, so alarmed z RICAUT, as before.

(C) In the text it is said to have been, by report, twenty hundred thousand millions of ducats. But there must have been some dreadful mistake in casting up the accounts. Perhaps it should be two millions.

(D) It stands on the coast, to the north-west of Nikofia.

them,

- a them, that they immediately agreed to conclude the perpetual league; and the Venetians, ^{A. D. 1571.} inclining rather to them than to the Turk, sent for their ambassador to return, under pretence of furthering the peace, which had been very far advanced. The treaty was signed May the 24th, 1571, wherein it was stipulated, that the sea and land forces should consist of two hundred gallies, one hundred ships, fifty thousand foot, and four thousand five hundred horse, to be ready every year in March or April at farthest. Of this expence, the king of Spain was to discharge one half; the Venetians two-thirds of the other half, and the pope the remainder. Don John of Austria, the king's natural brother, was to have the chief command. Tunis, Tripoli, and Algiers, if subdued, were to remain to Spain; but all other conquests were to be divided among the confederates. These were the chief articles of the league. Mean time
- b the Venetians sent Vincenzo Alessandro, one of their secretaries, by way of the Euxine Sea and Sinope, to Kasbin, in Persia, to excite Shâb Tâbmâsp to make war on the Turks. The Shâb, after long sollicitation, answered, that he would for two years wait the success of the Christians league, and then resolve on peace or war, as he saw occasion: but this imprudent resolution he afterwards repented of ^b.

To return to the war in Cyprus. Mostafa Pâshâ having reinforced his army to near two hundred thousand men, in April this year, renewed the siege of Famagusta. The city is situated on the east side of the island, in a low ground, between two promontories. It was then ^{Famagusta besieged, and furiously assaulted.} two miles in compass, and of a square figure; but the east side more long and winding than the rest. Almost one half of it lay open to the sea; the remainder was defended by a ditch

c not above fifteen feet wide, and a stone wall, strengthened with some bulwarks and parapets. The harbour, whose entrance is narrow, was shut up with a chain; and near it stood an old castle with four towers. It had one strong bulwark, of a modern fortification; and its garrison consisted of two thousand five hundred Italians, two hundred Albanian horse, and two thousand five hundred Cypriots, all determined men. These forces were commanded by Baleoneus, and Bragadino was governor of the city.

- Mostafa having battered the walls and town severely with his cannon and mortars, made several successive assaults; but was always so effectually repulsed, that in a few days he lost thirty thousand men; which made the Turkish commanders not only admire the bravery of the besieged, but begin to despair of success. However, the Pâshâ having ordered mounts
- d to be cast up higher than the parapets of the city, and walls raised of the broken stones on each side, to save his men from the flanking shot of the besieged; they renewed the assault, which was maintained daily on the breach for six hours together, and also kept them in a continual alarm by night. Finding all this prevailed not, they tried to possess themselves of Limosin gate, by setting fire to a great quantity of wood heaped near it for that purpose; in hopes its intolerable offensive smell (E) would have obliged those who defended it to abandon that post: but they endured it with patience for twenty-four hours.

- While the senate of Venice wrote to the citizens to hold out, promising them speedy relief, the Turks fell to sinking mines in four several places. One of these blowing up great part ^{The garrison weakened.} of the wall near the tower on the haven, they presently mounted, and began a most terrible
- e fight, in which they lost four thousand men and fourteen colours; whereas of the besieged were slain not above one hundred. For all this, the enemy played their batteries so furiously, that on the eighth of June, no fewer than eight thousand cannon-balls were shot into the city; which having so shattered one of the bulwarks that it was ready to fall, the besieged themselves blew it up, and with it above six hundred Turks, who came to assault the place. However, the enemy still obstinately continuing their batteries and assaults, whereby at length the fortifications were greatly ruined, and the garrison reduced to three hundred sound men; the powder likewise being consumed to no more than seven barrels, and other wants increasing upon them, the citizens prevailed on the governor to capitulate.

- Accordingly the place was to be delivered up, on condition that the inhabitants should
- f enjoy their lives, liberty, and goods, with the free exercise of their religion; and that the governor and remainder of the garrison might march out with bag and baggage, five pieces of cannon, three horses, and be safely conducted to Kandia. Hereupon Bragadino, attended by some others of quality, having leave to wait on Mostafa Pâshâ in his camp, the perfidious general had them all secured; and next day the brave but unfortunate Bragadino was brought out to be gazed at, with his ears cut off: after this he was tortured with the most exquisite cruelty, and made to endure the greatest indignities; among which, one was to carry on his back baskets full of earth, to repair the rampiers. At last, being flay'd alive, his head was cut off, and his skin stuffed with straw, hung at the yard-arm of a galley. Two days

^a RICAUT, ubi sup.

(E) This wood grows plentifully in the isle. It is much of the nature of fir, easy to be set on fire, and very difficult to be quenched.

after,

A. D. 1571 after, they hanged count Theupolus : but the famous commander Martinengo had the good fortune to be hidden by one of the Pâshâ's eunuchs, and by the help of a fisherman, got safe to Leptis. The loss of Famagusta was followed by that of the whole island of *Cyprus*¹.

Tunis taken. THUS far the Christian historians. Let us now return for a while to the Turkish. About the same time that the conquest of Cyprus was going forward, Kilij Ali Pâshâ (F), governor of Jezayr, (or Algiers), takes Tunez (G) from the Arabs, and annexes it to the Othmân empire ; while Deulet Gbieray, Khân of the Krîm Tatars, assembling all his hords, enters Russia, and penetrates to the metropolis (H), ravages the country, and slays or carries off all who could not save themselves by flight.

Great naval overthrow. THESE victories were followed by the greatest blow which the Othmâns ever received since the defeat of Ildcrim Bâ-yezîd : by which fortune shewed, that no empire, though ever so extensive, and firmly established, is out of her reach. Ali Pâshâ, having taken Cyprus, left the flower of the army to garrison the towns, and dismissed the European forces, fatigued with twelve months toil : but as he was returning with the rest of the forces by sea, he was suddenly attacked by the enemy's fleet (I), strengthened, as some say, by the assistance of the Germans and Spaniards. The admiral, scorning to fly, bravely engages with the few (K) forces he had, and renders the success of the battle for many hours doubtful : at last, after repelling the enemy several times, he is slain, whilst discharging the part sometimes of a general, sometimes of a common soldier. Upon his death, the Othmân ships immediately take to flight, when the enemy pursuing, sink and take almost the whole fleet^k (L).

Dulcigno taken. ALTHOUGH this is a full confession of the Turkish loss, yet as other matters are extenuated, and so great an engagement deserves a more explicit account, we shall relate in brief what the Christian historians have written about it. While Mostafa was engaged in the siege of Famagusta, the Pâshâs Parteu and Ali, joined by Kilij Ali (M), viceroy of Algiers, with the Turkish fleet, June 13th, landed twelve thousand men at Suda, in the bay of Kandia ; where, after ravaging the country, they were set upon by Justiniano, who slew a great number of them, and forced the rest to their gallies. From thence, sailing by Cytherea, Zant, and Cefalonia, from which islands they carried off six thousand people, they put into Dulcigno, in Dalmatia ; which having been but a little before besieged by a body of Turks by land, was quickly surrendered to them, as were also the towns of Antivari and Budua. But the town of Katbaro bravely withstood their attacks.

Remarkable exploit. MEAN time Kilij Ali, and Kârakoja, a famous pirate, departing with sixty gallies, for ten days, to ravage the Venetian isles, came to that of Karzola, about eighty miles to the east of Ragusa ; and assaulting the town of the same name, Contareni, the governor, and the inhabitants fled out by night, leaving behind about twenty men and eighty women. These all unanimously, with arms in their hands, resolved to die, rather than fall into the hands of the enemy : but while, with stones, fire, and other weapons, they bravely opposed the assailants, these latter were so incommoded by a violent storm, which came suddenly from the north, that they gave over the assault, and went to other places.

Turkish ravages. HAPPENING at length to take a ship bound from Messina to Korfû, they found on board letters to the governor of that place, giving him an account of the above-mentioned league concluded between the Christian princes against the Turks. These letters were immediately sent to Selîm ; who thereupon having ordered his admirals to commit all manner of hostilities in the dominions of the confederate princes, they ravaged not only the coasts of Dalmatia and Istria, but that of Italy, in such a manner as made the Venetians fortify their capital, and other places, with the utmost diligence, for fear of an attack. At length the whole fleet, leaving the Adriatic, sailed for the gulf of Lepanto ; and by the way, paid an unwelcome visit to Korfû^l.

¹ RICAUT, ibid.^k CANT. p. 222, & seqq.^l RICAUT in Selimus.

(F) He is reckoned among the Turks next to Khai-ro'ddîn, or Barbarossa, in sea-affairs. He built a large Jâmi in the suburbs of Top Khaneh, that is, the arsenal, on the Bosphorus ; the foundations of which, as high as the lower windows, they say, were run up in the night, without any signs of preparation, by the galley-slaves ; which at first passed for some miraculous work. Cant.

(G) That is, Tunis ; not Tremisen, as is in the margin of the translation of prince Cantemir's history.

(H) The Turks seem to mean Moskow : but the Russian annals say, they penetrated no farther than Tula, 190 Italian miles short of that city : and that, being overtaken near Kurska, by the Russian army, they were almost all put to the sword, and the spoils recovered. Cant.

(I) At Lepanto.

(K) It is the usual way with the Turks, to ascribe their ill-success, not to the bravery of the enemy, or their own inactivity, but to some accident, or the general's imprudence. Cant.

(L) Both Turks and Christians vary in their account of the number of the Turkish ships : some say they had 270 ; others, at least 170 : but all agree, that no more than 28 escaped. Cant.

(M) Written by the Christian writers, Pluz ales ; which seems to be a corruption of Kilij ali, governor of Algiers, above-mentioned.

a WHILE these things are doing by the Turks, the Christian preparations are going on but slowly. At last, after a long expectation, Don John of Austria, natural son of the emperor Charles V. about twenty-four years of age, with admiral Doria, and the Spanish fleet under his command, consisting of eighty-one gallies, whereof three were from Malta, arrived at Messina. There he found the Venetian fleet of one hundred and eight gallies, six galleasses, two tall ships, and a great many small galliots, under admiral Venieri; likewise twelve of the pope's gallies, commanded by admiral Colonna, his kinsman. On board this fleet, besides seamen, were reckoned twenty thousand good soldiers, and among them several persons of great quality, who went as volunteers in this expedition; particularly Alessandro Farnese, prince of Parma, who afterwards became the greatest general of the age; Francisco Maria, prince of Urbino, b and Paolo Jordano Ursino of Rome. A. D. 1571.
The Christian fleet puts to sea;

WHEN it came to be debated in council, whether they should give the enemy battle, or besiege some town, Requisenex, great commander of Castile, the vice-admiral and director of all Don John's affairs, advised besieging Durazzo, or some other maritime city, rather than fighting: but it being carried in behalf of the latter measure, the fleet set sail from Messina. At Paxo the whole expedition had like to have miscarried by discord: for Don John, finding the Venetian gallies but ill manned, put on board them four thousand Spaniards, and one thousand Italians. Of the former, Tortona, a captain, beginning a mutiny without cause, and likely to do mischief, the Venetian admiral caused him to be hanged at the yard-arm. This his countrymen, and chiefly Don John, took so ill, as thinking it intrenched upon his authority, that all the arguments used by admiral Colonna, could scarce appease him; nor would he afterwards impart his councils to Venieri, but Barbadico the proveditor-general.

BEING informed at Cefalonia where the enemy lay, they sailed directly for Lepanto. On their approach, the Turks, whose fleet consisted of three hundred and thirty-five sail, consulted whether they had best fight the confederates, or lie secure in their harbour. Mohammed Beg, otherwise named Chiroche, or Sirok, a person of great years and experience, was against a battle; urging among other things, that there was no necessity for it. Parteu, the admiral Pâshâ, seemed indifferent in the matter: but Ali Pâsha, who was of a fiery temper, and the great champion of the Turks, was for engaging without delay. In this opinion he was not a little encouraged by the report of Kârakoja; who, viewing the Christian fleet in a swift galliot, by some means mistook the number: so that their advice prevailed, contrary to the information given by two other fly-boats of the great strength of the confederates. On comes to Lepanto.

A BATTLE being thus agreed on, Parteu Pâshâ took on board twelve thousand Janizaries and Spahis, drawn out of the neighbouring garrisons; besides four thousand other soldiers. Then putting out of the gulf, the fleet steered their course for the isle of Corzulates, of old Echinates, half-way between Lepanto and Patras. Their line of battle was thus: Parteu and Ali Pâshâs commanded the center; Mohammed Beg with fifty-six gallies was in the right wing; and Kilij Ali with ninety-five gallies in the left; while Morâd Dragut with thirty gallies, and several other small vessels, brought up the rear. Mean time, the Christians moving towards them, both fleets came in sight, October the 7th, afternoon. Hereupon Don John, having ordered the great ensign of the confederates, which was the signal for engaging, to be hoisted, clad in armour, went in his long boat to encourage the several squadrons of the center under his command; while Doria did the like in the right wing, and Barbadico, the Venetian proveditor-general, in the left. The two fleets meet.

THE day was now well spent, when both fleets were ready for the battle, which was one of the most considerable that ever happened at sea. The signal was no sooner given, than the Turks, with a hideous cry, fell on six galleasses which lay at anchor near a mile a-head of the confederate fleet: but those ships fired so briskly on them, first from their fore-castles, and then as they passed by so galled their gallies with whole broadsides, that several of them were sunk, which made the rest bear farther off. The wind likewise chopped about to the west, and incommoded the Turks with the smoke. However, they soon made good their disordered squadrons, and came on with surprising resolution. Ali Pâshâ, observing the admiral's galley, ran upon her with such violence, that both their beaks were broken off, and fell into the sea. Hereupon ensued a most terrible fight between these two great commanders, and the other ships which seconded them: but as there were in Don John's galley four hundred men picked out of the whole army, and consisting mostly of officers, they entered the enemy's gallies three times to the very main-mast, yet were as often repulsed. The fight begins with great obliquity.

VENIERI seeing how things went, hastened to the general's relief; but on his way was encountered by Parteu Pâshâ with his gallies. Here the Turks behaved so bravely, that notwithstanding the example and amazing courage of that admiral, now seventy years old, they entered the prow of his galley, and must have taken it, had not the sudden coming of two brave Venetian captains to his relief turned the scale a little, though with the loss of their own lives. At length Venieri's ship took two of the Turkish gallies, while Parteu Pâshâ fled out

A. D. 1571. of the danger in a long boat. Not far from thence Colonna, the pope's admiral, being furiously engaged, made great slaughter of the enemy, and took one galley. Ligni, the Genoese admiral, did the like; on board of whom the prince of Parma, with other volunteers, gained immortal honour.

Death of Farbadico and Mohammed Beg.

AT the same time Mohammed Beg falling on the galleasses with the right wing, and being sorely damaged by them; to avoid this inconvenience, as also a shelf lying between him and the shore, he sent Ali, a Genoese renegado, with great part of his gallees, round about on the right, to fall on the rear of Barbadico, who presently tacked about to receive him. But as he had no fewer than five gallees at a time upon his own, he in this terrible fight grappling with the enemy, and shunning no danger, was struck in at the left eye and almost through the brain with an arrow; of which wound he died three days after. This encouraged the Turks so much, that the galley must needs have been lost, had not she been speedily relieved by Nani and Portia. These presently cleared her of her boarders, among whom they made a great slaughter: but were themselves dangerously wounded, and had been lost, if more gallees had not come to their assistance; with which reinforcement they took one of the principal gallees of the enemy. Not far from thence, the noble Giovanni Contareni had a terrible engagement with Mohammed Beg; whose galley at length being taken, and all the men either slain or forced over-board, he was found half dead and dispatched out of the way^m.

Ali Pâshâ slain.

DON John, who had been three hours engaged with Ali Pâshâ, finding himself in much danger, notwithstanding the assistance from Bacianono in the rear; on a sudden called forth his four hundred select men, before-mentioned, from under the hatches, by whose valour that admiral's galley was soon taken. The Pâshâ himself being mortally wounded, and all over bloody, was slain outright; and his head being cut off, held aloft on the point of a spear by Don John, as a trophy of his victory. This sight, with the cry of victory thro' the Christian fleet, so discouraged the rest of the gallees which were still valiantly fighting, that they fled towards the shore, about a mile distant: but several of them were taken by Canalis, who commanded the gallees of Kandia. Among the slain was Kârakoja, the famous renegado pirate; while Ahmed and Mohammed, the two sons of Ali Pâshâ, and nephews of Soltân Selîm, were both taken aboard their galley.

Kilij Ali Pâshâ put to flight.

FOR all this good success, the fortune of the day was still doubtful in the right wing, where Doria was engaged with Kilij Ali, a valiant and expert commander. The Spanish admiral at first seemed to keep off, while the Turkish extended his wing as if to hem him in: yet offered not battle, expecting some advantage. This he soon obtained, by inclosing twelve of the Venetian gallees, separated from the rest, which he boarded and took: only Superantio, a nobleman, rather than fall into the enemy's hand, blew himself and his galley up. Mean time the noise of the firing in this part of the fleet brought Pietro Justiniani, admiral of Mâlta, to Doria's assistance: but coming up singly, he was presently attacked by six Turkish gallees, which plied him so close, that he was on the very brink of being lost. But two of the other Mâltese gallees, which were engaged with three of the enemy's, seeing the danger their admiral was in, came presently and rescued him. Kilij Ali by this time understanding that the center and right wing of the fleet was overthrown, thought it best to make his escape; which with some difficulty he effected, with twenty-five gallees and ten galliots, into the gulf of Lepanto.

Loss of the Turks.

THE number of Turks slain in this famous naval fight could not with certainty be known. An author, who wrote an account of this war, makes their number thirty-two thousand, besides prisoners, who were about three thousand five hundred. The gallees taken from them amounted to one hundred and sixty-one. Forty more were sunk or burnt; and of galliots, with other small vessels, about sixty were taken. The Turkish admiral's galley was exceedingly rich and beautiful. In it was found Ali Pâshâ's casket, with six thousand ducats in it. This, with a yearly pension of three hundred ducats, was given in reward to a Greek of Macedonia, who slew that admiral. He was likewise knighted for that exploit by Don John; and had the barrel of the Turkish standard (N) bestowed on him. This barrel, on his return to Venice, he sold to a goldsmith; and the senate bought it of the goldsmith, paying a ducat for every ounce, to reposit it among the other trophies of that victory.

Korân divination.

THE news of this great defeat being carried to Venice, it was celebrated with the utmost joy (O). All prisoners were set at liberty, and Justina's day, on which it was gained, was made

^m RICAUT, ubi sup.

(N) It was all of massy silver, gilt, and engraven round with Turkish letters. On one side the inscription was, God condueth and adorns the faithful in worthy enterprises: God favours Mohammed. On the other side. There is no God but God, and Mohammed is his prophet, or messenger.

(O) One of the chief Turkish prisoners, hearing this victory compared with the loss of Cyprus, no less ingeniously than truly said, that the loss of the fleet was to Selim, as if a man should shave his beard, which would soon grow again: whereas the loss of Cyprus was to the republic as the loss of an arm, which once cut off could never

- a made a festival for ever : a great quantity of money also was coined, with Justina upon it, and an impression of the battle^a. But while Venice was filled with gladness on this occasion, we may conceive the deepest melancholy reigned at Constantinople. The emperor Selîm, otherwise of an invincible mind, was so struck with the news of this great loss, that, for three days (P), he neither eat nor drank, nor suffered any body to approach him (Q) ; praying night and day, that the God and protector of the Musulmans would have compassion on his people, and remove the dishonour brought on them by this defeat. On the fourth day, he takes up the Korân, and accidentally opens at this passage (R) : In the name of God, clement and merciful ! I grieve for the victory which the Europeans obtained over the inhabitants of the earth : gladness shall not be given them any more for victory hereafter. Selîm, admonished by this oracle, that the overthrow of his fleet had not happened without the finger of God, returned him thanks for his fatherly correction, and recovered his spirits, almost quite sunk with sorrow. This calamity seemed to be foretold, according to the interpretation of the wise men, by the fall of the wooden roof (S) of the temple at Mekka ; which Selîm ordered to be rebuilt with brick, that it might be a more stable emblem of the empire.

- b THE Venetians, still grieved for the loss of Cyprus, were not content with destroying the Turkish fleet ; but repairing their navy with thirty gallies, wherein were embarked six thousand soldiers, they won the castle of Margarita, in Epirus ; and recovered the town of Suppoto, which the Turks had taken from them the summer before. Besides this, the gallies of Kandia, under Canalis, intercepted many of the Turkish vessels, laden with the prisoners and spoils of Famagusta. Martinengo likewise, who besieged Castel Novo, had taken the suburbs, and reduced the town to great extremity ; but was obliged to withdraw on the approach of the Beglerbeg of Greece, with a considerable power to relieve it. In short, the Venetian successes this year were crowned with the relief of Cattaro ; besieged by the Turks both by sea and land, presently after the reduction of Cyprus, as hath been before observed. The enemy, to distress the place, having built a strong fort on the bay leading to it, Superantio, who commanded then as admiral at Korfu, sailed thither with twenty gallies ; and coming by night before the mouth of the bay, left one half of his fleet at anchor before the fort, while with the other he bravely entered farther into the bay. This he did with small opposition : so that battering the fort and landing his men on both sides at once, it was presently taken by assault, and all the garrison put to the sword. They found there seventeen pieces of great cannon, much armour, and abundance of victuals, besides seven galliots which lay at anchor under the fort.

- c NEXT year Kiliç Ali Pâshâ, a man of great valour, and an excellent seaman, who had succeeded as Kapudân Pâshâ, or high admiral, repaired the fleet with such expedition, that the following summer he had ready two hundred and fifty gallies : with which setting sail, he infested the coasts of Christendom where-ever he arrived. At length, the enemy's fleet appearing near Evarin (T), the Pâshâ, desirous to wipe out the late disgrace, vigorously attacks it ; but night coming on, retires to Koron. Four days after, the Christian admirals thought to surprise him, by lying concealed with their ships behind the high rocks which surrounded that port : but being informed by his scouts of their intention, he sails out of the harbour ; and, when they thought him still at anchor, find him ready to receive them. However, they advance, as if they intended to fall on him : but perceiving they were likely to meet with a rough reception, tack about, and suffer the fleet, laden with spoil, to return to Constantinople.

d THE Turkish historians are both defective and partial in their account of this enterprise ; which is related by the Christian writers as follows. Superantio, having relieved Cattaro, as before related, returned to Korfu ; where Tuscarini (now admiral of the Venetian fleet, in the room of Venieri, removed to please Don John) had lain for some time waiting for the con-

^a RICAUT, ibid.^c CANT. p. 225, & seqq.

never be recovered.—Prince Cantemir, in a note, p. 224, relates words to this effect, as spoken by the grand Wazîr to the Venetian ambassador, detained at Constantinople ; who, on occasion of this victory, had desired an audience of that minister, and went to it with the greatest parade.

(P) After his example, Abmed III. when he sent his Wazîr Abmed Pâshâ against the Russians, into Moldavia, prayed, it is said, forty days and nights, and eat nothing till sun-set : neither did he give over fasting till news came of his Wazîr's good success. Cant.

(Q) Some Christian writers say, he suffered none to speak to him the day on which he received the news ; and resolved to massacre all the Christians in his dominions, for fear of a general revolt on that occasion : but was diverted from that cruel design by Mohammed Pâshâ. Others write, that he made slight of the loss ;

saying, that it seemed from thence that God had allotted to the Christians the dominion of the sea, and to him that of the land.

(R) The Turks hold the Korân divination to be infallible. They first read a Sura or two, and then opening the book, read the first line of the first page. They either persist in their design, or drop it, according as the passage turns out. Cant.

(S) It is only a sort of roof, with the opening in the middle. It runs up from the angles of the walls ; and was of timber, before Selîm ordered it to be rebuilt with stone. Cant.—It is said to be of brick in the text.

(T) This must be Navarin, because there is no other port in the Morea which answers to that name. But the Turks are very negligent in marking the names of men and places, as hath been observed before. Cant.

federates,

A. D. 1572. federates, who were to have joined him in April. The admiral, impatient at their delay, sent a Superantio, with twenty-five gallies to Messina, to hasten their coming: but after many excuses made by Don John, particularly the apprehensions of a French invasion of Spain from Rochelle, all that could be at length obtained from him were twenty-two gallies, under the command of Lilly of Andrada; with whom went Colonna, the pope's admiral.

Their naval force:

ON their arrival at Korsû, Fuscarini, though it was now the month of August, failed to fight the enemy. The whole fleet consisted of 155 gallies, six galeasses, and twenty tall ships. In the right wing was Superantio; in the left, Kanalis; and in the center, Colonna, Fuscarini, and Lilly; Quirini bringing up the rear. In this order, having sailed beyond Cerigo, they discovered the Turkish fleet, consisting of 160 gallies, sixty galliots, and four great ships; who did all they could to decline fighting: for although Kilij Ali made a shew as if he intended to engage, yet, on the approach of night, he ordered all his artillery, charged with powder only, to be fired off, and retreated under cover of the smoke towards Cape Metapan; leaving boats behind with lights in them, to make a shew as if the fleet had still been there.

They meet and fight the Turks:

THREE days after, the confederates coming up with them, the Turks put out to sea, with their fleet divided into three squadrons: the left extended a great way into the sea, the right kept near the shore; and Kilij Ali, who commanded in the middle, advanced swiftly, ordering both his wings to fetch a compass on the right and left, aloof from the galeasses, which he was much afraid of, and so attack the wings of the Christians either on the sides or behind. But the confederates, perceiving his design on their wings, tacked about also, drawing up in form of a half-moon, their main body still facing that of the Turks; whose wings being thus separated from the rest, seemed to offer great advantage to the Christians. Hereupon, Fuscarini, without staying for the heavy ships and galeasses, proposed attacking the enemy's main body; which must have been overthrown before the wings could join them. This, however, both Colonna and Lilly refused to do, but for what reason is uncertain.

THE wings of the confederates having been a little disordered in tacking, the Turks with fifteen gallies moved to fall on their straggling ships. But Superantio, to prevent them, made up with four gallies; and after a sharp fight, was seasonably relieved by twenty gallies and two galeasses, which so galled and tore eighteen of the Turkish vessels, that they were glad to sheer off. Hereupon, both fleets falling into order again, without any further action, the Turks sailed away to Koron, while the confederates retired to the island of Cerigo. Here they received notice from Don John forthwith to meet him at Zant; which order Fuscarini much opposed, resolving first, if possible, to fight the enemy. Mean time the Turkish fleet appearing in the Fret of Cerigo, it was agreed to pass by them, in such order as if they offered them battle: but finding that the enemy lay still, more inclined to defend themselves than to fight, they made the best of their way to Korsû; where Don John was then arrived with fifty-three gallies, and eighteen ships of war.

Retire to Navarin:

THE whole fleet at length being come together, consisting of 200 gallies, nine galeasses, and thirty-six tall ships, it was agreed to set forward once more against the enemy, then at Navarino: but failing to surprise them, for want of timing matters, they at length got into the harbour of Modon, whither the confederates followed them. Being come to the mouth of the bay, the Venetian admiral endeavoured to prevail on Don John to enter with the whole fleet, and there destroy at once all the naval strength of the enemy; which he represented as a thing very easy to perform; but Don John urging many reasons to the contrary, refused, and returned with his fleet to Navarino.

Attack
Modon and Navarin in vain.

HERE they held a council to consider what enterprize they had best go upon; and concluding at last, after much consultation, to besiege the castle of Modon, they sailed thither again, and landed 7000 of their best soldiers to attack the place by land, while the galeasses were to batter it by sea. To do this the more conveniently, they fastened two of the greatest gallies together with masts and ropes: then boarding them clear over, made a floor or platform, on which they placed their gabions filled with earth all a-front, and planted great guns between them. But this engine proved quite ineffectual, and the castle being reinforced with some horse, they gave over the siege.

HOWEVER, resolving to do something before the season was quite spent, they agreed to besiege the castle of Navarino, the antient Pylos, and birth-place of Nestor. This business was intrusted to the care of the prince of Parma; who landing 2000 Italians, 1000 Spaniards, and 500 Germans, began to batter the place with twelve great pieces of cannon, and must soon have carried it: but, neglecting to secure the passes through a thick forest, the enemy, while the besieged made a sally, threw in a great number both of horse and foot on that side; whereupon the confederate forces forthwith raised the siege.

Venetians
make peace with the Turks.

FOR all these repulses, they might have succeeded tolerably well, had they continued to block up the harbour by sea, since the Turkish fleet, which was still in the bay, now consisted of no more than 100 gallies and 40 galliots. These were likewise so weak, and slenderly manned, a manned, by reason of the plague and famine among the crews, that their largest gallies had scarce 120 men left in them, all so meagre and faint, as scarce to be able to hold up their arms: but after many consultations and debates, the Spaniards would return home, contrary to the intreaties of the Venetian admiral; who thereupon steered his course for Venice, where he was honourably received. Mean time the senate, made sensible how little they could depend on their confederates, began to think of preserving their state, by suing to the enemy for peace; which at length was, in February 1574, concluded on these conditions: that they should pay Selim 300,000 ducats; one third down, and the rest in two years: that the merchants goods should be restored on both sides; and that such places as the Turks had taken from the Venetians should remain in their possession: but that those which the republic had taken from them, should be forthwith restored^p. Thus far the Christian historians.

LET us now return to the Turkish. The Germans, imagining all the Othmân forces to have been destroyed in the last year's defeat at sea, and that they might without difficulty recover what they had lost, lay siege to Nova, a city of Bosnia: but the governors of that and the neighbouring countries, hastening with united forces, surprise the enemy, intent on the leaguer, and put them to the rout. The damages sustained by the late defeat being thus amply retaliated, Selim repairs the injuries done by time to the temple of Sancta Sophia, erects four Minâreh, or towers, of different shapes, at the four corners; and demolishing some private houses near it, founds two Madresch, or academies, of excellent workmanship.

c THE same year Selim, to keep his word with the Musulmans of Spain, and curb the boldness of the Spaniards, in revenge for the blow given him by their fleet at Lepanto; sends his Wazîr and high admiral, Piala Pâshâ (U), with a fleet against them. Being arrived at Messina, they destroyed the adjacent country with fire and sword; and as no army appeared to relieve that city, they doubtless would have taken it, had not the sudden tempestuousness of the sea obliged them to retire. The fleet returning home thus ineffectual, the king of Spain, with the forces he had designed for the relief of Messina, sails to Africa, and surprises Tunis; where having killed and made prisoners all the Musulmans, he strengthens the city with new fortifications, and leaves a good garrison^q.

d WE must learn from the Christian writers what the motives were which induced the king of Spain to undertake this expedition, as well as the particulars of it. When Amîd, king of Tunis, before-mentioned (who, after being driven out of his kingdom by the Turks, had retired to Tavares, the Spanish governor at Guletta), heard of the good success of the Christians at Lepanto, he sent ambassadors to crave assistance of Don John, then in Sicily, for recovery of his dominions; promising to defray the whole charge of the war, and to be for ever tributary to Spain. This proposal having been accepted of, the king, in October, 1573, sent Don John, with 105 gallies and 40 ships, to Guletta; where he was joined by admiral Doria, with nineteen gallies, by Colonna, the pope's admiral, with fourteen more, and by the gallies of Malta. Don John, immediately landing his men, found the city and castle of Tunis desolate, the inhabitants having fled, some to Kairwân, and some to Biserta. But the Turks, who went to this last place, being denied entrance, they fell to ravage the country: of which Don John being informed, he sent Tavares, with part of his army, who routed them, and had the city peaceably delivered to him.

e THE kingdom of Tunis being thus reduced without opposition, Don John was so far from bestowing it on Amîd, who remained at Guletta, that finding he had already held intelligence with the Turks, and procured the death of some Christians, in hatred to their religion, he sentenced him not only to be deposed, but also deprived of sight, in detestation of his unnatural proceedings against his father and brethren. Then, pursuant to the king of Spain's order, his elder brother Mohammed was constituted king of Tunis, and his vassal. Hereupon, 40,000 Moors, who had before abandoned the city, were, on their supplication, permitted by Don John to return. The general, after this, ordered a strong castle to be built between Tunis and Guletta, leaving 2000 Italians, and as many Spaniards, to perform the work. This done, he departed for Sicily, carrying with him Amîd and his two sons prisoners^r.

f MEAN time, Selim having made peace with the Venetians, turned his arms against John, the Vayvod of Moldavia. This John, who was the natural son of the Vayvod Stephen, lived as a merchant among the Turks; and having embraced their religion, was at length by his intrigues made Vayvod in the room of Bogdân, who for his amity with the Poles was deposed. John, soon after his advancement, renouncing Mohammedism, and the Vayvod of Lesser

^p LEUNCL. & RICAUT, in Selimis.^q CANT. p. 226.^r RICAUT, in Selim.(U) Different from him in Soleyman's time.

A. D. 1574. Walakbia (X) applying to the Porte in behalf of his brother Peter; Selîm sent to him, either to pay an unreasonable sum of money, which he demanded, or give place to another. The nobles having opposed this tyranny, John told the messenger, that the people would not pay the money, and then endeavoured to make a league with the king of Poland against the Turks: but failing in that point, he took a body of Polish Kofaks, under the command of Sujercevius, into his service.

The Vayvod's success and cruelty:

THE Soltân having received John's answer, dispatched 30,000 Turks, and 2000 Hungarians, to the Palatine of Lesser Walakbia, to secure John, and make his own brother Peter Vayvod. The Palatine, on this encouragement, with these forces joined to his own, amounting in all to above 100,000 men, swam over the river Moldaw; and through confidence of success, kept no discipline in his army. Hereupon, John, with Sujercevius, comes on them so unexpectedly, that not having had time either to recover their horses, grazing in the meadow, or their arms, few or none of that great multitude escaped the slaughter, excepting the Palatine and his brother, who swam over the river to the castle of Brabilow. The victor followed, and having ravaged the country without sparing either age or sex, summoned the governor of the castle to deliver up the fugitives: but a rough answer being returned by four messengers, the cruel Vayvod caused first their lips, noses, and ears to be cut off; then their feet to be nailed to a long piece of timber, and so, with their heads downwards, to be exposed to the view of the citizens. Presently after, he attacked and took the city, with such horrible slaughter, that not so much as the very dogs were spared. Then giving the spoil, which was exceeding rich, to his soldiers, he razed the place to the ground.

He is betrayed
by his general.

IN the interim, news being brought that 15,000 Turks advanced to relieve the castle, he dispatched Sujercevius and his Kofaks, with 8000 light Moldavians; who slew near 14,000 of the enemy, while the rest fled to the castle of Teina, whose town the Vayvod presently besieged; and having taken it, left not one soul alive. Selîm, on advice of these proceedings, was so much afraid of being dispossessed of Walakbia, that he ordered public prayers to be made for his better success. Mean time, John being minded for a while to break up his army, left part of it with his old friend Jeremiah Czarnievice, general of the horse, to defend the passes over the Danube: but this old friend, suffering himself to be corrupted with a present of 30,000 Hungarian ducats, withdrew his troops, under pretence of forage, and gave the Pâshâ, who was on the other side, liberty to cross the river with an army of 200,000 men. Then, posting himself with this news to the Vayvod, pretended he wanted force to oppose the enemy: but said they were not numerous, and might be easily overthrown, if he advanced with speed against them.

Czarnie-
viech defeated and taken.

HEREUPON John raising the siege of Teina, marched forwards, and being come within three miles of their camp, sent Sujercevius and the faithless Jeremiah, with forces, to view it. The Kofaks, who had long before suspected the latter, judging the enemy's army to be very large by the great number of their scouts, at their return advised the Vayvod not to trust him too much: but John, giving no way to suspicion, advanced with all his power against the Turks. He divided his horse, amounting to 30,000, into thirty troops; before each of which he placed some field pieces. His foot, which were numerous, and very faithful, though a rude people, and but indifferently armed, he posted by themselves. Being arrived at a hill, from whence he could discern the huge army of the enemy, he sent for Czarnievice, whose treachery he now suspected: but the traitor excusing himself, because of the nearness of the enemy, sent word that he should soon see him in the field as forward as any against him. John believed so, when upon the signal of battle he saw him advance with 13,000 of the best troops: but as soon as he drew near the enemy, he caused his colours to be lowered, and his men, with their caps on the points of their swords and spears, to bow their bodies in token of submission. The Turks, with their lances lifted up, joyfully received them: but observing these revolvers, as men pricked in conscience, to shrink back in the battle, they forced them on to blunt their countrymen's swords; slaying such as did not go forward.

THE traitors being by these means almost all destroyed, the Turks maintained a most obstinate fight for a while, and then retreated, with a view to draw the Moldavians into an ambush: but their design being suspected, they came on afresh with greater fury than before, and after a most terrible conflict, at length prevailed by numbers over the Moldavians; most of whom were slain, and of the Kofaks only 250 left. However, the Vayvod, who had still 20,000 foot, and some horse remaining, retreated to the ruins of a town, which he had razed but a little before: and there fortified himself the best he could. Next day, which was the 11th of June, the Turks having fired briskly into his camp to no purpose, sent to advise him to a yield before they came to extremities. Hereupon it was agreed, that the Kofaks should have leave to return home; and that the Vayvod should receive no manner of violence, but be sent to Selîm to answer for himself: as for the Moldavians, it was represented as needless to make any terms for them, since any injury done to them would hurt the Soltân, and the Vayvod whom he should appoint. A. D. 1574.

(X) Called also Walakbia Transalpina; being one of the two parts into which Walakbia was formerly divided, Moldavia being the other.

THESE articles having been sworn to seven times by the Turkish officers, the Vayvod divided what money and jewels he had among his men, and then went in manner of a suppliant to the Turkish camp; where he talked for above four hours with the chief commanders of the army. At last, the Kâpuji Pâshâ, either offended with his words, or unmindful of his oath, struck him first on the face and then on the belly with his scymitar. On this the Janizaries b smiting off his head, held it up for every body to see it; and with the like perfidy fell upon the Moldavians, whom they slaughtered like cattle. The Kofaks, expecting no better usage, rushed into the thickest of their enemies, and valiantly fighting, were all slain; excepting the brave Sujercevius, and a few other officers reserved for ransom. The Turks after this over-ran all the country of Moldavia, put all the nobility to the sword, and carried away great numbers of the people for settling remote colonies. Thus was the whole province subjected, and by that means a passage opened into Podolia *. It may be observed, that this remarkable war is omitted by the Turkish historians come to our hands, to whom and the affairs of Tunis it is time to return. Perfidiously slain.

As the blame for the loss of that kingdom fell on Piâla Pâshâ, because he returned in too great security, without leaving part of the fleet to guard the African coasts, he is dismissed; and Sinân Pâshâ, the former Wazîr, being put in his room, is sent, in the year 982, to recover Tunis. The Wazîr having landed his troops, instantly orders the city and a neighbouring fortress, called Khalkulvadi (Y), to be attacked: both which, after several assaults, he takes; and sacrifices the garrison to the ghosts of the Musulmans slain there by the Christians the year before. Then he razes the fortress to the ground; and repairing the walls of Tunis, leaves there a sufficient garrison †. Turks African expedition.

THE Christian historians tell us, that Selîm made vast preparations, both by sea and land, for recovering of this country. The fleet, consisting of 300 gallies, under the command of three Pâshâs, Sinân, Piâla, and Kilij Ali, arrived before Guletta on the 13th of July; where d they were joined by more ships from Alexandria, Algiers, and other places. The first laid siege to the water-town, which was bravely defended by a garrison of 800 men, till most of them being slain, the governor ordered the rest to retire to the castle, and leave it to the Turks, who lost 3000 men before it. Hereupon they turned their arms against the castle; and after many furious assaults became masters of the chanel of the lake of Tunis, which proved of great service to them. Mean time, some companies of Spaniards sent from the new castle, having gotten into Guletta, the besieged made a sally, August the 20th, and repulsed the Turks with a very great slaughter; yet as they never ceased bringing on fresh men, the 23d, after continuing a most terrible fight the whole day, they at length, two hours after sun-set, took the castle, and put all therein to the sword. They take Guletta: A. D. 1574.

e THE Guletta being thus reduced, the Turks next day laid siege to the new castle, which was garrisoned by 4000 choice soldiers, under command of the valiant commanders Serbellio and Salazar: yet this too, after many most terrible and desperate assaults, was taken by them on the 13th of September. In the attack, which held that day for six hours together, most of the besieged were slain. The brave Serbellio, being shot with two musket balls, and choosing rather to die than fall into the enemy's hands, rushed into the midst of them, there to have perished; but by the hasty coming in of Piâla Pâshâ, both he and Salazar were taken alive. The Pâshâ, in his rage, struck old Serbellio, and the more to afflict him, caused his son to be slain before his face, with the rest of the garrison. But these conquests cost the Turks dear: for it was computed that they lost 30,000 men in less than three months time. After this, f they easily possessed themselves of Tunis, where Mohammed the new king was taken prisoner. Then having settled matters in that city, and at the Guletta, the Pâshâs departed with a fleet of 400 sail. On the 4th of October, they appeared in sight of Malta; but understanding that the knights were ready for them, and remembering their former disgrace there, they bore away for Constantinople †. The new castle: and recover Tunis.

WHILE the expedition to Tunis was going forward, 1500 Hungarians assembling with a design to surprise Seghetwar (or Sigetb), Jaffer Pâshâ, governor of Gbiula, who was informed of it, lies in ambush for them with 500 Janizaries, or more; and attacking them as they marched carelessly along, routs and takes many of them prisoners. Towards the end of this Hungarians defeated.

* RICAUT, ubi supr.

† CANT. p. 227.

‡ RICAUT, in Selimus.(Y) This seems to be the new castle, mentioned lower down, rather than that of Guletta, as prince Cantemir supposes it.

A. D. 1574.
Selim dies.

year, the Soltân builds a large and most elegant bath, in that part of the palace which looks a to the east. Whilst the mortar yet exhaled virulent steams, the emperor first enters the bath ; and, if some writers are to be credited, drinks a large dose of wine to expel the noxious vapours. This was followed by a slight head-ach, then a giddiness, and at length a sort of apoplexy ; which, on the 11th day of his distemper, and 28th of Shâban (Z) carried him out of the world.

Reign and character.

SOLTAN Selim lived fifty-two years (A), and reigned eight years, five months, and nineteen days. He was a prince of great valour (B), but not always successful ; of an invincible mind in all circumstances ; in councils ready and secret ; a lover of justice, and a good man : liberal, and so merciful, that nature seemed to have endued him with a gentler disposition than his predecessors. He was familiar and facetious in talk with his domestics ; extremely fond of the learned, and of mimicks : very constant in his devotions. However, some historians, who either had a better opportunity of knowing what passed in the inner seray, or sought to please their readers with novelties, say, that under pretence of devotion, he gave himself up intirely to wine and lust (C) in the secret apartments of his palace. It is certain, that he put on a great appearance of religion in public ; and if at any time his actions seemed to deviate from reason, it was ascribed rather to divine inspiration than the vice of drunkenness *. As to his person, the Christians say, he was of a middle stature, and of a heavy disposition : that his face was rather swollen than fat, and much resembled that of a drunkard †.

* CANT. p. 227, & seqq.

† RICAUT, in Selim.

(Z) The Christian historians say, he died the 9th of December, 1574, consumed with wine and women.

(A) The same writers make his reign fifty-two years.

(B) The Christian authors say, he had less valour than any of his predecessors, and therefore was least regarded.

(C) These agree with the Christian historians, who say, that he died consumed with wine and women, and that he was wholly given to sensual pleasures.

C H A P. XIII.

The Reign of Morâd III.

12 Soltân
Morad III.
Hej. 983.
A. D. 1575.

Strangles his brothers :

SELIM being dead, his son Morâd, the beginning of Ramazân, in the year 983 of the Hejrah, and thirty-first of his age, comes to Constantinople ; where he is immediately saluted emperor by all the great men, who testify their grief for his father's death in elegant orations : after which, Soltân Selim is buried in a Turbeb (or turret), near Sancta Sophia *.

WE are informed by the Christian historians, that his first care was to appease the Janizaries, who, besides the usual largesses, required an augmentation of their pay, and the privilege that their sons, as soon as they arrived at the age of twenty, should be enrolled among the younger Janizaries, and enjoy their immunities. After this, to comply with a political custom, rather than from inclination to cruelty, he caused his five brothers Mostafa, Soleymân, Abdo'llah, Ozmân, and Jebângbîr, to be strangled in his presence. This execution so much affected the mother of Soleymân, that she stabbed herself to the heart ; at which tragical sight, it is said, Morâd let fall some tears.

Invades
Poland :

THE Soltân's next care was to enact wholesome laws, alter the coin, and make the poor sensible of his bounty. Then, in prosecution of the wars which his father had begun, he sent the Krîm Tatars to invade Podolia ; which they entered in October, 1575, and committed great ravages : but while they were dividing the spoil with Peter, the new Vayvod of Walakhia before-mentioned, the Polish Kosaks broke into their country, in order to make reprisals. Mean time Morâd, understanding that the Poles, on the desertion of Henry de Valois, duke of Anjou, were about to chuse a new king, and that even the emperor Maximilian and great duke of Moskovy were candidates ; yet he by letter recommended to them Stephen Battori, f Vayvod of Transilvania. To this they paid so great regard, that they actually elected the prince's Ann of the Jagellonian family to be their queen, on condition that she should marry the Vayvod ; which was accordingly done. So that Morâd would often boast, that he had given a king to Poland ; and soon after he found the benefit of it, since Stephen entered into a league with him, whereby he became secure on that side, while he prosecuted his designs against Persia ; which were favoured by the distractions that arose on the death of king Tabmâsp, in May, 1576 †.

makes Stephen king :

* CANT. p. 227, 229.

† MINADOI's wars between the Turks and Persians. RICAUT, in Morâd III.

MORAD

- a MORAD, after spending three years in settling the public affairs, and making military preparations, resolves, in 986, to undertake the Persian expedition. To this end he sends Mostafa Pâshâ, who commanded in the Cyprian war, with the troops of Arzerûm and Diyârbekr (D), to attack their frontiers. That general first repairs the castles on the borders, and fortifies the city of Kârs, almost demolished by several sieges; where he builds magazines for laying up store of corn, that the want of grain might not obstruct his enterprise, as it had done all the former. After this he goes and closely besieges Khaldirân (E), a strong town of Persia; which he takes after several assaults. Then sending part of his forces, under the Pâshâs of Arzerûm and Diyârbekr, against Tokmak Khân (F), who was coming with a considerable army (G) to relieve that place, they surprise that general, and put his forces to flight (H).
 b The reward of this victory was Tiflis, a noted city of Armenia (I); which being taken immediately after was destroyed. From thence Mostafa marches towards Shamakhiya; but, being stopped by the rains, he leaves Ozdemâr (K), Othmân Pâshâ, and the Beglerbeg of Erzenûr-rûmi (L), to guard the subdued places, and returns to Europe.

- THE Christian historians are more particular on this occasion. The general having passed the mountains of Teflis, an ambassador came from a Georgian prince, called Skânder, or Alexander, with offers of obedience; and, after twelve days march, having reached the neighbourhood of Shîrwân, received the submission of the city of Sekhi. The soldiers being here much distressed for want of subsistence, they were told by some captives, that three days march thence there were fields of rice and corn, with cattle sufficient for the whole army. Hereupon 10,000 men were detached to bring that provision away: but, being come to the place, they were set on by Tokmak, Khân of Rivân, the Persian general, who had rallied his scattered troops, and almost all cut off. The Persians suffered in their turn; for, staying too long to divide the spoil, they gave Mostafa an opportunity to inclose them in a peninsula made by the rivers Arâs and Kanak (M); where they were all slain or drowned, excepting Tokmak, with Amîr Khân, and a few others, who escaped by swimming their horses over the Kanak.
 c MOSTAFA, on this occasion, having one hundred men to one against the enemy, lost not above 3000 soldiers: but next day in passing the Kanak, with part of his army, to enter Shîrwân, 8000 more were drowned. The rest of his troops, who murmured much before, would now probably have mutinied, had they not found a ford by which they crossed the river. At length arriving at Eres (or Arâs) the principal city on that side, but deserted as well as other places by the Persians, they refreshed for twenty-one days; in which time Mostafa erected a fortress, and furnished both it and the city with cannon, and a garrison of 5000 men. Then leaving Ozmân Pâshâ, who had taken Shamakhiya, to govern the province, with a charge to open a passage, if practicable, to Derbend, and give the Tatars notice of his arrival, he set out on his return homewards.

- BEING come to the Kanak, he ordered a bridge to be made over it; which having crossed, Sabamal, a Georgian prince, came and submitted to Morâd. At length he entered the country of Alexander; and being come to Zaghen, that prince sent him abundance of refreshments, but did not wait on him on account of his infirmities. From thence he marched to Teflis; after which, in passing over rough and woody mountains, he encountered with infinite difficulties, and lost many men cut off by the Georgians. At length he arrived at Altûnkâla, the palace of prince Dedefmit's widow; who made her feigned submission, and delivered him her elder son Alexander, whom, with his brother Manujeber (N), Mostafa sent to Constantinople as soon as he got to Arzerum, where he disbanded his army.^c

ACCORDING

^c MINADOI, ubi sup. l. iii. RICAUT, ibid.

(D) The Christian historians say that in spring he assembled an army of 201,000 men from all parts of the empire at Arzerûm. See Ricaut in Amurat 3d.

(E) As we know of no such town in Persia, we chuse to follow the Christian historians; who only say, Mostafa encamped in the plains, at the foot of the mountains of Khaldir, in the way from Kârs to Teflis.

(F) Tokmak signifies a mallet, pestle, or rammer. A surname, doubtless given to denote some quality of the owner. Cont.

(G) The Christian writers say he had not above 20,000 men, which were all that could then be raised in Persia. Ricaut.

(H) The Persians lost 8000 men, 5000 slain, and 3000 taken, yet put to death, and all their heads piled up in a heap. But the Turks, by the battle and sickness that followed, lost 40,000. Ricaut.

(I) Tiflis, or Teflis, is the capital of Georgia, or Gurmod. HIST. VOL. V.

jestân, and far from the borders of Armenia. The Christian writers say the Turks found it deserted by the garrison.

(K) Different from him mentioned before, p. 295. and so called from the fortitude of his mind, not of his body. Cont.

(L) Rather Arzeno'rrûmi. Prince Cantemir says, he cannot tell what city or province is meant by this name; but that it seems to be recovered from the Turks, since there is no such Pâshâlik now in the whole empire. Whereas it is no other than the Pâshâlik of Arzerûm, mentioned by him twice before within a few lines, only altered a little by being written more at length; and signifies Arze, or Arzen, of the Romans.

(M) Called also Tori. This junction happens about twenty-two leagues to the north-west of Shamakhiya, the capital of Shîrwân.

(N) Minadoi, from whom the account of these wars

A. D. 1576.

Turks slaughtered.

ACCORDING to the Turkish historians, Manujeh (or, as prince Cantemir writes it, Munev-jebr), who had till then been subject to the Persians, came to Mostafa while he was at Tiflis, and delivered him the keys of the towns under his command. Some time after he turned Mohammedan; for which he was rewarded with the Sanjak of Akbiska, in Anatolia, and made Beglerbeg of Tiflis itself. As the winter became so severe, that the Othmân soldiers, not used to the cold, daily perished in the camp, Ozdemir Oglu, Othmân Pâshâ, sent his forces into winter-quarters, at some distance from one another; because there was no city in those desert and ravaged parts capable of receiving the whole army: but this coming to the knowledge of Euris Khân, the Persian general, he unexpectedly falls on the Turks, thus dispersed, and makes a great slaughter.

Persians routed.

OTHMAN PASHA, otherwise an able general, troubled lest this misfortune should be imputed to negligence, assembles his army in the midst of winter, and, with doubtful fortune, fights the Persians above twenty times in different places. At last 30,000 of them, under the conduct of Imam Euli (O), furiously attack him: but at the end of four days, during which the battle continued, are repulsed and almost all slain. Ozdemir Oglu, after this, repairing the walls of Shamakhiya, retires with part of his weakened forces into Europe^d.

Soon after Mostafa Pâshâ's departure from Eres, Ares (or Eures) Khân, who had fled from Shamakhiya for fear of the Turks, resolved, with the other governors of Eres and Sekhi, to return into their country: but when he was near that capital, and understood by intercepted letters from the Tatars, who were newly arrived, to Ozmân Pâshâ, how strong they were, he retired towards the Kanak. There Abdo'l Gheray, the Tatar general, and brother of the Khân, surprising him, defeated his army; and taking him prisoner, he was hanged at Samakhiya by Ozmân's order, before one of the apartments of his late palace. After this the Tatars went and sacked Gânjeh.

Shirwân recovered.

MEAN time Amir Hâmzeb Mirza, the king of Persia's eldest son, with 12,000 new-raised troops, arrives in Shirwân, and recovers Eres from the Turks, with all the booty taken by them, after a fierce battle with Kaytas Pâshâ the governor, who was there slain, and all his followers. Then, marching towards Shamakhiya, he surprised the Tatars negligently encamped, made a great slaughter of them, and took many prisoners, with their general. Being come before that city, he summoned Ozmân Pâshâ to surrender, on condition of having his life and effects. The Pâshâ agreed to the proposal, and desired three days to get things ready to march out: but, fearing to trust his enemy, he, in the night, escaped with his effects to Dârbend. Next morning the Persian prince entering the city, took vengeance on the inhabitants for their want of fidelity; and razing the old walls, built new ones. He likewise severely punished those of Eres and Sekhi: after which he returned victoriously to Kasbin, with Abdo'l Gheray; who being young and handsome, the queen of Persia fell in love with him. The court-lords, offended at this amour, which was carried with too little reserve, but more at king Mohammed's intention to marry his daughter to that general, with a view to gain the Tatars over to his interest, one morning entered his apartment, and slew him. It is thought they likewise made away with the queen; for she never after appeared in public.

Ozmân Pâshâ flies to Dârbend.

OZMAN PASHA having gotten safe to Dârbend, which was now the only place in Shirwân possessed by the Turks, with a view to secure that country to the Soltân, married the daughter of Sabamal, a Georgian lord: but finding soon after by his wife, who cooed on him, that her father was underhand engaged with the king of Persia to ruin him, Ozmân invited him to a banquet, and there slew him, with his attendants. Thus ended the war for this year, in which the Turks lost 70,000 men^e.

Krim Tatars rebel.

THE greater part of the Turkish army being thus detained in Persia, the Khân of the Krim Tatars attempts to throw off the Othmân yoke. Hereupon Mostafa Pâshâ, being ordered to extinguish this flame in its birth, that general marched over Mount Caucasus, by the straits of Demur Kapi (P); and crossing the Don, or Tanais, in boats, surprised the Khân, who feared nothing from a quarter never before traversed by man; and cutting off his head, sends it to the Porte^f.

Affairs of Georgia.

MORAD thinking it best, in making conquests, to secure his own borders first, and then encroach by degrees upon his neighbours, ordered Mostafa to prepare materials for building forts on the roads leading from Arzerûm to Georgia. For this purpose, the Pâshâ prepared great forces, with 20,000 pioneers. Nor were the Persians idle on their side to oppose the encroaching enemy. Imâm Kûli Khân, governor of Gânjeh, on this occasion offered to defend is taken, writes Manuckhar (which, according to the English orthography, should be written Manukhar); for want perhaps of the English ch, or j consonant.

^d CANT. p. 231.^e MINADOI, ubi sup. c. 3.^f CANT. p. 231.

(O) Doubtless a mistake for Imâm Kûli.

(P) Demur, or Temur, Kapi, signifies the iron gate. So the Turks call Dârbend, or Derbent; which in Persian signifies the shut gate.

a Shîrwân, and hinder Osmân Pâshâ from either making conquests, or building forts in that province. At the same time, Simon, a valiant Georgian prince, thinking this a proper opportunity to recover his territories usurped by his younger brother David, or Dawd Khân, undertook to secure against the Turks that part of Georgia where Teflis stood. Hereupon the king made him Khân of the whole country, and sent Ali Kûli Khân with 5000 men to support his design. A. D. 1579.

On the approach of spring, Mostafa marched from Arzerûm in twelve days to Khârs; and having, in twenty more, fortified the place by the hands of the unwilling soldiery, detached about 19,000 men to Teflis, under the command of Hassan Pâshâ, son of the grand Wazîr Mohammed, a very brave officer. Being come to the famous straits of Tomanis, he was, in his passage through the woods, attacked by Ali Kûli Khân and Simon; where he lost a great many men. But as soon as he was clear of the forests, he made a halt; which the Persians mistaking as done out of fear to advance, attacked him a second time, and fell into an ambush laid for them; where most of them were slain, and Ali Kûli Khân made prisoner. Hassan after this relieved Teflis, but in his return was way-laid a second time at Tomanis. From this danger, however, he was freed by the advice of Ali Kûli Khân, on promise of liberty for that piece of service; yet he broke his word, under pretence that it was not in his power to perform it. Simon fretted much at this disappointment: but still pursued him so eagerly, that he destroyed the rear of his army, and took all his treasure from him. Hassan, in eight days march, got to Khârs, whither Mostafa returning not long after with his army, much weakened and discontented; there disbanded them, and finished this year's campaign. A. D. 1579.

To favour the expedition, and open an easier passage into Georgia than that by land, Morâd had sent Kilij Ali, with a great fleet into the Euxine Sea, to erect some forts in Mingrelia; which were presently after his departure demolished by the inhabitants. Hassan was nobly rewarded by the Soltân for his services: but Mostafa was disgraced, and Sinân Pâshâ, his enemy, made general. He was likewise soon after advanced to the Wazîrship, on the death of Mohammed; who was stabbed in the open Divân, by a soldier, whom he had deprived of his pay.^e Mingrelia curbed.

MORAD, intent on carrying on the war, the prime Wazîr is sent, in the year 988, with a great army against the Persians; who, seeing their whole nation threatened with destruction, sue for peace. For that purpose they send Ibrâhîm Khân, a man of great subtilty, who, by his speeches and presents, so moves the Wazîr, then entered within the Persian borders, that the army was immediately ordered to march back, and the ambassador sent with commendatory letters to the Porte. But Morâd thinking it too early to grant peace till the enemy was exhausted, as well as dishonourable for his arms to be diverted by deceitful proposals, refuses Ibrâhîm's petition, and deprives Sinân Pâshâ of his post, advancing Ferbâd Pâshâ in his room.^h Persian embassy unsuccessful. Hej. 988. A. D. 1580.

THE Christian historians say, there were two ambassadors sent from Persia; Maxud, or Masûd, Khân, in 1580, and Ibrâhîm Khân, the year following, both unsuccessful in their negotiations: that the first year Sinân Pâshâ did nothing but supply Teflis with necessaries; was hindered by rains from building a fort at Tomanis; and lost 9000 men in two attempts to carry off cattle, by the forces of Tokmak and Simon, who watched his motion: that Sinân having sent to the king of Persia about peace, first Hayder, an Aga, and then Ibrâhîm Khân, arrived; who being dispatched forward to Constantinople, Sinân got leave to go to court, in order to advise what articles were most proper to be insisted upon: that after all, this ambassador not agreeing to their terms, he was first affronted, and then closely confined, with so much rigour, that though 100 of his domestics died of the plague, yet he could not obtain the favour to be removed to some other place, till at length he was sent prisoner to Arzerûm.

SINAN PASHA was now made grand Wazîr; and Mohammed Pâshâ, nephew to Mostafa, the late general, sent to relieve Teflis, against the Wazîr's advice. Having gathered 25,000 men at Arzerûm, he was joined by Hassan, Pâshâ of Kâra Amîd, or Diyârbekr, and Manujekér, the Georgian prince, now turned Mohammedan, and called Mostafa. When they were advanced as far as Gori, within thirty miles of Teflis, they discovered a great army of Georgians, mixed with Persians in Georgian habits, because the peace was then depending. Next day, the Turks having crossed a river which parted the two armies, the Georgians, with great fury, fell on them before they could draw up in order, made a great slaughter of them, and took the military chest, with most of their provision: so that when the Pâshâ, with the rest who fled, got to Teflis, he was forced to raise 40,000 ducats among the officers to pay the garrison, and sent to Zaghen for provisions. Affairs of Georgia.

^e MINADOL, l. iv.^h CANT. p. 231, & seq.

A. D. 1580.
Manujeher's history.

MOMAMMED, having staid only two days at Teflis, marched back by the way of Tomanis; and being come to Altunkala, the castle of Mostafa the Georgian, he invited that prince to a council of war, with a design to cut him off. Mostafa, who had notice of this plot, with fifty choice men, went to the general's tent, where a sham mandate from the emperor was read. This Mostafa promised to obey: but when he was about to take his leave, the Hapiji Basbi came up; and, pulling him by the sleeve, would have forced him to sit down. At the same instant, the Georgian prince crying out, with his sword killed the general's lieutenant, cut off the Pâshâ of Kâra Amîd's ear, and desperately wounded Mohammed himself in several places. This affair caused great confusion in the army; while Mostafa immediately gave the Soltân notice of the conspiracy against him, and was honoured with a vest¹.

Turkish antifice.

MORAD laid all the fault of these misfortunes on the prime Wazîr, for not staying in the east to command the army; while Sinân retorted the blame on the emperor himself for employing Mohammed against his advice. He added, that they ought not to proceed in the war by erecting forts, since there was not money enough in the treasury to support the garrisons; and that if the Soltân expected a good issue of things, he ought to go to the war in person. But this advice was so disliked by the effeminate emperor, that he banished Sinân Pâshâ, and made

A. D. 1582.

Schaus Pâshâ, his brother-in law, Wazîr. At the same time, being resolved to carry on the war, he appointed Ferbâd, a man of great courage and experience, general of the forces; proposing at first to employ him no farther than to secure the passage to Teflis, and destroy the country of Mostafa the Georgian: but when he heard of the troubles arising in Persia between the king and his youngest son Abbâs Mirza, he ordered Ferbâd to build a fortress at Rivân, and secure the passage from Khârs thither, so to open the way to Tauris. As for Mostafa the Georgian, he directed the general to dissemble with him for the present, and make use of him to convey succours to *Teflis*².

Persian near removed.

H. J. 991.

A. D. 1583.

THE new Wazîr, in 991, with numerous forces, enters the Persian borders, and repairs the walls of Rivân; but either through cowardice or corruption did nothing else worthy memory. What is worse, he lost Tibrîs; and, after some defeats, returns towards winter with his army.

Manujeher revolts.

THE Turkish historians afford us no more than this short account of Ferbâd's performances; but the Christian writers relate them more at large, and to his advantage. According to them, Ferbâd, having gotten his army ready, marched to Rivân; where seizing on the houses and gardens of Tokmâk, he, in fifteen days, erects a strong fortress, 750 yards in compass, without opposition from that lord; who could procure no aid for the purpose. Then leaving Sinân Pâshâ, a renegade Genoese, with 8000 men to garrison the place, he marched to Khârs. There he received news of the revolt of Mostafa the Georgian: for being on the way to Teflis, with 30,000 ducats, accompanied by two Kapiji and a Chausb, he met with his cousin Stephen, who persuaded him to renounce Mohammedism; after which, killing the Turks, they divided the treasure between them. However, the general had the good fortune to relieve Teflis, by means of Hassan Pâshâ; while Resuan Pâshâ ravaged Mostafa's country: this done, he returned to winter at Arzerûm.

Simon defect-
ed.

THE king of Persia understanding that Ferbâd would next year invade Naksivân, or Nakchûn, with a mighty army, marched with all his forces to Tauris. Hereupon Ferbâd encouraged the report of his going to the first place, while he advanced to the castle of Lori, within two stages of Teflis, and strongly fortified it. After this he built a strong fort in the strait of Tomanis, and then sent 20,000 men, under Resuan and Karâ Amîd, Pâshâs, to put succours into Teflis. But Simon, the Georgian, seeing Resuan encamped with only 6000 men at the foot of a hill, believing that to be his whole force, charged him boldly with 4000 men; but was presently hemmed in by the Turks, who came from the other side of the hill. Here there ensued a terrible battle, in which Simon had his horse slain under him, and had like to have been taken, at such time as there appeared in view 10,000 men sent to reinforce Rusuan: but he taking them for Persians, was put to such a stand, that it gave the brave Georgian, and his surviving troops, an opportunity to escape.

Janizaries
mutiny.

AFTER this Ferbâd resolved to go and ravage the country of Manujeher; but the year being far spent, when they came to Arkbelek, the soldiers tumultuously rose, and abusing the general, would have him return to Arzerûm. At length, he pacified them: but being come to Ghiska, and proposing to build a fort there, they flew to their arms, and in a trice overturned the tents of all the commanders; telling the general, with threats and ill language, that they were neither masons nor bricklayers. Ferbâd perceiving there was no other remedy, marched to Ardekhân; and there disbanding the army, returned to Arzerûm, hated by every-body³.

¹ MINADOL, l. iv & v.

² Ibid. l. vi.

³ MINADOL, l. vi. RICAUT, in Morad III.

^a NEITHER was Morád himself pleased with his conduct, among other things, for letting Ali Kúli Khán escape; whom he took for his guide in the expedition. At the same time ^{A. D. 1583. Revolution in Krim.} having conceived a great opinion of Ozmán Páshá, then in Sbírzan, he sent for him, in order to make him general. But Shaus, the grand Wazír, being jealous of that Páshá's abilities, wrote to Mohammed Khán at Káffa to way-lay him. The Khán, fearing Ozmán would complain of his not having sent the promised succours, detached 12,000 Tatars; who surprised Ozmán with only 4000 choice men, on the shores of the Euxine Sea: but yet were defeated by him with great slaughter. Morád, being informed of this affair, sent Kilij Ali, his admiral, with a fleet to assist Ozmán; who, sailing to Káffa, put the Khán to death, and set up his brother Islán in his room ^m.

^b THIS summer Morád, to divert himself with his mutes mounted on heavy horses, rode himself about them on a nimble nag, striking sometimes the horse, sometimes the man, at pleasure: but in the midst of his gaiety, being taken with a fit of his old distemper, the falling-sickness, he fell off his horse, and was taken up for dead. The Janizaries believing him to be so, according to custom, raised a tumult; which ended, as usual, in strangling some of them. Morád recovering, to quash the rumour, rode from his palace to Sancta Sophia (Q). The same year an accident happened, which had like to have caused a war between the Turks and Venetians. The widow of Ramadán Páshá, late governor of Tripoli, being bound thither with three gallies, and driven by a storm into the Adriatic, Pietro Emo, a Venetian senator, who ^{Emo's barbarity.} then commanded in the gulph, took them, and committed horrid barbarities. He slew 250 of the men, and Ramadán's son in his mother's lap: then caused the women to be ravished, their breasts to be cut off, and afterwards thrown into the sea, not sparing even the Christians. Among the rest there was a beautiful virgin, whom Emo's brother first deflowered, and then, notwithstanding all her intreaties, drowned. This news so enraged the Turks at Constantinople, that they had much ado to refrain killing the Venetian Baillo, or resident, there. However, on Morád's demanding satisfaction, the senate begged pardon, and not only put Emo to death, but also restored the gallies with the goods ⁿ.

ABOUT this time both Syria and Egypt were embroiled in troubles. Hassan, the eunuch, ^{The Durzi invaded.} Páshá of Kayro, having by his exactions greatly oppressed the people, they petition to remove him. Morád on this sends thither Ibráhim Páshá, whom he had before designed to gratify with that employment, as he designed him for his son-in-law. But the new governor more greedy than the old, taking more unjust methods to amass treasure, was in a short time recalled to accomplish the intended marriage with the Soltân's daughter. He was ordered to return through the country of the Drusi (R), to settle matters among them. They were at this time governed by five Amírs, or commanders; three of them, Ebn Frek, Ali Ebn Karfus, and Mohammed Ebn Mansúr, having been always friends, came and submitted themselves to Ibráhim; who, in July 1585, arrived at Damaskus with 20,000 horse. Sbarífo'ddín, the fourth Amír, who was poor, thought fit likewise to tender himself with presents to the Páshá, by whom he was imprisoned.

^c BUT Ebn Mán, called by the Turks Mán Oglí, the fifth, excused himself by letter for not waiting on him, on account of his enemies. Hereupon Ibráhim ravaged his country, burning ^{cruelty,} twenty-four towns, and then encamped on Mount Libanus. However, the Drusi defeated 1500 of his rear, under Wéis Páshá, killing 500, and taking their camp. Ibráhim finding the artifices and presents he made use of ineffectual to insnare Mán Oglí, who was warned by his father's fate not to trust to fair words, he ravaged the remainder of that Amír's country, and burned Andrea, the place of his residence, seated on the hill, with nineteen other towns. After this he inticed the Makadem, or agent, of Mán Oglí at Andrea, with 350 soldiers under his command, to come to him, by a promise to make him a Sanják. But as soon as Ibráhim had him in his power, he ordered Ebn Frek to put the men to the sword, and the covetous Makadem to be flayed alive; which cruel punishment he bore with great bravery, reviling the Páshá for his perfidy.

^f NOT content with these barbarities, Ibráhim ordered 100 of Sbarífo'ddín's followers to be ^{and rapacious-} slain; and, with 4000 men from his gallies at Sidon, ravaged all the coasts as far as Cesarea ^{ness.} of Palestine, whither Mán Oglí's territories extended; destroying a multitude of people of all ages and sexes, together with towns and castles, and carrying away 3000 persons into slavery. When he had done this, he appointed Ebn Karfus Páshá of the Drusians country, after getting

^m MINADOI, &c. ubi sup.ⁿ LEUCL.(Q) Leunclavius, who saw him, observed that he looked very wan.(R) Rather Durzi, a people not descended from the Druids, the Truski, or from the Franks, in the time of the Crusade, as hath been idly asserted by the Christian historians; but are the native inhabitants, who take their name from one Durzi, the author of their religion, under Hakim, 3d Fatemite Khalifay of Egypt, in 1020, whom he taught to be God incarnate. Their sacred books, in four volumes 4^{to}, are in the king of France's library, and were translated by M. Petit de la Croix, interpreter to Lewis XIV.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

A. D. 1583. what he could out of him and others ; carried off Ebn Mansûr prisoner, contrary to his faith ; and then sailed for Constantinople, with so vast a treasure, that, according to Minadoi, he presented the Soltân with a million of gold, over and above the revenue of Egypt, amounting to 600,000 ducats, and other rich presents both to him and the court ladies ; which last, as Leunclavius writes, were valued at 20,000 Soltânîns ^o.

Affairs of Persia.

Hej. 993.
A. D. 1585.

To return to the affairs of Persia. Ozmân Pâshâ being arrived at Constantinople, Morâd made him prime Wazîr, in the room of Sbaus, and likewise general of his army against the Persians. The new general, to be the earlier in the field, winters his forces in Kastamoni, and in spring, 993, recovers Tibris : to secure which more effectually, he builds a castle on a neighbouring hill, which commanded the city ; and with such dispatch, that, on the 30th day, the walls were in a condition to withstand assaults. Mean while some of the Janizaries being slain in a fray with certain inhabitants, who had affronted them, Ozmân Pâshâ ordered all, except the women and children, to be put to the sword, and their goods distributed among the soldiers. After this, peopling the city with new colonies, he places Jâffer Pâshâ (S) over it with the title of Wazîr ^p.

The Turks
defeated.

WITH this account of the Turkish authors the Christian writers for the general agree ; but add many particulars, and are more circumstantial. Ozmân Pâshâ, who set out for Arzerûm in August, being come to the plain of Kalderan, or Khladeran, famous for the battle between Selîm and Ismaïl, he reviewed his army, consisting of 180,000 men, and then marched towards Tauris. The van-guard being arrived near the city, to discover the enemy, at the Bridge of Salt Water, where they halted to refresh, they were suddenly set upon by Amîr Hâmzeb, at the head of 10,000 men, with such fury, that he quickly broke them, and slew 7000, besides the prisoners, horses, and standards, which he carried to his blind father Shâh Mohammed, who lay twelve miles off with 50,000 men. As soon as Ozmân was informed of this defeat, he detached 14,000 troops to pursue the prince ; who, facing about, engaged them for two hours till night parted them, slaying 6000 men.

Tauris taken.

NEXT morning the Turks encamped within two miles of Tauris, where Ali Kûli Khân commanded : but having a garrison of no more than 4000 Persians, after he had made two notable sallies, he retired to the king's camp. The citizens, although thus left to shift for themselves, yet gallantly defended their gates, and killed multitudes of the enemy, who attempted to force them : yet at length, being obliged to give way to numbers, the Turks broke in and made great slaughter ; which the general on notice put a stop to. Then pitching on a garden, on the south side of the city, for its delightfulness called Sekes Jenet, or the eighth paradise, he set his men to build a fort ; which in thirty-six days was finished. Mean time Ozmân fell sick ; and eight Janizaries, with some Spahis, having been found strangled in a bath, he gave the city up to the soldiers, who for several days committed the greatest rapines and barbarities. Amîr Hâmzeb was so incensed at this, that he ordered his army to march, and sent 500 horse before to provoke the Turks : who thinking the whole Persian force was coming on them, to the number of 40,000, under the command of Sikala Pâshâ, and Mohammed, Pâshâ of Kâra Amîd, advanced to fight them ; and were drawn forward, by skirmishing, about eight miles, to the place where Hâmzeb, with 20,000 forces, met them. Here was fought one of the fiercest battles that ever happened. The Pâshâ of Kâra Amîd was soon put to flight, while Sikala still bore up against the enemy ; but at last he was forced to follow his colleague, after 8000 of his men had been slain.

Cruel slaughter.

The Turks
routed.

THE Persian prince, flushed with this success, marched to attack the whole Turkish army ; and, coming up with them, fell on with incredible fury. Then entering into the thickest of the enemy, hewing down all before him, he singled out the Pâshâ of Kâra Amîd, who commanded instead of the sick general ; and, striking off his head, gave it to be carried at the end of a lance : the Turks were so confounded at this sight, that they were quickly routed. They lost on this occasion 20,000 men, with the Pâshâs of Trapezond, the Sanjak of Prusa, and five more, besides Morâd, Pâshâ of Karamânia, who was taken prisoner ^q.

Ozmân attacked.

OZMAN PASHA, having nothing more to do in these countries, set forward on his return, with the greater part of the forces : but at Sofyân (T), he is met by Hâmzeb Mirza, the bravest general the Persians then had ; who with a great army attacked him. Both sides fought obstinately from sun-rise till midnight. Hâmzeb Mirza ran up and down the army ; one while he charged in front, another while rallied his disordered troops in the rear, and both by words and actions performed the duty of a good general. On the contrary, Ozmân Pâshâ,

^o MINADOI, l. vii.

^p CANT. p. 232.

^q MINADOI, l. viii. RICAUT.

(S) Minadoi says, he was Pâshâ of Tripoli ; and that 12,000 men were left in garrison.

(T) At Sankasan, seven miles from Tauris, so says

Minadoi, in a letter from a Turkish officer inserted by that author.

a being sick, rode on a mule, encouraging his men by his voice. At length the Persians were obliged to give ground; and the night after, Ozmân, exhausted with the labour of the foregoing day, breathed his last; and so crowned with martyrdom a life which he had rendered illustrious by his exploits[†]. A. D. 1585.

With regard to this battle, Minadoi informs us, that the Turks, being about to encamp at Hâmzeh Mir-Sankasan, perceived in the rear a confused noise, by which they judged the enemy to be approaching: but, while several troops drew that way to oppose them, the prince of Persia, with 28,000 men, without any signal of battle, attacked them on the other side. He first seized 18,000 camels and mules loaden with provisions, besides the plunder of the town; then fell on with a bravery and fury which astonished the Turks. They would have penetrated to the very tent of the sick general himself, if the cannon had not been brought to bear upon them; which yet, in that mixture of both armies, destroyed more Turks than Persians, who lost but few men in this gallant action, while their enemies had 20,000 slain. Among the rest Ozmân died here, not by the sword, but of an ague and the flux[‡]. Hâmzeh Mirza's bravery.

UPON his death, the army chose Sinân Pâshâ (U) for general, and pursue their march. But Hâmzeh Mirza follows them close; and though unable, by reason of his late loss, to attack the Othmâns in the field, yet he harrasses them with continual skirmishes, lies in ambush at narrow passes, and does them more damage than if he had defeated them. Having thus weakened their army, and assembled more forces, he at length attacks them at Salmâs (X), and furiously assaults their camp. But whilst he is bravely leading on his men, he falls among the foremost, and by his death frees the Othmâns from great danger: for the Persians, struck with the loss of their general, immediately retire, and give the Musulmâns an open passage to Wân[§]. The Turks pursued.

THE Turkish historian seems to have anticipated the death of prince Hâmzeh, as appears not only from Minadoi's history of these wars, but also from a letter inserted by that author, written by the Sanjâk of Hamâh, in Syria, to Ali, Pâshâ of Halep; who, in his account of the retreat to Wân, mentions nothing of the prince's death; and as the Turks are mistaken in the time, so it is likely they are in the manner of his death, which is differently related by the Christians. According to Minadoi, prince Hâmzeh, being informed of Ozmân's death, followed the Turks in their retreat, then commanded by Sikûlâ Pâshâ, and bravely attacked them again, though not with such success as before. His design was to have decoyed them into a deep marsh, by feigning to retire: but this being discovered by the rebels, Masûd and Dawd Khân, the Pâshâ caused a great wing to be formed, in order to charge the enemy. The prince, perceiving by this that his intentions were traversed, resolved to retire in earnest, as he did; but not without the loss of 3000 men. After this, the Turks met with no interruption in their march, by Salmâs, to Wân; where, after a general review, in which 85,000 men were found wanting, they were disbanded: only succours were first sent to Tefsîs, under the conduct of Dawd Khân; who for that service was made Pâshâ of Marâsh, as Masûd was of Halep[¶]. Retire to Wân.

THE Othmân forces being thus obliged, through weakness, to quit their conquests, the Persians next year besiege Tibrîs: but as Ferbâd Pâshâ was sent with numerous forces to its relief, he compels the enemy to raise the siege, and builds a new castle between that city and Rivân; about which places, as strong bulwarks, he keeps his army four whole years. In summer he fights the Persians, and, that he might be nearer their borders, passes the winter at Arzerûm^{*}.

LET us hear from Minadoi a more particular account of this expedition. The Persians, unable to bear the thoughts of the fortress built at Tauris, the king engaged 10,000 Turk-mâns in his service; but they, to revenge the death of their commander Amîr Khân, desired Tabmâsp, the Shâh's youngest son, for their leader; with design to embroil the state by setting him up for king. Their request being granted, they undertook the siege of the castle; but when they had carried their trenches to the very ditch, so that all things were ready for the assault, they suddenly marched away in the night for Kasbîn, giving young Tabmâsp the title of king, and reviling his father as well as brother. Prince Hâmzeh, boiling with indignation at this atrocious affront, with 12,000 men, and the king's usual guards, followed the rebels; and having overtaken them, a day's march from Kasbîn, quickly routed them: for the greater part of them, disliking the conspiracy, would not fight. So that prince Tabmâsp, Persians defeated. Hej. 994. A. D. 1586. The Turk-mâns revolt.

† CANT. p. 232, & seqq. p. 233.

‡ MINADOI, l. viii.

§ CANT. p. 233.

¶ MINADOI, l. viii.

* CANT.

(U) Minadoi says they chose Sikâlâ, or Sigela, Pâshâ.

(X) Prince Cantemir says, this city was unknown both to him and the maps; but believes it was dependent on Sofyân. What map our author used we know not:

but Salmâs is to be found in most of the maps on this side of Europe, being situate on the lake of Marâgab, or of the Shâh, about 85 miles to the south-west of Sofyân.

A. D. 1586. with Mohammed Khán, their general, and Soltán Khalifah, being taken, the two latter were beheaded on the spot.

Salmás taken. JAFFER PASHA, governor of Tauris, fearing prince Hámzeb would return to renew the siege, sent for aid to Sigála Páshá; who presently set forward with his troops: but understanding in the way by some Persians, that their king was on his march with an army towards Sankazán, he, through fear, retired to Wán. For all this Jaffer had the good fortune to be supplied by the succeeding general, before the Persians, engaged in their domestic broils, could come to attack him: for it was July 1586, before prince Hámzeb could bring an army to besiege Tauris; nor did he stay long there: but understanding that Zeniel, Páshá of Salmás, who had deserted the Persian interest, lay encamped before that city, he marched thither suddenly with twelve thousand men, and, routing him, took Salmás; which was miserably sacked. He likewise defeated the Páshá of Riván near that city, and then retired to his father's camp, where the rest of the army, to the number of forty thousand men, were assembled.

Hámzeh Mirzah treacherously slain. MEAN time Ferbád Páshá, the Turkish general, having passed Wán, the prince detached Ali Kúli Khán, with his eight thousand soldiers, from Heri, or Herát, and part of the Turkmáns, under Imám Kúli Khán, to infect the enemy at all the advantageous passages in their way to Tauris; but the latter being wholly influenced by the former, and he a traitor, they were so far from executing their orders, that the Turks relieved that city without any impediment. Disappointment having broken the prince's measures, and being now informed of Ali Kúli Khán's conspiracy, with other lords, to betray him into the hands of the Turks, he was obliged to abandon his enterprizes against the foreign enemy, in order to secure himself against the domestic traitors. These at length he chased out of the parts about Tauris, and then marched in haste to Ganjeb, with design to intercept the succours which the Turks intended for Teflis. As he had always found Imám Kúli Khán faithful to him, he here communicated to him his resolution: but while this gallant prince wasted the proper time for putting the same in execution, he was murdered in his sleep by one of his eunuchs: but on what occasion, or by whom set on, could not with any certainty be known^y.

Affairs of Hungary. BUT to leave the affairs of Asia for a while, let us see what the Turks have been doing in Europe. Notwithstanding the league between the emperor Rodolphus II. and Morád, many sharp rencounters happened between the Turks and Christians on the frontiers, particularly in December 1586, when the former, making an inroad into Kroatia, were defeated, and the Páshá of Bosnia, with his brother, slain. The Hungarians also, in February following, provoked by the frequent ravages of the Othmáns, surprised the castle of Koppán, near the lake of Balaton, and got a considerable booty. The Turks, waiting an opportunity to revenge the injury, in August destroyed seventeen villages about Limbach, and carried off all the country people with their effects: but George count Serini, governor of Kanisia, being informed of this, he speedily assembled some troops, and being joined by the counts Nadafti, Bashiani, and others, seized the passes between the Drave and Móra, through which the Turks were to march, and made a horrible slaughter of them. Among them fell the Sanják of Five Churches; and he of Mohatz, sticking fast in a marsh as he fled, was shot through the head. The Sanják of Koppán was some time after taken also, with thirteen hundred soldiers, and fifteen hundred horses; besides two thousand men slain, and all the prisoners, with the spoil, recovered.

The Turks worsted. THIS service was performed with no more than fifteen hundred foot, and five hundred horse, of whom there were only eleven slain, but most of the rest wounded. When Morád heard of these things, he ordered Ali, Páshá of Buda, to be strangled for violating the league, and Sinán Páshá to take his post. Yet this Páshá, in September, broke into the Christian territories, and burned Saxo. But Claudius Russel, general in those quarters, defeated and slew two thousand five hundred of the Turks, besides two hundred drowned in the river Schayo. The Christians soon after, in their turn, took some forts from the enemy in Upper Hungary: but Sinán was at length displaced for what he did, and Ferbád, the general in the Persian expedition, put into his post^z: to whom now it is time to return.

Georgia over-run. THIS Páshá, having acted on the frontiers of Persia, as before has been related, at length penetrates into Ghyurjestán, or Georgia, and subduing the castles of that province, builds two towns Luri and Ghiunje (Y). After this, joining battle with Káradághí Mehemed Khán, gene-

^y MINADOT, lib. ix.

^z RICAUT, in Amurath III.

(Y) This must be the same with Ganjeb, a fine city near the river Kór, and of great antiquity, as well as Luri, or Lori: so that the Turks rather repaired than built them.—The Christian writers say, that the inhabitants deserted Ganjeb on the approach of the Turks, but afterwards returned, and agreed to pay 5000 ducats yearly tribute. Ricaut.

a ral of the Persians, he puts him to flight, and so effectually disperses his army, that the forces of the Kezilbâsh, or Red Heads, dared not from that time to appear in the field (Z). A. D. 1587.

THE Shâh, discouraged by so many defeats, and the loss of the provinces of Rivân, Ghiunje, and Hârâbig (+), began to think in earnest of suing for peace. But as Morâd did not seem very forward to grant it, he promised to relinquish claim to all the countries subdued by the Othmâns, and send his brother Hayderjân to the Porte, as a pledge that no Persian army should ever enter the Othmân dominions, or make any private or open attempt against that empire. On these conditions, sworn to on both sides, a peace is at last concluded (A), and an end put to a long and bloody war. Hej. 995.
A. D. 1587.

b BUT the troops who had reduced the foreign enemies of the empire soon became its intestine foes. For the Janizaries, being stirred up by the enemies of the Defterdâr, or high treasurer, whom they accused with debasing the coin, and paying them with it (B), flock together, and threaten to kill him in his palace. That officer, informed of the danger, flies to the imperial throne, and begs Morâd's protection. The rebels, hearing this, surround the palace, and insolently demand the treasurer. On the emperor's refusal to deliver him they grow more insolent; and, guarding the avenues, threaten death to the Soltân and all his court. The Janizaries mutiny.
Hej. 997.
A. D. 1589.

IN this distress, Morâd, thinking it proper to proceed to extremities, left the imperial majesty should fall into contempt, first arms all his chamberlains and Baltâji (C), then orders the gates to be opened, and the Janizaries to be attacked, as infidels and disobedient. His orders are vigorously executed: for his domestics rushing like lions on the disorderly mutineers, killed one hundred and seventeen at the first onset, before they could come together, and dispersed the rest (D). Of these Morâd intended to make examples: but, by the intercession of Sinân Pâshâ, the prime Wazîr, he pardoned all but the ringleaders; who, by his command, were thrown into the sea.^a Are quelled and pardoned.

THE same year the Polish Kossâks, according to custom, made an inroad into the dominions of the Turks and Tatars, surprised Kessan, and did much mischief. The Tatars, by way of reprisal, breaking into Podolia, with forty thousand men, committed great ravages; which had like to have embroiled the Poles with the Turks: but matters were accommodated by the mediation of Elizabeth, queen of England, and the league renewed^b. As we meet with nothing in the Turkish historians for the next four years, although many considerable actions happened in Europe, we shall supply that chasm out of the Christian writers.

MORAD, being now at peace with all the world, his Pâshâs endeavour to excite him to a new war; but were much divided in their opinions, with regard to the nation against whom they were to employ their arms. Some were for breaking the peace with the Persians, in order to confirm their late conquest, by making more. Others were for subduing Morokko, in order to extend their footing in Africa, as well as commerce. A third sort were for invading Malta, to revenge their daily injuries and former disgraces received from the corsairs of that island. Many were for attacking the Spaniards, whose power was a bar to the Othmâns attaining universal monarchy; and, as they were then embroiled in the Low Countries, this counsel had like to have prevailed. Some again were for turning their forces against the Venetians and Italy; while others proposed carrying the war into Poland. War declared against the emperor.
A. D. 1591.

BUT at length it was resolved to fall upon the emperor of Germany, to which Morâd was most of all inclined, by the persuasion of Ozmân, the grand Wazîr, and Hassan, Pâshâ of Bosnia. These, under pretence that the Ukokki (E), and other of the archduke's subjects, infested the Turkish territories, as well by sea as land, got leave to make incursions into Kroatia, and seize the trading ships of Venice. Hereupon both the emperor and the republic complain by their ambassadors at the Porte, and demand redress. But although Morâd made profession of keeping the eight years truce with Rodolph II. yet he ordered the Pâshâ of Bosnia to enter A. D. 1592.

^a CANT. p. 233, & seqq.

^b RICAUT, ubi sup.

(Z) The Christian historians mention nothing of this; but say, that when Ferbâd would have advanced farther into the enemy's country, and that part of his army was cut off by the way, the soldiers mutinied, and wounding, forced him to return. Ricaut.

(+) Or Kârâbâgh.

(A) This peace, according to the Christian historians, was made for ten years, in the year 1588, so memorable for the defeat of the mighty Armada of Spain by the English fleet. On which occasion Morâd, by letter, congratulated Elizabeth, that glorious queen, in very obliging terms.

(B) It is said also, that they were offended with a new sort of tax; so that next night a fire happening, they refused to quench it, and even hindered the people from doing it; whereby seven mosks, five great Khâns, or inns, 15,000 houses, besides warehouses and shops, were consumed. Ricaut.

MOD. HIST. VOL. V.

(C) The Baltâji, for this service, are called to this day in the imperial palace, Khâskuller, pure and faithful servants. Cant.

(D) The Christian writers mention nothing of this. On the contrary, they say, that when Morâd saw all men were against the tax, he sacrificed the Beglerbeg of Greece, and Passî, the Jew, who were the contrivers of it, to the rage of the people. Ricaut.

(E) A sort of banditti, who had formed a kind of state towards the Venetian frontiers.

A. D. 1592. Kroatia with an army of fifty thousand men; who, laying siege to Wibitz, the capital of that country, took it upon articles ^c.

Successes in Kroatia and in Hungary.

WHILE the emperor was soliciting the princes and states of Germany, the Turkish army daily increased in Kroatia; where they hemmed in six thousand foot and five hundred horse, most of whom were slain. The island of Turopolis, in the Kulp, was destroyed also with fire and sword, by Hassan Pâshâ; who, being encamped between that river and the Save, passed over to it in the dead of the night. After this, seven thousand troops, sent by the emperor to oppose the incursions of the enemy, having been misinformed by the scouts sent to discover their strength, were by the Turks suddenly surrounded in their camp, where they lay negligently secure, and were almost all slain, after a most gallant resistance which they made, altho' they were deserted by their officers. These afterwards paid for their cowardice with the loss of their heads: but the soldiers sold their lives very dear, having slain the Turks twelve thousand men in that desperate action. The night following the Othmân forces surprised the castle of St. George, and slew all, except one hundred and fifty persons, without respect to age or sex. They likewise took a great many prisoners about Siseg, besides three hundred waggons, with provisions for the relief of the garrisons.

WHILE these things were doing in Kroatia, they, in September, suddenly attacked the castle of Tokay, and the Lesser Komorn, or Sbut, in Hungary: but failing in those attempts, the Pâshâ of Ziget also pitched his tents between that city and Rodesto. The Turkish army, now reported to be about one hundred and sixty thousand strong, committed great ravages, and carried off a multitude of people. This news made the Christians hasten their preparations; while the Turks, being informed that they had thrown a strong bridge over the Drave, withdrew into their own territories; and the rather, as the plague, which raged at Constantinople, had now reached their army.

Farther advantages.

A. D. 1593.

BUT in the beginning of the next year the enemy renewed their incursions. The garrison of Petrina, a fort newly built by the Turks, contrary to the peace, on the Kulp, entering into the isle of Turopolis, burnt the town and castle of Bech-Vocobinam; and, having made a great slaughter, carried away four hundred prisoners. The same garrison took also the town of Martenize, and another castle near the Kulp. The castles of St. Hedwig and Isna fell likewise into the hands of the enemy: but they failed in Hungary, where three thousand of them thought to have surprised Nubusel.

The Pâshâ of Bosnia outwitted and slain.

THE emperor Rodolph, being convinced of Morâd's resolution for war, as well by these hostilities as the strict confinement of his ambassador at Constantinople, wrote both to the Soltân and Sinân Pâshâ, the prime Wazîr, upon the occasion, and was answered by the latter nothing to the purpose. Mean time summer approaching, the Pâshâ of Bosnia resolved to be revenged on the governor or abbot of Siseg, who had affronted him in the following manner. The Pâshâ having the year before sent a Cbaus, or messenger, to require him to surrender the castle, the abbot, after he had civilly entertained him, coming to understand that his steward had plotted to betray the castle, threw both him and the messenger out at a window into the Save. The Pâshâ sending to know why the Cbaus did not come back, was answered, that he had been dismissed some days before; adding, that if the Pâshâ would, to save his credit, send some men of quality to receive the monastery, he was ready to yield it up.

THREE days after, certain troops of horse, with the noblemen, arrived: but as soon as the latter, and five hundred others were admitted, the port-culices were let down, and the Turks cut to pieces. Their companions having fled with this ill news to the Pâshâ, he wrote to acquaint the abbot, that he would raze his monastery, and pull his skin over his ears. In order to perform his promise, after he had taken Trenschin, he with an army of thirty thousand men, in June, sat down before Siseg; and, after beating down the new tower, continued to batter the town for ten days without intermission. On this advice the bishop of Zagrabia, with Eygenberg, the imperial general, joined by count Aversberg, governor of Carolstadt, marched to Gradisca, with four thousand troops, there to wait for count Serini: but receiving notice from the besieged of their great distress, they were prevailed on by count Aversberg to proceed to their relief. When they were arrived within a mile of the enemy's camp, and the Turks had brought all their forces over the Kulp, the Kroats and Hussârs, who were posted in the van, began the charge: but, being overpowered by numbers, they, after a long conflict, began to retreat; when Aversberg coming on, restored the battle, and put the Pâshâ to flight. Then getting to the new bridge before the Turks, he cut off their passage; so that they were all, to the number of eighteen thousand, either slain, or drowned in the Kulp or Oder; among whom was the general. Hereupon those who remained at the siege, setting fire to their powder and provision, fled; leaving their tents, artillery, and much spoil behind them ^d.

^c RICAUT, in Amurath III.

^d Ibid.

^a FOR all this success, the Christians failed to take Petrina : nor could the emperor procure a peace from Morád, who at length denounced war against him, and gave the command of his army, consisting of forty thousand men, of whom five thousand six hundred were Janizaries, to Sinán Páshá. While this general marched towards Buda, in Hungary, the Beglerbeg of Greece, with a greater force, enters Kroatia, and lays siege to Sifeg; which was exceedingly well defended till September, when it was taken by storm, and all the garrison put to the sword. A. D. 1593.
Sifeg taken.

MEAN time Sinán Páshá, being come before Weisbrun, invested that city : but the garrison, perceiving that it could not long be defended against so great a power, placed barrels of powder in mines under the walls, with trains to them, and so in the night endeavoured to escape; but being discovered, most of them were slain. However, the Turks greedily entering the city, many of them were blown up by the mines, and the place much defaced by the explosions. After this the castle of Palotta was surrendered to the Páshá, on condition that the garrison might depart with bag and baggage : but they were all slain, contrary to his oath, excepting the commander and two more. The consequence of this success was, that all the adjacent country near the lake of Baleton was easily subdued. Weisbrun reduced.

^b THE Christians having at last drawn together eighteen thousand men, count Hardeck, governor of Raab, about the end of October, laid siege to Alba Regalis; and, after some sharp assaults, raised it again, the beginning of November. But being informed by a spy, that twenty thousand men, under the Páshá of Buda, were at hand, he advanced towards them; and, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the ground, bravely mounted the hill where the enemy were posted, fought and routed them, killing about eight thousand, and taking all their cannon, waggons, and provision, with many standards. After this he burned the suburbs of Alba Regalis, and returned to Raab. The Turks slaughtered.

^c Soon after count Teffenbach, with twenty four thousand men, laid siege to Sabatza, in Upper Hungary; which he took the 19th of November, and put all the garrison to the sword. From thence he marched to attack Filek; which the Páshá of Temeswaer came to relieve, with an army of eighteen thousand men. Hereupon the general, taking with him seven thousand choice soldiers, suddenly fell upon the Turks in their tents, routed them, and slew six thousand; then, taking all their cannon and baggage, returned to the camp before Filek: where, being joined by six thousand men under count Palfy, they renewed the siege with such vigour, that they took and burnt the city on the 24th of the same month. In two days more they forced the castle, maugre the obstinate resistance of the enemy, and put all to the sword, excepting eight hundred; who, having retired to the most inward part thereof, capitulated for their lives. Filek taken.

^d UPON these successes the Turks abandoned the castles of Diistein and Somoske, with the towns of Setschine, Blavenstein, and Sallek; while the severity of the season hindered the general from prosecuting his advantages. However, the enemy still continued to forsake other territories and places; as Ainacke, Sollock, Westhe, &c. The Sanjâk of Palotto also was defeated by Peter the Hussâr; and five thousand Turks more from Petrina were routed by count Graswin, and most of them drowned or slain. Castles abandoned.

^e HOSTILITIES began early next year, notwithstanding the severity of the season : but two thousand Turks, having made an inroad in the middle of January into the country about Filek, were set upon by count Teffenbach, and fifteen hundred slain or taken prisoners. The archduke Matthias, whom the emperor had appointed general of his forces, being informed by a Turkish soldier that Novograde had only eight hundred men in garrison, he used such diligence, that by the eighth of March he came before it with his whole army; after the castle, which was strongly fortified both by art and nature, had been battered with much fury, but not being attended with success, the battery was renewed; and the principal gunner, a renegade German, happening to be slain, the Turks were so discouraged, that they agreed to surrender, on condition of departing with their cloaths and scymitars only. This loss was resented so much, that the Sanjâk who delivered up the place was hanged on a tree near the gate of Buda, by order of the Páshá of that city. Novograde surrendered.
A. D. 1594.

^f ABOUT the same time count Serini possessed himself of the castles of Bresenza, Sigest, and Babostche, which were abandoned by the Turks, and left a passage open to Sigetb. In Upper Hungary count Teffenbach, the archduke's lieutenant-general, with an army of twenty thousand men, in April, laid siege to Hatwan, a strong town, six miles from Buda; whose Páshá marched with thirteen thousand choice men, to pass the Sagijwa at Jasprin, where there is a bridge and ford, in order to fall on the rear of the besiegers. But the count perceiving his design, crossed the river with much difficulty, and coming up with the Páshá, first disordered his rear with his cannon, and then fell furiously on their whole body. The Turks for a long time

^c RICAUT, in Amurath III.

A. D. 1594.  sustained the charge with wonderful resolution : but being at length routed, fled, and were a pursued almost as far as Buda. In this action they lost two thousand five hundred men ; for no quarter was given to prisoners ; also thirteen field-pieces, and twenty-four colours. They at the same time deserted Jasprin, and the fort of Zabola. After which the count renewed the siege of Hatwan.

Gran invested.

MEAN time the archduke, with an army of forty-four thousand men, on the sixth of May, sat down before Gran, for some time the metropolis of Hungary ; and with wild-fire burned St. Adelbert's tower, the church, and great part of the town. Next day the besiegers, having made a breach in the castle wall, made a fierce assault, but could not carry it. However the Rascians in the old town offered to the general to deliver him that city, provided he would assault the new town, in order to draw the Turks thither ; which was accordingly performed. After b this the battery was carried on fiercely, especially against the castle, and the assault renewed ; but with greater courage than success. However, the besiegers took a hill, which somewhat commanded the castle, and had been fortified by the Turks, putting all they found to the sword, and turning the cannon upon the castle. Some companies also in the night attacked the lower town, and with much ado got over the wall ; but meeting with a strong counter-mure, were so dismayed and put to it to get back over the ditch, where many stuck fast, that they lost in this attempt one thousand men.

The siege raised.

THE 4th of June five hundred Turks made a shift to get into the town, which made the besieged more obstinate than before ; so that in five assaults the Christians lost five thousand men. Yet the 14th the archduke ordered the town to be assaulted in three different places ; c but after six hours fierce conflict, the besiegers retired. At the same time count Palfy erected a fort, which barred the besieged from receiving succours by the river, and took another in an island on the farther side. From these places the castle and lower town being severely battered, the Turks made two desperate sallies upon the new fort, seconded by the admiral of their gal- lies on the river ; but without success. At length, advice arriving of Sinân Pâshâ, with a great army, to relieve the place, the general raised the siege, towards the end of October, after he had fired the old town and razed St. Nicholas fort. Mean time the siege of Hatwan was carried on with great vigour, and count Teffenbach slew five thousand men, brought by the Pâshâ of Buda to relieve it : yet the Turks proved so obstinate in defence of the place, and the count was so weakened by his losses, that he also thought proper to give over his enter- d prise.

Rascians their exploits.

WHILE the two places above-mentioned were besieging, the Rascians, a poor oppressed people, who dwelt on both sides of the Danube, being weary of the Turkish thralldom, first took thirteen of their vessels upon that river ; and then drawing together a body of fifteen thousand men between Buda and Belgrade, twice defeated the Pâshâ of Temeswaer with a body of fourteen thousand Turks. After this they took Baczkerék, four miles from Belgrade, and the castle of Ottadt : then laying siege to that of Beche, on the Theyssa, the old Pâshâ of Temeswaer marched to relieve it with eleven thousand men : but the Rascians encountering them, slew near ten thousand, and took eighteen pieces of cannon. The consequence of this victory was the taking Wersetza and Lutz. Then, sending to the archduke for aid and gunners, they e offered to put themselves and their country under the emperor's protection^f.

AFFAIRS were in this troubled state in Hungary, when Sinân Pâshâ approached with an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men ; forty thousand of them Tatars, who, with much ado, had made their escape thro' Podolia and Upper Hungary from the Kossaks, after they had lost thirty thousand of their first number. The Pâshâ, having passed the Gran, came, on the 21st of July, to Dotis, or Totis, which was surrendered in three days. He likewise took the castle of St. Martin, not far off, and then marched to Raab, or Javarin, a city about fifty miles from Vienna, and reckoned the chief bulwark of it ; whose governor was the valiant count Hardeck, and the garrison five thousand strong.

Sinân Pâshâ
besieges Raab.

SINAN began to batter this place on the 2d of August, and ran his trenches within musket- f shot of the walls ; while four thousand Tatars and six thousand Turks, crossing the river, took a fort from the Christians, and turned the cannon thereof upon the archduke's camp, which lay a little beyond ; but they were forced back again thro' the river, and most of those who escaped the sword were drowned. They were defeated on a second and third passage, with great slaughter. Eight thousand Tatars likewise were slain by the Hussârs, in two attempts to take an island in the river ; and lost two thousand more, in assisting the Turks to attack the Christian camp. At the same time their army was diminished also by the flux and want of provisions : yet Sinân the general could not be advised to raise the siege ; while the Imperialists were so

^f RICAUT, ubi sup.

a successful as to take Castrowitz, Petrina, Siseg, and Gara, whereby the whole country of Kro- A. D. 1594.
atia was secured.

At the end of August twenty thousand Christians, passing over out of the island, and joining with the besieged, fell on the Turkish camp, and penetrated so far as to nail some of their cannon; yet were beaten off, with considerable loss on both sides: but the besieged, sallying a second time, slew two thousand of the enemy, with the loss only of four hundred on their own side; and took seventeen colours. No day passed without some action, when on the ninth of September, ten thousand Turks, having landed in the isle of Schut, or Sclut, suddenly fell upon the too secure Christians, and slew two thousand of them; while the archduke Matbias narrowly escaped with the rest, leaving all their artillery, money, and baggage behind them: so that, reckoning the waggons, boats, and gallies, that were also lost, the damage was computed at five hundred thousand ducats.

THE Pâshâ, encouraged with this success, on the 23d, gave a general assault upon the city, which was continued from morning to night, and renewed the two following days with all the desperate resolution imaginable. In these actions twelve thousand Turks were slain: but a few days after, the ditch being almost filled with the ruins of one of the bulwarks, they with all their force attempted thrice in one day to enter the breach, but were repulsed. In short, they repeated their batteries and assaults so often, that at length they gained two of the bulwarks. Upon this count Hardeck, having gotten an instrument under the hands of the principal officers to certify the impossibility of defending the place any longer, he surrendered that strong and well-provided fortress to the enemy, for which afterwards he had his right hand cut off, and was then beheaded.

SINAN PASHA, flushed with this good fortune, laid siege to the strong city of Komorra, in the isle of Schut, both by land and water. For some time the place was vigorously attacked, and as vigorously defended: but the archduke having in the interim drawn together a considerable body of men, encamped at Nitria, within five miles of the city; and the Tatars having quitted the Turkish camp, in order to return home, the Pâshâ immediately raised the siege; and, passing the Danube, returned to Dotis, from whence his army was sent into winter quarters. When the Tatars were gotten as far as the borders of Transilvania and Moldavia, several of them were cut off by count Palsy; and the rest finding the passages beset by prince Sigismund, Vayvod of Walakbia, they fell to burning the towns and villages about Tokay: then crossing the Danube at Gran, wintered at Weisburn Palotta, and other places near Raab, living on the spoil of the inhabitants on the frontiers of Austria, as far as Minesdorf.

THESE Tatars, when they first came to aid Sinân Pâshâ, not only did prodigious mischief in Transilvania, but conspired with some of the principal lords to seize and depose the prince, who was become suspected at the Porte. The design of the traitors was to get Balthazar Batori, the Vayvod's near relation, advanced in his room: but Sigismund, eluding all their designs, managed matters so well, that he secured and executed all the conspirators at Clausenburg. After this, entering into strict alliance with the emperor Rodolph against the Othmâns, he prevailed on Mikbael, Vayvod of Walakbia, to revolt from them; and had no small influence over Aaron, Palatine of Moldavia, to do the like. Mikbael having, with consent of the states, joined the emperor, with two thousand choice Hungarians, first slew one thousand Janizaries, who had, without his leave, settled in the country; and then the rest of the Turks, with the Jews who were found there. After which he took and burnt Dziurdzowa, a great town on the Danube, belonging to the Turks.

As he all this while seemed still to retain his obedience to Morâd, the Turks, who sought to be revenged on him, sent a Kâzilâsker with a proper force to Bukhorest, with a design to surprise him. That officer, who knew the Vayvod lay in his palace near the monastery, without the city, upon the Dembowiz, went thither with one thousand men, under pretence of paying him a visit: but the prince, suspecting the matter, repaired to his camp of Hungarian mercenaries. The Kâzilâsker, disappointed of his prey, sent to know why he entertained so many Hungarians in time of peace; and promised, in case he disbanded them, to lend him a ton of gold to pay them off. This Sigismund seemed thankfully to accept of, yet commanded the Hungarians to be ready, while drawing together some other troops in a valley, he suddenly surrounded the Turks in their lodgings, which were fired; and, notwithstanding the bold resistance they made, they were all either burnt or slain, not excepting the Kâzilâsker, who offered vast ransoms for himself and some others.

THE Vayvod, encouraged with this beginning, not long after surprised and sacked Pblokh, a very large open town beyond the Danube, slaying all the inhabitants. Not long after, crossing that river, then frozen, to surprise Hersowa, a walled city, but one stage from Brailowa, he by the way defeated a great body of Turks on the ice, and then took that rich city; which he

A. D. 1594.  rifled and burnt : but the castle was too strong to be reduced. Six days after he crossed the Danube again; and having in a great battle routed the Turkish garrisons, took Silistria, a great city of Bulgaria, which he plundered; and slaying most of the inhabitants, burnt it to the ground ^a.

Hungary
invaded.

Hej. 1002.

THE Turkish historians made use of by prince Cantemir sum up the four years transactions in Hungary in a few lines; or rather connecting the mutiny of the Janizaries, before related, with the transactions of the last year. They only tell us that, to remove all occasions of such-like disturbances for the future, Morâd sent the Wazîr Sinân Pâshâ, in the year 1002, with a great army into Hungary, where some towns were taken : that at the approach of winter he ordered the troops to be quartered in Rum-ili, and next spring Yanîk (F) to be invested; which was taken, after a siege of eighteen days. ^b

Morâd dies.

MORAD died on Friday the 6th day of Jemaziolawel (G), after he had lived fifty years, and reigned twenty, and eight months. He had twenty sons, who were all strangled by the eldest, his successor.

His character.

PRINCE Cantemir observes, that all the Turkish historians whom he had seen strangely pass over in silence the character and manners of this emperor, contrary to their constant custom ^h. But this silence cannot be owing to any thing very odious in the manners of Morâd, since the Christian authors speak much in his commendation. According to them, he was of a manly stature and corpulent, but of a pale complexion, wearing his beard long and thin. He had not the fierce aspect of the Othmân monarchs, and was of a peaceful disposition; a lover of justice, and very zealous in his religion. He reformed the riot and excess of his father's reign, by his own temperance, and the severe punishment of notorious drunkards; though some say he would drink plentifully himself of wormwood wine. He was rather too penurious, and gave more way to the counsels of his mother, wife, and sister, than of his great Pâshâs; which many imputed to simplicity ⁱ.

^a RICAUT. ubi sup.

^h CANT. p. 235.

ⁱ RICAUT, in Amurath III.

(F) So the Turks name Yavarin, or Yarinum; called by the Germans, Raab. CANT.

(G) According to the Christian writers, on the 18th of January, 1596, after he had lived 51 or 52 years, as others say, and reigned 19. They add, that his death was attended with so sudden and terrible a storm at Constantinople, that many thought the world was at an end.

C H A P. XIV.

The Reign of Mohammed III.

13 Soltân
Mohammed
III.

THE first thing Mohammed did on his arrival at Constantinople, was to secure himself in the throne by the slaughter of his nineteen brethren. The Christian historians say, that he invited them all to a feast, where, for their entertainment, they were strangled : that he was reported also to have caused ten of his father's wives and concubines, by whom any issue was to be feared, to be drowned in the sea : that a mutiny, raised hereupon by the Janizaries, being appeased, there was a tent set up before Sancta Sophia, in which was placed the body of Morâd, with those of his murdered sons beside him : that after this there was another tumult of the Janizaries, which might have cost the new proclaimed emperor and all his court their lives, had not the prime Wazîr, by his prudence and gravity, appeased them.

Confederacy against him.

MEAN time the emperor Rodolph II. having entered into a confederacy with the princes of Transilvania, Walakhia, and Moldavia, as has been before related, made divers successful incursions into the Turkish dominions. The Imperialists recovered Weitze; defeated four thousand Turks near Raab, or Javarin : the Walakhians seized upon all the treasures of Sinân Pâshâ; in conjunction with the Transilvanians, took from them Pondefia, Nikopolis, Killa, and Rebnikki, routed twelve thousand Tatars, and afterwards slew eight thousand of them, as they were on their march to join Bogdân, who was sent from the Porte to dispossess the old Vayvod. As for Aaron, Vayvod of Moldavia, he defeated the Tatars in three battles; slew twelve thousand of them, and drove the rest out of his country. Soon after this he took Bender, Schinitz, Tigna, Mekhnis, and other places, with the country of Bobraga, from the Turks; and slew eight thousand of them under Janikula, the son of Bogdân. ^e a THE Porte used all their artifices to break this confederacy among the Christian princes, at the same time that they made great preparations for war. At this juncture most places in Hungary possessed by the Turks laboured under a grievous famine, infomuch that the Tatar women who followed the camp were forced to eat their own children. This famine was attended by a terrible plague, of which daily great numbers died : so that of eighty-five thousand Tatars, who the year before came into Hungary, scarce eight thousand were left alive. As an addition to these calamities, the Turks continually received new damages from the confederates. Mikhael, Vayvod of Walakbia, entering their frontiers, surprised Schimele, with its castle, the port of Orofiga, where were the Turkish magazines full of provisions, Kilek, Galempe, with the strong castle of St. George, and then besieged Laganok. A. D. 1594.

Calamities in Turkey.

b WHILE the emperor endeavoured to gain the Poles on his side, two Turkish ambassadors, sent to cross his designs, were slain in Walakbia, without the privity of the Vayvod. Rodolph at length, with the assistance of several other princes, brought into the field an army of seventy thousand five hundred men, fifteen thousand five hundred whereof were cavalry, under the command of the archduke Matbias, and many other brave generals. At the same time a great body of Turks, commanded by the Pâshâ of Buda, was overthrown near Temeswaer. Ferbâd Pâshâ, entering Walakbia with another body, was routed (H), by the lord Nadafti, and eight thousand slain. In the interim Sigismond, prince of Transilvania, having, by intercepted letters and otherwise, just grounds to suspect that the Vayvod of Moldavia not only held intelligence with the Poles, and cardinal Bathori, his rival, but also went about clandestinely to make a peace with Mohammed, caused him to be seized with his wife and son, whom he sent prisoners to Prague, placing in his room Stephen Rozwan. The emperor's forces.

c DURING these troubles, three Chausb arrived in Transilvania, as ambassadors to Sigismond ; exhorting him to return under the protection of the Porte, and give the Turkish forces a passage through his country into Hungary. On these conditions the Soltân promised to forgive all past injuries, and that the Vayvod should enjoy the three principalities of Transilvania, Walakbia, and Moldavia, as his own inheritance, free from tribute : but his future behaviour shewed that the offers were not accepted. The Turks were for the general so discontented with this war, that it is said Wafwode Giezi, one of the old Janizaries, had the boldness to tell the Soltân, that his ministers had imposed on him, and made him dishonourably violate the peace : that the conquest of Christendom was so far from following the taking of Raab, which Sinân Pâshâ had bought, he said, with money, not reduced by force, that Transilvania, Walakbia, and Moldavia, the granaries of the Othmân empire, were shut up ; so that no provisions could come as usual either from the east or west by the Danube, while his mighty army would perish in Hungary for want of bread *. Sigismond's fidelity.

d BUT to return to the war. The first of July count Mansfield, by making a feint to besiege Dotis, came suddenly and encamped with his army under the walls of Gran, before the garrison knew any thing of his march. Hereupon the Turks burnt the suburbs, and St. Thomas's fort under the hill, which the count repaired ; besieging the city so straitly, that the Pâshâ of Buda failed in three attempts to throw in supplies. On the other hand, the Germans were repulsed several times at the breaches. However, the count having built a fort on St. Thomas's hill, greatly annoyed the upper town from thence ; while count Palfy took Gokaza, on the Danube, opposite to Gran, after a stout resistance. The prince of Transilvania had for some time prevented the Pâshâ of Temeswaer from going to its relief, by making a shew of besieging that city : but, on the 2d of August, came the Pâshâ of Buda with 20,000 men, and encamped within four miles of the Christians. Gran invested.

e THE Turks, encouraged by some small advantages in skirmishing, resolved to force their way into the city, while the Christians, drawing up in order of battle, gave them leave to advance to their very trenches. Mean time Palfy, with his Hungarian horse, and Swertzenburg, with his men, fetching a compass, so inclosed the Turks behind, that they could not retreat without danger. Hereupon a fierce battle began, in which, though it lasted but half an hour, several thousand Turks were slain ; and the rest flying, were almost all cut off by Palfy and Swertzenburg : so that they lost fourteen thousand men in this action, and twenty-seven colours, with great riches, besides great stores in their camp. The Pâshâ himself had much ado to escape to Buda. The Turks defeated.

f AFTER this, the batteries being renewed, the lower town was, on the 13th of August, taken by assault, and all put to the sword, except Ali Beg, the governor, and some others. This lord, while the Hungarians fell to plunder, got into the upper town and castle, against which the Turks were now directed.

* RICAUT, in Amurath III.

(H) An ensign taken on this occasion, set with precious stones, was valued at 30,000 dollars.

A. D. 1594.

Other successes.Sinân Pâshâ defeated.Kroatia invaded.Sinân retreats.Tergovista stormed.Bukhoreft abandoned.Moldavia reduced.Affairs of Asia.

besiegers turned their batteries; and the archduke coming to the siege, on the death of count ^a Mansfield at Komorra, several assaults were given, but not with success. However, the old governor being slain, and the Pâshâ of Buda defeated a second time by a detachment of eight thousand men, the Pâshâ of Anatolia capitulated for the garrison to march out with their swords, and as much goods as they could carry on their backs.

In September following Vicegrade was taken by eighteen thousand forces. Neither was the prince of Transylvania idle all this while: for the prince of Alba Julia, or Weisenburg, being to be married to Maria Cbristina, daughter of the late archduke Charles, the Turks drew thirty thousand men together, with a design to be forbidden guests at this wedding. Sigismund, who was aware of this, having made due provision for their reception, fell upon and flew most of them; then taking Fagiat, he put all to the sword. About the same time the Transylvanians ^b routed ten thousand Turks, who were marching to relieve that place; and so pursued the victory, that the Pâshâ with five hundred men only had much ado to escape. Lippa also fell into their hands: while the Turks and Tatars were baffled in their design upon Batoska, and defeated in battle.

SOLTAN Mohammed, vexed at these successes of his enemies, put Ferbâd Pâshâ to death, and sent old Sinân to reduce the three revolted countries; who, passing the Danube with a puissant army, was immediately attacked. The Transylvanians were obliged thrice to retire: but being reinforced, maintained the battle from morning till night; when the Turks retreated, after the loss of many thousands, besides the spoil; Sinân himself escaping with great difficulty. About the same time the Pâshâ of Bosnia, with twenty thousand men, invading Kroatia, was ^c overthrown, and most of them slain by the Imperialists; who, pursuing the chase, took fifteen villages and the castle of Varvivar. After this, their forces increasing, they returned; and on the 15th of September besieged Petrina, or Petrowina: but met with such loss and opposition in the assault, that they resolved to return to Siseg. In the interim a horseman, flying from the enemy to the camp, informed the Christians, that Rustan Beg, the governor, was dead of his wound, and the garrison so discouraged, that, in case they returned, the Turks would on sight of them abandon the town: which accordingly proved true ¹.

LUCKILY about this time the Zakulians, or antient Sikuli, who dwell to the north-east of Transylvania, throwing off the Turkish yoke, put themselves under the protection of Sigismund; obliging themselves to bring into the field forty thousand men in their own pay. The ^d young prince, now eighty thousand strong, advanced to oppose Sinân Pâshâ; who having passed the Danube over a bridge of boats, with seventy thousand choice soldiers, marched to Tergovista, in Walakhia. The Turks were so discouraged at his approach, that leaving their tents, ordnance, and baggage behind, they fled to Bukhoreft (F). Sigismund hereupon, storming the place, took it, with the castle, and put the garrison of four thousand men to the sword, excepting Hassan Pâshâ, the governor. After this four thousand Turks more coming thither in expectation of finding Sinân with his army, were cut to pieces.

FROM hence the prince marching to Bukhoreft, found it abandoned by the enemy; who, endeavouring in haste to repass the Danube, were slain and drowned in vast numbers. Then laying siege to Zorga, he took it, with the loss of about two hundred and fifty Christians; ^e whereas of the Turks and Tatars, between the 18th and last of October, there perished above twenty-six thousand: after which the prince returned to Alba Julia. At the same time that Sinân was sent to attack Transylvania, the Khân of Krîm Tartary was ordered to invade Moldavia, and make one Sudriak Vayvod: but, being come to the frontiers with 70,000 troops, his passage was opposed by Zamofski, the great chancellor of Poland; who after the Khân, by agreement with him, was returned home, out of envy to Sigismund's good fortune, entering Moldavia, quickly possessed himself of the whole country, expelled the Vayvod Stephen, and placed one Jeremy, under the protection of Poland, in his room. However he at the same time sent a messenger to Sinân Pâshâ, then at Tergovista, promising that Moldavia should still remain tri- ^f butary to the Soltân, and the arrears be paid by the new Vayvod; who immediately opening three ways for the Tatars into Transylvania, Sigismund sent the late Vayvod Stephen, with some forces, to drive out the Poles: but he was overthrown by them in a bloody battle; and being taken prisoner, was afterwards said to have been put to death.

BESIDES the events already related, many other actions of a lesser nature happened this year between the Turks and confederates, almost every-where to the disadvantage of the former. To augment their uneasiness in Asia the Georgians took up arms against them; and the old king of Persia being dead, they were not a little apprehensive of the resentment of his son and successor, on account of past injuries.

¹ RICAUT, ubi sup.(F) Capital of Walakhia.

^a IN the beginning of the year 1596, while the prince of Transilvania was at Prague, in Bohemia, to confer with the emperor about the management of the war; the Zakulians, or Siculi, whose privileges had been infringed in an assembly of the states, which met in December, took up arms in defence of their rights: but, several of the ringleaders being taken and put to death, the rest were obliged to submit. About the same time, 10,000 Rascians, revolting from the Turks, put themselves into the service of Sigismund. A. D. 1595.
The Zakulians revolt.

MEAN while, the plague and famine beginning to cease at Constantinople, Mohammed ordered war to be proclaimed there for three days successively against the emperor and prince of Transilvania; declaring that he would march in person with his army into Hungary. But before he got thither, many actions passed between the Turks and Imperialists. Lippa was besieged by 40,000 Turks and Tatars: but 6000 Hungarians from Lugos, sent out to plunder, having set fire to the suburbs of Temeswaer, in the absence of the Pâshâ, who commanded at the siege; the flame, being seen in the camp before Lippa, so terrified the Turks, that they presently raised the siege, leaving all their bag and baggage behind them. However, they had the luck to recover Kliffa, in Dalmatia, through the negligence of the Christians; who but a little before had taken it from them. On the other hand, the Heydûks took Plenia, a little town not far from Nyssa; and count Palfi the castle of Sambok, between Buda and Alba Regalis. War proclaimed.
Lippa besieged.

^b By this time, the prince of Transilvania, having raised a good army, laid siege to Temeswaer: but on the approach of 40,000 Turks and Tatars to its relief, he rose and met them with his forces, whence ensued a terrible battle, for a long while doubtful: but at length the Othmâns were routed, and 5000 of them slain against 1500 Christians. Yet, coming to relieve the place a second time with a greater force, the siege was raised. Temeswaer besieged.

^c AT length the imperial army, 60,000 strong, being come to Komorra, on the 24th of July advanced towards Vakbia, which the Turks abandoned; and on the arrival of Maximilian of Austria, the captain-general, in the camp, laid siege to Hatwan, in Upper Hungary (G), the middle of August. They were much incommoded by the vigorous sallies of the garrison: but at length, having attacked the town at five several breaches, they, after three hours sharp conflict, entered by force, and slew all they met for four hours together, amounting to 4000 Turks, while the Christians lost only 300. The Walloons were so barbarous as to rip children out of their mothers wombs, and slay people of both sexes alive, to make thongs of their skins.^m Hatwan taken.

^d THE Turkish historians before us omit all the foregoing transactions of Mohammed's reign, passing at once from the slaughter of his nineteen brothers to the siege of Egra, or Agria, which presents itself next to our view. They tell us, that as soon as the Soltân had established his empire by that fratricide, he turned his thoughts to finish the war in Hungary begun by his father; with a view to give himself up to repose, of which he was very fond. Accordingly, next year, he marches with a great army into Hungary, and besieges Egra, in vain attempted by his predecessors; and so harrasses the garrison with frequent assaults, that, despairing of relief, they at length surrender the town; from whence he got the name of Egra. Soltân Mohammed besieges and takes Egra.
Hejr. 1003.

^e THE Christian writers more particularly inform us, that Mohammed arrived early in September at Buda, with an army of about 200,000 men, and 300 field-pieces. The garrison of Hatwan, lately taken, were so terrified at the number of the enemy, that they deserted the place: nay, they were not without apprehensions of Vienna being in danger, and therefore employed all hands in fortifying it. But Agria, called also Erlau, being the city which Mohammed had his eye upon, after detaching 40,000 men to Temeswaer, he sat down before it on the 21st of the same month; and, presently raising five mounts, battered it with great fury. The besieged finding after six days assault, that they could keep the town no longer, set it on fire, and retired with their effects into the castle. This had a strong bulwark adjoining to it; which the Turks assaulted twelve times in one day, and took, tho' with incredible loss.

^f THE Soltân, being informed that the imperial army approached, used double diligence to fill up the ditch of the old castle; which having at length, with no small difficulty, effected, the Turks, on the 10th of October, made four desperate assaults upon it; but were still repulsed: however, making a fifth attack, they entered and put all to the sword. There now remained only the new castle; which the Turks began to undermine in several places. Hereupon the soldiers mutinied against their governors, and deserted many of them to the enemy: so that this important place was given up, on condition that the garrison, about 2000 men, might depart with their baggage, and swords by their sides. However they were in their march set upon by the Turks, and cut to pieces. Some of them were flayed alive, and others dismembered, their executioners reproaching them, and saying, that no faith ought to be kept with miscreants, who had so cruelly dealt with the people of Hatwan. However, it was reported, that the Soltân ordered some of the chief authors to be put to death, and the prisoners to be set at liberty by proclamation ^a.

^m RICAUT, ubi supr.

(G) A strong castle to the right of the road from Buda to Agria.

A. D. 1596.

His camp forced.

LET us now return to the Turkish historians. The Soltân, unable to make any farther progress for the approach of winter, returns with his army: but on the way an army of Christians suddenly appears, who so furiously attack the camp of the Othmâns, that, not able to stand the shock, they are forced to give ground. The Germans penetrate as far as the tents where the royal treasures are kept, and break open the coffers: but here, surprised at the immense riches, they betray victory for money. For the Soltân, perceiving them intent on the spoil, attacks them first with only his courtiers, and slays upon the very treasures those who had imagined the Othmâns intirely routed. The rest of the army, admonished by the emperor's example, rally again, and so bravely charge the enemy, that not a man of those who had entered the camp escaped the sword ^b.

Battle of Karesta lost thro' covetousness.

THIS is the Turkish account; but that of the Christians robs the Soltân of all his glory: for they tell us, that the Imperialists, having routed great part of his army near Karesta, and taken 190 pieces of cannon, Mohammed was so terrified, that he fled with Ibrâhîm Pâshâ to Agria. The enemy, not being vigorously pursued, rallied again, and came on with 50,000 men: but they were charged so furiously by the Imperialists, that most of them were slain, and the rest put to flight. The like success the Christians had elsewhere; but pursuing the enemy into their very camp, and beginning to plunder, contrary to orders, met with a strong squadron surrounding the tent which contained the Soltân's treasure. Here meeting with great opposition, and Sigâla Pâshâ coming on with his fresh troops, they were seized with such a panick, that they fled full speed different ways, though none pursued them, nor could be rallied by all the art of their commanders. Thus one of the greatest victories that ever the Christians obtained, was snatched out of their hands by the covetousness of the Hungarians, and cowardice of the German horse. In this famous battle, the Imperialists lost 20,000 men, and the Turks 60,000. They lost 7000 more in their way home by the Transylvanians and Walakhians, who attacked them at difficult passes.

Walakhia revolts.

THE Turkish historians speak of nothing more in Mohammed's reign, but of his peace with the Imperialists; which they seem to make the immediate consequence of his success in Hungary, although it did not seem to take effect till seven years after, that is, a little before his death: wherefore we must fill up the chasm wholly from the Christian historians.

Transilvania surrendered. A. D. 1598.

WHILE the Soltân was engaged in the reduction of Agria, the Pâshâ of Bosnia besieged Petrinia in Kroatia: but the lord of Herberstein, after defeating first 6000 and then 8000 troops, came and relieved it. Nothing was done in the year 1597 worth notice, only in August the Imperialists took Pappa (H); and soon after the castle of Dotis was reduced by the Turks. The confederacy also was weakened by the defection of Mikhael, Vayvod of Walakhia; who, to prevent farther ravages made by the enemy, submitted once more to the Soltân; yet, under pretence that he could not trust the Tatars, still kept garrisons in his frontier places, and sent no aid against the emperor ^c.

Raab surprised.

NEXT year, Sigismund, the brave prince of Transilvania, finding himself deserted by his neighbours, and fearing the growing power of the Turks, made a voluntary resignation of his country to the emperor; in lieu of the duchies of Oppel and Ratibor, in Silesia, a pension, and some other considerations. The Tatars also made peace with Rodolph, on payment of 40,000 ducats yearly pension. Mean time two Italian prisoners escaped from Raab, having discovered the ill state of that city to lord Swartzenberg at Komorra, he, in conjunction with count Palfi, set out on the 27th of March, with a good body of horse and foot, towards Raab; and, approaching silently in the night, found the draw-bridge down, and the port-culisses up, waiting for some waggons with provisions, which were every minute expected there. Then having in a trice battered down the gate, and some part of the wall, they boldly entered.

THEY were first opposed by 200 Turks, and then by the Pâshâ with 2000 more; who fell on with extreme fury, and fought for two hours; till being slain, his men began a little to retire: but then Jâffer Pâshâ advancing with 1000 soldiers more, and the inhabitants of the place, forced the Imperialists back to the very gate by which they entered. Yet, disdaining to be driven out again, they here most valiantly renewed the fight; and this Pâshâ happening also to fall, most of his followers retreated farther into the city. However, 300 of them creeping under one of the bulwarks where there were some barrels of powder, desperately let a it on fire, and, together with themselves, blew up 300 of their foes, who had not lost above 200 before. The slaughter continued all that day till night, and the victors got a very rich booty, besides ninety pieces of cannon, with great store of amunition and corn. A. D. 1598.

^a RICAUT, in Mahomet III.^b CANT. p. 236.^c RICAUT, in Mahomet III.(H) A strong place to the north west of Alba Regalis, and south-west of Raab.

THE march of the Othmán forces being delayed by a dissention which happened between the Janizaries and Spahis, count Palfi, in October, took St. Gerrard's Fort, and then battered Buda with sixteen pieces of cannon : which soon obliged the Turks to retire out of the city into the castle. This the besiegers vigorously assaulted, but in vain. They next fell to mining : but, being countermined, gave over, and made a general assault, at the same time springing a mine. But they were repulsed with the loss of 200 men ; while the Turks, making a sally, were almost all cut off. However, the count being informed that relief was coming to the place, he thought fit to withdraw from before it. Buda attempted.

b THE Turkish army, being now arrived in Upper Hungary, under the command of Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, laid siege to the strong town of Waradin, whose garrison made several successful sallies : but were at length reduced from 2000 to 700 men. Hereupon lieutenant-general Basta marched with some forces, and advanced briskly towards the besiegers, as if he really intended to fight them ; but while they were busy to put themselves in order of battle, he, by another way, dexterously threw 800 men into the city, and presently retreated to his trenches. The Turks were so discouraged with being thus outwitted, and with the foul weather, that they soon after raised the siege ; while the Imperialists ravaged their territories in Lower Hungary, as far as the gates of Buda. Turks besiege Waradin.

c DURING these transactions by land, Mohammed sent Sigâla Pâshâ, his admiral, with a great fleet to sea. Sigâla being arrived on the coast of Sicily, and desirous to see the lady Lucretia, his mother, who lived in Messina, he requested the viceroy to send her on board, promising to remit her safe back, and to depart without committing any hostilities ; which engagement, after entertaining her a whole day with great honour, he punctually performed. There is nothing else memorable in relation to the Turks this year, either by sea or land, only Mikhael, the Vayvod of Walakbia, who was now come over again to the emperor's side, being resolved to attempt the reduction of Nissa, in Bulgaria, set men to work to make a bridge over the Danube for the passage of his troops. Having been disturbed by the Pâshâs of Silistria and Badoua, the Vayvod overthrew them. Then passing the river with all his forces, Nissa surrendered to him as soon as he invested it. In the beginning of the succeeding year he made several inroads into the Turkish territories, and carried off a vast booty. Their fleet at sea. Nissa taken. A. D. 1599.

d MEAN time the free Heydûks of Walakbia, passing the Danube, defeated the Pâshâ of Anatolia with great slaughter : another Pâshâ with 3000 men, sent to reinforce the castle of Buda, was likewise overthrown by a party of Hungarians. After this the Pâshâ himself, going out of the city to favour a convoy of provision bound thither, was surprised by some Heydûks, and taken prisoner after a sharp conflict ; wherein his son and the Aga of the Janizaries lost their lives. Hereupon the Pâshâ of Bosnia marched at the head of 10,000 Turks, in order to open the passes by driving from thence the Heydûks, who diligently guarded them : but these latter, meeting the enemy in an advantageous post, routed them with great slaughter, the Pâshâ himself being slain. However the Tatars held on their way to Buda, with a design to ravage the country, and draw the Imperialists farther from the city ; which they in a manner blocked up : but were quickly defeated by Swartzenburgh's single regiment, and most of them either slain, or drowned in the Danube. Heydûks successful.

e By this time Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, the Othmán general, arrived at Solnokh with 50,000 men, whereof 10,000 were Janizaries : but, hearing that Basta was advanced to Kassova, he retreated again to Belgrade, there to wait for a great fleet of ships, coming up the Danube, with provisions and stores for the army, Buda, and distressed places, under a guard of 5000 Turks. Palfi being informed of this, sent a body of soldiers to intercept them ; which they did ; and sinking the ships, took a booty computed to be worth a million of gold, including 100,000 dollars, which were divided among the soldiers. The Christians, on this success, over-ran the enemy's country every-where ; while the Turks in Buda were so terrified, that they abandoned the city, and retired into the castle. At length, towards the end of summer, Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, with an army of 130,000 men, came to Buda, and made some overtures of peace : but insisting on unreasonable terms, the treaty broke off, and war went on, though nothing farther of moment passed this year. Exploits of Palfi.

f We must however observe, that Sigismund, breaking his late agreement with the emperor, returned about the beginning of the year to Transylvania, and insisted on new terms ; which were granted : yet at the same time made an agreement with cardinal Bathori to resign the possession to him, under the protection of the Soltân, to whom he became tributary. Mikhael, Vayvod of Walakbia, alarmed at this change, which foreboded no good to him, with the assistance of the emperor, under whose protection he was, in October enters Transylvania with Transylvania recovered.

9 RICAUT, ubi sup.

A. D. 1599. 60,000 men, overthrows and slays the cardinal, aided by 30,000 Turks, and recovers the country from the hands of the Othmâns.

Rebellion in Asia suppress- ed. THIS news added to the uneasiness given the Porte by the rebellion of Kusabin, Pâshâ of Karamânia; who, with 3000 musketeers, and 5000 horse, defeated 10,000 troops under four Sanjâks; and, having subdued almost the whole province, at length took Konia (or Ikoniûm). Upon this success he gave out, that, ere long, he would besiege Constantinople itself, and reform the government; charging the Soltân with cowardice, and his ministers with corruption. Hereupon Mohammed, son of Sinân, one of the Wazîr Pâshâs, was sent against him with all the force which could be raised: but not chusing to hazard a battle with so resolute a man, he endeavoured to corrupt the enemy's infantry; and so far succeeded, that Kusabin fled with the horse, and those belonging to Simeon the Georgian, who had joined him, into Arabia. Mohammed followed him as far as Halep, where he wintered. Mean time Kusabin, having gathered a considerable force, returned next year, and prepared to give the Pâshâ battle: but the latter, resolving to try first what could be done by artifice, published a general pardon for all who would submit. This had the desired effect on the rebels, who, now enriched with booty, for the most part returned home to enjoy in safety what they had gotten with danger: so that at length their leader was taken and put to death at Constantinople with exquisite torments.

French and Walloons mutiny.

To return to the war in Hungary. While the emperor was making preparations, 1200 French and Walloons, who were in garrison at Pappa, mutinied for want of pay; and even agreed to deliver the place to the Turks, provided they would disburse the money: but they were at last forced to abandon it, although the brave count Swartzenburg was unfortunately slain in the siege. As yet neither the Turks nor Christians had any thing of an army in the field, however many little incursions and skirmishes happened between them. Among the rest the free Heydûks surprised Giula, and set it on fire: in which confusion the Turks, flying into the castle, thrust one another for haste over the bridge into the ditch; where so many were drowned, that a man might have gone dry over their bodies.

Kanissia besieged and taken.

At length Ibrâhîm Pâshâ, in the end of August, setting out from Belgrade with an army 200,000 strong, marched towards Kanissia; and, having taken the strong fortress of Babotzka (I) in the way, laid siege to that strong town, in order to prevent the troublesome incursions of its garrison, and open a free passage into Austria. The place standing in an isle encompassed with a marsh, the Turks began to fill up the latter with faggots and earth, which they effected at length in spite of the cannon: but, endeavouring to get into the island, received such a repulse from the garrison, as constrained them to retire with loss. Next day, as they prepared to renew their attempt, the Imperial army, consisting of 40,000 men, under the command of duke Mercury, appeared in their rear; which they cannonaded. Hereupon, Ibrâhîm drawing up his forces, a bloody fight ensued: but while victory seemed to incline to the Imperialists, though so few in comparison of the enemy, the night came on, and broke off the action.

NEXT day the Turks would have renewed the battle, but the Christians, now at variance among themselves, kept their trenches; and being afterwards distressed by the loss of provisions, which, in coming to their camp, fell into the hands of the Tatars, they marched off in the night; yet not so silently but that the Turks, perceiving it, cut off 3000 of them, and took some cannon, with most of their baggage. Hereupon the Turks returned with more vigour to the siege; and the garrison, finding themselves out of all hope of relief, obliged Paralifer and some other officers, though against their wills, to capitulate. Accordingly the town was, on the 22d of October, delivered up; and the garrison safely conducted over the Murr.

The country ravaged.

AFTER this the Turks ravaged the adjacent country; on which occasion the inhabitants having fled, Ibrâhîm invited them to return, with a promise that they should pay no tribute for three years. He wrote also to count Serini, who was a great sufferer on this occasion, to recover his losses by the Soltân's protection: but receiving no answer, he returned to Belgrade. Mohammed was so well pleased with this good service, that he sent the general a robe of cloth of gold, and a truncheon set with precious stones: though he did not long enjoy that honour; for he died in the beginning of the next year. However the Soltân's joy was allayed by news from Asia: for after Kusabin's death, one they called Skrivano, an intimate of his, took the cause upon him, and in a short time became very formidable. Against him Mohammed Pâshâ, marching with all his power, received a notable overthrow. Neither was the Soltân less mortified with his ill success in Persia; where his ambassador, having required one of the king's sons in hostage for the peace, was severely bastonaded for that insolent demand, and hardly escaped being put to death.

Affairs of Asia.

(I) On the river Rigma, about four miles from the Danube, and twenty-eight south-east of Kanissia, or Kaniska.

a THE emperor having at length, in 1601, gotten a considerable army in Hungary, under the command of duke Mercury, the campaign was begun with the siege of Alba Regalis; and the duke being informed by a deserter, that the broad lake on the other side of that city was ^{able, whatever the Turks and others thought to the contrary, he sent Rossworm with 1000 foldiers, who, with each a faggot on his back, got over the lake, though with incredible difficulty from the mud, flags, and the height of the water. Of this the duke being apprised by a signal, with great noise attacked the other side; and while the Turks flocked thither to defend the place, Rossworm, scaling the walls, got into the suburbs: from whence without resistance the Turks fled into the city, with the Imperialists at their heels, making a great slaughter. At the same time the duke took the suburbs which lay next to him; and next day the city itself by storm. Having cleared the streets of the enemy, they retired to their houses, many of which they had undermined, and blew themselves up, with such Christians as were near them; so that the church, palace, and most of the houses, were ruined. The Páshá after this surrendered: and the *Walloon*s got most of the booty, to the great vexation of the Germans ^{A. D. 1600. Alba Regalis by the Germans. A. D. 1601.}}

MEAN time, Hassan, the new Turkish general, held on his march towards Alba Regalis, ^{The Turks de-} seemingly with a design to find it unprovided, and surprise it. But being met by the duke ^{fiated.} with 20,000 men, he was defeated, though much superior in number, with the loss of 6000; among whom were the Páshá of Buda, six Sanjaks, and several other officers of note. The victory had been more complete, had not a great body of Tatars appeared in the rear of the Imperialists, and given the Turks an opportunity to restore their disordered battle.

c AT the same time that duke Mercury sat down before Alba Regalis, the arch-duke Ferdinand, with an army 30,000 strong, laid siege to Kaniffia. ^{Kaniffia be-} Notwithstanding the marsh, ^{sieged.} which surrounded the place, they carried their trenches close to the ditch, and then summoned the garrison; who, though pressed with want, with contempt refused to surrender, especially the renegade *Walloon*s. Hereupon they prepared for the assault: but the bridge proving too short to pass the ditch, they were obliged to defer it. In the interim, the Italians, murmuring for want of pay, marched off: but, on the 4th of November, Rossworm coming from duke Mercury, with a reinforcement of 8000 men, they renewed their attempts, and must have carried the place at last, had not the north wind at the end of that month blown such a quantity of snow into the camp, that the whole army seemed buried in it, and no fewer than d 1500 men were frozen to death, besides 300 horses; whereupon it was thought fit to raise the siege.

LET us now see how matters stand with the Turks in Asia. The Skrivano, having by his actions last year grown into great credit with the people, appeared again in the field against Mohammed Páshá; who attacked him with an army of 150,000 men; but was overthrown <sup>The Asian rebel gains a victory.</sup> with great slaughter. After this victory, the rebel ravaged the country to the gates of Hálep, causing himself to be proclaimed the true defender of the Mohammedan faith, and liberty of those countries, associated with him. At length, Mohammed being furnished with a greater army than he had before, the Skrivano, presuming upon his former successes, met him, and was at the first obliged to give way: but, having dexterously restored his disordered battle, e he returned a second time to the charge, and put the Páshá's troops into confusion, with a great slaughter. However, not thinking it best to venture too far, he retired to the mountains, content with what he had done for that time.

THE plague raged severely this year at Constantinople, and in other parts of the Othmán ^{Janizaries} empire; at what time the Janizaries having been affronted by some of the Soltán's favourites, ^{mutiny.} caused their Aga to go to the palace and demand their heads. Mohammed, offended at this insolence, ordered the Spahis to cut him in pieces; which execution the Janizaries revenged on them. This broil would have proceeded much farther, had not Sigála Páshá appeased their fury with a great sum of money.

f BESIDES the rencounters in Walekbia between the Vayvods Radol and Jeremy, with which ^{Alba Regalis} last the Turks sided, and were worsted, they also received several small losses in Hungary: but ^{besieged.} at length, on the 10th of August, Hassan Páshá, with an army of 150,000 men, came and ^{A. D. 1602.} besieged Alba Regalis. As the arch-duke Matbias had notice of his coming from Ali Páshá, who was taken by the Heydúks, the governor Ysolan got thither in time. The Turks having battered the walls with incredible fury, and filled the marsh with the deep ditches, they attacked and took the counterscarp, though with great loss of men. The Imperialists, returning soon after, drove them out again, with the slaughter of most who were in it: but the noise piercing to the Turkish camp, they poured down in such multitudes, that the besieged, fatigued with the slaughter of them, abandoned the place.

MEAN time the governor sent to the arch-duke for speedy relief: but before it could arrive, g the Páshá, on the 29th of the same month, gave a terrible assault; with which the besieged ^{and recovered.}

^r RICAUT, ubi sup.

A. D. 1602. were so weakened, and the governor himself being dangerously wounded, that they capitulated, to be convoyed with the baggage and arms half-way to Raab. But the garrison falling to pilfer the citizens goods, that they might carry off the more with them, 30,000 Tatars, followed by the Turks, immediately entered at the abandoned breach, and took that business out of their hands. Then when there was no more spoil to be had, they drew their swords upon the inhabitants, nor ceased the slaughter till the Pâshâ came in person to stop it. There were slain 3000 soldiers, besides citizens; and the captains, with the brave Isolan, who were saved out of the massacre, led prisoners to Constantinople, whither the Turkish general, after ravaging the country, marched with his army.

Pest taken. Not long after his departure, the Imperialists, to retrieve their disgrace, to the number of 30,000, descending the Danube towards Buda, broke down the bridge crossing the river from that city to Pest, by running a ship against it; and while the Turks ran in crowds out of the water-city to defend it, count Schultz, by land, with a petard blew up one of the gates of Lower Buda: then, entering and slaying all before him, fell on the backs of the Turks at the bridge, who were all slain or drowned. By a like device they took Pest also; and having garrisoned it, returned to besiege the castle and upper city of Buda, whither all the Turks had fled. The Imperialists went on briskly, both with battering and mining: but the news coming to Hassan Pâshâ's ears, he hastily returned from towards Belgrade, with what forces he had then with him, and sat down before Pest; yet was not long there before he was obliged, for want of provision, to march back again. Presently after, count Nadaſti, with 5000 men, went down the Danube, and without much difficulty took the towns of Adom and Feldwar.

Buda besieged. MEAN time the besiegers, having intelligence that the Turks had assembled an army of 30,000 men to relieve the place, drew together into the water-town. Upon this the Turkish garrison took possession of their trenches and tents; but, after holding them for two hours, were beaten back into the city. Mean time, a strong tower next the Danube being battered down, the besiegers prepared to enter the breach a little before night; when suddenly there arose such a storm of wind and rain, that they could not use their arms. This, with the sallies made by the Turks after the storm, and the two succeeding days, gave them an opportunity to repair their breaches: and advice arriving at the same time, that the Tatars had passed Temeswaer, in order to relieve Buda, the Imperialists thought fit to raise the siege. They likewise abandoned Adom, and left a garrison of 10,000 men in Pest.

Affairs of Asia. WHILE these things were doing in Hungary, the Skrivano, growing stronger and stronger, over-ran a great part of the Othmân dominions in Asia. However, happening to die this year, a younger brother of his, no less warlike, took the command, and prosecuted the war with much vigour. Against him the Soltân sent Hassan Pâshâ, with a great army: but, coming to a battle, he was, after a bloody fight, slain, with most of his forces. Hereupon, the rebel ranging the country, seized the tribute of it, and exacted 300,000 ducats from the city of Anguri, or Ancyra, and the adjacent territories; by which methods he raised a great fund for support of his war, while the Tatars in Europe ravaged the frontiers of the emperor's dominions.

War in Hungary. THE year 1603 was ushered in by so intense a frost, that the Danube, especially eastward, seemed to be wholly converted into ice: yet the Turks, having drawn 18,000 men out of the garrisons, prepared to make incursions. But Colonitz, the emperor's governor in those parts of Hungary, assembled a good body of men in the suburbs of Quermans, and made such preparations every-where else for their reception, that they seemed to be very shy of him. About this time the garrisons of Gran and Komorra took 200 waggons with provisions going to Alba Regalis; and, though inferior in number, cut all the convoy of 6000 Turks to pieces. The garrison of Buda, understanding what had happened, and that the provision, designed for their relief was lost; animated with hunger and revenge, came on the victors with such fury, that they put them to flight, and recovered the waggons. But see the vicissitude of human affairs: for the Turks had not been long masters of their stores, before 2000 of the garrison of Pest, having way-laid them near a forest, unexpectedly fell on them, and made them quit their possession, after a smart conflict. Several other adventures happened between the garrisons of Pest and Buda, who, though the frost continued, frequently cannonaded each other; on which occasion the powder in the latter place happening to take fire, blew up part of the city wall.

and Walakbia. Now while Radul, the Vayvod of Walakbia, spoiled the town of Silistria belonging to the Turks; Colonitz, who had lain in ambush three days for the convoy bound to Kaniffia, at length discovering about 600 men going from that garrison to meet it, inclosed them so suddenly with his soldiers, that scarce four of them escaped the sword. But three of their horse, for the rest fled, bravely ventured to pass by the Imperialists, to give the convoy warning of the enemy's approach. Hereupon they returned to Babotz, which Colonitz resolved to attack; but although the assault was carried on with great bravery, yet for want of petards, scaling-ladders, and

^a and other necessary instruments, he was obliged to give over his design, and made a safe retreat A. D. 1603. to Komorra, notwithstanding the attempts of the enemy to intercept him ^{to Komorra}.

WHEN Hassan Pâshâ, the prime Wazîr, arrived at Constantinople, after the taking of Alba Regalis, he was magnificently received by Mohammed, and revered by the people: but while he expected to be farther honoured with the marriage of the Soltân's sister, the Janizaries and Spahis, with the other guards, to the number of 25,000, suddenly appeared in arms before the Diwân, and demanded audience. As soon as their ringleaders were admitted, they required that Hassan should be delivered up to them. The Pâshâ, hereupon strangely dismayed, passed through the raging multitude, in order to go to the faray, protesting his innocence as he went along: but they stopping him, with many reproaches asked him how it came to pass, that, while he was in Hungary, the rebels in Asia were neglected, so that now they were come within three days march of Constantinople? Hassan answered, trembling, that, for his part, he had done his duty in both places; and that the rebellion in Asia was owing to the ill government of the Soltân's mother and the Kâpi Aga.

THE mutineers, being somewhat satisfied with this defence, suffered him to go to the palace, in order to obtain leave for them to speak to the Soltân, and prevail on him to send them the heads of the two parties whom he had thrown the blame upon: threatening otherwise to make him feel their resentment. Mohammed, at the Wazîr's persuasion, accompanied by the Mufti, some other ecclesiastics, and several Pâshâs, shewed himself to the soldiery; whose chief, stepping forward, desired to know, why he did not rescue the empire from the danger it was in? and whether he would take care of the government, or leave every man to cut out for himself? Mohammed, though full of indignation, having answered mildly, that he had before resolved to reform matters, and remove all cause of discontent, they demanded the heads of the queen-mother and Kâpi Aga, whom Hassan, on farther interrogatories, again accused. At last, Mohammed being necessitated to give way, the Kâpi Aga, and other officers, were delivered up to them; whom they beheaded on the spot. As for the Soltâna, they were content she should be confined; which, for form's sake, was promised, though not performed.

WHILE these things passed at Constantinople, the rebels in Asia made great progress in their affairs. Their forces being grown numerous, they laid siege to Anguri; from which the citizens, in the absence of the governor, delivered themselves for 200,000 ducats. Soon after, a new governor and other officers arriving from court, they, farther to fleece the inhabitants, would have imputed this composition with the rebels as a crime worthy of death. Hereupon, suddenly taking up arms, they fell on the soldiery; and, after a great slaughter of them, drove the rest out of the city. This broil encouraged the rebels, who being now 40,000 strong, under the command of a brother of the Khân of the Tatars, laid siege to Burza (K), a great and rich city, as well as a magazine for military stores; which they took. Upon this success the governor of Bâghdâd joins their party, and the Shâh of Persia (L) takes Korbery, a frontier town: so that Mohammed, under all these disasters, was forced to sue for peace to his rebellious subjects; which at length he obtained, by granting them all their demands, and making Zel Ali, one of their leaders, Pâshâ of Bosnia.

^e BUT in avoiding one danger, the Soltân ran into another: for the soldiery, concerned at this dishonourable peace, and prement of several rebels (joined to his mismanagement of affairs, and cruelties which they charged him with), conspired to depose him. With this view, they engaged in their party the Soltâna, mother of the young prince, whom they proposed to set up in his father's room: but a letter sent to her by an eunuch, relative to that affair, having been intercepted by the Soltân, he thereupon put to death the young prince, his mother, and fifty of the conspirators; together with the astrologer who had prognosticated a fortunate issue to their enterprize.

MEAN time, the Tatars, being refused passage by the Poles into Hungary, forced their way thither through Walakbia; and though they were frequently worsted, yet did great mischiefs in that and the neighbouring provinces. The Imperialists, now under the brave Colonitz, took the castle of Loqua from the Turks; who also, deserting that of Boulouvener, were surprised and overthrown. In Transilvania, they were forced to give-up the castle of Solomose to Basta, the emperor's lieutenant in that country; where the war went on with various fortune, till Zakel Moses being defeated and slain in battle against the Walakbians, put an end to that dispute, and soon after the troubles, in which that country had been involved; were brought to a period.

^a RICAUT, ubi supr.

(K) This should seem to be Bursa, or Prusa, there being no other city in Anatolia which hath any resemblance of that name.

(L) We know of no such place on the frontiers of Turky or Persia.

A. D. 1603.
Alba Regalis fired.

THE Imperial forces under the lord Ruffworm being now arrived at Pest, the Turkish a army, one hundred thousand strong, came up and encamped in sight of them on the other side of the Danube. About the same time a Turkish captain, flying from Alba Regalis to Raab, informed the governor, that he could put them in a way how to plunder the suburbs of that place, if not to take the town itself. Hereupon, the garrisons of Raab and Gran joined together, marched under the guidance of the deserting officer, and surprised the said suburbs: where they slew all who made any resistance; and, having rifled the place, set it on fire. But, somewhat to allay this good fortune, the Heydûks in garrison at the castle of Adom, hearing that a great army of Turks were marching that way, set it on fire, and quite abandoned it.

Peace in agitation.

THE Soltân finding that, for all the concessions which he had made to the rebels in Asia, b they could not be reduced to due bounds of obedience, and that the wars in which he was engaged greatly interrupted his pleasures, resolved to make peace with the emperor upon any reasonable terms: and, as the French ambassador was then treating about the liberty of count Tsolan, taken the last year at Alba Regalis, Mohammed granted the same, and gave the count instructions to treat with the emperor about a peace, on condition; that if he did not succeed he should return to his captivity; for which the ambassador became his surety. At the same time Abmed Pâshâ wrote to Colonitz, the Imperial general, to the like purpose; which letter being transmitted to the emperor, Colonitz was appointed, with others, to treat with the enemy: but the latter demanding the restitution of Transilvania, Gran, and Pest, in lieu of Agria and Kanisia, the treaty broke off.

The Turks
repulsed:

HEREUPON the Imperialists resolving to prevent the relief of Buda, sorely distressed for want of provision, the general, on the 22d of August, attacked Morâd Pâshâ, encamped near Mohatz with eight thousand, whereof two thousand were Janizaries; and, after several brisk charges with his horse, forced them to retreat to their main army. However, the vanquishers falling presently to plunder, the Turks returned, and attacked them with such vigour that they must certainly have been defeated, had not the Heydûks left their boats on the river and come to their assistance; by which means the enemy was repulsed a second time, and seven hundred slain, besides the loss of three cannon, Morad's red standard, and Sasbar Beg, who was taken †.

quite overthrown.

AT length the Imperial army, under the Lord Ruffworm, rendezvoused early in September; d and, lest the Pâshâ should encamp between Vicegrade and Buda, in which case he might victual that city at pleasure, he raised a strong fort half way, and another in the isle of Vicegrade: then, having built a bridge of boats over the river from his camp to the isle, passed over to Vaks, or Vakkia. Not long after the Pâshâ, with ten thousand men, having attacked the first fort in vain, threw a bridge over the Danube, in order to annoy the Imperialists, and began to cross it. Mean time they were decoyed on by some loose fore-runners to an ambuscade of 6000 foot: these seeing in what disorder they pursued, when about 10,000 of them had gotten over, the Walloons, posted covertly along the river, played on their flanks with four culverins, while the rest charged them on every side; and, having killed 2000, put the others to flight: but not being able to recover the bridge, 5000 more were drowned or slain, and the rest e taken prisoners, with their field-pieces, colours, horses, and arms.

Other ill successes.

NEITHER did matters succeed better elsewhere with the Turks; for their fleets were about this time wrecked at sea: and although Zel Ali, one of the Asiatick rebels, had submitted, as before-mentioned, yet the chief rebel was still in arms, and the Pâshâ who had been sent against him, on being displaced by the Soltân, went over to his party. On the other side, the king of Persia, taking advantage of the troubles in which the Othmân empire was involved, laid siege to Tauris, and quickly recovered it.

Avoid a battle.

BUT to return to the affairs of Hungary. The Imperialists, fearing lest the Turks should besiege Pest, as they had given out, and finding they were gone to encamp near Buda, in the isle of Vicegrade, went and pitched their tents before St. Andrew, in sight of the enemy. f These a few days after detached 5000 men, with design to draw the Germans into an ambuscade of 10,000; but, missing of their aim, were forced to retire, with some loss. About the same time general Colonitz, thinking to surprise the Turkish army, landed on the 2d of October, with 600 Heydûks, in the isle of Vicegrade; but being discovered too soon, was forced to retire, after two hours engagement, with the loss of 400 men. Count Trantmestorf had better success in Stiria; for the Turks having made a bridge of boats at Lamascia, to give them passage into that country, and secured it with two forts, the count attacked them with such bravery, that at last he took them, and destroyed the bridge. Lugaze also, a place of great importance to the Turks, was at the same time delivered to Basta by the Transilvians.

† RICAUT, ubi supr.

- a ALL this while the Imperialists could not draw the Turks to a battle : but after the latter had supplied Buda with provision, they silently marched off by night, and retired out of Hungary. Upon their departure, the Imperialists besieged Hatwán, which was so well fortified as to endure a long siege. They made their approaches by taking the water-mill ; in which action Grafold, general of the Italians, was slain : after this, having cut off their water and made large breaches, the garrison capitulated for their lives, and the 29th of November were conveyed to Zolnok. Before the year was out, the Imperialists had several rencounters with the Turks and Tatars, generally to the disadvantage of the two latter ; and Beged Páshá, thinking to surprise Basta as he lay with his troops dispersed about Lippa (M), was attacked by that old experienced general in a place of disadvantage, and overthrown, with the loss of 1100 Turks, slain out of 5000 ; who, being also driven into a marsh, most of them perished there. Twenty captains and other prisoners were taken, besides a rich booty. But about the same time, Bethlem Gabor (N), an able commander, becoming head of the revolted Transilvanians, created Basta and the Imperialists no small trouble in that country, as will be seen in the next reign.

A. D. 1603.
Hatwán castle taken.

- In the interim Zel Ali, before-mentioned, after he had served this campaign in Hungary (with 12,000 of the late rebels brought over from Asia), retired to Bosnia, the government of which had been promised him, and encamped near Bághnaluk (O). But Jáffer Páshá, who resided there as governor, taking this as an incroachment on his right, drew all the force he could out of the garrisons, with an intent to fall upon him. The crafty Zel Ali, knowing his own weakness, caused several great fires to be lighted up in his tents, and suddenly retreated. Mean time the Páshá with his troops hastening to the place, and finding the camp deserted, they began to pillage it : but while the soldiers were loading themselves with the plunder, Zel Ali, returning with 3000 chosen horse, surprised the unsuspecting pillagers, and cut 6000 of them in pieces, the Páshá himself with difficulty escaping. After this the victor quickly obliged all the chief places in the province to submit to his obedience ; and, having amassed a great deal of wealth, he entered Bághnaluk in triumph, crowned with laurel, amidst the soldiers singing his praises. At the same time he gave out, that he was resolved to join with the emperor of Germany, in case any of the Páshás should go about to cross his designs. Mohammed, being informed of all this, would, under pretence of honouring Zel Ali, have drawn him to court : but the crafty rebel, thanking the Soltán, declined the invitation ; saying he desired no other reward than the government of the province, which his majesty had promised him, and which he was now in possession of.

Zel Ali enters and possesses Bosnia.

- THE Turks having often, during this year, especially towards the end of it, made a motion of peace, in the beginning of the next, commissioners were appointed on both sides to treat of it ; and those of the emperor went from Pest to Buda on that account, at the request of the Páshá thereof, and agreed on a truce for twelve days ; which was notified immediately to the Turkish governors on the frontiers. But while all mens minds were filled with the expectation of peace, Soltán Mohammed died, amidst all his pleasures. As soon as the news was brought to the Páshá of Buda, he sent notice thereof to the Imperial officers at Pest ; and that he was commanded by the new Soltán, Abmed, to continue the negotiation ^a.

Mohammed's death.
 A. D. 1604.

- THE Turkish historians employed by prince Cantemir omit all the transactions above related from the Christian writers, which succeeded the taking of Agria. After this victory, they only tell you, that he marched to Constantinople in triumph ; and, content with what he had acquired, made peace with the Christians, that he might enjoy, what he was naturally inclined to, ease and pleasure : that accordingly he lived in profound peace till the year 1012 (P), in which he died, after he had reigned nine years and two months : but that how long he lived was not mentioned (Q) in history, farther than that he died in the vigour of his age, without performing one memorable action more than what has been related ^x. And on this occasion it may be observed, that as this is the only action mentioned in his reign by the Turkish historians in question, one would be apt to think that their design was not to write a history of Turkish affairs, but only to give an account of such transactions as the Soltáns were themselves personally concerned in.

Hej. 1012.
 A. D. 1603.
His character.

- THE Christian historians give this character of him. They say, he was a prince of no great spirit, and yet exceeding proud ; whence it happened that he was neither much beloved Governed by women.

^a RICAUT, ubi sup.

^x CANT. Othm. Hist. p. 236.

(M) A strong town on the river Marosk, to the north of Temeswar.

(N) By some called Bethlin Habor.

(O) The chief city of Bosnia, and residence of the Begler Beg of that country. It is situate in the borders towards Kroatia, on the river Pliva.

(P) This year of the Hejrab ended the 18th of May, in the year of Christ 1604 ; in the beginning of which the Christian historians say he died.

(Q) The Christian writers say he lived forty-four years.

A. D. 1603. nor feared : that he neglected the affairs of government, which he gave up to the management of women ; and was wholly addicted to pleasure and voluptuousness, the signs of which appeared in a foul, swollen, and unwieldy body : that his debaucheries shortened his days ; and that he died unlamented by his subjects. He had four sons, and three daughters, married to three of his Pâshâs. His eldest son Mohammed was strangled, as before-mentioned (R). The second died young, and the fourth, called Mostafa, a youth, was strictly kept up in the palace ^y.

^y RICAUT in Mahomet III.

(R) It is added by our author, that afterwards, find- the Pâshâ to be hanged who had given him wrong ining the prince to have been innocent of the charge, he formation.
 caused his body to be buried in his own sepulchre, and

C H A P. XV.

The Reign of Ahmed I.

14 Soltân Ahmed I.

AHMED ascended the throne on the 9th of Rajeb in the year 1012, when he was yet scarce fifteen years old (A) ; and this was the first time that the reins of the Turkish government were given to a prince under the years of maturity (B). But he demonstrates in the first years of his reign, that the scepter was not unworthily put into the hands of a youth.
 The Asiatic soldiery, whom the Persian wars had always kept employed, became so insolent under his father's indolent reign, that they presumed to spoil not only travellers but whole provinces. The generals sent to suppress those rebels, being either allured with the hope of prey themselves, or negligent of their duty, were so far from putting a stop to their progress, that the number of plunderers increasing, all Anatolia was miserably ravaged.

A. D. 1604.
Asian rebels
defeated.

AMONG the rebels there were chiefly two, Kalender Ogli (C) and Tavil (D), who attacked the Othmân troops and did most mischief. Ahmed judged, that if they were once quelled, the rest would be easily suppressed, and peace restored to the east. To this end therefore he sends the prime Wazîr Kojâ Morâd Pâshâ, with his guards, to winter at Hâlep, with orders in the spring to lead them, in conjunction with such of the Asiatics as remained faithful, against the ravagers. These commands were executed by the Wazîr with such success, that after several bloody engagements, Kalender Ogli was vanquished near Marâsh, in the mountains of Kioykiesen, and driven alone, all his common soldiers being slain, into Persian Irâk. Then, turning his arms against Tavil, who advanced to assist his companions, he defeats him likewise, and forces him to fly into the same country.

War against Persia,

Hej. 1013.

A. D. 1604.

A. D. 1605.

A. D. 1606.

unsuccessful.

Hej. 1026.

A. D. 1617.

THE Shâh having refused to deliver up the two rebels, Ahmed, to be revenged for that contempt offered to his government, sends the Wazîr Morâd with a numerous army towards the Persian borders : but, arriving too late at Tibrîs to effect any thing this year, he resolves next spring to invade the enemy's country ; yet dies when he was on the point of marching.
 His office is conferred on Nasub Pâshâ (E), who, after a year's stay there to as little purpose, leads back his army, weakened by sickness and fatigue, to Constantinople : where, on his arrival, he was beheaded for sloth and negligence. Mehemed Pâshâ, being made Wazîr in his room, departs, in 1015, with a very numerous army, and lays close siege to Revân, which he furiously assaults for forty days ; but repulsed by the bravery of the garrison, is forced at last to raise the siege : for which ill success, he is, at his return to Arzerûm, strangled by the Kâpîji Pâshi, and his post conferred on Halil Pâshâ, a brave and prudent general : but, whilst he prepared to humble the pride of Persia, the Soltân is seized with a sudden fever ; which, tho' slight at first, increased every day, and at length carried him off ^a.

Turkish history defective.

THIS is in effect all which the Turkish authors consulted by prince Cantemir have given us relating to the reign of Ahmed I. The transactions of which being wholly confined to his war

^a CANT. p. 238, & seqq.

(A) The Christian historians say he was then about that age.

(B) Or, as the Turks say, before he was possessed of a Sanjak, or standard, which ensign of power is never delivered by them to any man till he is of mature age.
 Cant.

(C) He must not be confounded with one of the same name, who, under Mohammed I. reduced the Othmân empire to the last extremity. Cant. Kalender Ogli seems to be a nick-name, given him on account of his resembling the first Kalender in bravery as well as rebellion.

(D) Tavil, or Tarvil, in Arabic, signifies tall ; and is a surname, to express that quality in him. So Hassan Beg, or Uzûn Hassan, is by the Arabs called Hassan al
Tarvil, or Hassan the Tall, on account of his stature.

(E) Benjamin the son of Jacob, and brother of Joseph, is in the Korân called Nasub ; from whence this name came in use.

against

a against the Persians, a person who had not read the Christian historians would be apt to imagine, that he was at peace all the time with the rest of his neighbours, and never had any contest with the Imperialists. Leaving our readers to suggest the reason of this conduct, we have laid before them the whole at once of what they deliver concerning the Turkish affairs during this prince's reign, before we introduced any thing from the Christian writers, whom now we shall have recourse to. A. D. 1604.

AHMED having, to prevent the insolence of the soldiery, given the Spahis, by way of largess, ten crowns a man, and every Fanizary thirty, with advance in pay to the first of five aspers a day, and of one to the latter, was crowned with great solemnity. The first act of his authority was, to remove his grand-mother, a proud ambitious woman, from the prime administration of the government, which she managed at her pleasure in the late Soltân's reign. He likewise set the Persian ambassador at liberty; and continued the negotiations of peace in Hungary. On this occasion the Imperial commissioners made a splendid entertainment for the Turks at Pest; whither 600 of the better sort went. Mean time those of Buda had formed a design to surprise that city during the feast: but, finding the garrison as much on their guard as at other times, the Turks returned without success. Removes the Soltâna.

THIS treachery being complained of next day, the Pâshâ of Buda disavowed the thing with many protestations. However, the emperor's commissioners would not accept of his invitation to a feast the day following, but returned to Gran; yet left Giesberg at Pest, to treat with the Turks, in case he found them disposed to it. Instead of that, a messenger came soon after from the Soltân, to order the Pâshâ to break off the treaty. In effect, they had so little disposition to peace, that so soon as they had supplied Agria, Alba Regalis, and Buda, with necessaries, they laughed at the Imperialists for their credulity, and renewed their incursions with more cruelty than ever: yet not with impunity from the Hussârs, who endeavoured to repay them in their own coin. The treaty broken off.

MEAN time Jâffer Pâshâ, who had been driven out of Bosnia by Zel Ali, as before-mentioned, being supported by the Soltân's authority, suddenly entered that country with a great army, and at length expelled his competitor for that province; but died soon after his victory. As for Zel Ali, the ministry at the Porte, loth to lose the benefit of so great a soldier, and yet not willing to trust him with a government of such consequence as that of Bosnia, removed d thither Begredit Pâshâ from Temeswar, and made the other governor of this last place. Zel Ali, taking advantage of the broils and rancour which divided the Christians more than the Turks, laid a design to surprise Lippa by night; but after attempting not only to scale the walls, but even to force the gates, he was obliged to give over his enterprize. Attempt on Lippa.

ABOUT the same time some Turkish prisoners in Kassova, during the absence of the governor, and great part of the garrison, slew their keepers, with a design to have burnt the town and escaped: but were at length suppressed; while Kanisia suffered the misfortune which Kassova had escaped: for a soldier in the citadel having carelessly thrown fire into the powder, the whole place was in a manner blown up. Kanisia blown up.

WHILST the tumults in Transilvania and troubles in Hungary increased, the Pâshâ of Buda, understanding that the Imperial forces began to draw together, wrote to the governor of Gran, to invite him to a new treaty: but the insincerity of his motion appeared no less from the reserved strain of his letter, than the conduct of the Turks; who at the same time, with the united forces of several garrisons, surprised the castle of Somnin by night, and burnt it. False offers of peace.

BUT let us leave the affairs of Europe a while, to see how those of Asia stood. Although the rebellion there was weakened for a time, yet it broke out again with more force than ever. To suppress which, Sigâla Pâshâ, an officer of great experience, was sent with an army: but he was no sooner arrived than he was met by the enemy, and, after a bloody battle, defeated; with much ado escaping himself. However, he quickly recruited his diminished troops, and marched against the victors, in order to retrieve his disgrace: but the rebels, finding him much superior in force, retreated, and applied for aid to the king of Persia. The Shâh immediately sent them troops, under his own son; with which they marched to attack the Pâshâ a second time. At first fortune seemed to incline to the arms of the Soltân, till the prince of Persia with his brave cavalry falling upon them in the rear, while some of the rebel troops attacked them in the flank, they were at length totally routed, and thirty thousand of them slain, to only ten thousand on the other side. The Shâh, pursuing his good fortune, reduced the country of Shîrwân, won the city of Arufta (F), near the confluence of the Tigris with the Euphrates, and all the adjacent territories, excepting two or three towns, which had been taken from them ever since the time of Soltân Soleyman. Affairs of Asia. The Turks overthrown.

b RICAUT in Achmet I.

(F) We know of no such place in those quarters.

A. D. 1604.

make great preparations.

AHMED having narrowly escaped death from the small-pox, appointed Hassan Pâshâ, a man of great valour and abilities, to be his general in Hungary: but news arriving soon after, that the king of Persia had taken the field with an army of 100,000 men, and that Bagages Pâshâ, one of the Asian rebels, had confederated with him, the Soltân recalled Hassan with his forces from before Waradin to Constantinople: yet, after holding a council, sent him back again, and appointed Sigâla once more his general in Asia. The emperor, being aware of the Turkish preparations, sent the archduke Maximilian his ambassador to Rome, to solicit aid of the pope, who granted him 150,000 crowns for that year, with hopes of an augmentation for the future.

Walakhia ravaged.

MEAN time the Tatars being by the Poles denied a passage into Hungary, they fell to ravage Walakhia. Hereupon the Vayvod Rodolf retired to Kronstad; and, after taking a new oath, was, with his country, received by Basta under his protection. All this while the Turks seemed so desirous of peace, that at length Cæsar Gallen was sent to treat about it: but, as they insisted that the former tribute should be paid by the emperor; and that all the places which he had taken should be restored, together with Transilvania and Walakhia; the conferences came to nothing.

Pest deserted.

Soon after Jagenzenter, governor of Pest, terrified with the report that the grand Wazîr Hassan was coming with a great army to conquer Hungary, and intended to begin with the siege of Pest; he with the garrison, on the 5th of September, basely deserted the town, after he had first undermined the principal buildings, and laid trains of powder to blow them up. Accordingly next day they blew up, while the governor retired to Gran; where he was imprisoned, in order to be tried for his cowardice.

Gran besieged.

THE grand Wazîr, being by this time arrived in Hungary, laid siege to Gran on the 18th of the same month, encamping before St. Thomas's mount: but Basta, having raised a strong fort near the town on that side, so annoyed them from thence, as made them remove further off, while he lay with his army between the isle of Gran and the old town of the Rascians, to keep the enemy from entering into either place. On the 24th, the Turks assaulted fort St. Thomas; but count Schultz, governor of Gran, having ordered 500 horse and 2000 foot to sally out upon them, they forced the enemy to quit the mount on which they were encamped: however, pursuing them too far, they fell into an ambush, where, after a bloody fight, they were obliged to retreat. In this action the Turks lost 700 men, and the besieged 100; among whom was the valiant count Casimir of Holenloth.

Bethlem Ghabor routed.

As the noise of this siege drew many to the relief of the place, count Tambier, governor of Lippa, being about to march thither with some troops; Bethlem Ghabor, chief of the Transilvanian revoltors, with Bakheres Pâshâ and 4000 Turks, entered into that province, with a design to make himself master of it, under the protection of the Turks. The count understanding this, fell upon him so hastily that he quickly put him to flight, and killed 1000 men. The two chiefs were glad to save themselves by swimming; and succours sent to them from Temeswar were also cut to pieces by the count.

The siege raised.

MEAN time the besiegers having been repulsed in two assaults made on fort St. Thomas, although 5500 Heydûks had deserted out of 6000, they fell to mining; but their design was frustrated by counter-mines. On this they had recourse to their old artifice of a parley for peace: but the Germans not agreeing to their terms, the Janizaries were for giving over the siege. However, Hassan being resolved to attack the fort once more before he left it, assaulted it six times on the 10th of October; wherein failing, he withdrew his army, many of whom Basta cut off in their retreat. Yet he had not forces enough to put a stop to the ravages they made afterwards: but what that general could not do, was effected by Collonitz.

Troubles in Transilvania.

WHILE Hungary became a little easy by the departure of the Wazîr, Transilvania grew distracted with intestine troubles. The Lord Istivan, surnamed Botskay (G), who, under the Soltân's protection, stiled himself prince of that country, committed great disorders there. The lord Beligiosa, Basta's lieutenant there, was sent with an army to subdue him: but Botskay having seduced the Heydûks under his command to desert him in time of battle, the rest of his followers were almost all slain; and such as were taken prisoners cut in pieces, contrary to faith. After this, being assisted with men and money by the Turks, he took Kassova (H), and there established the reformed religion, of which he called himself the defender. The ensigns and prisoners taken on these occasions were borrowed by the grand Wazîr, to colour at Constantinople the ill success of his campaign.

Botskay revolts,

HOWEVER that be, Botskay was grown by this time to such a head, that Basta was forced himself to march against him, and defeated his troops, killing 1500 of his men. For all

c RICAUT, ubi supr.

(G) Or more truly Potskay; which in the Bohemian language signifies to stay, or wait. So called in scorn, on account of the long delay given him, by way of disgrace, at the emperor's court.

(H) About 33 leagues from Agria, to the north-east, in Upper Hungary.

that,

a that, Kassova would not submit to him, and receive an Imperial garrison, although Esperies A. D. 1604. did (I). But such were the confusions and discontents of these countries, that Basta's own soldiers were ready to have mutiny'd, if they had not been prevented by his prudence and generosity. The Heydûks had a great hand in these troubles: for they seized on divers castles, and among the rest the mine-towns; doing a great deal of mischief to the Imperialists, whom now they reckoned the worst of foes.

THESE distractions which afflicted Hungary and Transilvania had their rise from the persecuting spirit of the Romish clergy. These in an assembly this year at Presburg, without the consent or knowlege of the nobility, published a decree, condemning those of the reformed religion in Hungary either to be burned, or to suffer perpetual banishment. Against this decree the states of that kingdom made their protest; and declared, that they would defend themselves by arms, in case they should be molested on account of their religion. Notwithstanding all this, Beligiosa, Basta's lieutenant, seized on not only the churches, but lands and effects of the reformed at Kassova. He forbid them also the use of the bible, or to have sermons in their own houses; and would not suffer them to bury their dead in the city near monasteries. Not content with this, because Botzkay refused to lend him a large sum of money, he ordered his soldiers to plunder two of his castles. That lord, enraged at these injuries, by proclamation, promised four crowns a month, as pay, to every Heydûk who would enter into his service. Hereupon those people resorted daily to him, and among the rest 6000 who served under Beligiosa himself: but as soon as he took upon him the protection of the reformed religion, they flocked to him in crowds, and the people every-where appeared ready to join him.

NEITHER were the Turks free from intestine commotions, the rebels being still on foot in Anatolia; while, in Syria, the Pâshâs of Damaskus and Hâlep were in arms against each other: but the latter, having been defeated and besieged by an army of 30,000 men, was obliged to submit to such conditions as the other imposed. To add to these misfortunes, Sigâla Pâshâ, with all his great power, was defeated by the king of Persia; who, improving his victory, went and took Bâghdad. Although these crosses gave the Turkish ministers great uneasiness, yet Soltân Ahmed continued his pleasures, as if he did not mind how matters went.

d BASTA, finding himself by force unable to put an end to the troubles in Hungary and Transilvania, exhorted the chiefs of the malecontents, and even Botzkay himself, by letters, to lay down their arms. Hereupon that lord, by way of answer, insisted, that Transilvania should be yielded to him: that an Hungarian should be made lieutenant-general in Hungary; and none but Hungarians have command of the garrisons in that country: that the French and Walloon soldiers should be sent home; and every man have the free exercise of his religion. But these proposals not being agreeable to Basta, nothing was concluded. Mean time the Heydûks, joined by a body of Tatars, surpris'd Gokaza, over-against Gran; where they slew the German garrison; and, after rifling the town, set it on fire: but were quickly driven out again by the governor of that city. The Imperialists likewise took the strong fortress of Palantwar from the Turks.

e ABOUT the same time, the latter having a design to besiege Vachia, not far from Vicegrade, the Heydûks in garrison, finding themselves much stronger than the Germans, slew most of them, while the rest fled to Gran, and put the Turks in possession of that important place. The Ottomâns, with their new confederates, flushed with this success, attempted to take Gran, but were repulsed. The emperor was not a little troubled to see his enemies increase, and his own troops diminish through civil dissension: yet, instead of pacifying the malecontents by redressing their grievances, he applied to other princes for aid; in order to reduce them by force. But while he received nothing from them but promises; the enemy, under the prime Wazîr Hassan, taking the advantage of time, marched to besiege Vicegrade, situate on the Danube, between Buda and Gran. As soon as they appeared before it, the Heydûks opened the gates of the town, and then informed them how to attack the castle; which, after a brave defence, was yielded upon articles.

f BASTA, in the mean time lying at Esperies, published a general pardon to the revoltors; but with little effect: and not long after his own soldiers began to mutiny for want of pay. The Heydûks, in the beginning of February, besieged the castle of Sakmar, which was quickly surrendered to them. Then advancing towards Tokay, attempted to surpris'e the castle: but the governor being apprised of their design, caused the ice on the river to be broken forty paces over, and then covered it with snow near the place, so that the Heydûks marching on to

^a RICAUT, ubi supr.

(I) About 7 leagues north-by-east of Kassova.

A. D. 1606. Besiege New Hausel. scale the walls, were suddenly swallowed up. On the 2d of March they came before New Hausel, and having persuaded the citizens to revolt, Burbelius with his Kofaks retired into the castle; from whence afterward sallying, he drove them out of the town again. But about this time Filek, the key of that part of upper Hungary, was given up to the Heydûks, who had for some time besieged it by the garriou, for want of water. After this four thousand of them attempting to surprise Wiglate castle, were repulsed with great loss: but marching from thence, they broke into Turson's country, and forced the states to submit to Botskay.

Troubles every where. To remedy these evils, the emperor sent two commissioners to treat with that lord; but he refused to receive them; and sent circular letters to assemble the nobility and states of Hungary at Gerents, there to deliberate what was to be done, when their country was so oppressed with Germans and strangers. In the interim, the army under Basta mutinied again, for want of pay, severely threatened their general, and most miserably ravaged the country between Esperies and Presburg. About the same time Constantinople was afflicted not only with a tumult of the Janizaries, but also with a dreadful fire; wherein many people perished, with five hundred shops and warehouses, full of rich commodities, which were consumed. This misfortune was preceded by a letter from Sigála Pâshâ, giving the Soltân an account of his ill success; and that without speedy reinforcements the Persians would carry all before them.

New Hausel taken. To return to the affairs of Hungary. The Heydûks not only renewed the siege of New Hausel, but also took it; and afterwards made incursions into Moravia, where they committed intolerable ravages: but they were at length driven out by count Lichtenstein, governor of that country, yet carrying great spoils along with them. About this time Basta, who lay at Presburg, understanding that six thousand Turks and Tatars, out of fourteen thousand, arrived at St. George's, had crossed the Danube, about a mile below the city, went in the night with three hundred choice horse; and falling on the Turks and Heydûks, who remained behind in the camp, slew five hundred of them, before the rest could recover their arms, and returned with some booty of horses. Mean time the garrison of Aomorra, from an ambuscade, routed and slew Begedes Pâshâ, the great fomentor of the Hungarian troubles; and took seventeen waggon-loads of money and other things of value, which he was conveying to Botskay and the Tatars, under the son of the Khân of Khrim.

Botskay's success. To make amends for this loss, the Turks and Tatars, in conjunction with the forces of the malecontents, in May burnt twenty-eight villages, about the lake Nevisdier, and the town of Newstadt; put people of all ages and sexes to the sword, impaled many, and led multitudes captive. After this the malecontents surprised and plundered six or seven considerable towns, the terror of which made the adjacent country submit to them. In June the inhabitants of Wesbrun secured the officers, and put themselves under Botskay's protection. A passage being thus laid open to the Turks for farther conquests, they wrote to the Soltân to hasten the army. Indeed things grew daily worse and worse: for now the revolted broke into Stiria and Austria, and did so much harm, that the counts Serini, Nadasti and Budiani, who had been so serviceable against the Turks, seeing all they had in danger to be lost, submitted themselves, as well as many others, to Botskay. However the Heydûks were repulsed before Odenburg, which they besieged, with the loss of many men.

New Hausel retaken. THE Turks, to induce Botskay to give up Kassova to them, sent him three waggon-loads of money, by a convoy of four hundred Heydûks and some Turks: but being to pass by Tokay, the former joined four hundred Germans, sent to meet them by the governor, with whom they held intelligence, and slaying all the Turks, carried the booty into that place. However the malecontents still encreasing in strength, had Totis, or Dotis, yielded to them. Mean time Redesus, the lieutenant of Botskay in those parts, with an army of thirty thousand Hungarians and Turks, besieged New Hausel: but, loth that it should fall into the hands of the latter, he often kept them from attacking it, with design to take it by means of the Hungarians only, with whom he furiously assaulted it on the 25th of July; yet was repulsed after all, when on the point of taking it. After this the Pâshâ of Agria arrived with three thousand men and some Janizaries: but still the besieged held out, though reduced to a few men, in want of provision and other necessaries, till the 17th of October; when the utmost necessity forced them to surrender by consent to the Hungarians.

Turks besiege Gran. IN July offers of pacification were made from the emperor to Botskay, whose chief demands were a toleration of the reformed religion, and the principality of Transilvania conferred on him for life: but the Soltân coming to hear of these proceedings, diverted him from an accommodation, by promising, in a short time to make him king of Hungary. The Turks having gained this point, and resolved to carry on the war in that country, with all the vigour their wars in Asia would admit of; their general Sedar Pashâ, with an army of fifty thousand men, including Hungarians, on the 20th of August, laid siege to Gran. To deprive the city of relief by the Danube, they made a great bridge of boats over it, and placed a strong guard at each end. After they had with vast loss and charge made St. Thomas's castle assaultable, they mounted

- a mounted the hill in great numbers, and in spite of the cannon of the besieged, came to blows with them in the very breaches. The attack lasted five hours, during which they were with incredible courage three times repulsed : but by numbers prevailing at last, after they had slain nine hundred of the garrison, with count Ottingen their brave commander, they entered the place, and quickly dispatched the few who remained. This done, they raised a battery of thirty great cannon against the lower town, and having made a large breach in the wall, after four desperate assaults, entered the city. They then attempted the higher town, but being beaten off, fell to mining with such success, that the fortifications being blown up, the besieged lay open to their shot. Hereupon the garrison in a tumult would have the governor Dampier to surrender the place ; but on his refusing, they imprisoned him, and did the work themselves, on condition of being allowed to march out with their baggage, colours furled, and match lighted : for which piece of baseness, the captains, and principal authors of the mutiny, were executed at Komorra, whither they were civilly conducted by the enemy ^c.

A. D. 1606.
The city yielded.

THE Soltân's joy for taking this important place was much allayed by the ill success of his arms in Asia. Sigâla Pâshâ having advanced towards Persia, the Shâh, who had then a great army on foot, halted to meet him before the Pâshâ of Karamania joined him with the forces he was ordered to raise for that purpose ; accordingly, coming on him before he was ready to engage, he quickly overthrew his army, and took all his cannon. The king pursuing his victory, followed Sigâla, who with three hundred men hardly escaped to Adena (K), and besieged him there. Hereupon, the Pâshâ of Trapezond was ordered to march to his assistance ; which Sigâla hearing of, he secretly got over the wall with ten soldiers, and joining the succours, advanced to relieve the city. But the Shâh to prevent them, leaving part of his army to carry on the siege, with the rest marched to attack the Pâshâs, whom he unexpectedly surprised before they could draw up in order ; and made so great a slaughter of the Turks, that very few escaped, besides Sigâla, and two or three more, who got over the river in a boat. The consequence of this victory, was the surrender of the town ; and Ahmed, to make himself amends for the loss, seized on Sigâla's houses and treasure at Constantinople. After this, he ordered new forces to march against the Persians : But the Janizaries refusing to go, and mutinying for their pay, the high treasurer, whom they complained of, was put to death, to appease their clamour.

Sigâla overthrown by the Persians.

- d NOR did matters turn out better in Syria ; notwithstanding the late agreement between the two contending Pâshâs of Damaskus and Hâlep. The former, in concert with the Pâshâs of Tripoli and Gazera, at the head of sixty thousand men, marched to besiege Hâlep : but the Pâshâ of this last city, meeting them with only thirty thousand, attacked them with such bravery, that he entirely routed them ; and then took Tripoli, after he had a second time overthrown the Pâshâ, who had assembled an army to relieve it. This done, he raised tribute on the Turks, in order to make himself master of all Syria, whose capital he had in his power ; and to enrich the country, granted a free trade to the merchants of Persia and the Indies. Mean while, news being brought that the Beglerbeg of Anatolia's lieutenant was coming against him with a great army, he seized all the difficult passes ; and laying an ambuscade in the straits of the mountains, when the enemy had passed them with two thousand musketeers, and three thousand horse, charged them himself in front, while those in ambush fell on their rear ; and, after a sharp fight, totally defeated them. To encrease his good fortune, a rich ship, with the tribute of Egypt on board, was cast upon the coast, and fell to his share. These successes being communicated to the king of Persia, he extolled the Pâshâ's valour, and sent him rich presents, while the flames of this rebellion spread into Karamania and other parts of Anatolia ; which made the Soltân Ahmed dispatch orders to the prime Wazîr in Hungary, to make peace with the emperor upon reasonable terms. To this the Imperialists were not averse, although the king of Persia had sent ambassadors to Vienna, to engage the court to the contrary ; and Rodolph's commissioners having on the 6th of December received letters from the Pâshâ of Buda, inviting them to a negotiation, they went thither next day. But the Turks declaring they would do nothing without the Hungarians, matters for the present stopped here ; although the same month, all things were agreed at Vienna, with Illiskascius, Botzkay's agent, excepting what concerned the toleration of religion, which was not settled till next year.

lep grows formidable.

DURING this suspense of peace, the troubles continued in Hungary, as well as in Asia, where the Persians prospered, against whom the prime Wazîr was ordered to go in person. Mean time the Turks attempted to surprise Raab, as the revolted Hungarians distressed Esperies and reduced Tokey : yet there was no good understanding at this time between the confederates,

Affairs of Hungary.

^c RICAUT, ibid.

(K) A city near Tarsus, in the southern coast of Anatolia, towards Syria.

A. D. 1606. on account of the incursions of the Tatars in upper Hungary; which made the Heydûks resolve a to join their forces together, and oppose both them and the Turks. Hereupon the latter went and besieged Lippa, a town of the Heydûks, who forsaking the town, fortified the castle with armed men, and then placed others up and down in cellars and vaults; they likewise laid store of gunpowder in the streets. The Turks finding the gates open, entered without resistance, and hastened to reduce the castle: but the powder in the mean time taking fire, blew up a great many of them; while the concealed Heydûks, issuing from their hiding places, fell on, and made a great slaughter among them.

Peace with Botkay, and the Turks. AT length the difficulty about religion being removed, notwithstanding the great opposition made by the Romish clergy, and more particularly the bishop of Vienna, peace was concluded in September with the Hungarians; whereby, among other articles it was agreed, that every b man throughout Hungary should have the free use of his religion, and believe what he would: that the Hungarians might chuse a governor, which title the archduke was no more to use, but that of viceroy: that Botkay, for himself, and his heirs male, should for ever hold Transilvania dependent on Hungary: and that he should no more style himself prince, but lord of part of the kingdom of Hungary.

THIS peace was a prelude to that concluded between the emperor and the Turks, on the 19th of November following, near Komorra, for twenty years, to commence in 1607. By the articles, the Tatars were to be included, and the king of Spain might accede to the treaty: Vakbia was to be restored to the emperor, and Gran remain to the Soltân. The year concludes with the death of the great Botkay; who having been ill all the time both treaties were going c forward, died at Kassova, on the 30th of December, very much lamented. He was a man of great spirit; wise, politic, a warm lover of his country, but an extreme enemy to the Germans, and their government in Hungary.

Rebellion in Asia suppressed. A. D. 1607. THERE occurs very little remarkable for the next three years, concerning the Turks, who now resolved to turn their whole force against the Persians. But the Soltân thinking it necessary first to procure peace at home, sent to the Pâshâ of Hâlep, promising him pardon and favour, provided he submitted himself. The answer not being agreeable to Abmed's desire, the prime Wazîr was sent over with an army of one hundred and thirty thousand men, against the Asian rebels; who being suppressed by his discrete management, more than by his arms, he marched towards Hâlep. The Pâshâ, with a body of forty thousand only, but most of them musketeers, d engaged the Wazîr in an advantageous post, within two miles of that city, and in three notable battles withstood his whole power: but understanding, as he prepared for the fourth engagement, that a great reinforcement from the Pâshâs of Damaskus and Tripoli, his enemies, had joined the imperial troops, he fled with his effects towards Persia, followed by his army. Hereupon the Wazîr took Hâlep by force, and put the garrison to the sword. The Pâshâ having gotten together new forces, was returned with design to fight the Wazîr: but finding many of his old friends had forsaken him, he wrote to that minister, desiring him to obtain his pardon from the Soltân, which was accordingly effected f.

Persians successful. A. D. 1610. AHMED, though now quite at liberty to unite his forces against the Persians, yet chusing peace rather than war, employed the Khân of Tartary to bring it about: but as he demanded e Tauris, with all the provinces lately recovered by the Persians, the treaty did not take effect. However, nothing of moment was acted on either side against the other, till the year 1610, when the Persians entered into the provinces of Arabian Irâk, with a design to recover Bâghdâd, taken from them in a former reign. To prevent this misfortune, Abmed sent a mighty army under Nasub Pâshâ (L), who had no better success than Sigâla, for he was routed, and lost twenty thousand. To repair this loss, new troops were dispatched under the command of the famous Pâshâ of Hâlep, lately in rebellion. But whatever the reason was, he never marched against the enemy; being, by the Soltân's order, slain by a Kâpiji (M), soon after his arrival at Constantinople.

Affairs of Transilvania. MEAN time Gabriel Bathori, prince of Transilvania, having put himself under the protection f of the Turks, against the archduke Matthias, now king of Hungary, who pretended a title by reason of Sigismond's cession formerly to the emperor, as king of Hungary; that prince took Hermanstadt, and having entered Walakbia, drove out the Vayvod Raduile; then putting another in his place, he returns to Transilvania, to oppose Fortgatsi, the lieutenant of king Matthias. Raduile, who retired to Constantinople, Vayvod of Moldavia, having insinuated to that prince, that Bathori had a design to seize his country also, they joined their forces, and defeated him near Kronstadt, while Fortgatsi seized Transilvania: but Bathori, some time after,

f RICAUT, ibid.

(L) In our author Nasut Bassa.

(M) By this circumstance, he should be the same who is called Mehemmed Pâshâ by the Turkish historians. For he succeeded Nasub Pâshâ; though neither the time nor place of his death in them agrees with those of the Christian account.

having a having received a reinforcement of Turks and Tatars, forced the lieutenant of Mathias to retire A. D. 1610.

into Walakbia.

THUS the storm ceasing in Transilvania, a more violent one fell upon Moldavia. For the and Moldavia.
Soltân understanding that Constantine had assisted the Walakkians against Bathori his tributary, sent a new prince (the supposed son of Thomas, alias Aaron, once Vayvod there) with fifteen thousand men, besides orders to the Turks and Tatars in that province, to assist him in his pretensions. But as if two competitors for it were not enough, there started up a third, the son of Janiculo, who once commanded in Moldavia; and after many turns of fortune, arriving in England, was recommended by king James I. to Sir Thomas Glover, his ambassador at the Porte, in order to solicit his restitution; which he did, but without success.

b WHILE these things were doing by land, the gallies of Mâlta and Tuskany greatly incom- Naval trans-moded the Turks at sea; the latter intercepted forty gallies and two galleasses, laden with the action.
tribute of Egypt, sunk five, and drove the rest into Famagusta, but got no booty. However, in their way home, they took a rich ship, valued at a million and a half of crowns. About the same time the gallies of Mâlta and Naples, missing of the said treasure, ravaged the isle of Longo in the Archipelago; while the Turks slay'd a Greek patriarch alive, under pretence of his intending to make some Albanian Christians revolt. This summer Constantinople, and the adjacent countries, were afflicted with infinite clouds of locusts; which were followed by showers of extraordinary great hail, and a deluge of rain.

c DURING the distractions in the west, the Persian king having extended his dominion to the The Shâh's Black Sea, was content to have made a peace with the Porte, and sent two different embassies proposals. for that purpose. But although the proposals were rejected, yet the Turks attempted nothing against Persia in the years 1609 and 1610. However, next year Abmed sent an army thither, A. D. 1611.

of more than one hundred and fifty thousand men, under the command of Morâd Serder, the grand Wazîr: but he dying in July, before he had entered the enemy's borders, Nasuf Pâshâ, who had been formerly in rebellion, was appointed to succeed him (N). The new general about the midst of August, committing great spoil on the frontiers, was met by the Shâh; who had drawn his forces together: but, finding himself over-matched, he made offers of peace again, which were accepted of, on condition that he paid a yearly tribute of two hundred Peace con-camel-loads of silk, for some countries which he had conquered: that the Shâh's son should cluded.

d be called Pâshâ of Tauris; and that the judge of that city should be sent from Constantinople.
Nothing farther remarkable happened this year, except that the ships of Mâlta, failing in their design on Nowarino, landed eight hundred men near Korinth, in the Morea; who getting to that city an hour before day, surprised and plundered it, coming off with great booty, and no loss from the enemy, who had drawn together ten thousand men to attack them ^e.

NEITHER did any matters of great moment fall out the next year. The terms of peace having Janizaries been agreed on between the Shâh and Abmed, Nasuf Pâshâ returned to Constantinople without mutiny.
any delay, bringing with him an ambassador to conclude it. The Wazîr was received with A. D. 1612;

e great honour at court, and the Persian ambassador highly careffed. Soon after the Soltân going to reside at Adrianople, the soldiery began to mutiny, spurning at their bread and rice; and being expostulated with on the occasion, they answered, that no Soltân before carried out his men in the depth of winter. This gave great disgust to the Wazîr Nasuf, who was now so much in favour with Abmed, that none was allowed to see him in private but himself; and finding, at a great fire which soon after happened in Constantinople, that the Janizaries were more careful to break open houses, than quench the flames, he severely punished them for it; sent sixteen thousand of them away into Asia, and would suffer no more of their order to be made.

f WHILE the Persian ambassador was at Constantinople, one arrived from Mathias, now become Treaty with emperor of Germany, on the death of his brother Rodolph, requiring the province of *Transilvania to be given up to him, according to the agreement with Botskay, in case he died without male issue; but did not succeed in his demand. Holland.*

THIS year also, for the first time, an ambassador came from the states of Holland, and concluded a treaty, whereby the Soltân promised to set at liberty all the Dutch slaves within his dominions; that the Dutch merchants should be free to trade in all his ports; and, that the states might send an ambassador to reside at Constantinople.

IN the end of June, the Soltân married his sister and eldest daughter, the first to Mehemmed Ahmed af- Pâshâ, son to the late Sigâla, the latter to Mahmûd, the Kapudan Pâshâ, or high admiral. The faulced.
ceremony was extremely grand, and the presents of the Soltân to the brides exceeding costly:

^e GRIMSTONE in Achmet apud Ricaut.

(N) 'Tis said this was by Morâd's own advice, in his letters while sick to the Soltân, although Nasuf (or rather Nasub) was supposed to have poisoned him. But Morâd did it with a view, that by such means the Soltân should draw him home, and then dispose of him at pleasure, as afterwards it appears he did.

A. D. 1612. but all this gaiety ended in bitterness, for the day after, Abmed beat the Soltâna, mother to the new married daughter, most unmercifully; stabbed her through the cheek with his dagger, and trod her under his feet, because she had strangled a female slave of his sister's, whom he was enamoured with. After this, having, to avoid the plague, removed from Constantinople to one of his country palaces called Darut Pâshâ; while he was viewing a Yami, which he had built there, a Darwîsh threw a great stone, with a design to knock him on the head, but falling on his shoulder, it did but slightly hurt him. For this crime the offender was next day beheaded.

Affairs of Moldavia.

MOLDAVIA and Transilvania were still embroiled in troubles; and though the Turks could not make an absolute conquest of them, yet they set up princes there, who were in their interest. For Constantine being driven out of Moldavia, and taken prisoner, Stephen, the pretended son of prince Aaron, was placed in his stead. As for Bathori, he was much molested by Bethlem Ghabor, his mortal enemy; and being at length slain by his own soldiers, Bethlem was soon after declared prince of Transilvania, by Serder Pâshâ.

The Floren-
tines take fort Agliman.
A. D. 1613.

TOWARDS the end of this year, the Turks drew together a great army, which they sent towards Transilvania the next spring: but while they were fortifying the places which they held in those parts, Cosmo di Medicis, grand duke of Tuscany, bent his thoughts to take the fort of Agliman (O), in Kâramania; to revenge the loss of a ship in that port, and forty men, whose heads the Turks exposed on the walls. To this intent, his fleet of gallies, with some land forces on board, about the end of April, landed in the night near Jeronda (P), a small town in lesser Asia; but being discovered, embarked again, and put on shore a mile and half from the port of Agliman. The fort stands on a little hill, and extends from thence to the sea side. 'Tis of an oval form, with stone walls, four fathom high, and one broad, divided by a wall in two equal parts, one to the east, the other to the west. It was fortified with eight towers, and had a garrison of three hundred men, provided with all necessaries.

THE Florentines, commanded by Montano, presently marched towards it, and the earl of Candale being come within fifteen paces of the wall, was charged in front by the musketeers of the fort; behind by the Turkish gallies; and in flank from the mountain. For all this, they advanced with their petards to force the gate; and although the enemy from their gallies came forth to attack them, yet they at last entered the fort, and took it, after a most sharp fight: then having removed the artillery, provision and ammunition, they set Agliman on fire. They carried off likewise two gallies, and eight other vessels from the port^a.

Portuguese take Aden.

MEAN time the rebels in Asia Minor burnt several places; and an Arab prince having revolted, ravaged the Othmân territories with 50,000 troops. The Portuguese and Spaniards also, with their fleets infesting the Red Sea, took and plundered Aden, a city of great importance, on the south end of Arabia. In the interim, the Soltân set out for Hungary, with an army; but on advice that Bethlem Ghabor was become prince of Transilvania, he returned, yet dared not enter Constantinople for fear of the plague; and when it had ceased, for fear of renewing the infection, he ordered all the dogs in that city to be carried to Skutari, beyond the Bosphorus, with an allowance of bread and flesh for their maintenance: but becoming uneasy to the inhabitants, they were transported to a desert isle, sixteen miles from the capital, where they all perished for want of food. The lives of the dogs, though held unclean by the Turks, were deemed of such importance, that the Soltân demanded of the Mufti, whether it was lawful to kill them? but that head of their religion answered, that every dog had a soul, and therefore it was not lawful to kill them.

Dogs banished.

Fleet repaired.

THE Soltân having this and the preceding year sustained a loss of gallies and frigates in the Mediterranean, by those of Naples, Mâlta, and Florence, as well as in the Black Sea, by the Kosaks, he imposed a great tax on all his Christian subjects towards repairing it; on which occasion the Armenians were cessed to build nine gallies at their own charge, and the Greeks twenty.

The prime Wazîr put to death.
A. D. 1614.

THE first thing which occurs of any moment in the Turkish affairs, is the disgrace and death of Nasuf Pâshâ. This person, who was the tribute-son of a Greek priest, by degrees came to be Kâpi Aga, then governor of Hâlep, next that of Mesopotamia (or Diyârbekr), and lastly grand Wazîr. Abmed, for what reason is not known, growing jealous of his conduct, resolved on his death. Nasuf suspecting the Soltân's displeasure, endeavoured by presents to the Soltâna, and others, to pacify him, while he prepared to secure himself by flying over to Asia. In the interim, Abmed going one night, in the time of an eclipse, to visit a new mosque, as soon as the Wazîr heard the cry, the king comes, he went down to salute his majesty as he

^a GRIMST. ubi supra.

(O) It guards the port of Seleucia to the north-west of cape Bogaz, of old Karicaum, on the east of Cilicia.

(P) Supposed to be the Jeronda of the ancients.

- ^a passed by: but instead of the Soltân, the Bostânji Bâshi, dressed like Abmed, steps up to him, and tells him, it was his master's pleasure that he should resign the seal. The Wazîr amazed, asked, what the Soltân meant to do? the other replied, he knew not what the Soltân's pleasure was, but that if he would not deliver the seal, he would return with that answer. A. D. 1614.

HEREUPON Nasuf drawing the seal out of his bosom (Q), and delivering it, the Bostânji Bâshi then shewed him a warrant for his head, to which the Wazîr presently submitted; and then two Jamoglâns strangled him. His head was immediately cut off, and carried to the Soltân, while his body was thrown into the street to be trampled on. It was thought his death was procured by Sigâla, Pâshâ of Bâghdâd, whom he had removed; and denying him access to Abmed, he wrote a letter, accusing Nasuf of conspiring with the Persians to kill the Soltân.

- ^b This letter he sent by his wife, the Soltân's sister; but not being able to deliver it into his hands, on account of the Wazîr's vigilance, she left it in his chamber, where he found and read it. They got in his house eighty bags of gold, containing ten thousand chekins each. Mahmûd Pâshâ, the high admiral, succeeded him in his Wazîrship.

ALTHOUGH the Soltân laid aside his expedition into Transilvania, yet he wrote letters to the nobility and states in an imperious style, in favour of Bethlem Ghabor, who still carried on the war against the Germans. These letters were fixed up in form of a mandate, throughout the country, against the emperor's party. At the same time a Chausb arrived at Lintz, with letters also from the Soltân, complaining, that several places in Transilvania had been taken from Ghabor, who was under his protection, and demanded the restitution of them. But while the

- ^c states of the empire were debating this matter, Bethlem, assisted by Saïder Pâshâ, laboured to recover the towns which had been lost, and in October besieged Lîppa; with which Genna and Arach were surrendered to him, on condition that they should be annexed to the principality of Transilvania, and not be put into the hands of the Turks.

THIS year in Hungary, incursions began afresh between the Turks and malecontents, but the losses were on neither side very considerable. All this while Abmed was beautifying the front of the palace towards the Propontis, with a platform or terrass, eight hundred paces long, and twelve broad, washed by the sea. Mean time, one Iakaya, who gave himself out to be the Soltân's brother, after experiencing various turns of fortune, and failing, in concert with the prime Wazîr, to kill Abmed, by the sudden death of the Dârwish, who was to have been the assassin, he wandered through Walakbia and Moldavia, into Poland. There being in danger of his life from a Chausb who knew him, he escaped to the emperor's court at Prague, where he solicited aid against his brother: but meeting with nothing but fair words, he travelled to Florence, and from thence to Naples, Milan and Rome. Last of all he went to France, where he lived by the liberality of the duke of Nevers. Although many suspected him for an impostor, yet those who knew him, concluded from his actions and behaviour, that he was sprung from a princely race. A Turkish pretender. A. D. 1615.

- ^d STEPHEN, who had been by the Turks created Payvod of Moldavia, proving a great tyrant, and endeavouring to root out all the nobility of the country, they invited prince Alexander, son of Jeremy, from whom they had received so much good usage, to make head against him. Stephen, after several defeats, being forced to fly, Alexander was proclaimed prince of Moldâvia. After this, the latter sent an embassy to acquaint the Porte with his pretensions, and that he had no design to withdraw Moldâvia from the Soltân's obedience. But as that prince's ambassadors took the way of Buda, the Pâshâ seized and sent them to Stephen, then at Brâhilow, who put them to death. Then having assembled his scattered forces, and received a recruit from Mikhna, prince of Walakbia, he marched to try his fortune once more, but was again overthrown by Alexander. This prince afterwards gained some farther advantages over him and the Turks, who came to his assistance: but finding that his enemies had gathered a force which he was not able to withstand, he thought fit to retire to the strong fortrefs of *Kochim*¹. Revolution in Moldavia.

- ^e THE beginning of March following, the prince being reinforced with three thousand five hundred Kosaks under the lord Tischevich, and fifteen hundred Poles under Potoski, besides other succours, found his troops encreased to twelve thousand men. Mean time Skinder Pâshâ, and Stephen, with an army of twenty thousand strong, came and incamped between the town and the prince's army. The Tatars immediately fell on the Kosaks who were in the van, when eight cannon playing upon them from a masked battery, made them retreat. While the Kosaks pursued them, the lord Tischevich, with fifteen hundred horse, bravely forced a squadron of Walakbians and Moldavians to retire, although supported by three thousand Turks. Then The Turks routed. A. D. 1616.

¹ GRIMST. ubi supr.

(Q) The Turks have pockets in the breast of their vests, for carrying their money and other things of value.

A. D. 1616.

Stephen seized.Alexander seized :Is overthrown and taken prisoner.Peace with the Germans.Demand on France.
A. D. 1617.Great preparations.

prince Alexander advancing with the rest of the army, and prince Koreski rallying with the garrison of a thousand men in the Turks rear; the Pâshâ, who perceived the stratagem of the enemy, retired with Stephen and part of the cavalry, in much fear and confusion, leaving the prince to carry all before him, who in this action slew twelve thousand men, besides the wounded and prisoners.

THIS great success was attended with more advantages against Mikhna, Vayvod of Walakbia, whose Boyars offered that country to Alexander, though he thought not fit to accept of it.
Ibrâhîm Pâshâ likewise wrote to assure him, that he should remain in quiet possession of Mol-davia, since the prime Wazîr was in disgrace; and at the same time had orders to seize Stephen, and send him to Constantinople, where he turned Mohammedan, to save his life. For all this, in June, Skinder Pâshâ, with an army of twenty thousand Turks and Walakhians, joined by ten thousand more of Mikhna's men, came to Tergovist in Walakbia, and there proclaimed Mikhna prince of Moldavia; after which they marched towards that country.

ABOUT the same time, the Polish general growing discontented at the success of prince Alexander, and his son Bogdân, wrote to acquaint Mikhna and the Pâshâ, that if they would make the eldest son of the late prince Simeon Vayvod of Walakbia, he would so weaken the army of the two princes, that they must either yield or fly. This being agreed on, he drew the Kosaks to mutiny; and to the number of about eight thousand of them, marched towards Poland:
Bicho also, prince Alexander's own general, having treacherously deserted him with 2000 horse, it caused great confusion in his army. The prince perceiving that the Pâshâ had sent twelve thousand men to pursue the Poles, then at Kotnard, between Tassi and Kochim, suddenly advanced with his army towards the latter place. Mean time prince Koreski, who staid near Kotnard with two thousand five hundred horse, was surprised by a body of Turks and Tatars, yet retreated, with the slaughter of six thousand of them, to one hundred and fifty which he lost of his own.

THE Turkish commander being reinforced with sixteen thousand men from the Pâshâ, challenged prince Koreski to fight at single combat; but having been wounded twice in the late action, the lord Tischevich undertook the quarrel. The Turkish general being about fifty paces from his army, called for water to wash (R), then turned to the east (S), and prayed; after which he mounted, and rode slowly towards his adversary. The two combatants having spent their bows and arrows, Tischevich firing a petronel, shot the Turk through the body, and then dispatched him. But this small victory was of little service to them, for the traitor Bicho having found a way with two thousand horse to cut off the passage between Kotnard and Bochocan, the Poles were surrounded on all sides; yet refusing to yield, the Pâshâ and Mikhna ordered the cannon to be played upon them. Tischevich seeing all lost, with five hundred horse, forced his way through three or four squadrons, posted by the wood side, to keep any from escaping.
After this, the Turks approaching to force the prince's camp, they cried out, they yielded.
The prince Alexander and Bogdân, with their mother, were carried to Constantinople, where, for fear of perpetual imprisonment, they turned Mohammedans. Prince Koreski also was taken afterwards, and the young prince's wife carried into Tartary; from whence she was ransomed for three thousand chekîns.

THE peace made in 1606, between the Turks and Germans, having been infringed by both nations, for want of being explicit enough in certain articles; after much altercation, the ambassadors of both empires agreed to farther articles, to take away all pretence of controversy in explaining the former. By the seventh, priests of the church of Rome were allowed to build churches, and perform divine service in them; and by the tenth, all merchants from the empire and Spain were to pay three per cent. and, in case of death, the Soltân was not to claim their goods.

THE peace being thus confirmed between the two empires, the bordering countries, which had been so long harrassed with war, began to breathe a little; and the Soltân turning his thoughts to other things, in 1617, sent a Chausb to Paris, with letters to demand of Henry IV. that justice might be done the Moors of Granada, expelled out of Spain; who had been wronged of their goods, as well as in their persons, in their passage to France. The Chausb was amazed at the long delays given to law-suits in that country; whereas, he said, the Turks did justice with dispatch, and terminated the most important causes in eight days time.

THIS year the Soltân had two armies on foot, one under Ali Pâshâ, against the Persians, the other against the Poles, on account of their supporting the interest of Alexander, prince of Moldavia. They had likewise two fleets at sea, the first in the Euxine or Black Sea, against

(R) They wash their eyes, nose, mouth, ears, and privities: this is called Abdest, and is performed before they say their prayers, or go upon any action of importance.

(S) Or more properly to the point where the city of Mekka is situate, which from Moldavia was towards the south-east. This point, with the action of turning to it, is called Kibla.

a the Kofaks or Ruffians, who daily infested their coasts; the other in the White Sea, or Propontis, A. D. 1617. to be ready to convoy the treasure of Egypt, and oppose the attempts of the gallies belonging to Malta and Florence. However, nothing remarkable happened abroad this year, which at Ahmed dies, home proved unfortunate by the loss of the Soltân himself, who died on the sixteenth of November ^k.

AHMED lived twenty-nine years, and reigned fourteen. His three sons, Othmân, Murâd, and Ibrâhîm, all ascended the throne.

Not to mention his other virtues, he excelled all his predecessors in liberality and magnificence; His character, so that he has been charged by some with profuseness. He was very fond of building, and erected in the Hippodrome a Yâmî (T), the neighbour and rival of Sancta Sophia. This structure b proved so costly, that to finish it, the treasures of the whole empire, collected by his father during his long repose, scarce sufficed. Whilst this work was in hand, the Soltân is said to have visited it every week, and paid the workmen himself their wages ^l.

To this account of the Turkish historians, we may add from the Christian, that he was of a good constitution, well complexioned, and somewhat inclined to be fat. He was strong and active; ambitious and proud, but not so cruel as many of his predecessors. He was much given to sensuality, having had three thousand women, the daughters of Christians, in his Saray. He took great delight in hawking and hunting, to pursue each of which sports, he maintained forty thousand falconers, and near as many huntsmen, in Greece and Anatolia. Abmed took a fancy to make horn rings, such as the Turks use when they draw their bows; c and his father Mohammed made arrows. For the Mohammedan princes are obliged by their religion to practise some handicraft business, which they do in the morning, the first thing after they have said their prayers. But it is only for form sake, since they scarce finish an arrow or a ring in a whole year ^m.

^k CRIMST. IN RICAUT,

^l CANT. p. 240.

^m GRIMST. IN RICAUT.

(T) This building excells Sancta Sophia in magnificence, though not in largeness. Besides the numberless ornaments on the outside of the walls, there are above two hundred gold tables, each set with sixty one diamonds, hung up on the inside, whereon are engraven the names of the prophets, with sentences out of the Korân, every one of which is said to cost sixty dollars. It is certain, so much money was expended on this structure, that on an exact calculation, every dram of stone or mortar was found to cost three aspers. Cant. What then must the gold, gildings, painting, wood, and iron-work have cost?

CHAP. XVI.

The Reign of Mostafa.

d AHMED was succeeded in the beginning of the year 1027, by his younger brother ^{15 Soltân} Mostafa (U): but as this prince took no care of the public affairs, but gave himself ^{Mostafa.} up intirely to his lusts, he was in the fourth month of his reign, by the unanimous consent of ^{Hej. 1027,} the great men, removed from the throne to the prison of the seven towers. ^{A. D. 1618.}

HIS is all we meet with relating to this first reign of Mostafa, in the Turkish authors before us: nor do the Christian historians say much more, the short space of its duration not affording time for many transactions of moment. They tell us, that growing odious by his tyranny, he was by the grand Wazîr, on his return out of Asia, forced to return to his cell again. That Ahmed being but fifteen years old when he ascended the throne, the great officers of the court thought it not prudent to put him to death, lest his brother should die without children, and the empire be involved in civil wars. But that when Abmed saw he had children, he resolved e to get rid of him, had he not been hindered by frightful dreams the night before: another time going to shoot him, he was seized with a pain in his arm: yet that in his last sickness he called for him, and declared him his successor.

THE first thing this prince did, was to set the Persian ambassador at liberty; but, contrary ^{Koreski's} to the law of nations, he ill used the baron de Mole or Sancy, the French ambassador. The ^{escape out of} occasion was this: prince Koreski, after he was taken prisoner in Moldavia, as before related, ^{prison.} refusing to turn Mohammedan, was sent prisoner to the castle on the Black Sea, where he was confined in a little chamber, with one Rigault, a Frenchman, who was there before him. This chamber was on the top of one of the towers of the castle, and had one window without bars, f large enough for a man to get through. As the king of Poland was concerned for the prince's

(U) The Turks ascribe the greatest things to all their emperors, except this Mostafa, whom they represent as exceeding all the rest in vice and lust.

A. D. 1618.

French ambassador confined.

liberty, he wrote to the French ambassador to solicit his ransom; the imperial ambassador likewise did what he could to procure his release. Mean time Martin, the French ambassador's secretary, having ransomed a Polish lady, with her daughter and maid, for two thousand five hundred crowns, on condition that he was to have the young lady in marriage, sent them home: but the father refusing to perform the agreement, one day in a visit which he made to prince Koreski, he told him the affair. The prince bid him be easy, and assured him, that if he could obtain his liberty, he should not long pine for the lady. Hereupon, Martin sending a Greek priest with a rope ladder, which he drew up by means of a packthread, the prince and Frenchman got out of the tower, and were concealed at Constantinople.

As soon as their escape was known, not only the French ambassador's domestics were seized, and severely tortured to discover where they were, but the ambassador himself was confined in the grand Wazir's palace: and although the English and Dutch ambassadors resented this injury, yet he could not obtain his own and servants liberty, without very great presents to the Musti, Chausb bashi and others^a. But we must now look into the actions of Ozmân or Othmân, who by this time is upon the throne.

^a GRIMST. in RICAUT.

C H A P. XVII.

S E C T. I.

The Reign of Soltân Othmân II.

16 Soltân
Othmân II.

MOSTAFA having been deposed, Soltân Othmân (or Osmân) the second ascended the throne, in the eighth year of his age. It was upon account of his youth, that they had before passed him by, although he had more right to the empire than his uncle Mostafa, who was chosen as a contemplative and inoffensive man^c.

Embassy to France.

As soon as the French ambassador was freed from his confinement, he sent to acquaint his master with the treatment he had received. Hereupon, the king of France sent two gentlemen to Constantinople, to demand reparation for the indignity offered to his representative. On this occasion Uri Chausb was dispatched ambassador to Paris, to confirm the peace; and at his audience he delivered a letter from the young Soltân, wherein he made an apology for what had happened, and promised, that for the future, the French ambassador should be treated with more respect than that of any other Christian potentate.

URI CHAUSH, after he had finished his business in France, went over in the same quality to England, where he had an audience of king James I. at Whitehall, to whom he made a speech, and then presented a letter from the Soltân, much to the same purpose with that sent to the king of France.

Peace with Persia.

In the mean time, Ali Pâshâ, the grand Wazîr, had entered Persia with his army, and destroyed all before him with fire and sword, as far as Tauris, whither Karelghay Hân (or Khân), the Persian general, retreated: but on the Wazîr's approach he left that city; and being pursued by the Tatars, many of his troops were cut to pieces. Then the Turks proceeded towards Ardevil, from whence the king of Persia fled towards Hulkbal (X), and retreating with his army to the top of a high mountain, sent to demand peace (Y): which the Wazîr, being in distress for want of victuals, was obliged to grant, and Soltân Ozmân afterwards confirmed it.

Strange phænomena.

Hej. 1029.

A. D. 1620.

DURING this expedition of the Turks into Persia^p, in the year 1029, on the 28th of Rabio'lawel, there appeared in the heavens at Constantinople, a crooked sword, five times as long as a spear, and three feet broad (Z). It extended from east to west, and for a whole month shone with great brightness after sun-set. The astrologers declared it to be a sign of victory, and increase of empire to the Othmâns^q.

^c CANTEMIR Othman Hist. p. 241.^p GRIMST. in RICAUT.^q CANT. p. 241.

(X) Or Kalkal, a strong place on the river Ispervah, in the road from Ardevit to Kasîn.

(Y) This is according to the account sent by the Wazîr to Sir Paul Pindar, then the English ambassador at the Porte.

(Z) The Christian writers make it of a vast length, and extending from near the zenith, where the point was, below the horizon, which hid the hilt. The blade seemed to be stretched from Persia, with the edge towards Constantinople. It always rose in one place, and followed the motion of the heavens.

a THE war about the same time growing hot in Bohemia against the protestants, Bethlem A. D. 1620. Ghabor, prince of Transylvania, diverted the arms of the Imperialists, by invading Hungary; but fearing that the emperor, in case he quite subdued the Bohemians, should fall upon him with his whole power, he sent an ambassador to crave aid of Ozmân, who promised, with an oath, to assist him, in case of need, to the utmost of his power. Bethlem having thus gained the Soltân's protection, entered into a league with the Bohemians and Hungarians, and on the 25th of August was proclaimed king of Hungary ¹.

NEXT year there happened in the month of Rabio'lawel, a frost at Constantinople, which was so excessively great, that the inhabitants of that city walked over the Bosphorus to Iskuder (or Skutari) on foot. This the astrologers interpreted as a bad omen: but Othmân, in contempt of their prediction, undertakes in the summer after the hard winter, an expedition against the Poles; recovers Khotin (A), which they had taken by assault, and sends the Khân of Khrîm, with the Tatarian and Turkish forces, to ravage the inmost part of Poland. Mean while he himself so surrounds and presses the enemies troops with his own, that they were at last compelled to sue for peace; which the Soltân having granted on his own terms, he returns about winter laden with spoils and captives ².

As to the occasion of this war, the Christian historians tell us, that the Poles had not only given the Othmâns offence, by supporting the interest of Alexander prince of Moldavia, in opposition to the Vayvod set up by the Turks, as hath already been related; but they had also given protection to Gasparo Gratsiani, an Austrian, who had been made Vayvod of Moldavia, after the death of Mikhna, and falling into disgrace at the Porte, fled into Poland. Soon after this, Jebân beg Ghieray, Khân of Khrîm, having made several incursions into the Polish territories, the ambassador of Poland complained thereof to the Porte: but being answered, that the Tatars were absolute lords of themselves, and besides had a demand of forty thousand ducats annual tribute on his country, which was not paid to them, those ravagers grew more insolent, and committed much greater depredations than before.

HEREUPON the Poles and Kosaks, dwelling about the Boristhenes or Nieper, in order to make reprisals, fell down that river in boats, and plundered several towns and villages on the Euxine or Black Sea. The Soltân sent forces against them from time to time, which always came off with the worst; and when he complained of the damage done by them to his subjects, the Poles answered in his own language, that the Poles were absolute lords of themselves; but that when the Tatar would give over his hostilities, they might be prevailed on to give over theirs. Ozmân saw plainly by this, that he was to expect no peace from the Kosaks, so long as the Tatars continued their ravages; and therefore, rather than procure it at that rate, by the advice of his prime Wazîr Ali, he resolved on a war against Poland.

ACCORDINGLY, in the end of April, 1621, he set forward at the head of an army three hundred thousand strong. His first attempt was to attack the fortrefs of Kochin in Moldavia, given by Gasparo to the Poles: but failing in his design, he crossed the Boristhenes, and as it were, besieged the chancellor of Poland, with forty thousand Poles and Kosaks, besides eight thousand Germans, in their camp, for four and thirty days together. At length finding, after all his attempts, that he could do no good against the bravery of the enemy, who resisted him with great slaughter, by the mediation of Radula, prince of Walakbia, they came to the following agreement; that the emperor's army should retire from the borders of Poland: that the Tatars should send a Murza to reside as an hostage in Poland, against future incursions; and that the Poles should send another to the Krîm, as a security against any invasion, either by them or the Kosaks; and pay the Khân forty thousand florins: that the Poles should have a resident at the Porte, and be allowed a free trade in the Othmân dominions; but that their merchants should be obliged to make a present of one hundred thousand chekîns. This accommodation was the more seasonable on both sides, for that by the sword, cold, famine, and other casualties, the Turks were computed to have lost eighty thousand men (besides one hundred thousand horses), and the Poles twenty thousand.

HOWEVER, the Soltân being exasperated at the emperor Ferdinand II. for sending aid to the Poles, did, upon his leaving Poland, contrary to the advice of his council, proclaim war against him. Pursuant to this measure, he commanded the Pâshâ of Silistria to winter in that country, with an army of seventy thousand men, in order to invade the emperor's dominions in the following spring; and presently after Gallo, the emperor's ambassador, was stopt at Buda, under pretence that he had promised, upon his life, the emperor should not assist the

¹ GRIMST. ubi supra.

² CANT. p. 242.

(A) Or Khochim, commonly written in the maps Choczyn. It is a city of Moldavia, on the river Tyras, (or Nieper), over against Kaminiek. The walls were repaired by the Turks, after the battle of Hierafus, with the addition of some modern works; so that it may now be counted the bulwark of the whole empire, against the Poles and Russians. CANT.

A. D. 1921. Poles. Hereupon, the king of Poland acquainted the Chausb, who was then at his court, that in case his master should on any such account commence hostilities against Ferdinand, he would conclude no peace with him, but should be obliged to take the part of his ally. Upon this, Ozmân thought it adviseable to desist from his resolution; yet at the same time secret orders were sent to some of the officers, who commanded on the frontiers, to join with Bethlem Ghabor against the emperor. But that order came too late, Bethlem having already made peace with that prince¹.

Rebellion in Syria.

It being now given out, that the Amîr of Sidon (B) was in rebellion, Ozmân pretending to go against him in person, ordered his palace in Halep to be fitted up, and his troops to be in readiness to march. This resolution was against the opinion of the Mufti, and other officers of state, who thought it not convenient for him to leave his European dominions; besides, they said his presence would inhanse the charges of the expedition. On these remonstrances he seemed to change his mind; but next day going to the arsenal, he ordered one hundred gallies to be fitted out, and sent a fleet into the Black Sea against the Kosaks. The dissatisfaction given his ministry by these precipitate proceedings, was heightened by his marrying the granddaughter of a Soltâna, wife of Parteu Pâsbâ, only for her beauty, without any pomp; contrary to the custom latterly of his predecessors, who refrained taking wives of Turkish extraction. The soldiery also began to be disgusted on the same account; and his manner of behaviour increased a contempt of him in the city: for he used daily to go about the streets on foot, sometimes in disguise, with a page or two, peeping into houses and taverns like a petty officer (C).

Embassy from England.

While the peace between the Turks and Poles was in agitation, Sir Thomas Roe, ambassador from James I. of England, arrived at the Porte to renew the ancient capitulations and privileges, with some amendments. He had it also in charge to offer his master's mediation between the Soltân and Poland; to desire redress for the piracies committed by the gallies of Tunis and Algiers; and likewise to demand restitution of a great sum of money taken from Arthur Garraway, merchant, in the reign of Abmed.

The prime Wazîr answered the ambassador, that the Soltân had given orders for renewing the capitulations, with requisite additions: but declined the king's mediation, as if inconsistent with the Soltân's honour, since the Poles seemed not sincerely inclined to peace: however, he promised that if the peace did take place, all the prisoners should be released, except prince Koreski. As for the pirates, Ozmân protested against them, and was ready to do the English any service; but thought the demand of Garraway's money injurious to him, since they could obtain no relief from the three preceding Wazîrs, to whom they had applied.

Ozmân's
designs.

The Soltân, discontented ever since his disgrace in Poland, meditated revenge upon the soldiery; finding also that his intention of going in pilgrimage to Mekka did not relish, he grew still more uneasy: however, being resolved to undertake it, he seemed now content with any sort of peace, even a dishonourable one, with the Poles. He reinforced his frontiers in Hungary; and though much troubled at the league between the emperor and Bethlem Ghabor, yet he dissimbled his resentment to a high degree, and secured the Black Sea as well as he could with his gallies. Mean time, all the great officers both in church and state strenuously opposed his intended journey to Mekka; and the soldiery went so far as to protest they would not follow him, but set up another prince in his room.

The soldiery
mutiny:

For all this, Ozmân hurried on by his ill fortune, on Wednesday the 7th of May, began to pass over his tents and treasure into Asia. Hereupon the Janizaries and Spahis concluding that his palaces and the temples were not stripped of what was valuable in them, merely for sake of the pilgrimage; suddenly met in the Atmeydan or Hippodrome, and running to the Saray, called out for the Soltân. On Ozmân's appearing, and asking what they meant by that piece of insolence? they answered, that he should neither go to Mekka, nor over to Asia, but stay in the city: and at the same time demanded the heads of the prime Wazîr Delavir, and others, as enemies to the government. The Soltân finding it best to give way a little, promised to lay aside the thoughts of his journey; and as to their other demand, desired them to refer it to the divan to be held next Saturday.

Kill the Wazîr, and

Ozman perceiving that they could not be prevailed on to desist, at night fortified the Saray, with design to oppose the seditious; but although the palace had always 3000 domestics within it, yet not a man of them would arm in their master's behalf. Next morning the mutineers assembled again, and forcing the Mufti to go along with them to the court, made a new demand of the persons whom they wanted to destroy. In this danger the Wazîr

¹ Sir THOMAS ROE's Letters, ap. RICAUT.

(B) This was probably the famous Amîr Fakro'ddin, great loss to find excuses for destroying him, since this prince of the Dursâi, commonly called Drufes. was the effect of his care.

(C) The enemies of this prince seemed to be at a a intreated him to pass over to Asia in his own boats: but finding the Soltân inflexible, he bravely ventured to go out himself to the mutineers, and asked them, what it was they sought, and wherein he had offended? This courageous behaviour put them at first to a stand, till some insolent fellows, more audacious than the rest, answered him with their swords (D), and cut him in pieces. A. D. 1622.

WHEN Ozmân was informed of this, he attempted to escape into Asia; but finding he had slipped the opportunity, hid himself in a private part of the palace. The mutineers at last entered the Saray, and taking Mostafa with two negroe women out of a vault, where he had been put at the beginning of the tumult, by his nephew's order, they proclaimed him emperor a second time, and carried him to the old palace. Ozmân having in the night consulted with Husseyn, Aga of the Janizaries, and another officer, pursuant to their advice, early next morning, went to the college of those soldiers, and by a speech, accompanied with tears, acknowledging his error, had almost brought them to relent in his favour: but the Aga unseasonably making use of some harsh and reproachful words, their fury was roused again; so that crying out treason, they cut him and Husseyn Pâshâ to pieces, and sent the Soltân prisoner to the Seven Towers. their Aga.

As soon as Mostafa was seated on the throne, Dawd Pâshâ, the new prime Wazîr, and his brother-in-law, went with certain persons to put Ozmân to death: being awakened by the executioners entering his chamber, he cried, what news? At first they stood amazed; till one of them striking him on the head with a battle-axe, the rest leaped upon him, and with much ado strangled him ^u.

THE Turkish historians made use of by prince Cantemir, wholly omit the circumstances of this remarkable event: they only tell us in general, that the soldiery, unused to youthful government, and living idly at Constantinople, being stirred up by Mostafa's party, most barbarously kill the Soltân, a young man of great hopes, in the fourth year of his reign, and twelfth of his age; after which they release Mostafa, whom they had before deposed, and set him once more upon the throne ^x. Hej. 1032.
A. D. 1622.

^u ROE, ubi supra.

^x CANT. p. 242.

(D) When Sir Thomas Roe desired him, in case he went along with the Soltân in pilgrimage, to recommend him to the Kaymekâm, he replied, trouble not yourself, I shall never remove so far from this city, but I will leave one of my legs behind to serve you. Which promise was verified, in a way he never intended; for within a few days after his murder, one of his legs was hanged up in the Hippodrome.

S E C T. II.

Mostafa restored.

d ALTHOUGH the soldiery were so eager for Mostafa's restoration, yet he did not please them long. He had, while in prison, concealed, not corrected, the vices of his perverse nature; and thereby put the soldiers in hopes, that having tasted the cup of affliction, he would become better, and alter his course of life, as well as method of government. But after they had, in this expectation, replaced him on the throne, he thinking himself out of fortune's power, returns to his old vices, and seeks to destroy his deposers; neglects the administration of affairs, and in a word, does nothing worthy of memory. When he had thus tyrannized, rather than reigned, fifteen months, he is again dethroned by the great men, rejecting the dominion of a fool; and being with the greatest ignominy set on the back of an ass, is carried amidst the insults of the mob, to the prison of the Seven Stars, where soon after he is strangled by the command of his successor ^y. Mostafa's incapacity.
Deposed again.

e THIS is all the account which the Turkish historians in view afford us, relating to the second reign of Soltân Mostafa; nor are the matters which the Christian writers have collected of any great moment: however, it may not be amiss to mention them. The conditions agreed on by the late Wazîr Dalavir, and the Polish commissioners, were kept so secret, that the new Wazîr Dawd knew nothing of the matter, nor could find any copy of them: however, a Polish ambassador being now arrived to conclude the peace, it went on at the earnest solicitation of Sir Thomas Roe. For all this, on the 17th of June, the brave prince Koreski, who had formerly made his escape out of the Turkish dominions, after two years close confinement, was strangled in prison. Although this was done by the Wazîr's order, yet, in malice to the

^y CANT. ubi supra

A. D. 1622. Aga of the Janizaries, he laid the blame on him; and from thence taking occasion to remove a him, sent him to the islands to be strangled. The Janizaries, incensed at this injustice done Things in con- their general, rescued him, and demanded the Wazir's head. They likewise broke into and fusion. plundered his palace: but though on promoting Mostafa, a person of a mild nature, to that high post, they became quiet for two or three days; yet afterwards things returned into confusion again; some being for the continuance of Mostafa on the throne, whilst others practised for the advancement of Morád, the brother of Ozmân. Mean time at Bâghdád, the captain of the Janizaries there slew the Pâshâ of that city, burnt the Mufti and all his kindred, and married his daughter to Arslân Beg, who laid pretensions to the inheritance of a neighbouring prince.

Peace with Poland.

ON the 22d of August, there arrived an ambassador from Bethlem Gabor, prince of Transylvania; who, among other instructions, had orders to excuse his master for having made peace with the emperor; alleging, that it was done chiefly to gain time, and that he did not intend to keep it long. He likewise suggested, that the emperor designed to invade the Othmân dominions; and on that pretence would have had orders sent to the Pâshâs on the frontiers, to begin hostilities against the empire and Poland, whose ambassador was at the same time treating of peace; and at last, after many difficulties and delays, he gained his point, notwithstanding the great opposition given by the minister of Russia. By this peace the Moldavians were not to give the Krím Tatars a passage into Poland through their country; and in case the latter did the Poles any injury, satisfaction was to be made, and their Khân punished. They were likewise to assist the Poles in their wars, on paying them the yearly stipend. On the other hand, the Kosaks were not to invade the Turkish territories; and in case they did, restitution was to be made of the spoil. In consequence of this peace, some reparation was made the Poles, for the ravages committed by the Tatars, and their Khân, Jebân beg Gbieray, deposed; in whose room was placed Mehemed Gbieray, his cousin german, before imprisoned at *Rhodes*².

Violences committed.

THE soldiers persisting still in their mutinous disposition, demanded for themselves all profitable employments, which durst not be denied them. They drank wine in the streets, contrary to their law, and extorted money from the Christians to pay for it; killing them with impunity, in case they refused. About the same time, the Janizaries in the galleys which rode at Smyrna, commanded by Halil Pâshâ, in despite of his authority, set upon the houses of all the Christian consuls in that port. The English were forced to run naked from their lodgings, and swim to the admiral's galley to save their lives; while the Turks ransacked the lower part of the houses, and carried away to the value of two thousand dollars. The damage which the French suffered was still greater; and the loss of the Venetians amounted to at least ten thousand dollars.

The late Wazir put to death.

THERE were at the same time three rebellions on foot in Asia; one at Bâghdád, another at Arzerûm, and a third in Mesopotamia, which were concealed by the ministers of state.

MEAN while the grand Wazir, Jorji Mehemed, envying the authority of his predecessor, David Pâshâ (the queen mother's favourite, and son-in-law, who had been the instrument of Soltân Ozmân's murder) stirred up the Spahis to demand justice upon him for that heinous fact. Hereupon being seized and carried into the divân, he was, without any trial, brought before the soldiers, where he was stript, and on his knees, with his turban taken off, ready to receive the fatal stroke, when the Janizaries suddenly came to his rescue, and carried him away to their odas or chambers: but the Spahis insisting on his death with great vehemence, to prevent their coming to blows, he was, notwithstanding all the money given to save himself, delivered up to them. This done, he was secretly put in the same coach wherein he had sent Soltân Ozmân to his execution; and being dry with sorrow, drank at the same fountain where his late sovereign had stopped to drink. In a word, having been conveyed into the same chamber where he had murdered that prince, he shewed the executioners the corner where he had committed the crime; and desiring to expiate it in the very same place, he was there accordingly strangled.

Conspiracy at court.

AS the great disorders in the empire manifestly proceeded from the weak capacity of Mostafa, and instead of subsiding, spread themselves gradually into the provinces; both ministers and people seemed unanimously to desire the deposition of Mostafa a second time. There were indeed three difficulties in the way: for it was not likely, either that Khossûm Pâshâ, now prime Wazir, would consent to divest himself of that absolute power which he enjoyed under a weak prince; or that the Janizaries, who had exalted Mostafa, would easily forego their choice; nor was there money in the treasury sufficient to pay the customary donatives on a new inauguration. However, certain things happened at this juncture, which contributed much to remove those difficulties, and hasten a change. The chief of these was the news of the rebellion of Abâza, who, with fifteen thousand horse, ravaged the plains about Kârahissar, in

² RICAUT.

^a Anatolia, stiling himself the avenger of Soltân Ozmân's murder, and enemy of the Janizaries. A. D. 1622. {
Of these he slew all who fell into his hands; which so enraged the rest of that order who were at Constantinople, that they proposed to their Aga a speedy union with the Spahis, for the immediate suppression of the rebels; and the rather, because Sigâla Pâshâ, who had been sent into Asia for that purpose, had by letters informed the court, that on his approach towards the enemy, most of his forces had deserted him.

This intelligence furnished the Mufti, Wazîr, and Aga, with such an answer for the Janizaries, as disposed them to co-operate in the desired change. They told them, that they ^{deposed.} Mostafa were ready to comply with their request for suppressing the rebellion in Asia; but that the incapacity of their sovereign hindered them to proceed; and that the defect of the principal wheel obstructed all the motions of good government. The Janizaries hereupon met in a tumultuous manner at Soltân Soleymân's mosk, and there making an Ayak Diwân, it was enacted, by consent of the civil and military power, that young Morâd should be advanced to the throne, and Mostafa deposed; and because the treasury was low, the soldiers were content to wave their largesses for this time, but without prejudice to their claim on future inaugurations. This decree being made, the prime Wazîr immediately mounted on horseback to notify the same to Mostafa; but he found him so stupid, that he seemed insensible of the message ^a.

^a RICAUT:

C H A P. XVIII.

The Reign of Morâd IV. Surnamed Ghâzi.

S E C T. I.

^c THIS Soltân, whose brave exploits acquired him the surname of Ghâzi, or the valiant, (E), was born in the year 1018, and on the deposition of Mostafa, succeeded to the empire the 4th of Zulkadeh, 1032 ^b. 17 Soltân Morad IV.
Hej. 1032.
A. D. 1622.

THE first act of his power was to depose Husseyn Pâshâ, grand Wazîr, for mal-administration, whom he afterwards strangled; and to advance Halil Pâshâ, whom the other had unjustly prosecuted, in his place. He had many difficulties to struggle with, especially the insolence of the Janizaries, and want of money to satisfy their demands. To this end, besides a tax laid on all military officers, a shameful loan was required of thirty thousand chekins, from the four Christian ambassadors at the Porte. Distractions at court.
A. D. 1624.

MANY of the officers not liking this usurping humour, began secretly to espouse the cause of Abâza, Pâshâ of Arzerum, and his confederate the Pâshâ of Bâghdâd: neither was the Wazîr himself, or the Pâshâ of Anatolia, favourers of the Janizaries; who, when they pressed him to fight Abâza, answered, that they might if they would, but that for his part, he would not engage in a quarrel where Mussulmân blood must be spilled on both sides. Abâza favoured.

THE Porte was also distracted at this time with the Krîm Tatars refusing Mahmûd Ghieray, whom the Soltân had appointed Khân, and declaring for his brother Mehemet. On this occasion the Kâpûdân Pâshâ landing eight thousand men, to support the interest of the former; they fell into an ambush of thirty thousand Tatar horse, who might have cut them all off; but to shew their regard for them as old allies, they slew but a few, and let the prisoners go at small ransoms. Had they pursued the advantage they had against them, they might have destroyed their whole fleet, and done them still greater damages. Krîm Tatars succefs

^e DURING these troubles, the Kosâks in the admiral's absence, with one hundred and fifty sail and saiks, or boats, entered the Bosphorus, where they burnt several villages, and pleasure-houses. To oppose them, although so near the imperial city, there was not a galley in readiness; they therefore armed some small craft of the same kind with the enemies vessels, and brought forth a great chain, which the Greek emperors used at the siege of Constantinople, Kosâks invasions.

^b CANT. p. 243.

(E) Gâzi, or Ghâzi, signifies more properly a conqueror, or one who conquers, to propagate the Mohammedan religion.

A. D. 1621. to extend across the Bosphorus. Not long after, the Kosiks returned with a more considerable force, and threw the city into greater consternation than before. They landed in several places; and having burnt the Pharos, with some villages, returned home laden with spoil and glory.

Affairs of Germany.

For all things were in so bad a state at the Porte, yet Bethism Ghabor, prince of Transylvania, retained his attachment to it; and suing for leave to make war on the emperor, was assisted with fifty thousand Turks: but for these favours he paid fifty thousand dollars to the prime Wazîr, and promised a yearly tribute of forty thousand more. After he had, with those auxiliary troops joined to his own, done considerable damage to the imperial territories, a truce was at last concluded. But the Turks divided in parties, having in their return committed great spoil, and carried off a multitude of people captives, the imperialists fell upon and defeated most of them, killing a good number, and releasing many prisoners. Among the rest, Esterhâsi boldly attacked a large body of them, slew twelve hundred, freed one thousand Christians, and took several of their principal commanders, with all their baggage, besides a great quantity of gold and silver.

Persians take Bâghdâd.

THE Turks discouraged by these losses from a German war, sent ambassadors both to Vienna and Poland to renew the peace; and the rather, because the power of the rebels increased in the east, while the king of Persia entered the Othmân dominions, carrying all before him. The more moderate ministers were for pardoning Abâza, and granting his demands: but this was stiffly opposed by the Janizaries, whose declared enemy he was; so that while they differed about the method of proceeding, the rebel had an opportunity to ravage Anatolia, and the Shâh to conquer the city, with the province of Bâghdâd. After this, dividing his army into four parts, he marched with one into Mesopotamia, the second he sent into Syria, the third harried the coast of the Black Sea, and the fourth set forward towards Mekka.

ALI PASHA being sent to oppose the Shâh in Mesopotamia, was there slain, and his army ruined. The Othmâns had no better success in Syria, which was attended with the revolt of Damaskus. The forces sent to the Black Sea, besides other damages, took a fort near Trebizond; while those detached towards Arabia reduced the cities of Bâsrah and Medinah.

Abâza de-
featca.

To remedy these evils, the prime Wazîr, with a great army, set forward to besiege Bâghdâd. But here it will be proper to leave the Christian historians, and return to the Turkish, to see first what account they give us of the war in Asia, with which they begin the actions of Morâd's reign. They tell us, that in the very commencement of it, he shewed how much better it was for the Othmâns to obey an active young man, than a sluggard.^a

Hej. 1033.
A. D. 1623.

ABAZA, Pâshâ (F) of Arzerûm, in Mostafa's time, had dared to ravage the Asiatic provinces, in open defiance of his sovereign; and hoped to proceed with impunity, so long as Morâd, a youth, held the reigns of government. But the Soltân, in the second year of his reign, sends the prime Wazîr, Cberkies Mehemed Pâshâ (G), with an army against the rebel; who, after a bloody battle near Kaysarya, being defeated, flies to Arzerûm (H). But death at Tokâd prevented the Wazîr from prosecuting the war.

Baghdâd
besieged.
A. D. 1626.

HOWEVER, Morâd, imagining Abâza's rebellion to be entirely quashed, sends Khafiz (I) Ali Pâshâ, governor of Diyârbeker (K), with a great army to besiege Bâghdâd; but after five months siege, he is repulsed by the bravery of the besieged with great loss, and forced to return (L). For this reason, when he came to Hâlep, he was deprived of his dignity, and the imperial signet committed to Halil Pâshâ ^d.

Peace with the emperor.

ABOUT this time Bethlem Ghabor makes peace with the emperor of Germany; obliging himself, among other things, to procure a restitution of all places on the borders taken by the Turks in the last war, and all prisoners to be set at liberty. These articles which were approved of by Morâd, were agreed on in December 1626; and in September next year, a peace was concluded at Komorow, between the emperor and the Soltân.

Persian expedition.
A. D. 1627.

AFTER this, the Shâh of Persia, notwithstanding his late successes, thought fit to dispatch an ambassador to the Porte, with proposals of peace: but as he could not be prevailed on to part with Bâghdâd, the grand Wazîr Halil would not hearken to them. Soon after, with an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, he passed into Asia, in order to subdue that

^c RICAUT, in Amurat.

^d CANT. p. 244.

(F) So called from his country Abâza; the inhabitants whereof, both in manners and language, much resemble the Cherkassians. Cant. They are called also by some, Abkâs. Their country lies on the Euxine Sea, to the west of Mingrelia.

(G) The only prime Wazîr of Cherkassian extraction; although several of that nation have enjoyed the highest offices in the Turkish court. Cant.

(H) According to the account before from Ricaut, he seems to have been in great power about this time.

(I) Khafiz is a surname given by way of honour to those who can say the whole Korân by heart. Cant.

(K) This seems to have been the anonymous Wazîr mentioned above by Ricaut.

(L) Some say he was forced to burn his tents and provision, burst his guns, and throw them into the Euphrates. After which he was pursued with great loss by the enemy. Ricaut.

a capital *. But neither does this Wazîr answer the Soltân's expectations : for being ordered to A. D. 1627. march against the Persians, when he came into the neighbourhood of Arzerûm, Abâza Pâshâ, who lurked about that place, suspecting that, under the colour of a Persian expedition, an army was leading against him, returns to Arzerûm, which he had made the feat of arms, and furnished with provisions, as well as warlike stores.

HALIL PASHA taking this for a flight, leaves the Persian expedition (M), in order to crush Abâza's the rebels, quite dispirited, as he imagined ; and marching to that city, closely besieges it (N). success. But whilst he hoped to acquire fame with little labour, he procures disgrace with infinite trouble. For Abâza, who was by all esteemed the best soldier and wisest general of his time, bravely defended the city ; and having repulsed the enemy in an assault, unexpectedly attacks, with a b small but chosen band, the Othmân camp, instantly killed the guards, and struck the whole army with such terror, that a defeat easily followed. Thus numerous forces are vanquished by a handful of men, multitudes are slain, and many taken alive ; the Wazîr himself, after throwing away his arms, hardly escaping with a few attendants †.

THE Krim Tatars likewise gave no small trouble to the Porte at this time ; for they took Kâffa from the Turks ; who could find no better expedient to bring them to their duty, than Troubles in Krim. to forgive all past offences, on condition they restored that place again. This the Tatars readily agreed to, with a proviso, however, on their side, that the Soltân should impose no other Khân upon them, than him whom they had themselves elected.

BUT the great concern of the Porte being the rebellion in Asia ‡, Morâd, on the news of Abâza re-duced. c Halil Pâshâ's defeat, displaces him, and appointing Khosraw Pâshâ his Wazîr and general, sends him with supplies to the army, wintering in Diyârbekr, with orders to extinguish the flame, A. D. 1628. by attacking Abâza early in the spring. Khosraw Pâshâ, rendered more cautious by the miscarriage of his predecessor, besides assembling all his forces, provides the largest cannon ; and with them so shakes the walls of Arzerûm, that the frightened inhabitants deliver up their city, with the rebel, the fifth day of the siege (O). Hereupon the Pâshâ sends Abâza in chains to the Porte : but Morâd, in consideration of his heroical exploits and invincible courage, was unwilling to deprive the Othmân empire of so great an ornament. On his promise therefore to wipe out his former crimes, by drawing his sword against the Soltân's enemies, he is not only received into favour (P), but also made Beglerbeg of Bosnia ; as a proper person to secure d the empire on that side, in case any neighbouring power should invade it, whilst his master was employed in the Persian war.

THE civil disturbances being thus appeased, in the year 1039, Khosraw Pâshâ is sent with Hej. 1039. a fresh army against Bâghdâd (Q). The Wazîr, to remove the obstacles which his predecessors A. D. 1629. had met with, immediately goes into Asia, and makes great preparations the whole winter at Musol. In the spring, to cut off all relief from Bâghdâd, he enters the province of Irâk Arabi, governed by Zeynel Khân ; takes the castles, destroys those he cannot keep, and intirely quelling the rebellion, closely besieges Bâghdâd : but although he bravely assaulted the city for one-and-forty days, yet finding he could not prevail, he raised the siege, after sustaining considerable loss †.

c THE Christian historians tell us, with regard to this expedition, that the Wazîr being lured on by the feigned flight of the Persians, was brought at first under very great difficulties ; Defeats the Persians. but the experienced general having at length disintangled himself, encamped on the plain of A. D. 1630. Hamadân (R). There laying an ambush for the Persians, who he was informed designed to attack his camp, eight thousand of them were slain, though with the loss of many Turks, which made them averse to that service.

* RICAUT, ubi supr.

† CANT. p. 244.

‡ RICAUT, ubi supr.

b CANT. p. 245.

(M) The Christian writers tell us, that he did besiege Bâghdâd, but was forced to withdraw : yet that his army being reinforced, he entered Persia a second time, overthrew the Turkmâns, and then the Georgians, taking their general Merwe. After this, the Persians made new proposals of peace, offering to pay a large tribute in lieu of Bâghdâd ; but Morâd not approving thereof, Halil was recalled, and the Pâshâ of Diyârbekr made general. Ricaud.

(N) The Christian writers do not ascribe this siege to Halil Pâshâ, but to his successor : who, they say, was forced to this siege by the Janizaries, Abâza's inveterate enemies, whom the besieged hanged about the walls, when they took any of them prisoners.

(O) The Christian historians say, that the new Wazîr, by the Soltân's order, came to an amicable accommodation with Abâza, that he should continue Pâshâ of Arzerûm, his son of Bozra, and his lieutenant of Marash : after which, returning with the Wazîr to the Porte, he was honourably received. Ricaud.

(P) The pardon of this rebel is ascribed to Morâd as an unparalleled instance of clemency, by the Turkish historians, who study to put the best construction on their emperors actions. But others say, that he conditioned to depart out of the city with life and honour safe, and therefore could not be put to death. Cant. This is consistent with the Christian account.

(Q) About this time the Soltân appeared on horseback with his brother Ibrâhim by his side ; a very unusual sight, but the queen mother's order. A Turkish prince came into the world this year, and the great Bethlem Ghabor went out of it. Ricaud.

(R) One of the capitals of Persian Irâk, the antient Amatha, or Ekbatana.

A. D. 1630.

Siege of Bâghdâd raised with loss.

